9. Now let us look what righteouſneſs they have, whom we have ſet in the fourth rank. We grant that when God by means of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, reconcileth us to himſelf, and by giving us free forgiveneſs of ſins, accounteth us for righteous; and with this mercy, is alſo conjoined his beneficial working in us by his holy Spirit which dwelleth in us, by the power whereof the luſts of the fleſh are daily more and more mortified: but we are ſanctified, that is to ſay, hallowed to the Lord unto true purity of life, when our hearts are framed to the obedience of his law: that this may be our chief will, to keep his commandments, and by all means to advance only his glory. But even while we walk in the ways of the Lord, by the guiding of the holy Ghoſt, leſt we ſhould forget ourſelves and wax proud, there are left ſome remains of imperfection, to keep us ſtill humble. There is none righteous (ſaith the ſcripture, 1 Kings viii. 46.) that doth good and ſinneth not. What manner of righteouſneſs therefore will they get by their works? Firſt, I ſay, that the beſt work that can be brought forth by them, is always ſprinkled and corrupted with ſome uncleanneſs of the fleſh, and hath as it were ſome dregs mingled with it. I ſay, let a holy ſervant of God chooſe out of all his life the moſt excellent thing that he thinks he hath done in the whole courſe thereof, and let him well conſider all the parts of it, without doubt he will find ſomething in it ſavouring of the rottenneſs of the fleſh, becauſe to well-doing our chearful quickneſs is never ſuch as it ought to be, but in ſlackening our courſe our weakneſs is much. Although we ſee that there are ſome foul blots wherewith the works of believers are beſpotted, yea grant that they are but very ſmall, will they not offend the eyes of God, before whom even the ſtars are not clean? Thus have we ſhewed that there cometh not ſo much as one good work out of holy men, which if it be judged as it is in it ſelf deſerveth not ſhame.

If we could do any thing perfectly good, yet the evil which we do, would make it of no avail unto righteouſneſs, God judging us according to the rigour of the law which doth not require only ſome thing righteous, but forbiddeth every unrighteous thing under pain of death and condemnation.

10. Secondly, I ſay, though it were poſſible that we could have ſome thoroughly pure and perfect works, yet one ſin is enough to blot out and quench all remembrance of our former righteouſneſs, as the prophet ſaith, (Ezek. xviii. 24.) with whom alſo James agreeth: (Jam. ii. 10.) he that offendeth (ſaith he) in one point, is guilty of all. Now ſince this mortal life is never pure or free from ſin, whatever righteouſneſs we ſhould purchaſe, being corrupted, oppreſſed and loſt, by after ſins it could, not come into the ſight of God, nor be accounted to us for righteouſneſs. Finally, when the righteouſneſs of works is treated of, we muſt not have reſpect to the works of the law, but to the commandment. Therefore if we ſeek righteouſneſs by the law, we will in vain bring forth one or two good works, for a perpetual obedience of the law is neceſſary thereunto. Wherefore the Lord doth not only once (as many fooliſhly think) impute to us for righteouſneſs the forgiveneſs of ſins whereof we have ſpoken, that having once obtained pardon of our life paſt, we ſhould afterwards ſeek righteouſneſs by the law, becauſe he would only bring us into a falſe hope, and mock and laugh us to ſcorn. But as abſolute perfection is not attainable ſo long as we are clothed with this flesh, and since the law threateneth death and judgment to all them who perform not a full righteousness of works, it will always have something whereof to accuse and condemn us, unless the mercy of God on the other side withstand it, to acquit us from time to time with continual forgiveness of sins. Wherefore this standeth alway certain which we said at the beginning, that if we are judged by our own worth, whatever we propose or go about, yet with all our labours and endeavours we are worthy of death and destruction.

11. Upon these two points we must stand fast: that there never was any work of a godly man, which if it be examined by the strict judgment of God, but will be condemned. Again, if there be any such shew of good works, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted and defiled with sin, wherewith it is certain that the doer is laden, it loseth its grace. And this is the chief point of the matter in dispute. For about the beginning of justification there is no difference between us and the sounder sort of schoolmen, and we agree with them that a sinner being freely delivered from damnation obtaineth righteousness, by the forgiveness of sins; except in this, that they under the word justification comprehend the renewing wherewith we are newly formed by the Spirit of God unto the obedience of the law, and thus they describe the righteousness of a regenerate man. That man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is judged righteous before God by his good works, and by their merits is accepted. But the Lord saith on the contrary (Rom. iv. 13.) that he imputed faith to Abraham for righteousness, not at the time when he yet served idols, but after he had many years excelled in holiness of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed that obedience of the law which can be performed by a mortal man, yet he hath righteousness reposed in faith. Whence we gather, according to the argument of Paul, (Rom. iv. 4.) that it was not of works. Likewise when it is said in the prophet: The just shall live by faith, it is not spoken of wicked and prophane men, whom the Lord justifieth by converting them to the faith, but the speech is directed to believers, and to them life is promised by faith. Paul also taketh away all doubt, when for confirming of that sentence, he taketh this verse of David: (Psal. xxxii. 2.) Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. But it is certain, that David speaketh not of the wicked, but of believers, such as himself was: because he spake from the feeling of his own conscience. Therefore we must not have this blessedness once in our life, but maintain it through the whole course thereof. Last of all he testifieth (2Cor. v. 18.) that the embassy concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one day or two, but is perpetual in the church. Therefore believers have even to the end of their life no other righteousness than that which is there set forth. For Christ everlastingly remaineth a Mediator to reconcile the Father to us, and the efficacy of his death is everlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, and finally perfect obedience, wherewith all our iniquities are covered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, we derive the beginning of our salvation from grace, but that we are saved by grace, not of works, that no man should boast.

The shifts of the schoolmen in maintaining the righteousness of good works.

12. The lurking holes which the schoolmen here seek to escape by, will not deliver them. They say that good works are not by any inward worth in themselves of so great value, that they can be sufficient to purchase righteousness, but they say, that they are of so great value, through grace accepting of them. Then, because they are driven to confess that the righteousness of works in this life is always imperfect, they grant, that so long as we live, we need the forgiveness of sins, whereby the want of works is supplied: but that the sins which are committed, are recompenced with works of supererogation. But I answer, that accepting grace as they call it, is nothing else than the free goodness wherewith the Father embraceth us in Christ, when he clotheth us with the innocence of Christ, and accounteth it ours, that by the beneficial means thereof he may receive and accept us as holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousness of Christ (which as it is only perfect, so it only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our stead, and presented at the bar as our surety. And being furnished herewith we obtain the continual forgiveness of our sins through faith. With the purity whereof the impurity, and filthiness of our imperfections being covered they are not imputed unto us; but are hidden, as if they were buried, that they may not come into the judgment of God, until the hour come when the old man being slain and utterly destroyed in us, the goodness of God shall receive us into blessed peace with the second Adam, where let us look for the day of the Lord, in which receiving incorruptible bodies, we shall be removed into the glory of his heavenly kingdom.

The imperfection of our works is not supplied either by works of supererogation or satisfaction.

13. If these things be true, then surely no works of ours can of themselves make us acceptable and pleasing to God: neither can our works themselves please, but in this respect that being covered with the righteousness of Christ, they please God, and obtain forgiveness of our sins. For God hath not promised the reward of eternal life to some certain works, but only faith (Levit. xviii. 5.) that he who doth these things shall live: denouncing a curse against all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the contrivance of a righteousness in part is fully confuted, since no other righteousness is admitted into heaven, but an observing of the whole law. And no sounder is that doctrine which they say is capable of supplying the want of works, by works of supererogation. For do they not still return to the same place from whence they are already shut out: that he who keepeth the law in part, is by works so far righteous. And shamefully take that for granted, which no man of sound judgment will allow them. The Lord often testifieth that he acknowlegeth no righteousness of works, but in the perfect observing of his law. What obstinacy then is it, that when we are destitute of that obedience, lest we should appeared divested of all glorying and to have given place altogether to God, we boast of I know not what, some small remnants of a few works, and go about by satisfactions to redeem what is wanting. Satisfactions have been already overthrown, and therefore we ought not so much as dream of them. Only this I say, that they who play the fool so, do not consider how detestable a thing sin is before God: for then they would understand that the whole righteousness of men being laid in a heap, is not sufficient to make recompence for one sin. And we see, (Gen. iii. 17.) that man was for one offence cast away and so utterly forsaken of God, that he lost all means to recover salvation: therefore the power of satisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themselves, and it is a most certain truth that they will never satisfy God, to whom nothing is pleasant or acceptable which proceedeth from his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purposeth to impute sin. Therefore our sins must be covered and forgiven, before the Lord can have respect to any work of ours. Whence it followeth that the forgiveness of sins is of free grace, which they wickedly blaspheme who trust in any satisfactions. Let us therefore, after the example of the apostle, (Phil. iii. 13. 14.) forgetting those things that are behind, and hasting forward to those things which are before, run on our race, endeavouring to obtain the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Works of supererogation are works which we cannot work.

14. But how doth the boasting of works of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught us, (Luke xvii. 10.) that when we have done all things which are commanded us, we should say that we are unprofitable servants, and that we have done no more than we ought? To say or confess before God, is not to feign or lie, but to determine with thy self, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commanded us unfeignedly to think and consider with ourselves, that we do not any free and profitable actions unto him, but render due service. And very justly. For we are servants owing him so many services, that we are not able to discharge them, though all our thoughts and all our members, were turned into dutiful deeds of the law. And therefore that which he saith, when ye have done all things that are commanded you, &c. is as much in effect, as if the righteousness of one man were more than all the righteousness of men. How therefore can (we who are very far distant from this mark) be so bold as to boast that we have added a heap to the full measure? Neither is there any reason why any man may take exception and say, there is nothing which hindereth his endeavour to go beyond necessary duties, which in some measure supersedeth those that are necessary. For this we must hold fast and maintain that we can imagine nothing that availeth either to the worship or the love of God, which is not comprehended under the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let us not boast of a voluntary liberality, when we are bound by necessity.

We do no more unto God than we owe: if we do that which he requireth not, it is such as we cannot hope that ever he will reward.

15. And for this purpose that glorying of Paul, (2 Cor. vi. 1.) is alleged out of season. That among the Corinthians he did of his own will give up a part of his right, which otherwise he might have used if he had inclined so to do, and that he employed upon them, not only so much as he ought for duty to have done, but also gave them his free and voluntary labour beyond the bounds of his his duty. But they ſhould have obſerved the reaſon there expreſſed, that he did this leſt he ſhould be an offence to the weak. For falſe and deceitful workmen boaſted of this alluring ſhew of liberality, that they might procure a favourable reception to their poiſonous doctrines, and raiſe up a hatred againſt the goſpel, ſo that Paul was neceſſitated either to bring the doctrine of Chriſt into danger, or to meet with ſuch craftineſs. Go to: if it be an indifferent thing to a Chriſtian to run into offence, when he may refrain it, then I grant that the apoſtle did ſomething of a ſupererogation for the Lord. But if this was required by right of a wiſe and prudent diſtributer of the grace of the goſpel, then I ſay that he did only what was his duty to do. Finally, although there appear no ſuch cauſe, yet this ſaying of Chryſoſtome is ſtill true, that all our good actions are in the ſame condition with the goods of ſlaves, which it is certain are their maſter's by the law. And Chriſt hath declared the ſame in the parable. (Luke xvii. 7.) For he aſks what thanks we will give a bond ſervant, when havingbeen all the day occupied in ſundry labours he returneth home to us in the evening. Yea it is poſſible, that he hath laboured with greater diligence than we durſt have required. Be it ſo: yet he hath done nothing but what he ought to have done by his ſtate of bondage, for he with his whole ability is ours. I ſpeak not of what kind their ſupererogations are, which theſe men will boaſt of to God: for they are ſuch trifles, as he neither hath at any time commanded, or approved, nor will he allow them when account ſhall be made before him. In this ſenſe only will we grant that they are works of ſupererogation, as it is expreſſed in the prophet, who hath required theſe things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place ſpoken of theſe things: wherefore do ye ſpend your money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which ſatisfieth not? It is not very hard indeed for theſe idle Rabbins to diſpute under the ſhadow in a ſoft chair: but when the ſovereign judge ſhall ſit in his judgment ſeat, ſuch windy decrees muſt neceſſarily vaniſh away. This only is to be ſought, what certain truſt of defence we may bring before his judgment ſeat, not what we may talk of in ſchools and corners.

We muſt beware of truſting unto, and of glorying in our works.

16. In this matter there are chiefly two plagues to be driven out of our minds: firſt, that we place no confidence in the righteouſneſs of works. And ſecondly, that we aſcribe no part of glory to them. The ſcriptures do every where drive us from all manner of confidence in them, when they teach that our righteouſneſſes ſtink in the ſight of God, unleſs they receive a good ſavour from the innocence of Chriſt; and that they provoke the vengeance of God, unleſs they be ſuſtained by the tenderneſs of his mercy. Moreover they leave us nothing, but that we ſhould crave the mercy of our judge, with that confeſſion of David, (Pſal. cxliii. 2.) that none ſhould be juſtified before him, if he require an account of his ſervants. But where Job ſaith: if I have done wickedly, wo unto me: but if I do righteouſly, yet I will not lift up my head: though he mean that moſt high righteouſneſs of God, whereunto the very angels anſwer not: yet he therewithal ſheweth that when they come to the judgment of God, there remaineth nothing for all men, but to hold their peace as dumb. For his meaning here is, that he had rather willingly yield, than dangerouſly ſtrive with the ſeverity of God: and alſo that he felt no other righteouſneſs in himſelf, but ſuch as at the firſt moment ſhould fall before the ſight of God. When truſt and confidence is driven away, all glorying muſt alſo neceſſarily depart. For who can give the praiſe of righteouſneſs to theſe works, the confidence whereof trembleth before the ſight of God? We muſt therefore come whither Iſaiah calleth us, (Iſa. xlvi. 13.) that all the ſeed of Iſrael may be praiſed and glory in God: becauſe it is moſt true which he ſaith in another place, (Iſa. lxi. 3.) that we are the planting of the glory of God. Our mind therefore ſhall then rightly be purged, when it ſhall neither in any manner reſt upon the confidence of works, nor rejoice in the glory of them. This error encouraged fooliſh men to the puffing up of this falſe and lying confidence, that they always place the cauſe of their ſalvation in works.

Works no way the cauſe of ſalvation.

17. But if we look to the four kinds of cauſes, which philoſophers deſire us to conſider in the effect of things, we will find that none of theſe cauſes agree with works in the ſecuring of our ſalvation. For the ſcripture every where reports that the procuring cauſe of eternal life to us, is the mercy of the heavenly Father and his free love toward us; the material cauſe is Chriſt with his obedience, by which he purchaſed righteouſneſs for us; and what ſhall we ſay is the formal or inſtrumental cauſe, but faith? And theſe three cauſes John comprehendeth together in one ſentence, when he

faith, (John iii. 16.) God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that every one who believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. And the final cause the apostle testifieth to be the shewing forth of the righteousness of God and the praise of his goodness: where he mentions also the other three in express words. For he saith to the Romans: (Rom. iii. 23, 24.) all have sinned and come short of the glory of God: but they are justified freely by his grace. Here you have the head and first fountain, namely that God embraceth us with his free mercy. Then followeth: through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. Here you have as it were the matter whereof righteousness is made for us, through faith in his blood. Here is shewed the instrumental cause, whereby the righteousness of Christ is applied to us. Last of all he joineth the end, when he saith, To declare his righteousness: that he may be just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus. And (to touch by the way that this righteousness consists in reconciliation) he says expressly by name, that Christ was given to us for reconciliation. So in the first chapter also to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are received into the favour of God by mere mercy; and that the same is effected, by the intercession of of Christ; received by faith, and all for this purpose that the glory of the goodness of God may fully shine. Now when we see that all the parts of our salvation are without us, what cause is there that we should either have confidence or glory in works? Or can even the most inveterate enemies of the grace of God quarrel with us about the efficient or final cause, unless they will deny the whole scripture. On the material and formal cause they cast a false gloss, as if our works had a half place with faith and the righteousness of Christ. And this they teach tho' the scriptures cry out against them, which simply affirms both that Christ is to us for righteousness and life, and that this benefit of righteousness is possessed by faith only.

Why believers comfort themselves in a consciousness of their own uprightness.

18. But whereas believers do often strengthen and comfort themselves with the remembrance of their own innocency and uprightness, and sometimes also forbear not to speak of it with praise, this is done two ways: either that by comparing their good cause with the evil cause of the wicked, they may find an assured trust of victory, not so much to commend their own righteousness, as to condemn their adversaries: or that even without comparing themselves to others, while they record themselves before God, the purity of their consciences brings them both some comfort and trust. Of the first of these two ways, we shall speak hereafter: now let us briefly declare, how the latter agrees with what is said above, that in the judgment of God we must put no trust, in works nor glory upon an opinion of them. This is the agreement that believers, when it concerns the founding and stablishing of their salvation, do without any respect to works turn their eyes to the goodness of God only. And they not only look to it afore all things as the beginning of blessedness, but rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and established, is also established with a consideration of works: namely so far as they witness God dwelling and reigning in us. Therefore seeing this trust in works hath no place, unless thou hast first placed the whole confidence of thy mind upon the mercy of God: it ought not to seem contrary to that whereupon it depends. When we exclude confidence or trust in works, we mean only this, that a Christian must not incline to the merit of works, as thinking them any way helpful to salvation, but should thoroughly rest in the free promise of righteousness. But we do not forbid him it to prop and strengthen this faith with the signs of the good will of God toward himself. For if all the good gifts which God hath bestowed upon us, when they are kept in remembrance, are as it were beams of the face of God, by which we are enlightned to behold that sovereign light of goodness: much more is the grace of good works, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is given us.

The comfort which good men conceive by a consciousness of their integrity is grounded upon the knowlege of righteousness without respect of works.

19. Therefore when believers by innocency of conscience confirm their faith, and gather matter of rejoicing, they do nothing but call to mind by the fruit of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore which is taught by Solomon, (Prov. xiv. 26.) that in the fear of the Lord is strong confidence. And this that sometimes the holy ones use this protestation, to the intent that they may be heard of the Lord, that they have walked before his face in uprightness and simplicity: have no place in laying the foundation of stablishing of conscience: but are then only of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that fear is no where which may establish a full assuredness, and the holy ones are privy in their conscience of such such an uprightneſs, wherewith are yet mingled many remnants of the fleſh. But foraſmuch as of the fruits of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghoſt dwelling in them, they do thereby not ſlenderly ſtrengthen themſelves to look for the help of God in all their neceſſities, when they by experience find him their Father in ſo great a matter. And even this alſo they cannot do, unleſs they have firſt conceived the goodneſs of God, ſealed with no other aſſuredneſs, than of the promiſe. For if they begin to weigh it by good works, nothing ſhall be more uncertain nor more weak: foraſmuch as if works be conſidered by themſelves, they ſhall no leſs by their imperfection ſhew proof of the wrath of God, than they do with howſoever imperfect pureneſs teſtify his good will. Finally they do ſo ſet out the benefits of God, that yet they turn not away from the free favour of God, in which Paul teſtifieth (Eph. iii. 18.) that there is the length, breadth, depth, and height of them: as if he ſhould ſay: whitherſoever the ſenſes of the godly do turn themſelves, how high ſoever they climb, how far and wide ſoever they extend them, yet they ought not to go out of the love of Chriſt, but hold themſelves wholly in the meditation thereof, becauſe it comprehendeth all kinds of meaſures in it. And therefore he ſaith that it excelleth and ſurmounteth above all knowlege: and that when we acknowlege how much Chriſt hath loved us, we are fulfilled into all the fulneſs of God. As in another place, when he glorieth that all the godly are vanquiſhers in battle, he by and by addeth a reaſon, (Rom. viii. 37.) becauſe of him that loved us.

If we do good it is God's doing and not ours, and with the good which is his, there is much evil of ours mingled.

20. We ſee now that there is not in the holy ones that affiance of works, which either giveth any thing to the merit of them (foraſmuch as they regard them no otherwiſe than as ſigns of their calling, whereby they may think upon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from the free righteouſneſs which we obtain in Chriſt, foraſmuch as it hangeth upon it, and ſtandeth not without it. The ſame thing doth Auguſtine in few words, but very well ſet out where he writeth, I do not ſay to the Lord, deſpiſe not the works of my hands, or I have ſought the Lord with my hands and have not been deceived. But I do not commend the works of my hands: for I fear, leſt when you have looked upon them, you will find moe ſins than merits: only this I ſay, this I aſk, this I deſire, deſpiſe not the works of thy hands, behold in me thy work, not mine. For if thou beholdeſt mine, thou damneſt me, if thou beholdeſt thine, thou crowneſt me. For alſo whatever good works I have, they are of thee. He mentioneth two cauſes, why he dare not boaſt of his works to God, becauſe if he hath any good works, he ſeeth nothing of his own therein: ſecondly, becauſe the ſame is alſo overwhelmed with a multitude of ſins. Whereupon it comes to paſs that the conſcience feeleth thereby more fear and diſmay than aſſurance. Therefore he would have God no otherwiſe to look on his good actions, than that acknowleging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the work which he hath begun.

In what ſenſe the good which we do, is termed a cauſe of that good which God doth unto them.

21. But furthermore whereas the ſcripture ſheweth that the good works of believers are cauſes why the Lord doth good to them, that is to be underſtood in ſuch a way as not to overturn the doctrine formerly taught, to wit, that the effect of our ſalvation conſiſteth in the love of God the Father: the matter, in the obedience of the Son: the inſtrument, in the enlightening of the holy Ghoſt, that is to ſay, in faith: that the end is the glory of this great kindneſs of God. Theſe things hinder not, but that the Lord may embrace works as inferior cauſes. But whence comes that? Namely they whom the Lord of his mercy hath appointed to the inheritance of eternal life, he with his ordinary diſpenſation by good works brings into the poſſeſſion thereof. That which goeth before in order of diſpenſation, he calleth the cauſe of that which followeth. After this manner, (Rom. viii. 30.) he ſometimes makes eternal life to flow from works: not becauſe it is to be aſcribed to them: but becauſe whom he hath choſen, them he juſtifies, that he may at length glorify them; he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a ſtep toward that which followeth, after a certain manner the cauſe of it. But as oft as he hath occaſion to aſſign the true cauſe, he commandeth us not to flee to works, but inſiſts upon us to think only upon the mercy of God. For what is this which he teacheth by the apoſtle. (Rom. vi. 23.) The reward of ſin is death: the the grace of the Lord, is life everlaſting? Why doth he not ſet righteouſneſs in oppoſition to ſin, as he ſets life againſt death? Why doth he not make righteouſneſs the cauſe of life, as he maketh ſin the cauſe of death? For ſo ſhould the compariſon of contraries have ſtood well together, which is much broken by this turning. But the apoſtle meant by this compariſon to expreſs that which was truth, that death is due to the deſervings of men: that life is laid up only in the mercy of God. Finally in theſe forms of ſpeaking the order is rather expreſſed than the cauſe: becauſe God in heaping graces upon graces, taketh cauſe of the firſt to add the ſecond, that he may leave nothing undone to the enriching of his ſervants: and he ſo continually extendeth his liberality, that yet he would have us always look unto the free election which is the fountain and beginning of it. For though he love the gifts which he daily giveth, becauſe they ſpring out of that fountain: yet it is our part to hold faſt that free acceptation, which alone is able to ſupport our ſouls: and as for the gifts of his Spirit which he afterwards giveth us, we muſt join them in ſuch a manner to the firſt cauſe, that they ſhall not any way leſſen it.

CHAP. XV.

That thoſe things which are commonly boaſted concerning the merits of works, overthrow the praiſe of God in giving righteouſneſs, as alſo the aſſurance of ſalvation.

Whether works though not juſtifying may notwithſtanding merit.

WE have now ſhewed what is the chief point in this matter: that if righteouſneſs be upheld with works, it muſt immediately fall down in the ſight of God: it is contained in the mercy of God only, the communicating of Chriſt only, and therefore in faith only. But, let us carefully obſerve that this is the chief ſupport of the matter, leſt we be entangled in that general error, not only of the common people, but alſo of learned men. For ſo ſoon as the queſtion is propoſed concerning juſtification by faith or works, they flee to thoſe places which ſeem to attribute ſome merit to works, in the ſight of God: as though the juſtification of works were fully won, if it be once proved that they are of any value with God. But we have plainly ſhewed above that the righteouſneſs of works conſiſteth only in the perfect keeping of the law. Whereupon it followeth that no man is juſtified by works, but he who having attained to the height of perfection cannot be proved guilty of any offence be it never ſo little. Therefore it is another and a ſeparate queſtion, That though works are not ſufficient to juſtify a man, whether they do not deſerve favour with God?

The name of merit though uſed by the ancient fathers without prejudice to the truth might nevertheleſs have better been ſpared.

2. Firſt of the name of merit I muſt needs ſay this before hand, that whoever firſt applied it to the works of men compared to the judgment of God, he took very little care of the purity of faith. Truly for my part I would willingly drop any ſtrife about words but I could wiſh that this ſobriety had alway been obſerved among chriſtian writters, and that their hearts had not allowed them to uſe words foreign to the meaning of ſcripture, which produce much offence and no fruit. For to what purpoſe, I beſeech you, was it neceſſary to have the name of Merit brought in, when the price of good works might without offence, be properly expreſſed by another name? But what offence that word contains in it, is evident by the great hurt the world has ſuffered by it. And ſurely as it is a moſt arrogant expreſſion, it can do nothing but darken the grace of God, and fill men with pride. The old writers of the church, I grant have commonly uſed it, and I would to God they had not with the abuſing of one little word, given poſterity a foundation for an error. Although they themſelves in many places teſtify, that in no ways they meant to prejudice the truth. For thus ſaith Auguſtin in one place, De prædeſt. Sanct. Let the merits of men hold their peace, which have periſhed by Adam: and let the grace of God reign, by Jeſus Chriſt. Again, (Pſalm. cxxxix.) the ſaints attribute nothing to their own merits: they will give all to nothing elſe, but to thy mercy, O God. In another place, (Pſal lxxxviii.) When man ſees that whatever good he hath, he hath it not from himſelf, but from his God, he ſees that all which is praiſed in him, is not of his own merits, but of the mercy of God. You may here ſee, how by taking from men the power of doing well, he throws down the dignity and worth of merits. And Chryſoſtom ſaith, (Hom. 33. in Gen.) Our works, if there be any, which are conſequent to the free calling of God, are repayment and debt: but the gifs of God are grace, bounty, bounty, and the height of liberality. But leaving the name, let us rather look upon the thing. I have before cited a ſentence out of Bernard, as it is a ſufficient merit, not to preſume on merits: ſo to want merits, is enough to condemn us. But by adding an explanation immediately, he ſufficiently ſoftens the harſhneſs of the expreſſion, where he ſaith: therefore take care to have merits: when thou haſt them, know that they are given thee as a hope of fruit, thou art to reap, even the mercy of God: and ſo thou haſt eſcaped all danger, of poverty, unthankfulneſs, and preſumption. Happy is the church which neither wanteth merits without preſumption, nor hath preſumption without merits. And he had a little before largely ſhewn, how godly a meaning he uſed. For of merits (ſaith he) why ſhould the church be careful, which hath a more ſtedfaſt and ſurer cauſe to glory in, even the purpoſe of God? God cannot deny himſelf, he will do that which he hath promiſed. If there be no cauſe why thou ſhouldſt aſk, by what merits we may hope for good things? eſpecially ſince you hear it ſaid, (Ezek. xxxvi. 22.) Not for your ſakes, but for my ſake: it is a ſufficient merit, to know that merits are not ſufficient.

Our works ſhall have reward, they deſerve none.

4. What our works deſerve, the ſcripture ſhews, when it ſaith that they cannot abide the ſight of God, becauſe they are full of uncleanneſs; then, what the perfect obſerving of the law (if any ſuch could be found) ſhall deſerve, when it teacheth (Luke xvii. 10.) that we ſhould think ourſelves unprofitable ſervants, when we have done all things that are commanded us? becauſe we have given nothing freely to the Lord, but only performed our due ſervices, to which there is no thanks to be given. But thoſe good works which he himſelf hath given us, the Lord both calleth ours and teſtifieth that they are not only acceptable to him, but alſo that they ſhall have a reward. It is our duty again on our part, to be encouraged with ſo great a promiſe, and to ſtrengthen our hearts, that we be not wearied with well doing, and to give ſincere and hearty thanks to the great bounty of God. It is certain that it flows from the grace of God, whatever there is in works that deſerves praiſe; and that there is not one drop, which we ought properly to aſcribe to ourſelves. If we truly and ſincerely acknowlege this, then vaniſhes away not only all confidence, but alſo all opinion of merit. We (I ſay) do not divide the praiſe of good works (as the Sophiſters do) between God and man: but we preſerve it whole, perfect, and undiminiſhed to the Lord. Only this we aſſign to man, that even the ſelf-ſame works that were good, he corrupts and defiles by his uncleanneſs. For nothing cometh out of man, how perfect ſoever he be, that is not defiled with ſome ſpot and ſtain. Therefore, let the Lord judge even theſe things that are beſt in the works of men, and he will ſoon ſee his own righteouſneſs in them, and mans diſhoneſty and ſhame. Good works therefore pleaſe God and are not unprofitable to the doers of them, becauſe they receive for a reward the moſt unlimited and ample benefits of God: not becauſe they deſerve it, but becauſe the goodneſs of God hath of itſelf ſet this price upon them. But what ſpitefulneſs is this, that men not contented with the liberality of God, which gives unmerited rewards to works that deſerve no ſuch thing, with a ſacrilegious ambition do ſtill endeavour what in them lies, to make that which flows wholly from the liberality of God, ſeem to be paid to the merits of men. I here appeal to the common opinion of every man; if any man who hath a liberty of taking a profit in a piece of ground by another mans liberal grant, ſhould alſo claim to himſelf the title of propriety: doth he not by ſuch unthankfulneſs deſerve to loſe the very poſſeſſion which he had? Likewiſe, if a ſlave made free by his maſter, hide the lowneſs of his condition as being a Libertine, and boaſt that he is a free-man born: does he not deſerve to be brought back into his former bondage? For this is the proper way of enjoying a benefit, if we neither claim to ourſelves more than what is given, nor defraud the author of the benefit of his praiſe: and rather behave ourſelves in ſuch a manner, that what he hath given from himſelf to us, may ſeem after a certain manner to remain with him. If this moderation ought to be obſerved towards men, let all men obſerve and conſider what kind of moderation is due to God.

A Libertine is he who is free by manumiſſion, not by birth.

4. I know that theſe wrangling diſputants abuſe certain places, to prove thereby that the name of merit toward God is found in the ſcriptures. They allege a ſentence out of Eccleſiaſticus, (Eccle. xvi. 14.) Make way for every work of mercy: for every man ſhall find according to his works. And out of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, for-

Teſtimonies abuſed for proof of merits: whereas the doctrine of ſcripture doth indeed teach the contrary that our good works deſerve nothing

get not to do good and to communicate, for with ſuch ſacrifices God is well pleaſed. As for my power in reſiſting the authority of Eccleſiaſticus, I now quit it. Yet I deny that they faithfully quote that which Eccleſiaſticus, (what ever kind of writer he was) hath written. For the Greek copy is thus: πάσῃ ἐλεημοσύνῃ ποιήσει τοπον, ἑκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αυτοῦ ἐυρήσει. He ſhall make place to every mercy, and every man ſhall find according to his works. And that this is the true text, which is corrupted in the Latin tranſlation, appeareth both by the framing of theſe words, and by a longer joining together of the ſentence going before. In the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, (Heb. xiii. 16.) there is no cauſe why they ſhould inſnare us in one little word, when in the Greek words of the apoſtle nothing elſe is ſaid but that ſuch ſacrifices pleaſe and are acceptable to God. This alone ought fully to ſubdue and beat down the haughtineſs of our pride, and hinder us from arrogating any worth to works beyond the rule of ſcripture. Now the doctrine of the ſcripture is, that all our good works are continually beſprinkled with many filthy ſpots, wherewith God is very juſtly offended and angry with us; ſo far from being able to win him to us, or to provoke his liberality toward us: Yet becauſe out of his tender kindneſs he doth not examine themby the rigour of the law, he accepteth them as if they were moſt pure, and therefore though without merit, he rewardeth them with infinite benefits both of this preſent life and of the life to come. For I do not allow this diſtinction uſed by men otherwiſe learned and godly, that good works deſerve the graces that are given us in this life, and that eternal life is the reward of faith alone. For the Lord doth commonly always place the reward of labours and the crown of battle in heaven. Again, to ſay that the Lord heapeth us with graces upon graces, and to aſcribe this to the merit ofworks and take it away from his grace is againſt the doctrine of the ſcripture. For though Chriſt ſaith, (Matth. xxv. 21. and 23.) to him who hath, ſhall be given, and that the faithful and good ſervant who hath ſhewed himſelf faithful in few things, ſhall be ſet over many: yet he alſo ſheweth in another place, (Iſai. lv. 1.) that the increaſes of the faithful are the gifts of his free goodneſs. All ye that thirſt (ſaith he) come to the waters: and ye that have no money, come and buy milk and honey without money and without any price. Whatſoever therefore is now given to believers to promote their ſalvation, yea and bleſſedneſs itſelf, is the mere liberality of God: yet both in this and in thoſe he teſtifieth that he regards and reſpects works: becauſe to teſtify the greatneſs of his love toward us, he vouchſafeth to grant ſuch honour not only to us, but alſo to the gifts which he hath given us.

Chriſt is ſuch a foundation that being built upon him we cannot place any thing upon the worth of our own works.

5. If theſe things had in paſt ages been handled and diſpoſed in ſuch order as they ought to have been, there would never riſen ſo many troubles and diſſenſions. Paul ſaith, (1 Cor. iii. 11.) that in the building up of the chriſtian doctrine, we muſt keep ſtill that foundation which he had laid among the Corinthians, beſides which no other can be laid: and that the ſame foundation is Jeſus Chriſt. What kind of a foundation have we in Chriſt? Is it that he was to us the beginning of ſalvation: and that the completing thereof ſhould follow of ourſelves? and hath he but only opened the way, by which we ſhould go forward on our own ſtrength? No: but, as he ſaid a little before, when we acknowlege him, he is to us righteouſneſs. No man therefore is well founded in Chriſt, but he who hath a complete righteouſneſs in him: foraſmuch as the apoſtle ſaith (1 Cor. i. 30.) not that he was ſent to help us to obtain righteouſneſs, but that he himſelf might be our righteouſneſs. Namely, (Eph. i. 4.) that we are choſen in him from eternity before the making of the world, by no deſerving of ours, but according to the purpoſe of the good pleaſure of God: (Col. i. 14.) that by his death we have redemption, and are delivered from deſtruction: that in him we are adopted by our heavenly Father as children and heirs: that by his blood we are reconciled to the Father: (John x. 28.) that being given to him to be kept we are delivered from all danger of periſhing and being loſt: that being ingraffed in him, we are already after a certain manner partakers of eternal life, being entred into the kingdom of God by hope: and yet more, that having obtained ſuch a partaking of him, though we be fools in ourſelves, he is wiſdom for us before God: though we be ſinners, he is righteouſneſs for us: though we be impure, he is purity for us: though we be weak, unarmed and lying open in danger of Satan, yet ours is the power (Matth. xxviii. 18.) which is given him in heaven and earth, whereby he may tread down Satan for us, and break the gates of hell: though we ſtill carry about with us the body of death, yet he is life for us: briefly that all his things are ours, and we have all things in him, in ourſelves nothing. Upon this foundation, I ſay it is abſolutely neceſſary that we be built, if we will grow up into a holy temple to the Lord.

Being without Chriſt we can do no work that pleaſeth God: being in him we are not only endued with an ability to merit ſalvation for ourſelves but poſſeſt with that righteouſneſs and life which Chriſt hath merited for us.

6. But the world hath a long time been taught otherwiſe. For there hath been found out I know not what moral good works, by which men may be made acceptable to God before they be graffed into Chriſt. As if the ſcripture lieth, when it ſaith, (1 John v. 12.) that they are all in death who have not poſſeſſed the Son. If they be dead, how can they bring forth works unto life? As though it were of no weight now, which is ſaid in (Rom. xiv. 23.) that whatſoever is not of faith, is ſin: as though there could be good fruits of an evil tree. What have theſe moſt peſtilent and wrangling diſputants left to Chriſt wherein he may ſhew forth his power? They ſay he hath merited the firſt grace for us, namely the occaſion of deſerving: and that it is our part now not to neglect the opportunity offered. O deſperate ſhameleſſneſs of ungodlineſs. Who would have thought that men profeſſing the name of Chriſt, durſt have thus ſtripped him of his power, and in a manner tread him under foot? This teſtimony is every where ſpoken of him, that all are juſtified who believe in him: theſe men teach, that there ariſeth from him no other benefit, but this, that the way is opened to every man to juſtify himſelf. But I would to God they taſted what theſe ſayings mean: (1 John v. 12.) that all they have life who have the Son of God: (John v. 24.) that whoſoever believeth, is paſſed from death unto life: (Rom. iii. 24.) that we are juſtified by his grace, that we might be made heirs of eternal life: (1 John iv. 12.) that the faithful have Chriſt abiding in them, by whom they cleave faſt to God: (Eph. ii. 6.) that they who are partakers of his life, ſit with him in heavenly places: (Col. i. 13.) that they are tranſplanted into the kingdom of God, and have obtained ſalvation; and innumerable other ſuch paſſages. For they do not ſay, that by the faith of Chriſt there cometh nothing but the power to obtain righteouſneſs or ſalvation, but that they are both given to us. Therefore ſo ſoon as thou art by faith ingraffed into Chriſt, thou art already made the Son of God, an heir of heaven, a partaker of righteouſneſs, a poſſeſſor of life, and (that their lies may be better confuted) thou haſt not obtained a proper ability to deſerve, but even all the deſervings of Chriſt: for they are communicated to thee.

The ſchoolmen though for faſhion ſake granting righteouſneſs by faith in ſome ſort, nevertheleſs to eſtabliſh merits aſcribe unto man's free will, that whereby the grace and glory of God is much impaired, and mens conſciences bereaved of all truſt in the favourable acceptance of God.

7. So the ſchools of the Jeſuits, the mothers of all errors, have taken from us the juſtification of faith which is the ſum of all godlineſs. They grant indeed in words, that man is juſtified by formed faith: but this they afterward explain to be, becauſe good works ſo far partake of the nature of faith, that they contribute to righteouſneſs: ſo that they ſeem in a manner to name faith in a way of mockery and deriſion, ſince without great envy it could not be paſſed over in ſilence, ſeeing it is ſo oft repeated in the ſcripture. And not yet contented, they do in the praiſe of good works privily ſteal from God ſomething to give away to man. And becauſe they ſee that good works contribute little to advance man, and that they cannot be properly called merits, if they are reckoned the fruits of the grace of God: they pick them out of the ſtrength of free will. Oil forſooth out of a ſtone. And they deny not indeed that the principal cauſe of them is in grace: but they affirm that thereby free-will is not excluded, from all merit. And this not only the latter ſophiſters teach but alſo their Pythagoras, Lombard, whom if you compare with theſe men, you may ſay to be found witted and ſober. It was truly a point of ſtrange blindneſs, that when they had Auguſtine ſo oft in their mouth, they ſaw not with how great caution that man took care that no part of the glory of good works were it never ſo little, ſhould be conveyed to men. Here (Lib. 2. diſt. 28.) before where he had treated of free-will, we cited ſome teſtimonies of his to this purpoſe, and there are oftentimes found many expreſſions of the ſame kind in his writings, as when he forbids us on Pſal. cxliv. to boaſt of our merits, becauſe even they alſo are the gifts of God: and when he writes (Epiſt. 105.) that all our merit is only of grace, that it is not gotten by our ſufficiency, ency, but is all made by grace, &c. It is no wonder that Lombard was blind at the light of the ſcripture, in which it appeareth that he was not well verſed. Yet nothing can be deſired more plain againſt him and his diſciples, than this word of the apoſtle. (Eph. ii. 10.) For when he forbids Chriſtians all glorying, he adds the reaſon why it is not lawful to glory; becauſe we are the workmanſhip of God, created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works, that we ſhould walk in them. Since therefore there cometh out of us no good thing, but in ſo far as we are regenerate: and our regeneration is wholly of God without exception: there is no right why we ſhould claim to ourſelves the ſmalleſt degree of good works. Finally whereas they continually call upon good works, in the mean time they ſo inſtruct conſciences, that they never dare have any confidence or hope, that God is well pleaſed and favourable to their works. But we on the contrary, without making mention of any merit, do by our doctrine raiſe up the courage of believers with ſingular comfort, when we teach that in their works they pleaſe God, and are undoubtedly acceptable unto him. And alſo we require here that no man attempt or go about any work without faith, that is to ſay, unleſs we do firſt with aſſured confidence of mind determine that he ſhall pleaſe God.

The doctrine of free juſtification without reſpect of works an effectual ground to miniſter both courage in doing well, and comfort in ſuffering.

8. Wherefore let us not ſuffer our ſelves to be led ſo much as a hair breadth away from this only foundation: which being now laid, wiſe builders do afterward well and orderly build upon it. For if there be need of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in mind, (1 John iii. 8. 9.) that the Son of God hath appeared for this end, that he might deſtroy the works of the devil: that they who are of God ſhould not ſin. (1 Pet. iv. 3.) that the time paſt is enough for fulfilling the deſires of the Gentiles: (2 Tim. ii. 20.) that the elect of God are veſſels of mercy choſen unto honour, which ought to be cleanſed from all filthineſs. But all is ſaid at once, (Luke ix. 23.) when it is declared that Chriſt will have only ſuch diſciples, who forſaking themſelves, take up their croſs, and follow him. He who hath forſaken himſelf, hath cut off the root of all evils, that he may no more ſeek thoſe things that are his own. He who hath taken up his croſs, hath framed himſelf to all patience and mildneſs. But the example of Chriſt containeth both theſe and all other duties of godlineſs and holineſs. He ſhewed himſelf obedient to his Father, even to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the works of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glory of his Father: he gave his ſoul for his brethren: he both did and wiſhed good to his enemies. If we ſtand in need of comfort, theſe ſayings (2 Cor. iv. 8, 9, 10.) will afford us great conſolation, We are troubled on every ſide, yet not diſtreſſed; we are perplexed, but not in deſpair, perſecuted, but not forſaken, caſt down but not deſtroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our body. (2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.) that if we be dead with him, we ſhall alſo live with him: if we ſuffer, we ſhall alſo reign with him: (Phil. iii. 10, 11.) That I may know him, and the power of his reſurrection, and the fellowſhip of his ſufferings, being made conformable unto his death: if by any means I might attain unto the reſurrection of the dead. (Rom. viii. 29, 38, 39.) Whom he did foreknow, he alſo did predeſtinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firſt born among many brethren. For I am perſuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord. But rather that all things ſhall turn to our good and eternal ſalvation. You ſee by this that we do not juſtify a man by works before God: but we ſay, that all they who are of God, are regenerate and made new creatures, that they may be tranſlated out of the kingdom of darkneſs into his marvellous light: that by this teſtimony they make their calling and election ſure, (2 Pet. i. 10.) and are judged of as trees are by their fruits.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVI.

A confutation of thoſe ſlanders, whereby the Papiſts endeavour to bring this doctrine into contempt and hatred.

The doctrine of juſtification by Chriſt without works falſely accuſed as a mean to make men ſlack and careleſs in well-doing.

WITH this one word may the ſhamleſneſs of certain ungodly men be confuted, who ſlander us, ſaying that we deſtroy good works, and draw men away from following them, when we ſay that believers are not juſtified by works, nor do thereby merit ſalvation: and they ſay further, that we make too eaſy a road to righteouſneſs, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiveneſs of ſins, and that by this enticement we allure men to ſin, who are of their own will too much inclined thereto already. Theſe ſlanders (I ſay) are with that one word ſufficiently confuted: yet I will briefly anſwer them both. They allege that by the juſtification of faith, good works are deſtroyed. I ſhall not ſay, what ſort of men theſe zealous lovers of good works are who thus backbite us. They ſhall have liberty to rail as freely as they licentiouſly infect the whole world with the filthineſs of their life. They pretend that they are grieved, that faith is ſo glorioufly advanced, and works are driven out of their place. But what will they ſay, if works are more raiſed up, and eſtabliſhed? For we neither dream of a faith void of good works, nor of a juſtification that is without them. This only is the difference, that when we confeſs that faith and good works are neceſſarily and inſeparably connected together, yet we place juſtification in faith not in works. For what reaſon we do ſo, we are ready to declare, if we do but turn to Chriſt unto whom our faith is directed, and from whom it receiveth its whole ſtrength. Why therefore are we juſtified by faith? becauſe by faith we take hold of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But thou canſt not not take hold of this righteouſneſs, unleſs at the ſame time thou alſo take hold of ſanctification. For he was given unto us, for righteouſneſs, wiſdom, ſanctification, and redemption. (1 Cor. i. 30.) Therefore Chriſt juſtifieth none whom he doth not alſo ſanctify. For theſe benefits are coupled together by a perpetual and inſeparable union, that whom he enlighteneth with his wiſdom, them he redeemeth: whom he redeemeth he juſtfieth: whom he juſtifieth he ſanctifieth. But as our queſtion is only concerning righteouſneſs and ſanctification, let us ſtay upon theſe. We may put a difference between them, yet Chriſt contains them both inſeparably in himſelf. Would you obtain righteouſneſs in Chriſt? You muſt firſt poſſeſs Chriſt: and you cannot poſſeſs him, without being made a partaker of his ſanctification: becauſe he cannot be divided in pieces. Therefore ſince the Lord grants us theſe benefits to be enjoyed no otherwiſe than in giving himſelf, he gives them both together, and never the one without the other. Thus it appears how true it is, that we are juſtified not without works, and yet not by works: becauſe in the partaking of Chriſt, whereby we are juſtified, ſanctificatlon is no leſs contained than righteouſneſs.

Neither is an affection to well-doing hereby rooted out in men when they are taught that the good which they do, merits not the reward which they ſhall receive for doing: the ſcripture hath other motives than this when it provoketh unto good works.

2. That aſſertion alſo is moſt falſe, that the minds of men are withdrawn from an inclination to well-doing, when we take from them the opinion of meriting ſomething thereby. Here by the way the readers muſt be warned, that they reaſon fooliſhly from reward to merit, as I ſhall afterwards more plainly ſhew: namely, becauſe they know not this principle, that God is no leſs liberal when he aſſigneth a reward to works than when he giveth power to do well. But this I had rather defer to the place fit for it. Now it will be enough to touch how weak their objection is: which ſhall be done two ways. For firſt whereas they ſay that there will be no care to frame our life aright, but when the hope of reward is ſet before us: but they err very far from the truth. For if this only be intended when men ſerve God, that they look to reward or let out to hire or ſell their labours to him, they prevail little: for God will be freely worſhipped, freely loved: he (I ſay) alloweth that worſhipper, who when all hope of receiving reward is cut off, yet ceaſes not to worſhip him. Moreover, if men be to be driven forward,

no man can put ſharper ſpurs unto them, than thoſe that are taken from the end of our redemption and calling; ſuch as the word of God ſpurreth men on with, when it teaches, (1 John iii. 10.) that it is the moſt wicked unthankfulneſs, not mutually to love him who firſt loved us. (Heb. ix. 14.) That by the blood of Chriſt our conſciences are cleanſed from dead works to ſerve the living God: (Heb. x. 29.) that it is a hainous ſacrilege, if being once cleanſed, we defile ourſelves with new filthineſs, and tread under foot the Son of God, and count the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was ſanctified, an unholy thing. (Luke i. 74.) that we are delivered from the hands of our enemies, that we may without fear ſerve him in holineſs and righteouſneſs all the days of our life: (Rom. vi. 18.) that we are freed from ſin, that we may become the ſervants of righteouſneſs: (Rom. vi. 6.) that our old man is crucified, that we may riſe again to newneſs of life: again, (Col. iii. 1.) that if we be dead with Chriſt (as becomes his members) we muſt ſeek thoſe things which are above, and muſt be in the world like wayfaring men from home, that we may long after heaven where our treaſure is: (Tit. ii. 11, 12, 13.) that the grace of God hath appeared for this end, that forſaking all ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, we may live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this world, looking for the bleſſed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt: (1 Theſ. v. 9.) that we are not appointed to wrath, but to obtain ſalvation by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: (1 Cor. iii. 16. 2 Cor. vi. 17.) that we are the temples of the holy Ghoſt, which it is not lawful to defile: (Eph. v. 8.) that we are not darkneſs but light in the Lord, who muſt walk as children of light. (1 Theſ. iv. 7.) that we are not called to uncleanneſs, but to holineſs: (1 Theſſ. iv. 3.) becauſe this is the will of God, even our ſanctification, that we abſtain from unlawful deſires: (2 Tim. i. 9.) that our calling is holy, that the ſame is not fulfilled but with pureneſs of life: (Rom. vi. 18.) that we are freed from ſin, that we might become the ſervants of righteouſneſs. Can we be ſtirred up or excited to charity with a more powerful argument than that of John, (John xiii. 34.) that we ſhould mutually love one another as God hath loved us, that herein his children differ from the children of the devil, the children of light from the children of darkneſs, becauſe they abide in love? And again with that argument of Paul, (1 Cor. vi. 17, and xii. 12.) that we if cleave to Chriſt, we are members of one body, which it is neceſſary to help one another with mutual duties? Can we be more ſtrongly provoked to holineſs than when we hear John again ſaying, (1 John iii. 3.) that all they who have this hope, ſanctify themſelves, becauſe their God is holy? Again out of the mouth of Paul: (2 Cor. vii. 1.) that having the promiſe of adoption, we ſhould cleanſe ourſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and Spirit? then when we hear Chriſt ſetting forth himſelf for an example unto us that we ſhould follow his ſteps.

3. And theſe few things, I have given you as a ſpecimen: for if I intended to go through all, I ſhould be forced to make a large volume. The apoſtles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and reproofs, whereby they may inſtruct the man of God to every good work, and that without any mention of merit. And they draw their principal exhortations from this, that our ſalvation depends upon the mercy of God only and not upon any merit of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epiſtle diſcourſed that there is no hope of life for us but in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, when he cometh to moral exhortations, he beſeecheth (Rom. xii. 1.) them by the mercy of God which he hath vouchſafed to intend to us. And truly this one cauſe ought to have been ſufficient, that God may be glorified in us. But if any be not ſo vehemently moved with the glory of God, yet the remembrance of his benefits ought to have been ſufficient to ſtir up ſuch men to do well. But theſe men, who perhaps by thruſting in merits perform ſome ſervile and conſtrained obediences of the law, falſely ſay that we have nothing whereby we can exhort men to good works, becauſe we go not the ſame way to work. As though God were much delighted with ſuch obediences, who hath declared that he loveth a chearful giver, and forbiddeth any thing to be given as it were by conſtraint or of neceſſity. Neither do I mention this becauſe I either refuſe or deſpiſe that kind of exhortation, which the ſcripture often uſeth, that it may leave no method unattempted to ſtir up our minds. For it declareth the reward which God will render to every man according to his works. But I deny that this is the only thing, yea or the chief among many. And I do do not grant that we ought to begin thereat. Moreover I affirm that it contributes nothing to the advancing of ſuch merits as theſe men boaſt of, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Laſt of all I ſay that it is for no profitable uſe, unleſs this doctrine firſt take place, that we are juſtified only by the merit of Chriſt, which is conceived by faith, but by no merit of our works, becauſe none are fit to endeavour after holineſs, unleſs they have firſt digeſted this doctrine. Which thing alſo the prophet very well expreſſeth when he thus ſpeaketh to God: with thee is mercy that thou mayeſt be feared. For he ſheweth that there is no worſhipping of God, but when his mercy is acknowleged, upon which alone it is both founded and eſtabliſhed. Which is well worth our notice, that we may know not only that the beginning of worſhipping God aright is on the confidence of his mercy, but alſo that the fear of God (which the Papiſts will have to be meritorious) cannot have the name of merit, becauſe it is grounded upon the pardon and forgiveneſs of ſins.

To teach that God freely pardons ſinners is no allurement to ſin,

4. But it is a moſt vain and empty ſlander, to aſſert that men are allured to ſin, when we affirm that righteouſneſs conſiſteth in the free forgiveneſs of ſins. For we ſay that it is of ſo great value, that it can be recompenſed with no good works of ours, and therefore that it would never be obtained, unleſs it were freely given; moreover, that it is indeed freely given to us, but not ſo to Chriſt who bought it ſo dearly, namely with his own moſt holy blood, beſide which there was no price of value enough that might be paid to the judgment of God. When men are taught theſe things, they are put in mind that it is no thanks to them that the ſame moſt holy blood is not ſhed ſo oft as they ſin. Further we teach, that our filthineſs is ſuch as is never waſhed away but with the fountain of this moſt pure blood. Ought not they who hear theſe things, to conceive a greater horror of ſin, than if it were ſaid that it is wiped away with the ſprinkling of good works? And if they have any thing of God in them, muſt they not be afraid, being once cleanſed, to wallow themſelves again in the mire, and thereby as much as lieth in them to trouble and infect the purity of this fountain? I have waſhed my feet, (ſaith the faithful ſoul in Solomon Cant. v. 3.) how ſhall I again defile them? Now it is evident, which of us do moſt abaſe the forgiveneſs of ſins, and vilify the dignity of righteouſneſs. They boaſtingly ſay that God is appeaſed with their trifling ſatisfactions, that is, their dung: we affirm that the guilt of ſin is of a more heinous nature than can be purged away with ſo light trifles: that the diſpleaſure of God is more heavy than can be removed with ſatisfactions of no value, and therefore that this is the prerogative of the blood of Chriſt only. They ſay that righteouſneſs (if it fail at any time) is reſtored and repaired by ſatisfactory works: we think it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of works, and therefore that to reſtore it we muſt fly to the mercy of God only. As for the reſt of thoſe things that belong to the forgiveneſs of ſins. They will be found in the next chapter.

CHAP. XVII.

The agreement of the promiſes of the law and the goſpel.

Juſtification by faith alone doth not make the promiſes of the law fruitleſs.

NOW let us alſo go thro' the other arguments wherewith Satan by his emiſſaries goes about either to overthrow or weaken juſtification by faith. This I think we have already wreſted out of the hands of theſe ſlanderers, that they can no more charge us as enemies to good works. For, juſtification is taken away from good works, not that good works ſhould not be done, or that thoſe which are done ſhould be denied to be good; but that we ſhould place no truſt or confidence in them, nor glory in them, nor aſcribe ſalvation unto them. For this is our confidence, this is our glory, and the only foundation, of our ſalvation that Chriſt the Son of God is ours, and likewiſe that we are the Sons of God in him, and heirs of the heavenly kingdom, being called by the goodneſs of God, not by our own worth, unto the hope of eternal bleſſedneſs. But becauſe they attack us, as we have ſaid, with other engines, let us go forward in beating down theſe alſo. Firſt they have recourſe to the promiſes of the law, which the Lord ſet forth to the keepers thereof: and they aſk whether we will have them to be utterly void or no man can put ſharper ſpurs unto them, than thoſe that are taken from the end of our redemption and calling; ſuch as the word of God ſpurreth men on with, when it teaches, (1 John iii. 10.) that it is the moſt wicked unthankfulneſs, not mutually to love him who firſt loved us. (Heb. ix. 14.) That by the blood of Chriſt our conſciences are cleanſed from dead works to ſerve the living God: (Heb. x. 29.) that it is a hainous ſacrilege, if being once cleanſed, we defile ourſelves with new filthineſs, and tread under foot the Son of God, and count the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was ſanctified, an unholy thing. (Luke i. 74.) that we are delivered from the hands of our enemies, that we may without fear ſerve him in holineſs and righteouſneſs all the days of our life: (Rom. vi. 18.) that we are freed from ſin, that we may become the ſervants of righteouſneſs: (Rom. vi. 6.) that our old man is crucified, that we may riſe again to newneſs of life: again, (Col. iii. 1.) that if we be dead with Chriſt (as becomes his members) we muſt ſeek thoſe things which are above, and muſt be in the world like wayfaring men from home, that we may long after heaven where our treaſure is: (Tit. ii. 11, 12, 13.) that the grace of God hath appeared for this end, that forſaking all ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, we may live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this world, looking for the bleſſed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt: (1 Theſ. v. 9.) that we are not appointed to wrath, but to obtain ſalvation by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: (1 Cor. iii. 16. 2 Cor. vi. 17.) that we are the temples of the holy Ghoſt, which it is not lawful to defile: (Eph. v. 8.) that we are not darkneſs but light in the Lord, who muſt walk as children of light. (1 Theſ. iv. 7.) that we are not called to uncleanneſs, but to holineſs: (1 Theſſ. iv. 3.) becauſe this is the will of God, even our ſanctification, that we abſtain from unlawful deſires: (2 Tim. i. 9.) that our calling is holy, that the ſame is not fulfilled but with pureneſs of life: (Rom. vi. 18.) that we are freed from ſin, that we might become the ſervants of righteouſneſs. Can we be ſtirred up or excited to charity with a more powerful argument than that of John, (John xiii. 34.) that we ſhould mutually love one another as God hath loved us, that herein his children differ from the children of the devil, the children of light from the children of darkneſs, becauſe they abide in love? And again with that argument of Paul, (1 Cor. vi. 17, and xii. 12.) that we if cleave to Chriſt, we are members of one body, which it is neceſſary to help one another with mutual duties? Can we be more ſtrongly provoked to holineſs than when we hear John again ſaying, (1 John iii. 3.) that all they who have this hope, ſanctify themſelves, becauſe their God is holy? Again out of the mouth of Paul: (2 Cor. vii. 1.) that having the promiſe of adoption, we ſhould cleanſe ourſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and Spirit? then when we hear Chriſt ſetting forth himſelf for an example unto us that we ſhould follow his ſteps.

3. And theſe few things, I have given you as a ſpecimen: for if I intended to go through all, I ſhould be forced to make a large volume. The apoſtles are all full of encouragements, exhortations and reproofs, whereby they may inſtruct the man of God to every good work, and that without any mention of merit. And they draw their principal exhortations from this, that our ſalvation depends upon the mercy of God only and not upon any merit of ours. As Paul, after that he hath in a whole Epiſtle diſcourſed that there is no hope of life for us but in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, when he cometh to moral exhortations, he beſeecheth (Rom. xii. 1.) them by the mercy of God which he hath vouchſafed to intend to us. And truly this one cauſe ought to have been ſufficient, that God may be glorified in us. But if any be not ſo vehemently moved with the glory of God, yet the remembrance of his benefits ought to have been ſufficient to ſtir up ſuch men to do well. But theſe men, who perhaps by thruſting in merits perform ſome ſervile and conſtrained obediences of the law, falſely ſay that we have nothing whereby we can exhort men to good works, becauſe we go not the ſame way to work. As though God were much delighted with ſuch obediences, who hath declared that he loveth a chearful giver, and forbiddeth any thing to be given as it were by conſtraint or of neceſſity. Neither do I mention this becauſe I either refuſe or deſpiſe that kind of exhortation, which the ſcripture often uſeth, that it may leave no method unattempted to ſtir up our minds. For it declareth the reward which God will render to every man according to his works. But I deny that this is the only thing, yea or the chief among many. And I do do not grant that we ought to begin thereat. Moreover I affirm that it contributes nothing to the advancing of such merits as these men boast of, as we shall see hereafter. Last of all I say that it is for no profitable use, unless this doctrine first take place, that we are justified only by the merit of Christ, which is conceived by faith, but by no merit of our works, because none are fit to endeavour after holiness, unless they have first digested this doctrine. Which thing also the prophet very well expresseth when he thus speaketh to God: with thee is mercy that thou mayest be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshipping of God, but when his mercy is acknowleged, upon which alone it is both founded and established. Which is well worth our notice, that we may know not only that the beginning of worshipping God aright is on the confidence of his mercy, but also that the fear of God (which the Papists will have to be meritorious) cannot have the name of merit, because it is grounded upon the pardon and forgiveness of sins.

To teach that God freely pardons sinners is no allurement to sin,

4. But it is a most vain and empty slander, to assert that men are allured to sin, when we affirm that righteousness consisteth in the free forgiveness of sins. For we say that it is of so great value, that it can be recompensed with no good works of ours, and therefore that it would never be obtained, unless it were freely given; moreover, that it is indeed freely given to us, but not so to Christ who bought it so dearly, namely with his own most holy blood, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be paid to the judgment of God. When men are taught these things, they are put in mind that it is no thanks to them that the same most holy blood is not shed so oft as they sin. Further we teach, that our filthiness is such as is never washed away but with the fountain of this most pure blood. Ought not they who hear these things, to conceive a greater horror of sin, than if it were said that it is wiped away with the sprinkling of good works? And if they have any thing of God in them, must they not be afraid, being once cleansed, to wallow themselves again in the mire, and thereby as much as lieth in them to trouble and infect the purity of this fountain? I have washed my feet, (saith the faithful soul in Solomon Cant. v. 3.) how shall I again defile them? Now it is evident, which of us do most abuse the forgiveness of sins, and vilify the dignity of righteousness. They boastingly say that God is appeased with their trifling satisfactions, that is, their dung: we affirm that the guilt of sin is of a more heinous nature than can be purged away with so light trifles: that the displeasure of God is more heavy than can be removed with satisfactions of no value, and therefore that this is the prerogative of the blood of Christ only. They say that righteousness (if it fail at any time) is restored and repaired by satisfactory works: we think it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompence of works, and therefore that to restore it we must fly to the mercy of God only. As for the rest of those things that belong to the forgiveness of sins. They will be found in the next chapter.

CHAP. XVII.

The agreement of the promises of the law and the gospel.

Justification by faith alone doth not make the promises of the law fruitless.

NOW let us also go thro' the other arguments wherewith Satan by his emissaries goes about either to overthrow or weaken justification by faith. This I think we have already wrested out of the hands of these slanderers, that they can no more charge us as enemies to good works. For, justification is taken away from good works, not that good works should not be done, or that those which are done should be denied to be good; but that we should place no trust or confidence in them, nor glory in them, nor ascribe salvation unto them. For this is our confidence, this is our glory, and the only foundation, of our salvation that Christ the Son of God is ours, and likewise that we are the Sons of God in him, and heirs of the heavenly kingdom, being called by the goodness of God, not by our own worth, unto the hope of eternal blessedness. But because they attack us, as we have said, with other engines, let us go forward in beating down these also. First they have recourse to the promises of the law, which the Lord set forth to the keepers thereof: and they ask whether we will have them to be utterly void or effectual. And becauſe it would be an abſurdity, and ought to be deſpiſed to ſay that they are void and of no effect, and they take it then for granted that they are of ſome effect. Hence they reaſon that we are not juſtified by faith only. For thus ſaith the Lord: (Deut. vii. 12, 13.) and it ſhall be, if thou ſhalt hear theſe commandments and judgments, and ſhalt keep them and do them, the Lord alſo ſhall keep with thee his covenant and mercy which he hath ſworn to thy fathers, he ſhall love thee and multiply thee, and bleſs thee, &c. Again, (Jer. vii. 5. and 23.) if ye ſhall direct your ways and your endeavours aright, if ye walk not after ſtrange gods, if ye do judgment between man and man, I will walk in the midſt of you. I will not cite a thouſand paſſages of the ſame ſort, which as they differ nothing in the ſenſe, ſhall be declared by the explanation of theſe. In ſhort, Moſes teſtifieth, (Deut. xi. 26.) that in the law is ſet forth the bleſſing and the curſe, death and life. Thus therefore they reaſon, that either this bleſſing is made idle and fruitleſs, or that juſtification is not of faith alone. We have before ſhewed, that if we ſtick faſt to the law, we can expect nothing but the curſe which is threatened to all tranſgreſſors, as we are deſtitute of every thing which might entitle us to its bleſſing. For the Lord promiſeth nothing but to the perfect obſervers of his law, and ſuch cannot be found. This therefore remains, that all mankind is accuſed by the law, and ſubject to the curſe and wrath of God; from which that they may be looſed, they muſt of neceſſity get out of the power of the law, and be as it were brought into liberty from the bondage thereof: not that carnal liberty which would withdraw us from the keeping of the law, leſt it ſhould tempt us to think all things lawful, and to ſuffer our luſts, as it were with an unbridled licence to run into all kinds of riot and exceſs: but that ſpiritual liberty, which may comfort and raiſe up a diſmayed and caſt down conſcience, ſhewing it to be free from the curſe and condemnation wherewith the law held it bound down and faſt tied. This deliverance from the ſubjection of the law, and manumiſſion (as I may call it) we obtain when by faith we take hold of the mercy of God in Chriſt, whereby we are certified and aſſured of the remiſſion of ſins, with the ſenſe whereof the law did vex and torture us.

The promiſes offered in the law would be ineffectual if Chriſt had not fulfilled that righteouſneſs whereupon the promiſes depend.

2. By this reaſon even the promiſes that were offered us in the law would be ineffectual and void, unleſs the goodneſs of God by the goſpel did help. For, this condition that we keep the whole law, upon which the promiſes depend, and whereby alone they are to be performed, will never be fulfilled. And the Lord doth not help us, by placing a part of righteouſneſs in our works, and ſupplying a part by his merciful bearing with us, but only when he giveth us Chriſt alone for the fulfilling of righteouſneſs. For the apoſtle, (Gal. ii. 16.) when he had before ſaid that he and other Jews believed in Jeſus Chriſt, knowing that a man is not juſtified by the works of the law, he adds a reaſon, That we might be juſtified by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, and not by the works of the law. If believers go from the law and take ſhelter in faith, that they may find a righteouſneſs in faith which they ſee is not to be found in the law: truly they forſake the righteouſneſs of the law. Therefore now let him who pleaſes, extol the rewards which are ſaid to be prepared for the keepers of the law, provided he at the ſame time conſider, that this comes to paſs by our diſobedience, that we reap no benefit thereby till we have obtained another righteouſneſs of faith. So David (Pſal. xix. 12.) when he had mentioned the reward which the Lord hath prepared for his ſervants, he immediately acknowleges his ſins, whereby that reward is made void. Alſo in the xix. Pſalm, he glorioufly ſets forth the benefits of the law, but he by and by cries out: who can underſtand his errors? Lord cleanſe me from my ſecret faults? This place agreeth with (Pſal. xxv. 10.) where when he had ſaid that all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth to them that fear him, he addeth ver. 11. For thy names ſake O Lord, pardon mine iniquity: for it is great. We ought alſo to acknowlege, that the good will of isGod ſet forthunto us in the law, if we could deſerve it by works, but that we never attain it by the deſerving of works.

The imperfect works of believers rewarded with that which is promiſed unto the perfect obſervers of the law: whereof there are three cauſes.

3. How then? are good works given that they ſhould vaniſh away without fruit? I have even now already proteſted that is not my meaning. I ſay verily that they are of no effect to us, ſo long as they have reſpect to the merit of works, and that if they are conſidered in themſelves, they are after a certain manner aboliſhed. If the apoſtle teacheth (Rom. x. 5.) that this noble noble promiſe: (Levit. xviii. 5.) I have given you commandments, which if a man do he ſhall live in them, is of no value if we continue in it, and ſhall not profit a whit more than if it had not been given at all: becauſe it belongeth not even to the moſt holy ſervants of God, who are far from the fulfilling of the law, but are compaſſed about with many tranſgreſſions. But when the promiſes of the goſpel are put in place of them, which offer free forgiveneſs of ſins, they bring it about not only that we ourſelves are acceptable to God, but that our works alſo have their thanks: and not only this that the Lord accepteth them, but alſo extendeth the bleſſings to them which by covenant were due to the keeping of the law. I grant therefore, that thoſe things which the Lord hath promiſed in his law, to the followers of righteouſneſs and holineſs, are given to the works of believers: but in this giving, the cauſe is always to be conſidered that poureth grace to works. Now we ſee that there are three cauſes. The firſt is, that God turning away his ſight from the works of his ſervants, which always rather deſerve reproach than praiſe, embraceth them in Chriſt, and by the mean of faith only reconcileth them to himſelf without the mean of works. The ſecond, that of his Fatherly kindneſs and tender mercy, he raiſeth up works to ſo great honour, not weighing the worth of them, as if he accounted them of ſome value. The third, that he receiveth theſe very ſame works with pardon, not imputing their imperfections, wherewith they being defiled, ſhould otherwiſe without his pardon, rather be reckoned among our ſins than virtues. And hereby it appears how much the ſophiſters have been deceived, who thought they had pretty well eſcaped all abſurdities, when they ſaid that works do not of their own inward goodneſs avail to deſerve ſalvation, but only by the form of the covenant, becauſe the Lord of his goodneſs hath ſo much eſteemed them. But in the mean time they conſidered not, how far thoſe works which they would have to be meritorious, were from the condition of the promiſes, unleſs there went before, both juſtification grounded upon faith only and the forgiveneſs of ſins, by which even theſe good works themſelves have need to be wiped from ſpots. Therefore of the three cauſes of God's liberality, by which it is brought to paſs that the works of believers are acceptable, they noted but one, and ſuppreſſed two, yea and thoſe the principal.

The teſtimony of Peter and example of Cornelius perverſly quoted to prove that the mercy of God towards men is procured by ſome worthineſs of their own.

4. They allege the ſaying of Peter, which Luke rehearſeth in Acts x. 34, 35. I find in truth that God is no accepter of perſons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteouſneſs is acceptable to him. And hence they conclude what ſeems undoubted, that if a man do by right endeavours obtain the favour of God, it is not by the beneficial gift of God alone that he obtaineth ſalvation: yea that God doth of his mercy help a ſinner in ſuch a manner, that he is by works inclined to mercy. But you can in no ways make the ſcriptures agree together, unleſs you obſerve a double accepting of man with God. For as man is by nature, God findeth nothing in him whereby he may be inclined to mercy, but only miſery. If therefore it be certain that man is naked and in want of all goodneſs, and on the other hand ſtuffed full and laden with all kinds of evils, when God firſt receiveth him: for what quality, I pray, ſhall we ſay that he is worthy of the heavenly calling? Away therefore with the vain imagination of merits, where God ſo evidently ſetteth out his free mercy. For, that which in the ſame place is ſaid by the voice of the angel to Cornelius, that his prayers and alms had aſcended into the ſight of God, is by theſe men moſt wickedly wreſted to prove that man by an endeavour after good works is prepared to receive the grace of God. For it muſt needs be that Cornelius was already enlightened with the Spirit of wiſdom, ſince he was endued with true wiſdom, namely with the fear of God: that he was ſanctified with the ſame Spirit, ſince he was a follower of righteouſneſs, which the apoſtle teacheth to be a moſt certain fruit thereof: all theſe things therefore which are ſaid to have pleaſed God in him, he had of his grace, ſo far is it from it that he did by his own endeavour prepare himſelf to receive it. Truly there cannot one ſyllable of the ſcripture be brought forth, that agreeth not with this truth, that there is no other cauſe for God to accept man but becauſe he ſeeth that man ſhould be every way loſt, if he be left to himſelf: and becauſe he will not have him loſt, he uſeth his own mercy in delivering him. Now we ſee how this accepting hath not regard to the righteouſneſs of man, but is a mere token of the goodneſs of God toward men being miſerable and moſt unworthy of ſo great a benefit.

The good works of believers are acceptable to God not because they are worthy to be accepted, but because the mercy of God loving their persons, embraceth their works notwithstanding their unworthiness.

bottomless pit of destruction and separated and set him apart to himself by the grace of adoption: because he hath begotten him again and formed him into a new life, he now embraces him, as a new creature with the gifts of his Spirit. This is that accepting whereof Peter makes mention, by which believers are after their vocation allured of God even in respect also of works: for the Lord cannot but love those good things which he works in them by his Spirit. But this is always to be remembered, that they are no otherwise acceptable to God as good works, but in so far as for their cause and for their sakes, whatever good works he hath given them by increasing his liberality, he also vouchsafes to accept. For whence have they good works? only because the Lord, as he hath chosen them for vessels unto honour, so he will garnish them with true godliness? Whereby also are they accounted good? as tho' there were nothing wanting in them: only because their kind Father tenderly pardons those deformities and spots that cleave to them. And to sum up all he means nothing else in this place, but that to God his children are acceptable and lovely in whom he seeth the marks and features of his own face. For we have in another place taught that regeneration is a repairing and renewing of the image of God in us. For as much as whereever the Lord beholds his own face, he both loves and honours it: it is not said without cause, that the life of believers being framed to holiness and righteousness pleaseth him, but because the saints being clothed with flesh, are yet sinners, and their good works are but begun, and yet savour of the frailties of the flesh: he cannot be favourable neither to those nor these: unless he rather embrace them in Christ than in themselves. After this manner are those places to be taken, which testify that God is kind and merciful to the followers of righteousness. Moses said to the Israelites, (Deut. vii. 9.) The Lord thy God keepeth covenant, to a thousand generations: which sentence was afterward used by the people as a common manner of speech. So Solomon in his solemn prayer (1 Kings viii. 23.) saith, Lord God of Israel, who keepeth covenant and mercy to thy servants that walk before thee with all their heart. The same words are also repeated by Nehemiah chap. i. 5. For, as in all the covenants of his mercy, (Deut. xxix. 18.) the Lord likewise on their part requires of his servants uprightness and holiness of life, that his goodness should not be mocked, and that no man puffed up with vain rejoicing upon account of God's goodness should bless his own soul, walking in the mean time in the frowardness of his own heart: so his will is by this method to keep in their duty those who are admitted into the communion of the covenant: yet nevertheless the covenant itself is both made free at the beginning, and perpetually remaineth so. After this manner David when he boasteth that there was rendered to him a reward for the cleanness of his hands, yet he omits not that fountain which I have spoken of, that he was drawn out of the womb, because God loved him: when he sets out the goodness of his cause, he takes nothing from that free mercy which goes before all gifts, and whereof it is the beginning.

6. And here by the way it will be useful to observe how these forms of speaking differ from the promises of the law. I call promises of the law, not only those which are every where commonly written in the books of Moses: (for in them also are found many promises of the gospel) but those which properly belong to the dispensation of the law. Such promises, by what name soever you please to call them, declare that there is a reward ready, upon condition you do that which is commanded. But when it is said, that the Lord keepeth the covenant of his mercy to them who love him, therein is rather shewed what manner of men his servants are who have faithfully received his covenant, than the cause expressed why the Lord should do good to them. Now this is the manner of shewing it. As the Lord vouchsafeth to grant us the grace of eternal life, that he should be loved, feared, and honoured by us: so whatever promises there are in the scriptures of his mercy, they are by right directed to this end, that we should reverence and worship the author of these benefits. So often therefore as we hear that he doth good to them that keep his law, let us remember that the children of God are there signified and pointed out by the duty which ought to be continual in them; that we are adopted for this cause, that we should honour him as our Father. Therefore lest we should disinherit ourselves from the right adoption, we must always endeavour after after this whereto our calling tends. But let us ſtill keep this in mind, that the accompliſhment of the mercy of God depends not upon the works of believers: but that he fulfills the promiſe of ſalvation to them who anſwer to their calling in uprightneſs of life, for this reaſon, becauſe in them he acknowlegeth the natural marks of his children who are ruled with his Spirit unto good. Hereunto let that be referred which is ſpoken in the xv pſalm of the citizens of the church, Lord who ſhall abide in thy tabernacle, and who ſhall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteouſneſs, and ſpeaketh the truth in his heart. &c. Again in Iſaiah, (Iſa. xxxiii. 14.) who ſhall dwell with devouring fire? He that doth righteouſneſs, he that ſpeaketh uprightly, &c. For in theſe places is not deſcribed the ſtay whereupon the faithful may ſtand before the Lord, but the manner whereby the moſt merciful Father bringeth them into his fellowſhip, and defendeth and ſtrengtheneth them therein. For, becauſe he abhorreth ſin, he loveth righteouſneſs, and whom he joineth to himſelf, them he cleanſeth with his Spirit, that he may faſhion them like himſelf and his kingdom. Therefore if the queſtion be of the firſt cauſe, whereby the entry is opened to the ſaints into the kingdom of God? whence they have that ſupport by which they may ſtand faſt and abide in it? we have this anſwer ready, becauſe the Lord by his mercy hath both adopted, and perpetually defendeth them. But if the queſtion be of the manner, then we muſt come to regeneration and the fruits thereof, which are recited in the xv. pſalm.

The virtuous actions of believers are assurances of their rewards, and tokens that they are in the favour of God, but not causes for the worth whereof God should favour them.

In what ſenſe the commandments of God are called righteouſneſs.

7. But there ſeems to be much more difficulty in theſe places, which adorn good works with the title of righteouſneſs, and affirm that man is juſtified by them. Of the firſt kind there are very many places where the obſerving of the commandments are called juſtifications or righteouſneſſes. Of the other ſort, that is an example which is in (Deut. vi. 25.) This ſhall be our righteouſneſs, if we keep all theſe commandments. And if you take exception and ſay, that this is a promiſe of the law, which being joined to a condition impoſſible, proves nothing. There are others to which you cannot make the ſame anſwer, as this: (Deut. xxiv. 13.) And that ſhall be to thee for righteouſneſs before the Lord to deliver to the poor man his pledge, &c. Again, that which the prophet ſaith, (Pſal. cvi. 30, 31.) that the zeal in revenging the ſhame of Iſrael, was imputed to Phineas for righteouſneſs. Therefore the Phariſees of our time think they have here a great matter to triumph upon. For when we ſay, that when the righteouſneſs of faith is exalted, the juſtification of works gives place, by the ſame right they make this an argument, if righteouſneſs be of works, then it is falſe that we are juſtified by faith only. Though I grant that the commandments of the law are called righteouſneſſes, it is no wonder: for they are ſo indeed. Howbeit we muſt warn our readers that the Grecians have not properly tranſlated the Hebrew word Hucmi, Dikaiomata, righteouſneſſes for commandments. For the word I willingly give up the diſpute. Neither do we deny that the law of God containeth perfect righteouſneſs. For we are debtors of all the things that it commandeth, therefore even when we have performed full obedience thereto, we are unprofitable ſervants: yet becauſe the Lord vouchſafeth to grant it the honour of righteouſneſs, we take not away that which he hath given. Therefore we willingly confeſs that the full obedience of the law is righteouſneſs, that the keeping of every commandment, is a part of righteouſneſs, if ſo be that the whole ſum of righteouſneſs were in the other parts alſo. But we deny that there is any where ſuch a form of righteouſneſs. And therefore we take away the righteouſneſs of the law, not becauſe it is maimed and imperfect of it ſelf, but that by reaſon of the weakneſs of our fleſh it is no where ſeen. But the ſcripture not only calleth ſimply the commandments of the Lord righteouſneſſes: but alſo gives this name to the works of believers. As when it reports (Luke i. 6.) that Zacharias and his wife walked in the righteouſneſſes of the Lord: truly when it ſpeaks thus, it conſiders works rather by the nature of the law, than by their own proper ſtate. Yet here again it is to be obſerved what I juſt now ſaid, that a law or rule is not to be made by the negligence of the Greek tranſlator. But as Luke would alter nothing in the received tranſlation, ſo I will not ſtrive about it. For God hath commanded theſe things that are in the law to men for righteouſneſs: but this righteouſneſs we do not perform but in keeping the whole law: for by every tranſgreſſion it is broken. Whereas therefore the law doth nothing but preſcribe righteouſneſs; if we have reſpect to it, all the ſeveral commandments thereof are righteouſneſs: if we have reſpect to men by whom they are done, they do not obtain the praiſe of righteouſneſs by one work, being treſpaſſers in many, nor by that ſame work which is always faulty in ſome degree, by reaſon of our imperfection.

In what ſenſe man is ſaid to be juſt by works and the act of Phineas to have been imputed unto him for righteouſneſs.

8. But now I come to the ſecond kind, in which the chief difficulty lies. Paul hath nothing more ſtrong to prove the righteouſneſs of faith, than that which is written of Abraham, (Rom. iv. 3.) that his faith was imputed to him for righteouſneſs. Since therefore it is ſaid that the act done by Phineas (Pſal. cvi. 31.) was imputed to him for righteouſneſs: what Paul affirms of faith, the ſame we may alſo conclude of works. Whereupon our adverſaries, as though they had won the victory, conclude that we are not juſtified without faith, but alſo that we are not juſtified by it alone, and that works accompliſh our righteouſneſs. Therefore I beſeech the godly, if they know that the true rule of righteouſneſs is to be taken out of the ſcripture only, that they will religiouſly and earneſtly conſider with me, how the ſcripture may without any wrangling be made to agree with itſelf. As Paul knew that the juſtification of faith is the refuge of them who are deſtitute of a righteouſneſs of their own, he boldly concludes that all they who are juſtified by faith, are excluded from the righteouſneſs of works. But ſince it is certain that the juſtification of faith is common to all the faithful, he doth with like boldneſs conclude that no man is juſtified by works, but on the contrary that men are juſtified without any help of works. But it is one thing to diſpute of what value works are by themſelves, and another thing, what account is to be made of them after the eſtabliſhing of the righteouſneſs of faith. If we would ſet a price upon works according to their worth, we ſay that they are unworthy to come into the ſight of God: and therefore that a man hath no works whereof he may glory before God: and, that being ſpoiled of all help of works he is juſtified by faith only. Now we define righteouſneſs thus, that a ſinner being received into the communion of Chriſt is by his grace reconciled to God, when being cleanſed with his blood he obtaineth forgiveneſs of ſins, and being cloathed with his righteouſneſs as with his own, he ſtandeth aſſured before the heavenly judgment ſeat. When the forgiveneſs of ſins is ſet before, the good works which follow have now another value than their own deſerving; becauſe whatever is imperfect in them, is covered with the perfection of Chriſt: whatever ſpots or filthineſs there is, it is wiped away with his cleanneſs, that it may not come into examination at the judgment of God. Therefore when the guilt of all treſpaſſes is blotted out, whereby men are hindered to bring forth any thing acceptable to God, and when the fault of imperfection is buried, which is wont alſo to defile good works; the good works which believers do are counted righteous, or (which is all one) are imputed for righteouſneſs.

It flows from the righteouſneſs which is by faith without works, that the works of believers are accounted righteous.

9. Now if any man object this againſt me to attack the righteouſneſs of faith, I will aſk firſt whether a man be counted righteous for one or two holy works? being in the reſt of the works of his life a tranſgreſſor of the law. This is more than an abſurdity. Then I will aſk if he be counted righteous for many good works, if he be in any part found guilty? This alſo he will not be ſo bold as to affirm, when the penal threatning of the law crieth out againſt it, (Deut. xxvii. 26.) and proclaimeth all them accurſed who have not fulfilled all the commandments of the law to the uttermoſt. Moreover, I will go further and aſk, whether there is any work that cannot be accuſed of uncleanneſs or imperfection? And how there can be any ſuch before thoſe eyes, to whom even the ſtars are not clean, nor the angels righteous enough? (Job iv. 18.) And he will be compelled to grant that there is no good work which is not ſo defiled with tranſgreſſions joined with it, and with the corruptneſs of it ſelf, that it cannot have the honour of righteouſneſs. Now if it be certain that it proceedeth from the righteouſneſs of faith that works which are otherwiſe impure, unclean, and but half works, not worthy of the ſight of God, much leſs of his love, are imputed for righteouſneſs, why do they by boaſting of the righteouſneſs of works deſtroy the juſtification of faith, whereas if this juſtification were not, they would boaſt of that righteouſneſs in vain? Will they make a vipers birth? For thereto tend the ſayings of theſe ungodly men. They cannot deny that the juſtification of faith is the beginning, foundation, cauſe, matter, and ſubſtance of the righteouſneſs of works: yet they conclude that man is not juſtified by faith, becauſe good works alſo are accounted for righteouſneſs. Therefore let us paſs theſe follies and confeſs the truth, that if the righteouſneſs neſs of works of what ſort ſoever it be accounted, depends upon the juſtification of faith, it is by this not only undiminiſhed but rather confirmed, namely whereby the ſtrength thereof appeareth more mighty. Neither let us think that works are ſo commended after free juſtification, that they afterwards come into the place of juſtifying a man, or any way divide the office between them and faith. For unleſs juſtification remain always whole, the pollution of works will be uncovered. And it is no abſurdity to ſay that a man is juſtified by faith, in ſuch a manner that not only he himſelf is righteous, but alſo that his works are eſteemed righteous beyond their worth.

Not only we, but our works alſo juſtified by faith in Chriſt: and therefore the righteouſneſs of works a thing both under and after the righteouſneſs of faith.

10. After this manner we will grant in works not only a righteouſneſs in part, (as our adverſaries themſelves would have) but alſo that it is allowed of God as if it were a perfect and full righteouſneſs. But if we remember upon what foundation it is upheld, all the difficulty will be removed. For then and not till then it begins to be an acceptable work, when it is received with pardon. Now whence cometh pardon, but becauſe God beholdeth both us and all our things in Chriſt? Therefore as we, when graffed into Chriſt, appear righteous before God, becauſe our wickedneſſes are covered with his innocence, ſo our works are righteous and accepted as ſuch, becauſe whatever faults are otherwiſe in them, being buried in the purity of Chriſt, they are not imputed. So we may lawfully ſay, that by faith alone, not only we, but alſo our works are juſtified. Now if this righteouſneſs of works of what kind ſoever it be, depends upon faith and free juſtification, and is made of it: it ought to be included, and ſet under it, as the effect under the cauſe thereof, as I may call it: ſo far is it off that it ought to be raiſed up either to deſtroy or darken it. Thus Paul (Rom. iv. 7.) to oblige men to confeſs that our bleſſedneſs conſiſts in the mercy of God, not in works, chiefly enforceth that ſaying of David (Pſal. xxxii. 1.) Bleſſed are they whoſe iniquities are forgiven, and whoſe ſins are covered. Bleſſed is he to whom the Lord hath not imputed ſin. If any man thruſt into the contrary innumerable ſayings where bleſſedneſs ſeems to be aſcribed to works, ſuch as theſe: (Pſal. cxiii. 1.) bleſſed is the man who feareth the Lord, (Pſal. xli. 1.) who hath pity on the poor, (Pſal. i. 1.) who hath not walked in the counſel of the wicked, (Lam. i. 12.) which beareth temptation: (Pſal. cvi. 3.) bleſſed are they who keep judgment, (Pſal. cxix. 1.) the undefiled (Matth. v. 3.) the poor in ſpirit, the meek, the merciful, &c. They will not make any thing againſt our doctrine, but it will be true which Paul ſaith, for becauſe thoſe things that are there commended are never ſo in any man, that he is therefore allowed of God, it followeth that man is alway miſerable, unleſs he be delivered from miſery by the forgiveneſs of ſins. Foraſmuch as therefore all the kinds of bleſſedneſs which are extolled in the ſcriptures, fall down empty and void, ſo that man reapeth the fruit of none of them, till he hath obtained bleſſedneſs by forgiveneſs of ſins, which may afterward make place for them: it follows that this is not only the higheſt, and chief, but alſo the only bleſſedneſs: unleſs perhaps you will plead that it is weakened by thoſe who confide in it alone. Now there is much leſs reaſon why the calling of men righteous ſhould trouble us, which is commonly given to believers. I grant verily that they are called righteous as to holineſs of life; but as they rather endeavour to follow righteouſneſs, than fulfil righteouſneſs it ſelf, it is proper that this righteouſneſs ſuch as it is, give place to juſtification by faith, from whence it hath that which it is.

James maketh nothing againſt juſtification by faith alone without works. For he ſpeaketh not of ſuch a faith as is meant by Paul in delivering this doctrine.

11. But they ſay we have yet more buſineſs with James, who with open voice fights againſt us. For he teaches both that Abraham was juſtified by works, and alſo that we are all juſtified by works, not by faith only. What then? will they make Paul to fight with James? If they hold James for a miniſter of Chriſt, his ſaying muſt be ſo taken, that it diſagree not from Chriſt ſpeaking by the mouth of Paul, The holy Ghoſt affirms by the mouth of Paul, that Abraham obtained righteouſneſs by faith, not by works: and we alſo teach that all are juſtified by faith, without the works of the law. The holy Ghoſt teaches by James that both Abraham's righteouſneſs and ours conſiſts of works, not of faith only. It is certain that the holy Ghoſt fighteth not with himſelf. What agreement will there be therefore of theſe two? It is enough for the adverſaries, if they can pluck up the righteouſneſs of faith, which we would have faſtened with the deepeſt roots: but to give quiet to the conſcience, they have have no great care. Whereby you may ſee that they worm out the juſtification of faith, but in the mean time appoint no mark of righteouſneſs where conſciences may reſt. Therefore let them triumph as they pleaſe, if they can boaſt of no other victory, than that they have taken away all certainty of righteouſneſs. And this wretched victory they will obtain, where the light of truth being quenched, the Lord will ſuffer them to overſpread it with the darkneſs of lies. But whereſoever the truth of God ſhall ſtand, they will not prevail. I deny therefore that the ſaying of James which they ſtill continually hold up againſt us, as it were the ſhield of Achilles, doth make any thing at all for them. That this may be made plain, firſt we muſt look to the mark the apoſtle aimeth at: and then we muſt obſerve where they are deceived. Becauſe there were then many (which miſchief ſtill continues in the church) who openly betrayed their infidelity, in neglecting and omitting all the proper works of believers, and yet ceaſed not to boaſt of the falſe name of faith; James doth here mock the fooliſh boldneſs of ſuch men. Therefore it is not his purpoſe in any point to diminiſh the force of true faith, but to ſhew how fooliſhly thoſe triflers challenged ſo much the vain image of it, that being contented herewith they careleſly ran diſſolutely into all the licentiouſneſs of vice. This ground being underſtood, it will be eaſy to perceive where our adverſaries fail. For they fall into two errors in the word, the one in the name of faith, the other in the word juſtifying. Where the apoſtle calleth faith, a vain opinion far diſtant from the truth of faith, it is ſpoken by way of conceſſion, which is no way derogatory to the matter: which he ſheweth at the beginning in theſe words. What profiteth it, my brethren, if any man ſay that he hath faith and hath not works? He doth not ſay, if any man have faith without works, but, if any man boaſt. Alſo he ſpeaks more plainly a little after, where in deriſion of ſuch a faith, he makes it worſe than the devils knowlege: laſt of all, when he calls it dead. But by the definition you may eaſily perceive what he means. Thou believeſt (ſaith he) that there is a God. Truly if nothing be contained in this faith but to believe that there is a God, it is now no wonder if it do not juſtify. And when this is taken from it, let us not think that any thing is deducted from the chriſtian faith, the nature whereof is far otherwiſe. For after what manner doth true faith juſtify us, but when it conjoins us with Chriſt, that being made one with him we may enjoy the partaking of righteouſneſs? It doth not therefore juſtify us by this that it conceiveth a knowlege of the being of God, but by this that it reſteth upon the aſſurance of the mercy of God.

Neither doth James uſe the word juſtification, as Paul doth, but in a meaning far different: Paul meaning thereby the imputation of righteouſneſs, and James the declaration of that righteouſneſs by works, which without works was imputed.

12. We have not yet the work, unleſs we examine alſo the other deceit in the word, as James places part of juſtification in works. If you will make James agree both with the reſt of the ſcriptures, and with himſelf, you muſt of neceſſity take the word juſtifying in another ſenſe than it is taken in Paul. For Paul ſaith that we are juſtified, when the remembrance of our unrighteouſneſs being blotted out, we are accounted righteous. If James had meant of that taking, he had wrongfully quoted that out of Moſes: Abraham believed God, &c. For he thus framed it together. Abraham obtained righteouſneſs by works, becauſe at the commandment of God he did not heſitate, to offer up his ſon. And ſo the ſcripture was fulfilled, which ſaith, that he believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteouſneſs. If it be an abſurdity, that the effect is before the cauſe, either Moſes doth in that place falſely teſtify, that faith, was imputed to Abraham for righteouſneſs; or he deſerved not righteouſneſs by that obedience which he ſhewed in offering up Iſaac. Abraham was juſtified by his faith, when Iſhmael was not yet conceived; who was now grown paſt childhood before that Iſaac was born. How therefore ſhall we ſay, that he obtained a righteouſneſs by an obedience which followed long afterward? Wherefore either James wrongouſly inverted the order (which it is a wickedneſs to think) or he meant not to ſay that he was juſtified, as though he deſerved to be accounted righteous. How then? Truly it appears that he ſpeaketh of the declaration of righteouſneſs and not the imputation: as if he had ſaid: Thoſe who are righteous by true faith, prove their righteouſneſs by obedience and good works, not with a bare and image like maſk of faith. In ſhort, he diſputes not by what mean we are juſtified, but he requires of believers an active, working righteouſneſs. And as Paul affirms that men are juſtified without the help of works: ſo James here ſuffers them not to be accounted righteous who want good works. The conſidering of this end, will deliver us out of all doubt.

For

For our adverſaries are hereby chiefly deceived, thinking that Jamesdefines the manner of juſtifying, whereas he labours about nothing but to overthrow their perverſe careleſſneſs, who vainly pretended faith, to excuſe their deſpiſing of good works. Therefore how many ways ſoever they wreſt the words of James, they will force out nothing but two ſentences: that a vain empty ſhew of faith doth not juſtify, and that a believer, not contented with ſuch an imaginative ſhew, declares his righteouſneſs by good works.

That the doers of the law are juſtified and not the bare hearers, helpeth nothing to overthrow juſtification by faith alone.

Rom. ii. 23.

13. As for what they quote out of Paul, meaning, that the doers of the law, not the hearers are, juſtified, it helpeth them nothing. I will not ſeek to get off with the ſolution of Ambroſe, that it is ſpoken becauſe the fulfilling of the law is faith in Chriſt. For I ſee that it is but a meer ſtarting hole, which I want not when there is a broad way open. There the apoſtle throws down the Jews from a fooliſh confidence, who boaſted themſelves of the only knowlege of the law, when in the mean time they were the greateſt deſpiſers of it. Therefore that they might not truſt ſo much in their own conceit for the bare knowlege of the law, he warneth them, that if righteouſneſs be ſought out of the law, not the knowlege but the obſerving of it is required. We make no doubt of this, that the righteouſneſs of the law conſiſts in works; nor yet of this alſo that righteouſneſs conſiſts in the worth and merit, of works. But it is not yet proved, that we are juſtified by works unleſs they bring forth ſome man who hath fulfilled the law. And that Paul meant no otherwiſe, the connexion of the text will be a ſufficient teſtimony. After he had generally condemned the gentiles and the Jews of unrighteouſneſs, then he deſcended to the particular ſhewing of it, and ſaith, that they who ſinned without the law, periſh without the law: which is ſpoken of the Gentiles, but they who have ſinned in the law, are judged by the law: which pertains to the Jews. Now becauſe they winking at their own tranſgreſſions proudly gloried of the only law: he adjoins what moſt fitly agreed, that the law was not given that men might be righteous by only hearing of the voice thereof: but then and not till then when they obeyed: as if he ſhould ſay Seekeſt thou righteouſneſs in the law: alledge not the hearing of it, which of itſelf is of ſmall importance, but bring works, by which thou mayeſt declare that the law was not given in vain. And becauſe they were all deſtitute, of theſe works it followed, that they were ſpoiled of glorying of the law. Therefore we muſt from the meaning of Paul rather frame a contrary argument. The righteouſneſs of the law conſiſts in the perfection of works. No man can boaſt that he hath by works ſatisfied the law. Therefore there is no righteouſneſs by the law.

The proteſtations which believers make of their innocency in the ſight of God, are no arguments that they ſuppoſed themſelves thereby juſtified before him.

14. They allege theſe places, where believers boldly offer their righteouſneſs to the judgment of God to be examined, and require that ſentence be given of them according to it. Of which ſort are theſe: Pſal. vii. 8. Judge me O Lord according to my righteouſneſs, and according to mine integrity which is in me. Again, Pſal. xvii. 1. Hear my righteouſneſs, O God: thou haſt proved my heart, and haſt viſited it in the night, and there was no wickedneſs found in me. Again, Pſal. xviii. 20. 21. The Lord ſhall render to me according to my righteouſneſs, and he ſhall recompence me according to the cleanneſs of my hands. Becauſe I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God. And I ſhall be unſpotted, and ſhall keep me from my iniquity. Again, Pſal. xxvi 1. Judge me, Lord, becauſe I have walked in mine integrity. I have not ſit with lying men: I will not enter in with them that do wicked things. Deſtroy not my ſoul with the ungodly, my life with men of blood, in whoſe hands are iniquities: whoſe right hand is filled with gifts. But I have walked innocently. I have above ſpoken of the confidence which the ſaints ſeem ſimply to take to themſelves of works. As for theſe teſtimonies that we have here alledged, they will not much encumber us if they be underſtood according to their compaſs, or (as they commonly call it) their circumſtance. Now this is twofold. For neither would they have themſelves to be wholly examined that they ſhould be either condemned or acquitted according to the continual courſe of their whole life: but they bring into judgment a ſpecial cauſe to be debated. Neither do they claim to themſelves righteouſneſs in reſpect of the perfection of God, but by a compariſon of naughty and wicked men. Firſt when the juſtifying of man is treated of, it is not only required that he have a good cauſe in ſome particular matter, but a certain perpetual agreement of righteouſneſs in his whole life. But the ſaints, when they call upon the judgment of God to approve their integrity, do not offer themſelves as free from all guilt and in every reſpect faultleſs: but verily when they have faſtened their hope and truſt of ſalvation in his goodneſs only, yet truſting that he is the revenger of the poor who are oppreſſed contrary to right and equity, they commend to him the cauſe wherein the innocent are oppreſſed. But when they ſet their adverſaries with them before the judgment ſeat of God, they boaſt not of ſuch an innocence as ſhall correſpond with the purity of God if it be ſtrictly ſearched, but becauſe in compariſon of the malice, obſtinacy, ſubtlety, and wickedneſs of their adverſaries, they know that their plainneſs, righteouſneſs, ſimplicity, and cleanneſs is known and pleaſing to God: they fear not to call upon him to be judge between themſelves and them. So when David ſaid to Saul, 1 Sam. xxvi. 23. The Lord render to every man according to his righteouſneſs and truth: he meant not that the Lord ſhould examine and reward every man by himſelf according to his deſervings, but he took the Lord to witneſs, how great his innocence was in compariſon of the wickedneſs of Saul. And Paul himſelf, 2. Cor. i. 12. when he boaſts that his rejoicing is this the teſtimony of his conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by his grace we have had our converſation in the world, and more abundantly to you-wards, means not that he reſts upon ſuch glorying before God, but being compelled by the ſlanders of the wicked, he defends his faithful and honeſt dealing, which he knew to be pleaſing to the merciful kindneſs of God, againſt all evil ſpeaking of men, whatever it be. For we ſee what he ſayeth in another place, that he knoweth no thing by himſelf, yet that he is not thereby juſtified, becauſe he knew that the judgment of God far ſurmounteth the blear-eyed ſight of men. However therefore the godly defend their innocence againſt the hypocriſy of the ungodly, by the witneſſing and judgment of God: yet when they have to do with God alone, they all cry out with one mouth: Pſal. cxxx. 3. If thou Lord ſhouldſt mark iniquity, Lord, who ſhall ſtand? and cxliii. 2. Enter not into judgment with thy ſervant: in thy ſight ſhall no man living be juſtified: and diſtruſting their own works, they gladly ſing. Pſal. lxiii. 4. Thy loving kindneſs is better than life.

To mens righteouſneſs life is not vainly promiſed if we underſtand it given thereunto, not for merit but of mercy: neither is perfection falſly attributed to ſaints if a part thereof be the ſerious acknowlegement of their imperfection.

15 There are alſo other places not unlike theſe before, in which a man may yet tarry. Solomon ſaith, Prov. xx. 7. that he who walketh in his uprightneſs, is righteous. Again, Prov. xii 28. That in the path of righteouſneſs is life, and thatin the ſame is no death. After which manner Ezekiel reporteth, ch. xviii. 9. and xxxiii. 15. that he ſhall live that doth judgment and righteouſneſs. None of theſe we either deny or darken. But let there come forth one of the ſons of Adam with ſuch an uprightneſs. If there be none, either they muſt periſh at the ſight of God, or flee to the ſanctuary of mercy. Neither do we in the mean time deny but that to believers their uprightneſs, though it be but half and imperfect, is a ſtep toward immortality. But whence cometh that but becauſe whom the Lord hath taken into the covenant of grace, he examineth not their works according to their deſervings, but kiſſeth them with fatherly kindneſs? Whereby we not only underſtand what the ſchoolmen teach that works have their value of the accepting grace. For they mean that works which are otherwiſe inſufficient to purchaſe righteouſneſs by the covenant of the law, are by the accepting of God advanced to the value of equality, But I ſay, that being defiled both with other tranſgreſſions and their own ſpots, are of no other value at all, but in ſo far as the Lord tenderly granteth pardon to both: that is to ſay, giveth free righteouſneſs to man. Neither are thoſe prayers of the Apoſtle Epheſ i. 4. and 1 Theſ. iii 13. ſeaſonably brought in here, where he wiſhs ſo great perfection to the faithful, that they may be faultleſs and unblameable in the day of the Lord, theſe words indeed the Celeſtines did formerly wreſt, to affirm a perfection of righteouſneſs in this life. But we think it ſufficient, to anſwer briefly after Auguſtine, that all the godly ought indeed to endeavour toward this mark, that they may one day appear ſpotleſs and faultleſs before the face of God: but becauſe the beſt and moſt excellent manner of this life is nothing but a going forward, we ſhall then and not till then attain to this mark, when being unclothed of this body of ſin we ſhall fully cleave to the Lord. Yet will I not ſtiffly ſtrive with him who will give the title of perfection to the ſaints, provided he alſo limit the ſame with the words of Auguſtine himſelf: When (ſaith he) Lib. ad Boni. iii. cap. vii. we will call the virtue of the ſaints, perfect: to the ſame perfection alſo belongeth the acknowlegeing of imperfection both in truth and humility.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

That of the reward the righteousness of works is ill gathered.

When rewards are promised to men according to their works, it is not to shew that good works are the cause, but the way to salvation.

NOW let us proceed to those expressions which affirm, Matth. xvi. 27. that God will render to every man according to his works: of which sort are these. 2 Cor. v. 10. Every man shall bear away that which he hath done in the body, either good or evil. Rom. ii. 9, 10. Glory honour and peace to him that worketh good: trouble and distress upon every soul of man that worketh evil. John v. 29. And they which have done good shall come forth unto the resurrection of life; and they who have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. Matth. xxv. 34. Come ye blessed of my father: I was hungry, and and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink, &c. And with them let us also join these sayings, which call eternal life the reward of works. Of which sort are these. Prov. xii. 14. The recompence of the hands of a man shall be rendered to him. Prov. xiii. 13. He that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded. Mat. v. 12. Luk. vi. 13. Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is in heaven. 1 Cor. iii. 14. and 8, 30. Every man shall receive reward according to his labour. Where it is said that God shall render to every man according to his works, that difficulty is easily solved. For that manner of speaking rather shews the order of following, than the cause. But it cannot be doubted, that the Lord accomplishes our salvation by these degrees of his mercy, when those whom he hath chosen he calleth to him: those whom he hath called, he justifieth: those whom he hath justified he glorifieth. Although therefore he do by his mercy alone receive them that are his into life, yet because he brings them into the possession thereof by the race of good works, that he may fulfil his work in them by such an order as he hath appointed: it is no wonder if it be said that they are crowned according to their works, by which without doubt they are prepared to receive the crown of immortality. Yea and after this manner it is fitly said that they work their own salvation, when in applying themselves to good works, they practise themselves toward eternal life: namely as in another place they are commanded to work for the meat which perisheth not, when by believing in Christ they get to themselves life, John vi. 27. and yet it is by and by afterward added, Which the son of man shall give you. Whereby it appeareth, that the word Working is not set as contrary to grace, but is referred to endeavours; and therefore it followeth not, that either the faithful are themselves the authors of their own salvation, or that the same proceedeth from their works. How then? So soon as they are taken into the fellowship of Christ, by the knowlege of the gospel, and the enlightening of the holy Ghost, eternal life is begun in them. Now the same good which God hath begun in them, must also be made perfect until the day of the Lord Jesus, Phil. i. 6. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heavenly Father in righteousness and holiness, they prove themselves to be his children not swerved out of kind.

2. There is no reason why we should of the name of reward gather an argument that our works are the cause of salvation. First let us be determined, in this that the kingdom of heaven is not a reward of servants, but an inheritance of children, which they only shall enjoy, that are adopted of the Lord to be his children; and for no other cause, but for this adoption, Eph. i. 18. For the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir, but the son of the free-woman, Gal. iv. 30. And in the very same places in which the holy Ghost promiseth to works eternal glory for reward, in expressing the inheritance by name he sheweth that it cometh from elsewhere. So Christ rehearseth works, which he recompenseth with the reward of heaven, when he calleth the elect to the possession thereof; but he therewithal adjoineth, that it must be possessed by right of inheritance, Matth. xxv. 33. So Paul biddeth servants, which do their duty faithfully, to hope for reward of the Lord; but he addeth, of the inheritance. We see how they do as it were by express words prove, that we ought not to impute eternal blessedness to works, but to the adoption of God, Col. iii. 23. Why therefore do they likewise make mention of works? This question shall be made plain with one example of scripture; before the birth of Isaac there was promised to Abraham a seed in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and a multiplying of his seed, which should match the stars of the sky, and the sands of the sea, and other like, Gen. xv. 5. and xvii. 1. In many years afterward, Abraham, as he was commanded by the oracle, prepared himſelf to offer up his ſon in ſacrifice. When he had performed this obedience, he received a promiſe; 'I have ſworn by myſelf (ſaith the Lord) becauſe thou haſt done this thing, and haſt not withheld thy ſon, thine only ſon,; that in bleſſing I will bleſs thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy ſeed as the ſtars of heaven, and as the ſand which is by the ſea ſhore; and thy ſeed ſhall poſſeſs the gate of his enemies: and in thy ſeed ſhall all the nations of the earth be bleſſed: becauſe thou haſt obeyed my voice. Gen. xxii. 3. 16, 17, 18. What hear we? Hath Abraham by his obedience deſerved the bleſſing, the promiſe whereof he had received before the commandment was given? Here verily we have it without circumſtances ſhewed, that the Lord rewardeth the works of the faithful with thoſe benefits which he had already given them before that the works were thought of, having yet no cauſe why he ſhould do good to them but his own mercy.

3. Yet doth the Lord not deceive nor mock us, when he ſaith that he rendereth for reward to works the ſame thing which he had before works freely given. For becauſe he will have us to be exerciſed with good works, to think upon the delivery or enjoying (as I may ſo call it) of theſe things which he hath promiſed, and to run through them to the bleſſed hope ſet before us in heaven, the fruit of the promiſes is alſo rightly aſſigned to them, to the ripeneſs whereof they do not bring us. The Apoſtle very fitly expreſſed both theſe points, when he ſaid that the Coloſſians apply themſelves to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laid up for them in heaven, of which they had heard before in the word of the truth of the goſpel, Col. i. 4. For when he ſaith that they knew by the goſpel, that there was hope laid up for them in heaven, he declareth that the ſame is by Chriſt only, not ſupported by any works. Wherewith agreeth that ſaying of Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God through faith unto ſalvation, ready to be revealed in the laſt time. 1 Pet. i. v. When he ſayeth that they labour for it, he ſignifieth that the faithful muſt run all the time of their life, that they may attain to it. But leſt we ſhould think that the reward which the Lord promiſeth us is not reduced to the meaſure of merit, he did put forth a parable, in which he made himſelf a houſholder, which ſent all them that he met to the trimming of his vineyard, ſome at the firſt hour of the day, ſome at the ſecond, ſome at the third, yea and ſome alſo at the eleventh. At evening he payed to every one equal wages. Matth. xx. 9. The expoſition of which parable, that ſame old writer, whoſoever he was, whoſe book is carried abroad under the name of Ambroſe, of the the calling of the Gentiles, hath briefly and truly ſet out. I will rather uſe his words than my own. (Lib. i. cap. iii.) The Lord (ſaith he) by the rule of this compariſon, hath ſtabliſhed the diverſity of manifold calling, belonging to one grace: where without doubt they which being let in into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, are made equal with them that had wrought the whole day, do repreſent the eſtate of them, whom for the advancing of the excellency of grace, the tender kindneſs of the Lord hath rewarded at the evening of the day, and at the ending of their life; not paying wages for their labour, but pouring out the riches of his goodneſs upon them whom he hath choſen without works, that even they alſo which have ſwet in great labour, and have received no more than the laſt, may underſtand that they have received a gift of grace, not a reward of works. Laſt of all, this alſo is worthy to be noted in theſe places, where eternal life is called a reward of works, that it is not ſimply taken for that participation which we have with God in bleſſed immortality, when he embraceth us with fatherly goodwill in Chriſt: but for the poſſeſſing or enjoying (as they call it) of bleſſedneſs, as alſo the very words of Chriſt do ſound, In time to come life everlaſting. Matth. x. 30. And in another place, Come and poſſeſs the kingdom, &c. Matth. xxv. 35. After this manner Paul calleth adoption, the revealing of the adoption which ſhall be made in the reſurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our body, Rom. viii. 23. Otherwiſe as eſtranging from God is eternal death, ſo when man is received of God into favour, that he may enjoy the participation of him and be made one with him, he is received from death to life: which is done by the beneficial mean of adoption only. And if, as they are wont, they ſtiffly enforce the reward of works, we may turn againſt them that ſaying of Peter, that eternal life is the reward of faith, 1 Pet. i. 9.

4. Therefore let us not think, that the holy Ghoſt doth with ſuch promiſes ſet forth the worthineſs of our works, as if they deſerved ſuch reward. For the ſcripture leaveth nothing to us, whereby we may be advanced in the ſight of God. But rather it wholly endeavoureth to beat down our arrogance, to humble us, to throw us down, and altogether to break us in pieces. But our weakneſs is ſo ſuc-coured, which otherwiſe would by and by ſlip and fall down, unleſs it did ſuſtain itſelf with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious griefs with comfort. Firſt, how hard it is for a man to forſake and deny not only all his things, but alſo himſelf, let every man conſider for himſelf. And yet with this introduction Chriſt traineth his ſcholars, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life, he ſo inſtructeth them under the diſcipline of the croſs, that they may not ſet their heart either to deſire or conſide in preſent good things. Briefly, he ſo handleth them for the moſt part, that which way ſoever they turn their eyes, throughout the whole wideneſs of the world, they have on every ſide nothing but deſperation preſent before them: ſo that Paul ſaith, If only in this life we have hope, we are of all men moſt miſerable, 1 Cor. xv. 19. That they ſhould not faint in theſe ſo great diſtreſſes, the Lord is preſent with them, which putteth them in mind to lift up their heads higher, to caſt their eyes further, ſo they find with him the bleſſedneſs which they ſee not in the world. This bleſſedneſs he calleth reward, wages, recompence, not weighing the merit of works, but ſignifying that it is a recompence to their troubles, ſuffering, ſlanders, &c. Wherefore there is no reaſon, but that we may after the example of ſcripture, call eternal life a rewarding, becauſe in it the Lord receiveth his from labours into reſt, from affliction into a proſperous and happy ſtate, from ſorrow into gladneſs, from poverty into flowing wealth, from ſhame into glory, and changeth all the evils which they have ſuffered for greater good things. So it ſhall alſo be no inconvenience, if we think holineſs of life to be the way, not which openeth an entry into the glory of the heavenly kingdom, but whereby the elect are led by their God unto the diſcloſing of it: forſmuch as this is his good-will to glorify them whom he hath ſanctified, Rom. viii. 30. Only let us not imagine a cavil of merit and reward, wherein the ſophiſters do fondly ſtick faſt, becauſe they conſider not this end which we ſet forth. But how diſorderly is it, when the Lord calleth us to one end, for us to look to another? Nothing is more evident than that it is to ſupport the weakneſs of our fleſh with ſome comfort, and not to puff up our minds with vain-glory. Whoſoever therefore doth thence argue the merit of good works, or doth in one balance weigh work with reward, he erreth far from the aim of God.

5. Wherefore when the ſcripture ſaith, that God the righteous judge will one day render to his a crown of righteouſneſs, 2 Tim. iv. 8. I do not only take exception with Auguſtine, and ſay, To whom ſhould he being a juſt judge, render a crown, if he had not being a merciful father given grace? and how ſhould there be righteouſneſs, unleſs grace went before which juſtifieth the unrighteous? How ſhould theſe due things be rendered, unleſs theſe undue things were firſt given? (Aug. ad Valent. de gr. et lib. arb.) But alſo I add another thing. How ſhould he impute righteouſneſs to our works, unleſs his tender mercifulneſs did hid the unrighteouſneſs that is in them? How ſhould he judge them worthy of reward, unleſs he did by unmeaſurable bountifulneſs take away that which is worthy of puniſhment? for he is wont to call eternal life, grace; becauſe it is rendered to the free gifts of God when it is repaid to works. But the ſcripture doth further humble us, and therewithal raiſe us up. For beſide this, that it forbiddeth us to glory in works, becauſe they are the free gifts of God, it therewithal teacheth that they are always defiled with ſome dregs, that they cannot ſatisfy God, if they be examined by the rule of his judgment: but leſt our courage ſhould faint, it teacheth that they pleaſe only by pardon. But although Auguſtine ſpeaketh ſomewhat otherwiſe than we do: yet that he doth not ſo diſagree in the matter, ſhall appear by his words in his third book to Boniface. (cap. 5.) Where when he had compared two men together, the one of a life even miraculouſly holy and perfect, the other honeſt in deed and of uncorrupt manners, but not ſo perfect but that much wanteth in him: at the laſt he concludeth thus; Even this man which in manners ſeemeth much inferior, by reaſon of the true faith of God whereby he liveth, and according to which he accuſeth himſelf in all his offences, in all his good works praiſeth God, giving to himſelf the ſhame, and to him the glory, and taking from himſelf both the pardon of ſins, and the love of well-doing, when he is to be delivered out of this life, he paſſeth into the fellowſhip of Chriſt. Wherefore, but becauſe of faith? Which although it ſave no man without works (for it is it which worketh by love, not a reprobate faith) yet by it alſo ſins are releaſed, becauſe the righteous man liveth by faith, Hab. ii. 4. but without it even the ſame which ſeemeth good works, are turned into ſins. Here verily he doth plainly confeſs, that which we ſo much labour to prove, that the righteouſneſs of good works dependeth hereupon, that they are by pardon allured of God.

6. A very near ſenſe to the places abovementioned, have theſe; Luke xvi. 9. Make to yourſelves friends of the Mammon of unrighteouſneſs, that when you ſhall fail, they may receive you into everlaſting habitations. 1 Tim. vi. 17. Charge the rich men of this world, not to be high-minded, nor to truſt in uncertain riches, but in the living God; to do well, to become rich in good works, to lay up in ſtore for themſelves a good foundation againſt the time to come, that they may obtain eternal life. For good works are compared to the riches, which we may enjoy in the bleſſedneſs of eternal life. I anſwer, that we ſhall never come to the underſtanding of them, unleſs we turn our eyes to the mark whereunto the holy Ghoſt directeth his words. If it be true which Chriſt ſaith, that our heart abideth there where our treaſure is, as the children of the world are wont to be earneſtly bent to the getting of thoſe things which ſerve for the delights of this preſent life; ſo the faithful muſt look, ſince they have learned that this life ſhall by and by vaniſh away, that they ſend thoſe things which they would enjoy, thither, where they ſhall have perfect life. We muſt therefore do as they do who purpoſe to remove into any place, where they have choſen to reſt their whole life. They ſend their goods before, and do not diſcontentedly want them for a time: becauſe they think themſelves ſo much more happy, how much more goods they have where they ſhall tarry long. If we believe that heaven is our country, it behoveth us rather to ſend away our riches thither, than to keep them here where we muſt loſe them with by a ſudden removal. But how ſhall we ſend them thither? If we communicate to the neceſſities of the poor: to whom whatſoever is given, the Lord accounteth it given to himſelf. Matth. xxv. 11. Whereupon cometh that notable promiſe; He that giveth to the poor, lendeth for gain to the Lord, Prov. 19. 17. Again, he that ſoweth liberally, ſhall reap liberally, 2 Cor. ix. 6. For thoſe things are delivered into the hand of the Lord to keep, which are beſtowed upon our brethren by the duty of charity. He, as he is a faithful keeper of that which is committed to him, will one day reſtore it with plentiful gain. Are then our dutiful doings of ſo great value with God, that they are as riches laid up in ſtore for us in his hand? Who ſhall fear ſo to ſay, when the ſcripture doth ſo oft and plainly witneſs it? But if any man will leap from the mere goodneſs of God to the merit of work, he ſhall not be aſſiſted by theſe teſtimonies to eſtabliſh his error. For you can gather nothing rightly thereof, but the mere inclination of God's tenderneſs toward us: in order to encourage us to well-doing, although the ſervices which we do to him, are not worthy of ſo much as his only looking upon them, yet he ſuffereth none of them to be loſt.

7. But they chiefly inſiſt upon the words of the apoſtle, 2 Theſſ. i. 5. who, when he comforteth the Theſſalonians in troubles, teacheth that the ſame are ſent to them that they may be accounted worthy of the kingdom of God for which they ſuffer. For (ſaith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to them that trouble you; but to you reſt with us, when the Lord Jeſus ſhall be revealed from heaven. But the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews ſaith, (Heb. vi. 10.) God is not unrighteous, that he ſhould forget your work and labour of love, which ye have ſhewed to his name, in that ye have miniſtered to the ſaints, and do miniſter. To the firſt place I anſwer, that there is no worthineſs of merit ſpoken of; but becauſe God the Father willeth that we whom he hath choſen to be his children, ſhould be made like to Chriſt his firſt begotten Son, Rom. viii. 29. as it behoved that he ſhould firſt ſuffer, and then enter into the glory appointed for him, (Luke xxviii. 26.) ſo muſt we alſo through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of God, Acts xiv. 22. Therefore when we ſuffer tribulation for the name of Chriſt, there are as it were certain marks printed upon us, wherewith God uſeth to mark the ſheep of his flock. After this manner therefore we are accounted worthy of the kingdom of God, becauſe we bear in our body the marks of our Lord and maſter, which are the ſigns of the children of God, Gal. vi. 17. To this purpoſe are theſe ſayings. That we bear about in our body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our body, 2 Cor. iv. 10. That we may be faſhioned like unto his ſufferings, that we may come to the likeneſs of his reſurrection from the dead. The reaſon which is adjoined ſerveth not to prove any worthineſs, but to confirm the hope of the kingdom of God. As if he had ſaid, As it agreeth with the juſt judgment of God, to take vengeance on your enemies for the vexations that they have done to you: ſo agreeth it alſo to give to you releaſe and reſt from vexations. The other place which teacheth, that it ſo becometh the righteouſneſs of God not to forget the obedience of them that are his, that it declareth it to be in a manner unrighteous if he ſhould forget them, hath this meaning: God, to quicken our ſlothfulneſs, hath given us aſſurance, that the labour ſhall not be in vain which we ſhall take for his glory. Let us always remember, that this promiſe, as all others, will bring us no profit, unleſs the free covenant of mercy went before, whereupon the whole aſſured-assuredness of our salvation should rest. But standing upon that covenant, we ought assuredly to trust, we shall also not want reward of the liberality of God to our works however they be unworthy. The apostle, to confirm us in that expectation, affirmeth that God is not unrighteous, but will stand to his promise once made. Therefore this righteousness is rather referred to the truth of God's promise, that to his justice in rendering due. According to which meaning there is a notable saying of Augustine, which as the holy man sticketh not to rehearse often as notable, so I think it not unworthy that we should continually remember it. The Lord (saith he) is faithful, who hath made himself debtor to us, not by receiving any thing of us, but by promising all things to us. In Psal. xxxii. & cix.

3. There are also alledged these sayings of Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. If I have all faith, so that I can remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. Again, Now abideth hope, faith and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity. Again, (Col. iii. 14.) Above all things have charity, which is the bond of perfection. By the first two places our Pharisees affirm, that we are rather justified by charity than faith, namely by that more excellent virtue, as they say. But this foolish argument is easily wiped away; for we have in another place already declared, that those things which are spoken in the first place pertain nothing to true faith. The other place we also expound of true faith, than which he saith that charity is greater: not that it is more meritorious, but because it is more fruitful, because it extendeth further, because it serveth more, because it remaineth always in force, whereas the use of faith continueth but for a time. If we have regard to excellence, the love of God should worthily have the chief place, of which Paul here speaketh not. For he enforceth this thing only, that we should with mutual charity edify one another in the Lord. But let us imagine that charity doth every way excel faith: yet what man of sound judgment, yea or of sound brain, will gather thereof that it doth more justify? The power of justifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthiness of the work: but justification standeth only upon the mercy of God and the merits of Christ, which justification when faith taketh hold of, it is said to justify. Now, if you ask our adversaries in what sense they assign justification to charity, they will answer, that because it is a dutiful doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deserving thereof righteousness is imputed to us by the acceptation of the goodness of God. Here you see how well the argument proceedeth. We say that faith justifieth, not because by the worthiness of itself it deserveth righteousness to us, but because it is an instrument by which we freely obtain the righteousness of Christ. These men, omitting the mercy of God, and overlooking Christ (where the sum of righteousness standeth) do affirm that we are justified by the benefit of charity because it is more excellent than faith: even as if a man would argue, that a king is fitter to make a shoe than a shoemaker, because he is by far more excellent. This only argument is a plain example that all the Sorbonical schools do not so much as taste with the uttermost part of their lips what the justification of faith is. But if any wrangler do yet carp and ask, why in so small distance of place do we take the word faith in Paul so diversly? I have a weighty cause for this exposition. For since those gifts which Paul rehearseth are after a certain manner under faith and hope, because they pertain to the knowlege of God, he contemneth them all by way of recapitulation under the name of faith and hope: as if he should say by the prophecy, and the grace and knowlege of interpretation tend to this mark to lead us to the knowlege of God. And we know God in this life no otherwise but by hope and faith. Therefore when I name faith and hope, I comprehend all these things together. And so there remaineth these three hope, faith and charity; that is to say, how great diversity of gifts soever there be, they are all referred to these. Among these the greatest is charity, &c. Out of the third place they gather, If charity be the bond of perfection, then it is also the bond of righteousness which is nothing else but perfection. First, to speak nothing how Paul there calleth perfection, when the members of the church well set in order, do cleave together, and to grant that we are by charity made perfect before God: yet what new thing bring they forth? For I will alway on the contrary side take exception, and say, that we never come to this perfection, unless we fulfil all the parts of charity; and thereupon I will gather, that since all men are very far from the fulfilling of charity, therefore all hope of perfection is cut off from them.

9. I will not go through all the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorbonists rashly snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hand, and do throw them against us. For, some of them are so worthy of ridicule, that I myself cannot rehearse them, without being justly accounted foolish. Therefore I will conclude, when I shall have declared the saying of Christ, wherewith they marvelmarvelouſly pleaſe themſelves. For, to the lawyer which aſked him what was neceſſary to ſalvation, he anſwered: If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. Mat. xix. xvii. What would we more (ſay they) when we are commanded by the author of grace himſelf to get the kingdom of God by the keeping of his commandments. As though forſooth it were not certain, that Chriſt tempered his anſwers to them with whom he ſaw that he had to do. Here a doctor of the law aſketh of the mean to obtain bleſſedneſs, and not the only, but with doing of what thing men may attain unto it. Both the perſon of him that ſpake and the queſtion it ſelf led the Lord ſo to anſwer. The lawyer being filled with the perſwaſion of the righteouſneſs of the law, was blind in conſcience of works. Again, he ſought nothing elſe but what were the works of righteouſneſs, by which ſalvation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily ſent to the law, in which there is a perfect mirror of righteouſneſs. We alſo do with a loud voice pronounce the commandments muſt be kept, if life be ſought in works. And this doctrine is neceſſary to be known of Chriſtians. For how ſhould they fly to Chriſt if they did not acknowlege that they are fallen from the way of life into the headlong downfal of death: But how ſhould they underſtand how far they have ſtrayed from the way of life, unleſs they firſt underſtand what is taht way of life. For then they are taught that the ſanctuary to recover ſalvation, is in Chriſt, when they ſee how great difference there is between their life and the righteouſneſs of God which is contained in the keeping of the law. The ſum is this, that if ſalvation be ſought in works, we muſt keep the commandments by which we are inſtructed to perfect righteouſneſs. But we muſt not ſtick faſt here, unleſs we will faint in our mid courſe: for none of us is able to keep the commandments. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteouſneſs of the law, we muſt of neceſſity reſort to another help, namely to the faith of Chriſt. Wherefore as here the Lord calleth back the doctor of the law whom he knew to ſwell with vain confidence of works, to the law whereby he may learn that he is a ſinner ſubject to the dreadful judgment of eternal death: ſo in other places without making mention of the law, he comforteth others that are already humbled with ſuch knowlege, with promiſe of grace: as, Come to me. all ye that labour and are heaven laden, and I will refreſh you, and ye ſhall find reſt unto your ſouls, Matth. xi. 39.

10. At the laſt when they are weary with wreſting the ſcripture, they fall to ſubtleties and ſophiſtical arguments. They cavil upon this, that faith is in ſome places called a work, and thereupon they gather, that we do wrongfully ſet faith as contrary to works, John vi. 29. As though, forſooth, faith, in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her own deſerving procure unto us righteouſneſs, and not rather becauſe by embracing the mercy of God, it ſealeth in our hearts the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, offered to us in the preaching of the goſpel. The readers ſhall pardon me if I do not tarry upon confuting of ſuch follies, for they themſelves, without any aſſault of others, are ſufficiently overthrown with their own feebleneſs. But I will by the way confute one objection which ſeemeth to have ſome ſhew of reaſon, leſt it ſhould trouble ſome that are not ſo well practiſed. Since common reaſon teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular ſins are imputed to us for unrighteouſneſs, they ſay it is meet, that to all particular good works be given the praiſe of righteouſneſs. They do not ſatisfy me, which anſwer, That the damnation of men properly proceedeth from unbelief, not from particular ſins. I do indeed agree with them, that unbelief is the fountain and root of all evils. For it is the firſt departing from God, after which do follow the particular traſpaſſings againſt the law, But whereas they ſeem to ſet one ſelf ſame reaſon of good and evil works in weighing of righteouſneſs or unrighteouſneſs, therein I am compelled to diſagree with them. For the righteouſneſs of works is the perfect obedience of the law. Therefore thou canſt not be righteous by works, unleſs thou do follow it as a ſtreight line in the whole continual courſe of thy life. From it ſo ſoon as thou haſt ſwerved, thou art fallen into unrighteouſneſs. Hereby appeareth that righteouſneſs cometh not of one or a few works, but of a ſtedfaſt and unwearied obſerving of the will of God. But the rule of judging unrighteouſneſs is moſt contrary. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath ſtolen, is by one offence guilty of death, becauſe he hath offended againſt the majeſty of God. Therefore theſe our ſubtle arguers do ſtumble, for that they mark not this ſaying of James, that he who ſinneth in one, is made guilty of all, becauſe he that hath forbidden to kill, hath alſo forbidden to ſteal, &c. Therefore it ought to ſeem no abſurdity, when we ſay that death is the juſt reward of every ſin; becauſe they are every one worthy of the juſt diſpleaſure and vengeance of God. But thou ſhalt reaſon fooliſhly, if on the contrary thou conclude that by one good work man may be reconciled to God, who with many ſins deſerveth his wrath.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Christian liberty.

The necessity of handling the question that concerneth christian liberty.

NOW we must treat of Christian liberty: the declaration whereof he must not omit whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgment the sum of the doctrine of the gospel. For it is a thing principally necessary, and without the knowlege whereof consciences dare in a manner enterprise nothing without doubting, they stumble and start back in many things, they always stagger and tremble: but especially it is an appendage of justification, and availeth not a little to the understanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly fear God, shall hereby receive an incomparable fruit of that doctrine which the wicked and Lucinianical men do pleasantly taunt with their scoffs, because in the spiritual darkness wherewith they are taken, every wanton railing is lawful for them. Wherefore it shall now come forth in fit season: and it was profitable to defer to this place the plainer discoursing of it (for we have already in diverse places lightly touched it) because so soon as any mention is brought in of Christian liberty, then either filthy lusts boil, or mad motions rise, unless these wanton wits be timely met withal, who do otherwise most naughtily corrupt the best things. For, some men by pretence of this liberty, shake off all obedience to God, and break forth into an unbridled licentiousness: and some men disdain it, thinking that by it all moderation, order and choice of things is taken away. What should we do here, being compassed in such narrow straits? shall we bid Christian liberty farewel, and so cut off all fit occasion for such perils? But, as we have said, unless that be fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the gospel, nor the inward peace of the soul is rightly known. We must rather endeavour that so necessary a part of doctrine be not suppressed, and yet that in the mean time those foolish objections may be met withal which are wont to rise thereupon.

The first part of Christian liberty, the freedom from the bondage and tyranny of the law.

2. Christian liberty (as I think) consists in three parts. The first, that the consciences of the faithful, when the affiance of their justification before God is to be sought, may raise and advance themselves above the law, and forget the whole righteousness of the law. For since the law (as we have already in another place declared) leaveth no man righteous: either we are excluded from all hope of justification, or we must be loosed from the law, and no regard at all had to works. For whoso thinketh that he must bring somewhat, be it never so little of good works to obtain righteousness, he cannot appoint any end or measure of them, but maketh himself a debtor to the law. Therefore taking away all mention of the law, and laying aside all thinking upon works, we must embrace the mercy of God only, when we treat of justification: and turning away our sight from our selves, we must behold Christ alone. For there the question is not how we are righteous: but how although we be unrighteous and unworthy, we be taken for worthy. Of which thing if consciences will attain any certainty, they must give no place to the law. Neither can any man hereby gather that the law is superfluous to the faithful, whom it doth not therefore cease to teach, and exhort, and prick forward to goodness, although before the judgment seat of God it hath no place in their consciences. For these two things, as they are very different, so must they be well and diligently distinguished by us. The whole life of Christians ought to be a certain meditation of godliness, because they are called unto sanctification. Eph. i. 4. 1 Thes. iv. 5. Herein standeth the office of the law, that by putting them in mind of their duty, it should stir them up to the endeavour of holiness and innocence. But when consciences are careful how they may have God merciful, what they shall answer, and upon what affiance they shall stand if they be called to his judgment, there is not to be reckoned what the law requireth, but only Christ must be set forth for righteousness, which passeth all perfection of the law.

The liberty disputed of in the Epistle to the Galatians.

3. Upon this point depends almost all the argument of the epistle to the Galatians. For, that they are foolish expositors who teach that Paul there contendeth only for the liberty of ceremonies, may be proved by the places of the arguments. Of which sort are these. Gal. iii. 13. That Christ was made a curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law. Again, v. 1. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul ſay, if ye be circumciſed, Chriſt ſhall profit you nothing. And he who is circumciſed is debtor to the whole law. Chriſt is made idle to you whoſoever ye be that are juſtified by the law: ye are fallen away from grace. Wherein truly is contained ſome higher thing than the liberty of ceremonies. I grant indeed that Paul there treats of ceremonies, becauſe he contendeth with the falſe apoſtles, who went about to bring again into the Chriſtian church the old ſhadows of the law which were aboliſhed by the coming of Chriſt. But for the diſcuſſing of this queſtion, there were higher places to be diſputed, in which the wole controverſy ſtood. Firſt, becauſe by thoſe Jewiſh ſhadows the brightneſs of the goſpel was darkned, he ſheweth that in Chriſt we have a full giving in deed of all thoſe things which were ſhadowed by the ceremonies of Moſes. Secondly, becauſe theſe deceivers filled the people with a moſt naughty opinion, namely that this obedience availed to deſerve the favour of God: here he ſtands much upon this point, that the faithful ſhould not think that they can by any works of the law, much leſs by thoſe little principles, obtain righteouſneſs before God. And alſo he teacheth, that they are by the croſs of Chriſt free from the damnation of the law, which otherwiſe hangeth over all men, that they ſhould with full aſſurance reſt in Chriſt alone. which place properly pertains to this purpoſe. Laſt of all he maintains to the conſciences of the faithful their liberty, that they ſhould not be bound with any religion in things not neceſſary.

The ſecond part of Chriſtian liberty free and by the law unconſtrained obedience.

4 The ſecond part, which depends upon the former, is that conſciences obey the law, not as compelled by the neceſſity of the law: but being free from the yoke of the law it ſelf, of their own accord they obey the will of God. For becauſe they abide in perpetual terror, ſo long as they are under the dominion of the law, they ſhall never be with cheerful readineſs framed to the obedience of God, unleſs they firſt have this liberty given them. By an example we ſhall both more briefly, and more plainly perceive what theſe things mean. The commandment of the law is, Deut. vi. 5. that we love God with all our heart, with all our ſoul, and with all our ſtrength. That this may be done, our ſoul muſt firſt be made void of all other ſenſe and thought, our heart muſt be cleanſed of all deſires, all our ſtrength muſt be gathered up and drawn together to this only purpoſe. They who have gone fartheſt before others in the way of the Lord, are yet very far from this mark. For though they love God with their mind, and with ſincere affection of heart, yet they have ſtill a great part of their heart and ſoul poſſeſſed with the deſires of the fleſh, by which they are drawn back and hindered from going forward with haſty courſe to God. They do indeed travel forward with great endeavour: but the fleſh partly enfeebles their ſtrength, and partly draws them to it ſelf. What ſhall they do here, when they feel that they do nothing leſs than perform the law? They will, they covet, they endeavour, but nothing with ſuch perfection as ought to be. If they look upon the law, they ſee that whatſoever work they attempt or purpoſe, is accurſed. Neither is there any cauſe why any man ſhould deceive himſelf by concluding that the work is therefore not altogether evil, becauſe it is imperfect: and therefore that God doth nevertheleſs accept that good which is in it. For, the law requiring perfect love, condemneth all imperfection, unleſs the rigour of it be mitigated. Therefore his works ſhould fall to nought which he would have to ſeem partly good: and he ſhall find that it is a tranſgreſſion of the law, even in this becauſe it is imperfect.

Men freed from the exactions of the law are as children ſweetly won unto cheerful obedience by the fatherly gentleneſs wherewith they know that God hath promiſed to treat them.

5 Behold how all our works are ſubject to the curſe of the law if they be meaſured by the rule of the law. But how then ſhould unhappy ſouls cheerfully apply themſelves to work, for which they might not truſt that they could get any thing but the curſe? On the other ſide, if being delivered from this ſevere exacting of the law, or rather from the whole rigour of the law, they hear that they are called of God with fatherly gentleneſs: they will merrily and with great cheerfulneſs anſwer his calling and follow his guiding. In ſum, they who are bound to the yoke of the law, are like bond ſervants, to whom by their lords are appointed certain taſks of work for every day. Theſe ſervants think that they have done nothing, nor dare come in the ſight of their lords, unleſs they have performed that full taſk of works. But children, who are more liberally and more freemen-like handled by their fathers, ſtick not to preſent to them their begun and imperfect works, yea and thoſe having ſome fault, truſting that they will accept their obedience and willingneſs of mind, although they have not exactly done ſo much as their good will was to do. So muſt we be that we may have ſure affiance, that our our obedience ſhall be allowed of our moſt kind father, how little ſoever, and how rude and imperfect ſoever they be. As he alſo aſſureth us by the prophet: Mal. iii. 17. I will ſpare them (ſaith he) as a father is wont to ſpare his ſon that ſerveth him. Where this word ſpare, is ſet for to bear with, or gently to wink at faults, for he alſo makes mention of ſervice. And this affiance is not a little neceſſary for us, without which we ſhall go about all things in vain. For God accounteth himſelf to be worſhipped with no work of ours but which is truly done by us for the worſhipping of him. But how can that be done among theſe terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worſhipped without our work.

The liberty which we have in the ſtate of grace a ſpecial encouragement to ſtrive that we be not over-ruled with ſin.

6. And that this is the cauſe why the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, refers all the good works which are read of in the holy fathers, to faith, and weigheth them only by faith. Touching this liberty, there is a place in the epiſtle to the Romans, chap. xi. 2. where Paul reaſoneth that ſin ought not to have dominion over us, becauſe we are not under the law, but under grace. For when he had exhorted the faithful Rom. vi. 12. that ſin ſhould not reign in their mortal bodies, and that they ſhould not give their members to be weapons of wickedneſs to ſin, but ſhould dedicate themſelves to God, as they that are alive from the dead, and their members, weapons of righteouſneſs to God: and whereas they might on the other ſide object that they do yet carry with them the fleſh full of luſts, and that ſin dwelleth in them, he adjoineth that comfort by the liberty of the law, as if he ſhould ſay. Though they do not yet thoroughly feel ſin deſtroyed, and that righteouſneſs liveth not yet in them, yet there is no cauſe why they ſhould fear and be diſcouraged as though he had been alway diſpleaſed with them for the remnants of ſin, foraſmuch as they are by grace made free from the law, that their works ſhould not be examined by the rules of the law. As for them that conclude that we may ſin becauſe we are not under the law, let them know that this liberty pertaineth not to them, the end whereof isto encourage us to good.

The third part of Chriſtian liberty is freedom of conſcience touching the uſe of indifferent things, as cloth, meat, drink, wherein it is unneceſſary to know how much is permitted us, leaſt too much ſtraitneſs drive us to inconveniency.

7. The third part is, that we are bound with no conſcience before God of outward things which are in themſelves indifferent, but that we may indifferently ſometimes uſe them, and ſometimes leave them unuſed. And the knowlege of this liberty alſo is very neceſſary for us, for if it ſhall be abſent, there will be no quiet to our conſciences, no end of ſuperſtitions. Many at this day think us fooliſh to move diſputation about the free eating of fleſh, about the free uſe of days, and garments, and ſuch other ſmall trifles as they indeed think them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when conſciences have once caſt themſelves into the ſnare, they enter into a long and cumberſome way, from whence they can afterward find no eaſy way to get out. If a man begin to doubt whether he may occupy linen in ſheets, ſhirts, handkerchiefs, and napkins, neither will he be out of doubt whether he may uſe hemp, and at the laſt he will alſo fall in doubt of matters, for he will weigh with himſelf whether he cannot ſup without napkins, whether he may not be without handkerchiefs. If any man think dainty meat unlawful, at length he will not with quietneſs before the Lord eat either brown bread or common meats, when he remembreth that he may yet ſuſtain his body with baſer food. If he doubt of pleaſant wine, afterward he will not drink dead wine with good peace of conſcience, laſt of all he will not be ſo bold as touch ſweeter and cleaner water than other. Finally, at the length he will come to this point, to think it unlawful (as the common ſaying is) to tread upon a ſtraw lying acroſs. For here is begun no light ſtrife, but this is in queſtion, whether God will have us to uſe theſe or thoſe things, whoſe will ought to guide all our counſels and doings. Hereby ſome muſt needs be carried with deſperation into a devouring pit: ſome muſt, deſpiſing God, and caſting away his fear, make themſelves away through deſtruction when they have no ready way: for whoever is entangled with ſuch doubts, which way ſoever they turn themſelves, they ſee every where preſent offence of conſcience.

We cannot with thankfulneſs unto God enjoy the uſe of outward things, unleſs the knowlege of our liberty remove all ſcruple of conſcience and trou-

8. I know (ſaith Paul) Rom. xiv. 14. that nothing is common (meaning by common, unholy) but whoſo thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which words he maketh all outward things ſubject to our liberty, provided always that our minds have the aſſurance of the liber-

liberty before God. But if any ſuperſtitious opinion caſt us into any doubt, thoſe things, which of their own nature were clean, are defiled to us. Wherefore he addeth: Bleſſed is he that judgeth not himſelf in that which he alloweth. But he that judgeth, if he eat, is condemned, becauſe he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is ſin. Among ſuch narrow ſtraits, whoſo nevertheleſs with careleſly venturing on all things ſhew themſelves bolder, do they not as much turn themſelves away from God? But they who are thoroughly pierced with ſome fear of God, when they themſelves alſo are compelled to do many things againſt their conſcience, are diſcouraged and fall down with fear. All that are ſuch, receive none of the gifts of God with thankſgiving, by which alone yet Paul teſtifieth that they all are ſanctified to our uſe: I mean the thankſgiving that proceedeth from a heart that acknowlegeth the liberality and goodneſs of God in his gifts. For many of them indeed underſtand that thoſe are the benefits of God which they uſe, and they praiſe God in his works: but ſince they are not perſuaded that they are given to them, how can they thank God as the giver of them? Thus we ſee whereto this liberty tendeth, namely, that we ſhould uſe the gifts of God to ſuch purpoſes as he hath given them unto us, without any ſcruple of conſcience, without any trouble of mind, by which confidence our ſouls may both have peace with him, and acknowlege his liberality toward us. For here are comprehended all ceremonies that are at liberty to be obſerved, that our conſciences ſhould not be bound with any neceſſity to keep them, but ſhould remember that the uſe of them is by God's benefit ſubject to themſelves unto edification.

The uſe and abuſe of the doctrine which concerneth Chriſtian liberty.

9. But it is diligently to be obſerved, that Chriſtian liberty is in all the parts of it a ſpiritual thing, the whole ſtrength whereof conſiſteth in appeaſing fearful conſciences before God, if they be either unquieted, or careful for the forgiveneſs of ſins, or if they be penſive whether our imperfect works, and defiled with the faults of our fleſh do pleaſe God, or if they be troubled about the uſe of indifferent things. Wherefore they expound it wrong, who either make it a cloak for their own deſires, that they may abuſe the gifts of God to their own luſt, or who think that there is no liberty but that which is uſed before men, and therefore in uſing it have no regard to weak brethren. In the firſt kind, men at this day much offend. There is almoſt no man which may by his ability of wealth be ſumptuous, who delighteth not in exceſſive gorgeouſneſs, in banquets, in apparel of body, in building of houſes, who hath not a will to excel others in all kinds of magnificence; who doth not marvellouſly flatter himſelf in his fineneſs. And all theſe things are defended under the pretence of Chriſtian liberty. They ſay, that they are things indifferent. I grant, if a man uſe them indifferently. But when they are too greedily coveted, when they are proudly boaſted of, when they are waſtefully ſpent, it is certain that thoſe things which were in themſelves lawful, are by theſe faults defiled. This ſaying of Paul, doth very well put a difference between things indifferent. All things are clean to the clean, but to the defiled and unbelieving nothing is clean, becauſe their mind and conſcience is defiled. For why are rich men accurſed, Tit. i. 15. Luke vi. 24. Amos vi. 1. and Iſa. v. 8. they who have their comfort, who are ſatisfied with meat, who now laugh, who ſleep in beds of ivory, who join land to land, whoſe banquets have lute, harp, tabor, and wine? Verily both ivory, gold and riches are the good creatures of God, permitted, yea and appointed by the providence of God for men to uſe. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be ſatisfied with meat, or to join new poſſeſſions to their own old poſſeſſions or of their anceſtors, or to be delighted with muſical melody, or to drink wine. This is true indeed. But when they have plenty of things, to wallow in delights, to glut themſelves, aud to make their wit and mind drunk with preſent pleaſures and always to gape for new, theſe doings are moſt far from the lawful uſe of the gifts of God. Therefore let them take away immeaſurable deſire, let them take away immeaſurable waſting, let them take away vanity and arrogance, that they may with a pure conſcience purely uſe the gifts of God. When the mind ſhall be framed to this ſobriety, they ſhall have a rule of the lawful uſe. On the other ſide let this moderation be wanting, even baſe and common delicates are too much. For this is truly ſaid, that oftentimes in freez and coarſe cloth dwelleth a purple heart, and ſometimes under ſilk and purple, lieth ſimple humility. Let every man in his degree ſo live, either poorly, or meanly, or plentifully, that they all remember that they are fed of God to live, not to be riotous: and let them think, that this is the law of Chriſtian liberty: if they have learned with Paul to be contented with thoſe things which they preſently have: Philip. iv. if they have ſkill both to be humhumble and to excel: if they be taught in all places and in all things to be both full and hungry, to have plenty and to ſuffer want.

Indiſcreet and unſeaſonable uſing of liberty

10. Herein alſo many men err, becauſe as though their liberty ſhould not be ſound and ſafe unleſs it had men witneſſes of it, they do indiſcreetly and unwiſely uſe it. By which unſeaſonable uſing they many times offended the weak brethren. You may ſee at this day ſome, who think that their liberty cannot ſtand, unleſs they take poſſeſſion of it by eating of fleſh on Friday. I blame not that they eat: but this falſe opinion muſt be driven out of their minds. For they ought to think, that by their liberty they obtain no new thing in the ſight of men but before God, and that it ſtandeth as well in abſtaining as in uſing. If they underſtand that it maketh no matter before God, whether they eat fleſh or eggs, whether they wear red or black garments, that is enough. The conſcience is now free, to which the benefit of ſuch liberty was due. Therefore altho' they do afterwards abſtain all their life long from fleſh, and wear always but one colour, yet they are no leſs free, Yea therefore becauſe they are free, they do with a free conſcience abſtain. But they do moſt hurtfully offend becauſe they nothing regard the weakneſs of their brethren, which we ought ſo to bear with, that we raſhly commit nothing to the offence of them. But ſometimes alſo it behoveth that our liberty be ſet forth before men. And this I grant. But there is a meaſure moſt heedfully to be kept, that we caſt not away the care of the weak of whom the Lord hath ſo earneſtly given us charge.

Of offences riſing unto others in the uſe of our liberty.

11. I will in this place therefore ſpeak ſomewhat of offences, in what difference they are to be taken, which are to be avoided, and which to be neglected: whereupon we may afterward determine what place there is for our liberty among men. I like well that common diviſion, which teacheth that there is of offences one ſort given, another taken: foraſmuch as it both hath a plain teſtimony of the ſcripture, and doth not unfitly expreſs that which it meaneth. If thou do any thing by unſeaſonable lightneſs, or wantonneſs, or raſhneſs, not in order, not in fit place, whereby the ignorant and weak are offended, that ſame may be called an offence given by thee: becauſe it came to paſs by thy fault that ſuch offence was given. And it is alway called an offence given in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing itſelf. It is called an offence taken, when a thing which is otherwiſe not evilly done, nor out of time, is by ill will, or by ſome wrongful maliciouſneſs of mind drawn to occaſion an offence. For in this caſe offence was not given, but theſe wrongful conſtruers do without cauſe take one. With that firſt kind of offence none are offended but the weak: but with this ſecond, kind four natures and Phariſaical ſcornful heads are offended. Wherefore we ſhall call the one, the offence of the weak; the other of the Phariſees: and we ſhall ſo temper the uſe of our liberty, that it ought to give place to the ignorance of the weak brethren, but in no wiſe to the rigorouſneſs of the Phariſees. For what is to be yielded to weakneſs, Paul ſheweth in very many places. Bear (ſaith he) with the weak in faith. Rom. xiv. 1. and 13. Again, Let us not hereafter judge one another, but this rather, let there not be laid before our brother any offence or occaſion of falling: and many other ſayings to the ſame intent, which are more fit to be read in the place itſelf, than to be here rehearſed. The ſum is, that we which are ſtrong ſhould bear with the weakneſs of our brethren, and not pleaſe ourſelves, but every one of us pleaſe his neighbour unto good for edifying. 1 Cor. viii. 9. In another place, But ſee that your liberty be not in any wiſe an offence to them that are weak. Again, Eat ye all things that are ſold in the ſhambles, aſking no queſtions for conſcience ſake: of your conſcience (I ſay) not another man's. Finally, be ye ſuch that ye give no offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Greeks, nor to the church of God. 1 Cor. x. 25. Alſo in another place, Ye are called, brethren, into liberty: only uſe not your liberty for an occaſion to the fleſh, but by charity ſerve ye one another, Gal. v. 13. Thus it is. Our liberty is not given towards our weak neighbours, whoſe ſervants charity maketh us in all things: but rather that having peace with God in our minds, we may alſo live peaceably among men. As for the offence of the Phariſees, how much it is to be regarded, we learn by the words of our Lord, whereby he biddeth them to be let alone, becauſe they are blind, and guides of the blind. Matth. xv. 14. The diſciples had warned him, that the Phariſees were offended with his ſayings: he anſwered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

How far our liberty extendeth

12. But yet ſtill the matter hangeth doubtful, unleſs we know who are to be taken for weak, in reſpect of others whom it may offend.

and who for Phariſees: which difference being taken away, I ſee not among offences what uſe at all of liberty remaineth, which might never be uſed without great danger. But it ſeemeth to me that Paul hath moſt plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, how far our liberty is either to be tempered or to be defended though with offences. When he took Timothy into his company, he circumciſed him: but he could not be brought to circumciſe Titus. Act. xvi. 3. Galat. ii. 3. Here were divers doings, and no change of purpoſe or of mind: namely in circumciſing Timothy, when he was free from all men, he made himſelf a ſervant to all men: and he was made to the Jews, as a Jew, that he might win the Jews: to them that were under the law, as if he himſelf were under the law, that he might win them which were under the law: all things to all men, that he might ſave many, as he writeth in another place Cor. ix. 19. and 21. Thus we have a right moderation of liberty, if it may be indifferently reſtrained with ſome profit. What he had reſpect unto, when he ſtoutly refuſed to circumciſe Titus, he himſelf teſtifieth, writing thus: But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumciſed, becauſe of the falſe brethren which were come in by the way, which had privily creep in to eſpy our liberty which we have in Chriſt Jeſus, that they might bring us into bondage, to whom we gave not place by ſubjection ſo much as for a time, that the truth of the goſpel might continue with you. Gal. ii. 4. There is alſo a time when we muſt of neceſſity defend our liberty, if the ſame be in weak conſciences endangered by the unjuſt exactings of falſe apoſtles. We muſt in every thing ſtudy to preſerve charity, and have regard to the edifying of our neighbour. All things (ſaith he) are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things do not edify. 1. Cor. x. 23. Let no man ſeek that which is his own, but that which is anothers. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that we muſt uſe our liberty, if it may turn to the edifying of our neighbour: but if it be not ſo expedient for our neighbour, then we muſt forbear it. There be ſome which counterfeit the wiſdom of Paul in forbearing of liberty, while they do nothing leſs than apply the ſame to the duties of charity. For ſo that they may provide for their own quietneſs, they wiſh all mention of liberty to be buried, whereas it is no leſs neceſſary for our neighbours, ſometimes to uſe liberty for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to reſtrain it for their commodity. But it is the part of a godly man to think, that free power in outward things is therefore granted him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charity.

Intolerable halting covered with pretence of not offending the weak.

13 But whatſoever I have ſpoken of avoiding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to mean and indifferent things. For thoſe things that are neceſſary to be done, are not to be left undone for fear of any offence. For as our liberty is to be ſubmitted to charity, ſo charity it ſelf likewiſe ought to be under the pureneſs of faith. Verily here alſo regard ought to be had to charity, but ſo far as to the altars, that is, that for our neighbours ſake we offend not God. Their intemperance is not to be allowed, who do nothing but with troubleſome turmoiling, and who had rather raſhly to rend all things, than leiſurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkned to, which when they be leaders of men into a thouſand ſorts of ungodlineſs, yet do feign that they muſt behave themſelves ſo that they be none offence to their neighbours. As though they do not in the mean edify the conſciences of their neighbours to evil, ſpecially whereas they ſtick faſt in the ſame mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleaſant men forſooth, whither their neighbour be to be inſtructed with doctrine or example of life, ſay that he muſt be fed with milk, whom they fill with moſt evil and poiſonous opinions. Paul reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milk. 1. Cor. iii. 2. But if popiſh maſs had then been among them, would he have ſacrificed to give them the drink of milk? No: for milk is not poiſon. Therefore they lie in ſaying that they feed them whom under a ſhew of flattering allurements they cruelly kill. But, granting that ſuch diſſembling is for a time to be allowed, how long yet will they feed their children with milk? For if they never grow bigger, that they may at the leaſt be able to bear ſome light meat, it is certain that they were never brought up with milk. There are two reaſons that move me why I do not now more ſharply contend with them: firſt, becauſe their folllies are ſcarcely worthy to be confuted, ſince they worthily ſeem filthy in the ſight of all men that have their ſound wit: ſecondly, becauſe I have ſufficiently done it in peculiar books, I will not now do a thing already done. Only let the readers remember this, that with whatſoever offences Satan and the world go about to turn us away from the ordinances of God or to ſtay us from following that which he appointeth, yet we muſt never-nevertheleſs go earneſtly forward: and then, that whatſoever dangers hang upon it, yet it is not at our liberty to ſwerve one hair breadth from the commandment of the ſame God, neither is it lawful by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he giveth us leave.

The conſciences of faithful men exempted from humant power.

14. Now therefore ſith faithful conſciences having received ſuch prerogative of liberty as we have above ſet forth, have by the benefit of Chriſt obtained this that they be not entangled with any ſnares of obſervations in thoſe things in which the Lord willed that they ſhould be at liberty: we conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is unmeet, that either Chriſt ſhould loſe the thanks of his ſo great liberality, or conſciences their profit. Neither ought we to think it a ſlight matter, which we ſee to have coſt Chriſt ſo dear: namely which he valued not with gold or ſilver, but with his own blood: 1. Pet. i. 18. ſo that Paul ſticketh not to ſay, that his death is made void, if we yeeld our ſouls in ſubjection to men. For he travelleth about nothing elſe in certain chapters of the epiſtle to the Galatians, but to ſhew that Chriſt is darkned or rather deſtroyed to us, unleſs our conſciences ſtand faſt in their liberty, which verily they have loſt if they may at the will of men be ſnared with the bonds of laws and ordinances. Gal. v. 1. and 4. But as it is a thing moſt worthy to be known, ſo it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For ſo ſoon as any word is ſpoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, by and by great troubles are raiſed up partly by ſeditious men, partly by ſlanders, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and overthrown.

Chriſtians are not therefore according to the outward behaviour of their perſons privileged from ſubjection to the laws of men, becauſe their conſciences are at liberty before God.

15. Therefore that none of us may ſtumble at this ſtone, firſt let us conſider, that there are two ſorts of government in man: the one ſpiritual, whereby the conſcience is framed to godlineſs and to the worſhip of God: the other civil, whereby man is trained to the duties of humanity and civility which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not unfit names called the ſpiritual and temporal juriſdiction, whereby is ſignified, that the firſt of the two forms of government pertaineth to the life of the ſoul, and the latter is occupied in the things of this preſent life: not only in feeding and clothing, but in ſetting forth of laws whereby a man may ſpend his life among men holily, honeſtly, and ſoberly. For, that firſt kind hath place in the inward mind, this latter kind ordereth only the outward behaviour. The one we may call the ſpiritual kingdom, the other the civil kingdom. But theſe two, as we have divided them, muſt be either of them alway ſeverally conſidered by themſelves, and when the one is in conſideration, we muſt withdraw and turn away our minds from thinking upon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both divers kings and divers laws may govern. By putting of this difference it ſhall come to paſs, that that which the goſpel teacheth of the ſpiritual liberty, we ſhall not wrongfully draw to the civil order, as though Chriſtians were according to the outward government leſs ſubject to the laws of men, becauſe their conſciences are at liberty before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the fleſh, becauſe they are free according to the ſpirit. Again, becauſe even in thoſe ordinances which ſeem to pertain to the ſpiritual kingdom, there may be ſome error, we muſt alſo put a difference between theſe, which are to be taken for lawful as agreeable to the word of God, and on the other ſide which ought not to have place among the godly. Of the civil government there ſhall be elſewhere place to ſpeak. Alſo of the eccleſiaſtical laws I omit to ſpeak at this time, becauſe a more full treating of it ſhall be fit for the fourth book, where we ſhall ſpeak of the power of the church. But of this diſcourſe, let this be the concluſion, the queſtion being (as I have ſaid) of it ſelf not very dark or entangled, doth for this cauſe accumber many, becauſe they do not ſubtilly enough put difference between the outward court as they call it, and the court of conſcience. Moreover this increaſeth the difficulty, that Paul teacheth that the magiſtrate ought to be obeyed, not only for fear of puniſhment, but for conſcience. Rom. xiii. and 5. Whereupon followeth that conſciences are alſo bound by the civil laws. If it were ſo, all ſhould come to naught which we both have ſpoken and ſhall ſpeak of the ſpiritual government. For the looſing of this knot, firſt it is good to know what is conſcience. And the definition thereof is to be fetched from the derivation of the word. For, as when men do with mind and underſtanding conceive the knowlege of things, they are thereby ſaid (Scire) to know, whereupon alſo is derived the name of ſcience: knowlege: ſo when they have a feeling of the judgment of God, as a witneſs joined with them which doth not ſuffer them to hide their ſins but that they be drawn accuſed to the judgment ſeat of God, that ſame feeling is called conſcience. For it is a certain mean between God and man, becauſe it ſuffereth not man to ſuppreſs in himſelf that which he knoweth, but purſueth him ſo far till it bring him to guiltineſs. This is it which Paul meaneth, where he ſaith that conſcience doth together witneſs with men, when their thoughts do accuſe or acquit them in the judgment of God. Rom. ii. 15. A ſimple knowlege might remain as incloſed within man. Therefore this feeling which preſenteth man to the judgment of God, is as it were a keeper joined to man, to mark and eſpy all his ſecrets, that nothing may remain buried in darkneſs. Whereupon alſo cometh that old proverb, conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes. And for the ſame reaſon Peter hath ſet the examination of a good conſcience for the quietneſs of mind, when being perſuaded of the grace of Chriſt, we do without fear preſent our ſelves before God. 1. Pet. iii. 21. And the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, ſetteth to have no more conſcience of ſin, inſtead of, to be delivered or acquitted, that ſin may no more accuſe us. Heb. x. 2.

In what ſort the conſcience is bound or free.

16. Therefore as works have reſpect to men, ſo conſcience is referred to God, ſo that a good conſcience is nothing elſe but the inward pureneſs of the heart. In which ſenſe Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law out of a pure conſcience and faith not feigned. Tim. i. 5. Afterward alſo in the ſame chapter he ſheweth how much it differeth from underſtanding, ſaying that ſome had ſuffered ſhipwreck from the faith, becauſe they had forſaken a good conſcience. For in theſe words he ſignifieth it is a lively affection to worſhip God, and a ſincere endeavour to live holily and godly. Sometimes indeed it extendeth alſo to men, as in Luke where the ſame Paul proteſteth that he endeavoured himſelf to walk with a good conſcience toward God and men. Acts. xxiv. 16. But this was therefore ſaid, becauſe the fruits of a good conſcience do flow and come even to men. But in ſpeaking properly, it hath reſpect to God only, as I have already ſaid. Hereby it cometh to paſs that the law is ſaid to bind the conſcience, which ſimply bindeth a man without reſpect of men, or without having any conſideration of them. As for example: God commandeth not only to keep the mind chaſte and pure from all luſt, but alſo forbiddeth all manner of filthineſs of words and outward wantonneſs whatſoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conſcience is ſubject although there lived not one man in the world. So he that behaveth himſelf intemperately, not only ſinneth in this that he giveth an evil example to the brethren, but alſo hath his conſcience bound with guiltineſs before God. In things that are of themſelves mean, there is another conſideration. For we ought to abſtain from them if they breed any offence, but the conſcience ſtill being free. So Paul ſpeaketh of fleſh conſecrate to idols. 1. Cor. x. 28. If any (ſaith he) move any doubt, touch it not for conſcience ſake. I ſay for conſcience, not thine but the others. A faithful man would ſin, who being firſt warned ſhould nevertheleſs eat ſuch fleſh. But howſoever in reſpect of his brother, it is neceſſary for him to abſtain as it is preſcribed of God, yet he ceaſeth not to keep ſtill the liberty of conſcience. Thus we ſee how this law binding the outward work, leaveth the conſcience unbound.

CHAP. XX.

Of prayer, which is the chief exerciſe of faith, and whereby we daily receive the benefits of God.

Our own emptineſs and the fulneſs of all riches laid up in Chriſt ſhould allure us unto prayer.

OF theſe things that have been hitherto ſpoken, we plainly perceive how needy and void man is of all good things, and how he wanteth all helps of ſalvation. Wherefore if he ſeek for reliefs whereby he may ſuccour his needineſs, he muſt go out of himſelf and get them elſewhere. This is afterward declared unto us, that the Lord doth of his own free will and liberality give himſelf to us in his Chriſt, in whom he offereth us inſtead of our miſery all felicity, inſtead of our need wealthineſs, in whom he openeth to us the heavenly treaſures: that our whole faith ſhould behold his beloved ſon, that upon him our whole expectation ſhould hang, in him our whole hope ſhould ſtick and reſt. This verily is the ſecret and hidden philoſophy, which cannot be wrung out with logical arguments: but they learn it whoſe eyes God hath opened that they may ſee light in his light. But ſince that we are taught by faith to acknowlege that whatſoever we have need of, whatſoever wanteth in us, the ſame is in God and in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, namely in whom the

the Lord willed the whole fulneſs of his bounty to reſt, that from thence we ſhould all draw as out of a moſt plentiful fountain: now it remaineth that we ſeek in him, and with prayers crave of him that which we have learned to be in him. Otherwiſe to know God to be the Lord and giver of all good things, which allureth us to pray to him, and not to go to him and pray to him: ſhould ſo nothing profit us, that it ſhould be all one as if a man ſhould neglect a treaſure ſhewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the apoſtle to ſhew that true faith cannot be idle from calling upon God, hath ſet this order: that as of the goſpel ſpringeth faith, ſo by it our hearts are framed to call upon the name of God, And this is the ſame thing which he had a little before ſaid, that the ſpirit of adoption, which ſcaleth in our hearts the witneſs of the goſpel, raiſeth up our ſpirits that they dare ſhew forth their deſires to God, ſtir up unſpeakable gronings, and cry with confidence Abba father. Rom. viii. 26. It is meet therefore that this laſt point, becauſe it was before but only ſpoken of by the way and as it were lightly touched, ſhould now be more largely treated of.

By prayer we are both enriched with grace, and in diſtreſs quieted.

2. This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that we attain to thoſe riches which are laid up for us with the heavenly father. For there is a certain communicating of men with God, whereby they entring into the ſanctuary of heaven, do in his own preſence call to him touching his promiſes: that the ſame thing which they believed him affirming only in word not to be vain, they may when need ſo requireth find in experience. Therefore we ſee that there is nothing ſet forth to us to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which we are not alſo commanded to crave with prayers: ſo true it is that by prayer are digged up the treaſures, which our faith hath looked upon being ſhewed to it by the goſpel of the Lord. Now how neceſſary and how many ways profitable this exerciſe of prayer is, it can by no words be ſufficiently declared. Undoubtedly it is not without cauſe that the heavenly father teſtifyeth, that the only fortreſs of ſalvation is in the calling upon his name, namely whereby we call to us the preſence both of his providence, by which he watched to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which he ſuſtaineth us being weak and in a manner fainting: and of his goodneſs, by which he receiveth us into favour being miſerably loaden with ſins: finally, whereby we call him all whole, to give himſelf preſent to us. Hereby groweth ſingular reſt and quietneſs to our conſciences. For when we have diſcloſed to the Lord the neceſſity which diſtreſſed us, we largely reſt though it were but in this only that none of our evils is hidden from him, whom we are perſwaded both to be moſt well willing toward us, and moſt able to provide well for us.

It is not a needleſs thing to pray even for thoſe things which before we pray we know that God is purpoſed to beſtow.

3. But (will ſome man ſay) did not he know without any to put him in mind of it, both in what part we be diſtreſſed, and what is expedient for us: ſo that it may ſeem after a certain manner ſuperfluous, that he ſhould be troubled with our prayers, as though he winked or ſlept, until he were awaked with our voice? But they which ſo reaſon, mark not to what end the Lord hath inſtructed them that be his to pray: for he ordained it not ſo much for his own cauſe as rather for ours. He willeth indeed, as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowlege to come from him whatſoever men require or do perceive to make for their profit, and do teſtify the ſame with wiſhings. But the profit alſo of this ſacrifice wherewith he is worſhipped, cometh to us. Therefore how much more boldly the holy fathers glorioufly talked both to themſelves and other of the benefits of God, ſo much the more ſharply they were pricked forward to pray. The only example of Elias ſhall be enough for us, which being ſure of the counſel of God, after that he not raſhly had promiſed rain to Achab, yet buſily prayeth between his knees, and ſendeth his ſervant ſeven times to eſpy it: 1. King. xviii. 42. not for that he did diſcredit the oracle of God, but becauſe he knew that it was his duty, leaſt his faith ſhould wax drowſy and ſluggiſh, to lay up his deſires with God. Wherefore although while we ly ſenſeleſs and ſo dull that we perceive not our own miſeries, he waketh and watcheth for us, and ſometime alſo helpeth us undeſired, yet it much behoveth us, that he be continually called upon of us, that our heart may be inflamed with earneſt and fervent deſire to ſeek, love, and worſhip him, while we accuſtom our ſelves in every neceſſity to flee to him as to our refuge. Again, that no deſire and no wiſh at all may enter into our mind, whereof we ſhould be aſhamed to make him witneſs, while we learn to preſent our wiſhes, yea and to pour out our whole heart before his eyes. Then that we may be framed to receive all his benefits with true thankfulneſs of mind, yea and with outward thankſgiving, of which we are put in mind by our prayer that they come to us from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which we deſired, being perſuaded that he hath anſwered to our prayers, we may be thereby the more fervently carried to think upon his kindneſs, and therewithal embrace with greater pleaſure thoſe things which we acknowlege to have been obtained by prayer. Laſt of all, that very uſe and experience may according to the meaſure of our weakneſs aſſure our minds of his providence when we underſtand that he not only promiſeth that he will never fail us, and that he doth of his own accord open us the entry to call to him in the very point of neceſſity, but alſo hath his hand always ſtretched out to help them that are his, and that he doth not feed them with words, but defendeth them with preſent help. For theſe cauſes, the moſt kind father, although he never ſleepeth or is ſluggiſh, yet oftentimes maketh a ſhew as though he ſlept and were ſluggiſh, that ſo he may exerciſe us, which are otherwiſe ſlothful and ſluggiſh to come to him, to aſk of him, to require him to our own great benefit. Therefore they do too fooliſhly, who to call away the minds of men from prayer, babble that the providence of God, which maketh for the ſafekeeping of all things, is in vain wearied with callings upon him: whereas the Lord contrariwiſe not in vain teſtifyeth that he is nigh to all them that call upon his name in the truth. Pſal. cxlv. 18. And of none other ſort is that which others, do trifling ſay, that it is ſuperfluous to aſk thoſe things which the Lord is of his own will ready to give; whereas even the very ſame things which flow to us from his own free liberality, he will have us acknowlege to be granted to our prayers. Which thing that notable ſentence of the pſalm doth teſtify, wherewith many like ſayings do accord. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears unto their prayers. Pſal. xxxiv. 16. Which ſaying ſo ſetteth out the providence of God bent of his own accord to provide for the ſafety of the godly, that yet he omitteth not the exerciſe of faith whereby ſlothfulneſs is wiped from the minds of men. The eyes of God therefore do wake, that he may ſuccour the neceſſity of the blind: but he will again on our behalfs hear our gronings, that he may the better prove his love toward us. And ſo both are true, that the watchman of Iſrael ſleepeth not, nor ſlumbereth, Pſal. cxxi. 8. and yet that he ſitteth ſtill as having forgotten us when he ſeeth us dull and dumb.

4. Now, to frame prayer rightly and well, let this be the firſt rule, that we be no otherwiſe framed in mind and heart, than becometh them that enter into talk with God. Which verily we ſhall attain as touching the mind, if the ſame being free from fleſhly cares and thoughts wherewith it may be called away or withdrawn from the right and pure beholding of God, do not only bend itſelf wholly to prayer, but alſo ſo much as is poſſible be lifted up and carried above itſelf. Neither do I here require a mind ſo at liberty, that it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwiſe the ferventneſs of prayer muſt by ſuch carefulneſs be kindled in us (as we ſee that the holy ſervants of God do ſometime declare great torments, much more carefulneſs, when they ſay they cry unto the Lord out of the depths, and out of the midſt of the jaws of death.) But I ſay that all ſtrange and foreign cares muſt be driven away, wherewith the mind itſelf wandering hither and thither is carried about, and being drawn out of heaven is preſſed down to the earth. I mean by this that it muſt be lifted up above itſelf, that it may not bring into the ſight of God any of thoſe things which our blind and fooliſh reaſon is wont to imagine, nor may hold it ſelf bound within the compaſs of her own vanity, but riſe up to pureneſs worthy for God.

The firſt rule of framing rightly our prayers is to void our cogitations as much as may be from all fleſhly and earthly cares.

5. Both theſe things are ſpecially worthy to be noted, that whoſoever prepareth himſelf to pray, ſhould thereto apply all his ſenſes and endeavours, and not (as men are wont) be diverſly drawn with wandering thoughts: becauſe there is nothing more contrary to the reverence of God, than ſuch lightneſs which is a witneſs of too wanton licentiouſneſs and looſe from all fear. In which thing we muſt ſo much more earneſtly labour as we find it more hard. For no man can be bent ſo to pray, but that he ſhall feel many by thoughts to creep upon him, either to break off, or by ſome deviating or ſwervin to hinder the courſe of his prayer. But here let us call to mind how great an unworthineſs it is, when God receiveth us into familiar talk with him, to abuſe his ſo great condeſcention, by mingling holy and prophane things together, when the reverence of him holdeth not our minds faſt bound unto him: but as if we talked with with some mean man, we do in the midst of our prayer, forsaking him, leap hither and thither. Let us therefore know that none do rightly and well prepare themselves to prayer, but they whom the majesty of God pierceth, that they come to it unincumbered with earthly cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremony of lifting up of hands, that men should remember that they be far distant from God unless they lift up their senses on high. As also it is said in the Psalms, Psal. xxv. 1. To thee have I lifted up my soul. And the scripture oftentimes useth this manner of speech, to lift up prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not sit still in their dregs. Let this be the sum: that how much more liberally God dealeth with us, gently alluring us to unload our cares into his bosom, so much less excusable are we unless his so excellent and incomparable benefit do with us overweigh all other things, and draw us unto itself that we may earnestly apply our endeavours and senses to pray: which cannot be done unless our mind by strongly wrestling with the hinderances do rise up above them. Another point we have set forth, that we ask no more than God giveth leave. For though he biddeth us to pour out our hearts, yet he doth indifferently give loose reins to foolish and froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will do according to the will of the godly, he proceedeth not to so tender bearing with them that he submitteth himself to their will. But in both these points men do commonly much offend. For not only the most part of men presume without shame, without reverence, to speak to God for their follies, and shamelessly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dream: but also so great foolishness or senseless dulness possesseth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, even all their most filthy desires, whereof they would greatly be ashamed to make men privy. Some prophane men have laughed to scorn, yea and detested this boldness, yet the vice itself hath always reigned. And hereby it came to pass that ambitious men have chosen Jupiter to be their patron: covetous men, Mercury; the desirous of learning, Apollo and Minerva; warriors, Mars; and letcherous folk, Venus. Like as at this day (as I have even now touched) men do in prayers grant more licence to their unlawful desires, than when they sportingly talk with their equals. But God suffereth not his gentleness to be so mocked: but claiming to himself his right, maketh our prayers subject to his authority, and restraineth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keep fast this saying of John: 1 John v. 14. This is our confidence, that if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us. But forasmuch as our abilities are far from being sufficient to perform so great perfection, we must seek a remedy to help us. As we ought to bend the sight of our mind to God, so the affection of the heart ought also to follow to the same end. But both do stay far beneath it, yea rather do faint and fail or are carried a contrary way. Wherefore God to succour this weakness, in our prayers giveth the spirit to be our schoolmaster, to instruct us in what is right and to govern our affections. For because we know not what we should pray for as we ought, the Spirit cometh to our succour, and maketh intercession for us with unspeakable groanings, Rom. viii. not that it indeed either prayeth or groaneth, but stirreth up in us affiance, desires, and fightings, which the strength of nature were not able to conceive. And not without cause Paul calleth them unspeakable groanings which the faithful send so forth by the guiding of the Spirit, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they are so held in perplexity with blind cares, that they scarcely find what is profitable for them to speak: yea, while they go about to utter stammering words, they stick fast encumbered. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our own slothfulness should give over the charge of praying to the Spirit of God, and lie dull in that carelessness, to which we are too much inclined (as there are heard the wicked sayings of some, that we must lie negligently gaping to wait until he prevent our minds occupied elsewhere) but rather that we, loathing our own slothfulness and sluggishness, should crave such help of the Spirit. Neither doth Paul, when he biddeth us to pray in spirit, therefore cease to exhort us to wakefulness: 1 Cor. xiv. meaning that the instinct of the Spirit so useth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our own endeavour: because God will in this behalf prove how effectually faith moveth our hearts.

A second rule for direction of prayer is the sense & feeling of our own want.

6. Let also another law be, that in praying we always feel our own want, and that earnestly thinking how we stand in need of those things that we ask, we join with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtain. For many do slightly for manners sake, recite prayers after a prescribed form, as though they rendered a certain thankfulneſs of mind, yea and with outward thankſgiving, of which we are put in mind by our prayer that they come to us from his hand. Moreover, that when we have obtained that which we deſired, being perſuaded that he hath anſwered to our prayers, we may be thereby the more fervently carried to think upon his kindneſs, and therewithal embrace with greater pleaſure thoſe things which we acknowlege to have been obtained by prayer. Wherefore God to ſuccour this weakneſs, in our prayers giveth the ſpirit to be our ſchoolmaſter, to inſtruct us in what is right and to govern our affections. For becauſe we know not what we ſhould pray for as we ought, the Spirit cometh to our ſuccour, and maketh interceſſion for us with unſpeakable groanings, Rom. viii. not that it indeed either prayeth or groaneth, but ſtirreth up in us affiance, deſires, and fightings, which the ſtrength of nature were not able to conceive. Neither doth Paul, when he biddeth us to pray in ſpirit, therefore ceaſe to exhort us to wakefulneſs: 1 Cor. xiv. meaning that the inſtinct of the Spirit ſo uſeth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or ſlacketh our own endeavour: becauſe God will in this behalf prove how effectually faith moveth our hearts.

A ſecond rule for direction of prayer is the ſenſe & feeling of our own want.

6. Let alſo another law be, that in praying we always feel our own want, and that earneſtly thinking how we ſtand in need of thoſe things that we aſk, we join with our prayer an earneſt yea fervent affection to obtain. For many do ſlightly for manners ſake, recite prayers after a preſcribed form, as though they rendered a certain taſk to God: and though they confeſs that this is a neceſſary remedy for their evils, becauſe it is to their deſtruction to be without the help of God which they crave; yet it appeareth that they do this duty for cuſtom, foraſmuch as in the mean time their minds are cold, and do not weigh what they aſk. The general and confuſe feeling indeed of their neceſſity leadeth them hereunto: but it doth not ſtir them as it were in a preſent caſe to aſk releaſe of their need. Now what think we is more hateful or more deteſtable to God than this feigning, when a man aſketh forgiveneſs of ſin, in the mean time either thinking that he is not a ſinner, or not thinking upon this, that he is a ſinner, even wherewith God himſelf is plainly mocked? But of ſuch perverſeneſs (as I have ſaid) mankind is full, that for manners ſake they oftentimes aſk many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberality to come to them from ſome other where, or that they have them already remaining with them. The fault of ſome other ſeemeth to be lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which have only conceived this principle, that we muſt ſacrifice to God with prayers, do mumble up prayers without any muſing of mind upon them. But the godly muſt principally take heed, that they never come into the preſence of God to aſk any thing, but becauſe they do both boil with earneſt affection of heart, and do therewithal deſire to obtain it of him. Yea, and alſo though in thoſe things which we aſk only to the glory of God, we ſeem not at the firſt ſight to provide for our own neceſſity, yet the ſame thing ought to be aſked with no leſs ferventneſs and vehemency of deſire. As when we pray that his name may be hallowed, we muſt, (as I may ſo ſpeak) fervently hunger and thirſt for that hallowing.

Although there be no time wherein prayer is not needful, yet at ſometimes we ſee a ſpecial neceſſity for it, but reap no benefit by it at any time without a lothing of our own filthineſs which cannot be in us but by repentance.

7. If any man object, that we are not always driven with the like neceſſity to pray; I grant the ſame indeed: and this difference is profitably taught us of James: Is any man heavy among you? Let him pray. Whoſo is merry, let him ſing, James v. 13. Therefore even common feeling teacheth us, that becauſe we are too ſlothful, therefore, as the matter requireth, we are the more ſharply pricked forward of God to pray earneſtly. And this David calleth the fit time, Pſalm xxxii. 6. becauſe (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, diſcommodities, fears, and other kinds of temptations do preſs us, ſo much freer acceſs is open for us, as though God did call us unto him. But yet no leſs true is that ſaying of Paul, that we muſt pray at all times, Eph. vi. 18. Becauſe howſoever things proſperouſly flow according to our hearts deſire, and matter of mirth doth compaſs us on every ſide, yet there is no minute of time wherein our need doth not require us to pray. If a man have abundance of wine and wheat: yet ſince he cannot enjoy one morſel of bread but by the continual grace of God, whole cellers or barns full ſhall be no let why he ſhould not crave daily bread. Now if we call to mind how many dangers do every moment hang over us, the very fear itſelf will teach us, that we have no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceive in ſpiritual things. For, when ſhall ſo many ſins, whereof we know ourſelves guilty, ſuffer us to ſit ſtill without care and not in humble wiſe crave pardon both of the fault and the pain? When do temptations grant us truce, ſo that we need not to haſte unto help? Moreover the deſire of the kingdom and glory of God ought ſo to pluck us to itſelf, not by fits but continually, that it ſhould always be fit time for us. Therefore not without cauſe we are ſo oft commanded to pray continually. I do not yet ſpeak of perſeverance in prayer, whereof mention ſhall be made hereafter: but when the ſcripture warneth us, that we ought to pray continually, it accuſeth our ſlothfulneſs, becauſe we do not perceive how neceſſary this care and diligence is for us. By this rule all hypocriſy and craftineſs of lying to God, is debarred, yea driven far away from prayer. God promiſeth that he will be near to all that call upon him in truth, and he pronounceth that they ſhall find him who ſeek him with their whole heart. But they aſpire not thither who pleaſe themſelves in their own filthineſs. Therefore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly ſaid in the ſcriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are accurſed, like as their ſacrifices alſo are. becauſe it is juſt that they find the ears of God ſhut, who do lock up their hearts, and that they ſhould not find God flexible, who do with their own hardneſs provoke his ſtiffneſs. In Iſaiah xv. 15. he threatneth after this manner, When ye ſhall multiply your prayers, I will not hear you: for your hands are full of blood. Again, in Jeremiah xi. 7, and 11. I have cried, and they have refuſed to hear: they ſhall likewiſe cry, and I will not hear: becauſe he taketh it for a moſt high diſhonour, that wicked men men ſhould boaſt of his covenant, who do in all their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Iſaiah xxix. 9. he complaineth, that when the Jews drew near to him with their lips, their heart was far from him. He ſpeaketh not this only of prayers, but affirmeth that he abhorreth feigning in all the parts of worſhipping him. To which purpoſe maketh that ſaying of James, chap. iv. 3. Ye aſk, and receive not, becauſe ye aſk amiſs, that ye may conſume it upon your luſts. It is true indeed, (as we ſhall again ſhew a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly, which they pour out, do not reſt upon their own worthineſs: yet is not that admonition of John ſuperfluous, if we aſk any thing we ſhall receive it of him, becauſe we keep his commandments: 1 John iii. 22. foraſmuch as an evil conſcience ſhutteth the gate againſt us. Whereupon followeth, that none do rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worſhippers of God. Therefore whoſoever prepareth himſelf to pray, let him lothe himſelf in his own eyes, and (which cannot be done without repentance) let him put on the perſon and mind of a beggar.

The third rule of prayer is the unfeigned humbling and abaſing of our ſelves.

8. Hereunto let the third rule be joined, that whoſoever preſenteth himſelf before God to pray, ſhould forſake all thinking of his own glory, put off all opinion of worthineſs, and finally give over all truſt of himſelf, giving in the abaſing of himſelf the glory wholly to God: leaſt if we take any thing be it never ſo little to our ſelves, we do with our own ſwelling fall away from his face. Of this ſubmiſſion which throweth down all height, we have often examples in the ſervants of God: among whom the holier that every one is, ſo much the more he is thrown down when he cometh into the ſight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himſelf commended with ſo great title of praiſe, ſaid: we pour not out our prayers before thee in our righteouſneſs, but in thy great mercy. Hear us Lord, Lord be merciful to us: Hear us, and do thoſe things that we aſk, for thine own ſake: becauſe thy name is called upon over the people and over thy holy place. Dan. ix. 18. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as men ſometime ſpeak) mingle himſelf with the multitude as one of the people, but rather ſeverally confeſſeth his own guiltineſs and humbly fleeth to the ſanctuary of forgiveneſs, as he expreſly ſaith: when I confeſſed my ſins and the ſins of my people. And this humbleneſs David alſo ſetteth out with his own example, when he ſaith, enter not into judgment with thy ſervant, becauſe in thy ſight every one that liveth ſhall not be juſtifyed. Pſal. cxliii. 2. In ſuch manner Eſay prayeth. Eſa. lxiv 5. Lo, thou art angry becauſe we have ſinned, the world is founded in thy ways, therefore we ſhall be ſaved: and we have been all filled with uncleanneſs, and all our righteouſneſs as a defiled cloth: and we have all withered away as a leaf, and our iniquities do ſcatter us abroad as the wind: and there is none that calleth upon thy name, that raiſeth up himſelf to take hold of thee: becauſe thou haſt hid thy face from us, and haſt made us to pine away in the hand of our wickedneſs. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our faſhioner, and we are the work of thy hand. Be not angry O Lord, neither remember wickedneſs for ever Behold, look upon us, we are all thy people. Lo, how they ſtand upon no affiance at all, but upon this only, that thinking upon this that they are God's, they deſpair not that he will have care of them. Likewiſe Jeremiah. If our iniquities anſwer againſt us, deal thou for thy names ſake. Jer. xiv. 7. For it is both moſt truly and moſt holy written, of whomſoever it be, which being written by an unknown author is fathered upon the prophet Barak: a ſoul heavy and deſolate for the greatneſs of evil, crooked, and weak, a hungry ſoul, and fainting eyes give glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the righteouſneſſes of our fathers do we pour out prayers in thy ſight, and aſk mercy before thy face O Lord our God: but becauſe thou art merciful, have mercy upon us, becauſe we have ſinned before thee.

The preface of our prayer muſt be the humble acknowlegement of ſins.

9. Finally the beginning and alſo the preparing of praying rightly, is craving of pardon, with an humble and plain confeſſion of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holieſt man may obtain any thing of God, until he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it poſſible that God may be favourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no marvel if the faithful do with this key open to themſelves the door to pray. Which we learn out of many places of the pſalms. For David when he aſketh another thing, ſaith: remember not the ſins of my youth, remember me according to thy mercy for thy goodneſs ſake O Lord. Again, look upon my affliction, and my labour, and forgive all my ſins. Pſal. xxv. 6. and 18. Where we alſo ſee that it is not enough, if we every ſeveral day do call our ſelves to account for our new ſins, if we do not alſo remember thoſe ſins which might ſeem to have been long ago forgotten. For, the ſame prophet in another place, having confeſſed one hainous offence by this occaſion returneth even to his mother's womb wherein he had gathered the infection Pſal. li. 7.: not to make the fault ſeem leſs by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the ſins of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning himſelf, ſo much more eaſy he may find God to intreat. But although the ſaints do not alway in expreſs words aſk forgiveneſs of ſins, yet if we diligently weigh their prayers which the ſcripture rehearſeth, we ſhall eaſily find that which I ſay, that they gathered a mind to pray of the only mercy of God, and ſo always took their beginning at appeaſing him: becauſe if every man examine his own conſcience, ſo far is he from being bold to open his ears familiarly with God, that he trembleth at every coming toward him, except that he ſtandeth upon truſt of mercy and pardon. There is alſo another ſpecial confeſſion, where they aſk releaſe of pains, that they alſo pray to have their ſins forgiven: becauſe it were an abſurdity to will that the effect be taken away while the cauſe abideth. For we muſt beware that God be favourable unto us, before that he teſtify his favour with outward ſigns: becauſe both he himſelf will keep this order, and it ſhould little profit us to have him beneficial, unleſs our conſcience feeling him appeaſed ſhould throughly make him lovely unto us. Which we are alſo taught by the anſwer of Chriſt. For when he had decreed to heal the man ſick of the palſey, he ſaid, thy ſins are forgiven thee: Matth. ix. 1. lifting up our minds thereby to that which is chiefly to be wiſhed, that God doth firſt receive us into favour, and then ſhew forth the fruit of reconciliation in helping us. But beſide that ſpecial confeſſion of preſent guiltineſs, whereby the faithful make ſupplication to obtain pardon of every ſpecial fault and pain, that general preface, which procureth favour to prayers, is never to be omitted; unleſs they be grounded upon the free mercy of God. they ſhall never obtain any thing of God. Whereunto may be referred that ſaying of John: if we confeſs our ſins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us and cleanſe us from all iniquity. 1 John. i. 9. For which cauſe it behoved prayers in the time of the law to be hallowed with expiation of blood, that they might be acceptable, and that ſo the people ſhould be put in mind that they are unworthy of ſo great a prerogative of honour, till being cleanſed from their defilings they ſhould of the only mercy of God conceive affiance to pray.

10. But whereas the ſaints ſeem ſometime for the entreating of God to allege the help of their own righteouſneſs (as when David ſaith:) keep my ſoul, becauſe I am good. Again Ezekiah: remember Lord I beſeech thee, that I have walked before thee in truth, and have done good in thine eyes, by ſuch forms of ſpeaking they mean nothing elſe than by their very regeneration to teſtify themſelves to be the ſervants and children of God, to whom he himſelf pronounceth that he will be merciful. He teacheth by the prophet (as we have already ſeen) that his eyes are upon the righteous, and his ears unto their prayers. Pſal. xxxiv. 16 Again by the apoſtle, that we ſhall obtain whatſoever we aſk, if we keep his commandments. 1 John. ii. 3. In which ſayings he doth not value prayer by the worthineſs of works: but his will is ſo to ſtabliſh their affiance, whoſe own conſcience well aſſureth them of an unfeigned uprightneſs and innocency, ſuch as all the faithful ought to be. For the ſame is taken out of the very truth of God, which the blind man that had his ſight reſtored, ſaith in John, that God heareth not ſinners: John. ix. 21. if we underſtand ſinners after the common uſe of the ſcripture, for ſuch as without all deſire of righteouſneſs do altogether ſleep and reſt upon their ſins: foraſmuch as no heart can ever break forth into unfeigned calling upon God which doth not alſo aſpire to godlineſs. Therefore with ſuch promiſes accord the prayers of the ſaints, wherein they make mention of their own pureneſs or innocency that they may feel that to be given them which is to be looked for of all the ſervants of God. Again it is then commonly found that they uſe this kind of prayer, when they do in the preſence of the Lord compare themſelves with their enemies, from whoſe unjuſt dealing they wiſhed themſelves to be delivered by his hand. In this compariſon it is no marvel if they brought forth their righteouſneſs, and ſimplicity of heart to move him the rather by the righteouſneſs of their cauſe to help them. This therefore we take not away from the godly heart of a good man, but that he may uſe the pureneſs of his conſcience before the Lord, to ſtrengthen himſelf

Prayer is fruitleſs where there is not an unfeigned aſpiring unto godlineſs, ſuch as David and Ezekiah mention in their praying as warranted thereby that they could not pray in vain.

ſelf in the promiſes wherewith the Lord comforteth and upholdeth his true worſhippers: but our meaning is, that the truſt of obtaining ſtand upon the only mercy of God, laying away all thinking of their own deſerving.

The fourth rule of prayer is courage grounded upon certain hope and truſt to obtain the thing we pray for.

11. The fourth rule is, that being ſo thrown down and ſubdued with true humility, we ſhould nevertheleſs with certain hope of obtaining be encouraged to pray. Theſe be things indeed contrary in ſhew to join with the feeling of the juſt vengeance of God, ſure affiance of favour: which things do yet very well agree together, if the only goodneſs of God raiſe us up being oppreſſed with our own evils. For as we have before taught that repentance and faith are knit as companions together with an unſeparable bond: of which yet the one affrighteth us, the other cheereth us: ſo in prayers they muſt mutually meet together. And this agreement David expreſſeth in few words: I (ſaith he) will in the multitude of thy goodneſs enter into thy houſe: I will worſhip in the temple of thy holineſs with fear. Pſal. v. 8. Under the goodneſs of God he comprehendeth faith, in the mean time not excluding fear: becauſe not only his majeſty driveth us to reverence, but alſo our own unworthineſs holdeth us in fear forgetting all pride and aſſuredneſs. But I mean not ſuch affiance, which ſhould ſhake the mind looſe from all feeling of carefulneſs with a ſweet and full quietneſs. For, to reſt ſo peaceable is the doing of them who having all things flowing as they would wiſh it, are touched with no care, are kindled with no deſire, do ſwell with no fear. And it is a very good ſpur to the ſaints to call upon God, when being diſtreſſed with their own neceſſity, they are vexed with moſt great unquietneſs, and are almoſt diſmaid in themſelves, till faith come in fit time to their ſuccours, becauſe in ſuch diſtreſſes the goodneſs of God ſo ſhineth to them, that they do indeed grone being wearied with weight of preſent evils, they are alſo in pain and grieved with fear of greater: yet being ſo upholden by it, they both relieve and comfort the hardneſs of bearing them, and do hope for eſcape and deliverance. Therefore the prayer of a goodly man muſt ariſe out of both affections, muſt alſo contain and ſhew both namely to grone for preſent evils, and to be carefully afraid of new, and yet therewithal to fly to God, not doubting that he is ready to reach his helping hand. For God is marvellouſly provoked to wrath by our diſtruſtfulneſs, if we aſk of him the benefits which we hope not to obtain. Therefore there is nothing more agreeable with the nature of prayers, than that this be preſcribed and appointed to them, that they break not forth raſhly, but follow faith going before them. To this principle Chriſt calleth us all with this ſaying: I ſay unto you, whatſoever things ye require, believe that ye ſhall receive them, and they ſhall happen to you. Mat. xi. 24. The ſame alſo he confirmeth in another place. Whatſoever ye aſk in prayer believing, ye ſhall receive. Mat. xxi. 22. Wherewith agreeth James's ſaying, If any man lack wiſdom, let him aſk it of him who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not: but let him aſk in faith not doubting. James v. 15. Wherein ſetting doubting as contrary to faith, he doth moſt properly expreſs the genuine nature of it. And no leſs is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtain nothing which call upon God in wavering and doubt, and do not determine in their hearts whether they ſhall be heard or no. Whom he alſo compareth to waves which are diverſly toſſed and driven about of the wind. Whereupon in another place he calleth a right prayer, the prayer of faith. Again when God ſo oft affirmeth that he will give to every one according to his faith, he ſignifieth that we obtain nothing without faith. Finally it is faith that obtaineth whatſoever is granted by prayer. This is meant by that notable ſaying of Paul, which the fooliſh men do take no head unto. How ſhall any man call upon him, in whom he hath not believed, Rom. x. 14. But who ſhall believe, unleſs he hath heard? But faith cometh of hearing, and hearing of the word of God. For conveying by degrees the beginning of prayer from faith he plainly affirmeth that God cannot be ſincerely called upon of any other, than them to whom by the preaching of the goſpel his mercifulneſs and gentleneſs hath been made known, and familiarly declared.

It is a thing not abſurd but moſt neceſſary that they which call upon God have an aſſured confidence in his favour, and a ſtedfaſt feeling of his good will.

12. This neceſſity our adverſaries do not think upon. Therefore when we bid the faithful to hold with aſſured confidence of mind that God is favourable and beareth good will to them, they think that we ſpeak a moſt great abſurdity. But if they had any uſe of true prayer, they would truly underſtand that God cannot be rightly called upon without that ſtedfaſt feeling of God's good will.

will. Since no man can well perceive the force of faith, but he which by experience feeleth it in his heart: what may a man profit by diſputing with ſuch men which do openly ſhew, that they never had any thing but a vain imagination? For of what force, and how neceſſary is that aſſuredneſs which we require, is chiefly learned by invocation. Which whoſo ſeeth not, he bewrayeth that he hath a very dull conſcience. Let us therefore, leaving this kind of blind men, adhere cloſely to that ſaying of Paul, that God cannot be called upon of any other, but them that know his mercy by the goſpel, and are ſurely perſuaded that it is ready for them. For what manner of ſaying ſhould this be? O Lord, I am verily in doubt whether thou wilt hear me: but becauſe I am diſtreſſed with carefulneſs, I fly to thee, that thou mayeſt help me if I be worthy. This was not the wonted manner of the ſaints, whoſe prayers we read in the ſcriptures. Neither hath the holy Ghoſt thus taught us by the apoſtle which biddeth us to go to the heavenly throne with confidence, that we may obtain grace, Heb. iv. 16. and when in another place he teacheth that we have boldneſs and acceſs in confidence by the faith of Chriſt, Eph. iii. 11. We muſt therefore hold faſt with both hands this aſſuredneſs to obtain what we aſk (ſince both the Lord with his own voice ſo commandeth us, and all the ſaints teach it by their example) if we will pray with fruit. For, only that prayer is pleaſing to God which ſpringeth out of ſuch a preſumption of faith (as I may ſo call it) and is grounded upon a dreadleſs certainty of faith. He might have been content with the bare name of faith, but he not only added confidence, but alſo furniſhed the ſame with liberty or boldneſs, by this mark to put difference between us and unbelievers, which do indeed alſo pray to God as we do, but at adventure. For which reaſon the whole church prayeth in the pſalm: let thy mercy be upon us, as we put our truſt in thee. Pſal. xxxiii. The ſame condition is alſo ſpoken of in another place by the prophet: In what day I ſhall cry, this I know that God is with me. Pſal. lxvi. 10. Again, in the morning I will direct my ſelf to thee, and I will watch. Pſal. v. 15. For of theſe words we gather, that prayers are in vain caſt into the air, unleſs hope be adjoined, from whence as out of a watch tower we may quietly wait for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Paul's exhortation. For before that he move the faithful to pray in ſpirit at all times with wakefulneſs and diligence, he firſt of all biddeth them to take the ſhield of faith, the helmet of ſalvation, and the ſword of the ſpirit, which is the word of God. Eph. vi. Now let the readers here call to remembrance that which I have ſaid before, that faith is not overthrown where it is joined with acknowleging of our miſery, needineſs, and filthineſs. For with how heavy weight ſoever of evil doings the faithful feel themſelves to be overloaden or grieved, and that they be not only void of all things which may procure favour with God, but alſo that they be burdened with many offences which may worthily make him dreadful to them: yet they ceaſe not to preſent themſelves, neither doth this feeling make them ſo afraid but that they ſtill reſort to him, foraſmuch as there is no other way to come to him. For prayer was not ordained, whereby we ſhould arrogantly advance ourſelves before God, or eſteem at great value any thing of our own, but whereby confeſſing our guiltineſs, we would bewail our miſeries to him, as children do familiarly open their complaints to their parents. But rather the unmeaſurable heap of our evils ought to be full of ſpurs or pricks to prick us forward to pray. As alſo the prophet teacheth us by his example, ſaying, Heal my ſoul, becauſe I have ſinned againſt thee, Pſal. lxiv. 5. I grant indeed that in ſuch ſayings ſhould be deadly prickings unleſs God did help: but the moſt good Father of his incomparable tender kindneſs hath brought remedy in fit ſeaſon, whereby appeaſing all trouble, aſſwaging all cares, wiping away fears, he might gently allure us to him, yea, and taking away all doubts (much more all ſtops) he might make us an eaſy way.

Nothing ſhould withhold us from prayer, whereunto we are both by the authority of his commandment bound, and encouraged by the ſweet allurements of his promiſes to whom we pray.

13. And firſt when he commandeth us to pray, he doth by the very ſame commandment accuſe us of wicked obſtinacy, unleſs we obey him. Nothing could be more preciſely commanded, than that which is in the Pſalm l. 15. Call upon me in the day of trouble. But foraſmuch as among all the duties of godlineſs, the ſcripture commendeth none more often, I need not to tarry longer upon this point. Aſk (ſaith our maſter) and ye ſhall receive: knock, it ſhall be opened to you. Howbeit here is alſo with the commandment joined a promiſe as it is neceſſary. For though all men confeſs that the commandment ought to be obeyed, yet the moſt part would flee from God, when he calleth, unleſs he promiſed that he would be eaſy to be entreated, yea, yea, and would offer himſelf. Theſe two things being eſtabliſhed, it is certain that whoſoever make delays that they come not ſtraight to God, are not only rebellious and diſobedient, but alſo are proved guilty of infidelity, becauſe they diſtruſt the promiſes. Which is ſo much more to be noted, becauſe hypocrites under the colour of humility and modeſty do as well proudly deſpiſe the commandment of God, as diſcredit his gentle calling, yea and defraud him of the chief part of his worſhip. For after that he hath refuſed ſacrifices, in which at that time all holineſs ſeemed to ſtand, he declareth that this is the chief thing and moſt precious to him above all other, to be called upon in the day of need. Therefore where he requireth his own, and encourageth us to chearfulneſs of obeying, there are none ſo gay colours of doubting that may excuſe us. Wherefore how many teſtimonies are commonly found in the ſcriptures whereby we are commanded to call upon God, ſo many ſtandards are ſet up before our eyes to put affiance into us. It were raſhneſs to ruſh into the ſight of God, unleſs he did prevent us with calling us. Therefore he openeth us the way with his own voice, ſaying: I will ſay to them, Ye are my people: and they ſhall ſay to me, thou art our God, Zech. xiii. 9. We ſee how he preventeth them that worſhip him, and willeth them to follow him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this ſhould not be a very ſweet melody which he tuneth. Specially let this notable title of God come in our mind, whereupon if we ſtay, we ſhall eaſily paſs over all ſtops. Thou God that heareſt prayer, even to thee ſhall all fleſh come. Pſ. lxv. 3. For what is more lovely or more alluring, than that God be garniſhed with this title which may aſcertain us, that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to grant the deſire of humble ſuitors? Hereby the prophet gathereth that the gate ſtandeth open not only to a few, but to all men: becauſe he ſpeaketh even to all in this ſaying: Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou ſhalt glorify me, Pſal. l. 15. According to this rule David layeth for himſelf that a promiſe was given him that he may obtain what he aſketh: Thou haſt revealed into the ear of thy ſervant: therefore thy ſervant hath found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee, 2 Sam. vii. 27. Whereupon we gather, that he was fearful, ſaying in ſo much as the promiſe had encouraged him. So in another ther place he armeth himſelf with this general doctrine he will fulfil the deſire of them that fear him. Pſal. cxlv. 19. Yea, and this we may note in the Pſalms, that as it were breaking his courſe of praying he paſſeth over ſometimes to the power of God, ſometimes to his goodneſs, ſometimes to the truth of his promiſes. It might ſeem that David by unſeaſonable thruſting in of theſe ſentences, made mangled prayers: but the faithful know by uſe and experience that ferventneſs fainteth unleſs they put new nouriſhments unto it, and therefore in praying the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his word, is not ſuperfluous. And ſo by the example of David, let it not grieve us to thruſt in ſuch things as may refreſh fainting hearts with new lively ſtrength.

Our ſluggiſhneſs notwithſtanding ſo many, ſo effectual motives unto this heavenly exerciſe.

14. And it is wonderful that with ſo great ſweetneſs of promiſes we are either but coldly or almoſt not at all moved, that a great part of men wandering about by compaſſes had rather, leaving the fountain of living waters, to dig for themſelves dry pits, than to embrace the liberality of God freely offered them. The name of the Lord (ſaith Solomon, Prov. xviii. 10) is a ſtrong tower, the righteous flee to it, and are ſaved. And Joel, after he had propheſied of that horrible deſtruction that was at hand, addeth this notable ſentence. Whoſoever calleth upon the name of the Lord ſhall be ſafe, Joel ii. 32. which ſentence we know to pertain properly to the courſe of the goſpel. Scarcely a man among a hundred is moved to go forward to meet God. He himſelf crieth by Iſaiah: Ye ſhall call upon me, and I will hear you, yea, before that ye cry, I will anſwer you. Iſa. lxv. 24. And the ſame honour alſo in another place he vouchſafeth to give in common to the whole church as it belongeth to all the members of Chriſt. He hath cried to me, I will hear him. I am in trouble with him, that I may deliver him. Pſal. xci. 15. Neither yet (as I have already ſaid) is it my purpoſe to reckon up all the places, but to chuſe out the chief, by which we may take a taſte how kindly God allureth us unto him, and with how ſtrait bonds our unthankfulneſs is bound, when among ſuch powerful motives our ſluggiſhneſs ſtill maketh delay. Wherefore let theſe ſayings always ſound in our ears: The Lord is nigh to all that call upon him, that call upon him in truth: Pſal. cxlv. Alſo theſe ſayings which we have alleged out of Iſaiah and Joel, by which God affirmeth that he is heedful to hear prayers, yea and is delighted as with a ſacrifice of ſweet ſavour, when we caſt our cares upon him. This ſingular fruit we receive of the promiſes of God, when we make our prayers not doubtingly and fearfully, but truſting upon his word, whoſe majeſty would otherwiſe make us afraid, we dare call upon him by the name of Father, foraſmuch as he vouchſafeth to put this moſt ſavoury name into our mouths. It remaineth that we having ſuch allurements ſhould know that we have thereby matter enough to obtain our prayers: foraſmuch as our prayers ſtand upon no merit of our own, but all their worthineſs and hope of obtaining are grounded upon the promiſes of God, and depend upon them: ſo that it needeth no other foundation, nor looketh upward hither or thither Therefore we muſt determine in our minds, that although we excel not in like holineſs as is praiſed in the holy fathers, prophets, and apoſtles, yet becauſe the commandment of prayer is common to us, and faith is alſo common, if we reſt upon the word of God, in this right we are fellows with them. For God (as we have before ſhewed) promiſing that he will be gentle, and merciful to all, giveth cauſe of hope to all even the moſt miſerable, that they ſhall obtain what they aſk. And therefore the general forms are to be noted, from which no man (as they ſay) from the firſt to the laſt is excluded: only let there be preſent a pureneſs of heart, miſliking of ourſelves, humility, and faith: let not our hypocriſy unholily abuſe the name of God with deceitful calling upon it: the moſt good Father will not put back them, whom he not only exhorteth to come to him but alſo moveth them by all the means that he can. Hereupon cometh the manner of praying of David which I have even now rehearſed. Lo thou haſt promiſed, Lord, to thy ſervant: for this cauſe thy ſervant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore, O Lord God, thou art God, and thy words ſhall be true. Thou haſt ſpoken to thy ſervant of theſe benefits: begin therefore, and do them, 2 Sam. vii. 27. As alſo in another place, Perform to thy ſervant according to thy word, Pſal. cxix. 76. And all the Iſraelites together, ſo oft as they arm themſelves with remembrance of the covenant, do ſufficiently declare that we ſhould not pray fearfully, whereas the Lord ſo appointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the fathers, eſpecially of Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 10. who after he had confeſſed that he was unworthy of ſo many mercies which he had received at the hand of God, yet he ſaith that he is encouraged to require greater things, becauſe God had promiſed that he would do them. But whatſoever excuſe unbelievers do pretend, when they flee not to God ſo oft as neceſſity preſſeth them, when they ſeek not to him nor crave his help, they do as much defraud him of his due honour as if they made to themſelves new gods and idols: for by this means they deny that he is to them the author of all good things. On the other hand, there is nothing ſtronger to deliver the godly from all doubt, than to be alarmed with this thought, that no ſtop ought to ſtay them while they obey the commandment of God, which pronounceth, that nothing is more pleaſing to him than obedience. Here again that which I ſaid before more clearly appeareth, that a dreadleſs ſpirit to pray agreeth well with fear, reverence, and carefulneſs: and that it is no abſurdity to ſay that God raiſeth up the overthrown. After this manner thoſe forms of ſpeech agree well together which in appearance are contrary. Jeremiah and Daniel ſay, that they throw down prayers before God, Jer. xlii. 9. Dan. ix. 18. In another place Jeremiah ſaith: Let our prayer fall down in the ſight of God, that he may have mercy on the remnant of his people, Jer. xlii. 2. On the other hand, the faithful are oftentimes ſaid to lift up prayer. So ſpeaketh Hezekiah, requiring the prophet to make interceſſion for him, 2 King xx. 10. And David deſireth that his prayer may aſcend as incenſe, Pſal. cxli. For although they being perſuaded of the fatherly love of God, chearful commit themſelves into his faithful keeping, and doubt not to crave the help which he freely promiſeth: yet doth not an idle carefulneſs lift them up, as though they had caſt away ſhame, but they aſcend ſo upward by degrees of promiſes, that they ſtill remain humble ſuppliants in the abaſement of themſelves.

Some having prayed otherwiſe than they ſhould, have nevertheleſs at the hands of God obtained the things they have prayed for.

15. Here are queſtions objected more that one. For the ſcripture reporteth, that the Lord granted certain deſires which yet break forth of a mind not quiet nor well framed. Verily for a juſt cauſe: Joatham had doomed the inhabitants of Sichem, to the deſtruction which afterwards came upon them; but yet God kindled with ferventneſs of anger and vengeance following his execration ſeemeth to allow ill-tempered violent paſſions. Such heat alſo carried Sampſon when he ſaid, Strengthen me, O God, that I may take vengeance of the uncircumciſed. Judg. ix. 20. Judg. vi. 28. For tho' there were ſome piece of good zeal mingled with it: yet a hot, and therefore faulty greedineſs of vengeance did bear rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it ſeemeth that it may be gathered, that although the prayers be not framed according to the preſcribed rule of the word, yet they obtain their effect.

effect. I answer, first, that a general law is not taken away by singular examples: again, that sometimes special motions have been put into a few men, whereby it came to pass that there was another consideration of them than of the common people. For the answer of Christ is to be noted, when the disciples did indiscreetly desire to imitate the example of Elias, that they knew not what manner of spirit they were of. Luke ix. 55. But we must go yet further, and say that the prayers do not always please God which he granteth: but that, so much as serveth for example that is by clear praise made plain which the scripture teacheth, namely that he succoureth the miserable, heareth the groanings of them which being unjustly troubled do crave his help: that therefore he executeth his judgments, when the complaints of the poor rise up to him, although they be unworthy to obtain any thing be it never so little. For how oft hath he taken vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy lusts, and other wicked doings of the ungodly, subduing their boldness and rage, and also overthrowing their tyrannical power, testified that he helpeth the wrongously oppressed, which yet did beat the air with praying to an uncertain godhead? And one Psalm plainly teacheth, that the prayers want not effect, which yet do not pierce into heaven by faith, Psal. cvii. For he gathereth together those prayers which necessity extorteth no less out of the unbelievers than out of the godly by the very feeling of nature: to which yet he proveth by the effect, that God is favourable. It is because he doth with such gentleness testify that they are pleasing to him? No. But to enlarge or to set out his mercy by this circumstance, for that even to unbelievers their prayers are not denied: and then the more to prick forward his true worshippers to pray, when they see that prophane wailings sometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cause why the faithful should swerve from the law laid upon them by God, or should envy the unbelievers, as though they had gotten some great gain, when they obtained their desire. After this manner we have said, that the Lord was bowed with the repentance of Ahab, 1 King xxi. 29. that he might shew by this example how easy he is to be entreated of his elect, when truly turning to him. Therefore in the psalm he blameth the Jews, that they having by experience proved him so easy to grant their prayers, yet within a little after returned to the stubbornes of their nature. Psal. c. 5. Which also plainly appeareth by the history of the judges: namely that so oft as they wept, although their tears were deceitful, yet they were delivered out of the hands of their enemies. As therefore the Lord indifferently maketh his sun shine upon the the good and the evil: so doth he also not despise their weepings, whose cause is righteous and their miseries needful of help. In the mean time he no more heareth these to salvation, than herein ministreth food to the despisers of his goodness. The question seemeth to be somewhat harder of Abraham and Samuel: of whom the one being warranted by no word of God, prayed for the Sodomites: Gen. xviii. 13. the other against a manifest forbidding prayed for Saul. 1 Sam. xi. Likewise is it of Jeremiah who prayed that the city might not be destroyed. Jeremiah. xxxi. 16. For though their requests were denied, yet it seemeth hard to take faith from them. But this solution shall (as I trust) satisfy sober readers: that they being instructed with the general principles, whereby God commandeth them to be merciful even also unto the unworthy, were not altogether without faith, although in a special case their opinion deceived them. Augustine writeth wisely [Lib. de civit. Dei xxii. cap. 1.] How (saith he) do the saints pray by faith, to ask of God contrary to that which he hath decreed? Even because they pray according to his will: not that hidden and unchangeable will, but the will which he inspireth into them, that he may hear them after another manner: as he wisely maketh difference. This is well said: because after his incomprehensible counsel he so tempereth the successes of things, that the prayers of the saints be not void which are wrapped both with faith and error together. Neither yet ought this more to avail for an example to follow, than it excuseth the saints themselves, whom I deny not to have passed measure. Wherefore where appeareth no certain promise, we must ask of God with a condition adjoined. To which purpose serveth that saying of David. Watch to the judgment which thou hast commanded: Psal. vii. 7. because he telleth that he was warranted by a special oracle to ask a temporal benefit.

The rules of prayer must not be too rigorously applied.

16. This also it is profitable to note, that those things which I have spoken of the four rules of right prayer, are not so exactly required with extream rigour, that God refuseth the prayers in which he shall not find either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a ferventness of zeal and well ordered requests. We have said that although prayer be a familiar talk of the godly with God, yet we muſt keep a reverence and modeſty, that we give not looſe reins to all requeſts whatſoever they be, and that we deſire no more, than God giveth leave: and then, leaſt the majeſty of God ſhould grow into contempt with us, that we muſt lift up our minds upward to a pure and undefiled worſhipping of him. This no man hath ever performed with ſuch pureneſs as it ought to be. For (to ſpeak nothing of the common ſort) how many complaints of David do ſavour of intemperance: not that he meant of purpoſe to quarrel with God, or carp againſt his judgments: but becauſe he fainting with weakneſs, found no better comfort, than to caſt his ſorrows into his boſom. Yea and God beareth with our childiſh ſpeech and pardoneth our ignorance, ſo oft as any thing unadviſedly eſcapeth us: as truly without this tender bearing, there ſhould be no liberty of praying. But although David's mind was to ſubmit himſelf wholly to the will of God, and he prayed with no leſs patience than deſire to obtain: yet there ariſe, yea boil out ſometimes troublous affections, which are much diſagreeing from the firſt rule that we have ſet. Eſpecially we may perceive by the concluſion of the xxxix. Pſalm, with how great vehemency of ſorrow that holy man was carried away, that he could not keep meaſure. Ceaſe (ſaith he) from me, till I go away and be not. A man would ſay, that he like a deſperate man deſireth nothing elſe but that the hand of God ceaſing, he might rot in his evils. He ſaith it not for that he with an avowed mind runneth into ſuch outrage, or (as the reprobate are wont) would have God to depart from him: but only he complaineth that the wrath of God is too heavy for him to bear. In theſe temptations alſo there fall out oftentimes requeſts not well framed according to the rule of the word of God, and in which the ſaints do not ſufficiently weigh what is lawful and expedient. Whatſoever prayers are ſpotted with theſe faults, they deſerve to be refuſed: yet if the ſaints do bewail, correct themſelves, and by and by come to themſelves again, God pardoneth them. So they offend alſo in the ſecond rule, becauſe they are oftentimes driven to wreſtle with their own coldneſs, and their need and miſery doth not forcibly enough excite them to pray earneſtly. And oftentimes it happeneth that their minds do ſlip aſide, and in a manner wander away into vanity. Therefore in this behalf alſo there is need of pardon, leſt our faint, imperfect, broken and wandering prayers have a denial. This God hath naturally planted in the minds of men, that prayers are not perfect but with minds lifted upward. Hence came the ceremony of lifting up of hands, as we have before ſaid, which hath been uſed in all ages and nations, as yet it is in uſe. But how many a one is there, who when he lifteth up his hands doth in his own conſcience find himſelf dull, becauſe his heart reſteth upon the ground? As touching the aſking of forgiveneſs of ſins, although none of the faithful do overlook it, yet they which are truly exerciſed in prayer do feel that they bring ſcarcely the tenth part of that ſacrifice, of which David ſpeaketh. An acceptable ſacrifice to God is a troubled ſpirit; a broken and humble heart, O God, thou will not deſpiſe, Pſal. li 19. So there is always a double pardon to be aſked, both becauſe they know themſelves guilty in their conſciences of many faults, with the ſenſe whereof they are not yet ſo touched, as to lothe themſelves ſo much as they ought: and alſo that, ſo much as it is given them to profit in repentance and in the fear of God, they being caſt down with juſt ſorrow for their offences, ſhould pray to eſcape the puniſhment of the judge. Chiefly the feebleneſs or imperfection of faith corrupteth the prayers of the faithful, unleſs the tender mercy of God did help them. But it is no wonder that God pardoneth this default, who doth oftentimes exerciſe them that are his with ſharp inſtructions, as if he ſhould of purpoſe quench their faith. This is a moſt hard temptation, when the faithful are compelled to cry: How long wilt thou be angry upon the prayer of thy ſervant: Pſal. lxxx. as though their very prayers made God more angry. So when Jeremiah ſaith; The Lord hath ſhut out my prayer, Lam. iii. 8. there is no doubt that he was ſhaken with a violent pang of trouble. Such examples are innumerable in the ſcriptures, by which it is evident, that the faith of the ſaints was oftentimes mingled and toſſed with doubtings, that in believing and hoping they diſcovered yet ſome unfaithfulneſs: but becauſe they come not ſo far as it is to be wiſhed, they ought to endeavour ſo much the more that their faults being amended, they may daily come nearer to the perfect rule of praying, and in the mean time to feel in how great a depth of evils they are drowned, who even in the very remedies do get to themſelves new diſeaſes: ſince there is no prayer which the Lord doth not worthily lothe, unleſs he wink at the ſpots wherewith they are all beſprinkled. I rehearſe not theſe things to this end, that the faithful ſhould carelеſly pardon themſelves any thing, but that in ſharply chaſtiſing themſelves they ſhould labour to overcome theſe ſtops, and although ſatan labour to ſtop

up all the ways, that he may keep them from praying, yet nevertheleſs they ſhould break through, being certainly perſwaded, that although they be not unencumbred of all hinderances, yet their endeavours do pleaſe God, and their prayers are allowed of him, ſo that they labour and bend themſelves thitherward, whither they do not by and by attain.

That the conſciouſneſs of our own imbecillity diſcourage us not too much, we are to relieve our ſelves in prayer with the mediation of Chriſt Jeſus beſides whoſe name no other by way of interceſſion ſhould be mentioned in our prayers.

17. But foraſmuch as there is no man worthy to preſent himſelf to God, and to come into his ſight: the heavenly father himſelf to deliver us both from ſhame and fear which ſhould have thrown down all our courages, hath given to us his ſon Jeſus Chriſt our Lord,, to be an advocate and mediator with him for us, by whoſe leading we may boldly come to him, truſting that we have ſuch an interceſſor, nothing ſhall be denied us which we aſk in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the father. And hereunto muſt all be referred whatſoever we have heretofore taught concerning faith: becauſe as the promiſe ſetteth out unto us Chriſt for our Mediator, ſo unleſs our hope of obtaining ſtay upon him, it taketh from it ſelf the benefit of praying. For ſo ſoon as the terrible majeſty of God recurrs to our mind, it is impoſſible but that we ſhould tremble for fear, and the acknowlegeing of our own unworthineſs ſhould drive us far away, till Chriſt interpoſe between us and him, which may change the throne of dreadful glory into the throne of grace: as alſo the apoſtle teacheth that we may be bold to appear with all confidence which ſhall obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. And as there is a law ſet that we ſhould call upon God, as alſo a promiſe given, that they ſhall be heard who call upon him: ſo are we peculiarly commanded to call upon him in the name of Chriſt, and we have a promiſe ſet forth, that we ſhall obtain that which we ſhall aſk in his name. Hitherto (ſaith he) ye have not aſked any thing in my name: aſk and ye ſhall receive. In that day ye ſhall aſk in my name, and whatſoever ye aſk, I will do, that the father may be glorified in the ſon. John. xiv. 13, and xvi. 24. Hereby it is plain without controverſy, that they which call upon God in any other name than of Chriſt, do ſtubbornly break his commandments, and regard his will as nothing, and that they have no promiſe to obtain any thing. For (as Paul ſaith) all the promiſes of God are in Chriſt, yea, and Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20. that is to ſay they are confirmed and fulfilled.

No prayer effectual which hath not Chriſt as an advocate.

18. And the circumſtance of the time is diligently to be marked, where Chriſt commandeth his diſciples to flee to interceſſion to him after that he is gone up into heaven. In that hour (ſaith he) ye ſhall aſk in my name. John. xvi. 26. It is certain that even from the beginning none were heard that prayed, but by the means of the mediator. For this reaſon the Lord had ordained in the law, that the prieſt alone entring into the ſanctuary, ſhould bear upon his ſhoulders the names of the tribes of Iſrael, and as many precious ſtones before his breaſt: but the people ſhould ſtand a far off in the porch, and from thence ſhould join their prayers with the prieſt. Yea, and the ſacrifice availed hereto, that the prayers ſhould be made ſure and of force. Exod. xxviii. 9. and 10, 21. Therefore that ſhadowiſh ceremony of the law taught that we are all ſhut out from the face of God, and that therefore we need a mediator, which may appear in our name, and may bear us upon his ſhoulders, and hold us faſt bound to his breaſt, that we may be heard in his perſon: then that by ſprinkling of blood our prayers are cleanſed, which (as we have already ſaid) are never void of filthineſs. And we ſee that the ſaints, when they deſired to obtain any thing, grounded their hope upon ſacrifices, becauſe they knew them to be the ſtabliſhings of all requeſts. Let him remember thy offering (ſaith David) and make thy burnt offering fat. Hereupon is gathered that God hath been from the beginning appeaſed by the interceſſion of Chriſt, to receive the prayers of the godly. Why then doth Chriſt appoint a new time when his diſciples ſhall begin to pray in his name, but becauſe this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, ſo deſerveth more commendation with us. And in this ſame ſenſe he had ſaid a little before. Hitherto ye have not aſked any thing in my name, now aſk. Not that they underſtood nothing at all of the office of the mediator (whereas all the Jews were inſtructed in the principles) but becauſe they had not yet clearly known that Chriſt by his aſcending into heaven ſhould be a ſurer patron of the church than he was before. Therefore to comfort their grief of his abſence with ſome ſpecial fruit, he claimeth to himſelf the office of an advocate, and teacheth that they have hitherto wanted the chief benefit, which it ſhall be granted them to enjoy, when being aided by his mediation, they ſhall more freely call upon God: as the apoſtle ſaith that his new way is dedicate in his blood. Heb. x. 20. And ſo much leſs excuſable is our frowardneſs, unleſs we do with both arms (as the ſaying is) embrace ſo ineſtimable a benefit, which is properly appointed for us.

The interceſſion of Chriſt withſtandeth not but that we may be advocates one for another: ſo that we know that the force of our mutual prayers dependeth wholly upon him without whom it were in vain to intreat either for others or for our ſelves.

19. Now whereas he is the only way, and the only entry by which it is granted us to come in unto God: whoſo do ſwerve from this way and forſake this entry, for them there remaineth no way nor entry to God: there is nothing left in his throne but wrath, judgment, and terror. Finally, ſince the Father hath appointed him for our head, and guide, they which do in any wiſe ſwerve or go away from him, do labour as much as in them lyeth to raze out and efface the mark which God hath imprinted. So Chriſt is ſet to be the only mediator, by whoſe interceſſion the father may be made favourable to us and eaſy to be entreated. Howbeit in the mean time the ſaints have their interceſſions left to them, whereby they do mutually commend the ſafety one of another to God, of which the apoſtle maketh mention: 1 Tim. ii. 1. but thoſe be ſuch as depend upon that one only interceſſion: ſo far are they from derogating from it. For as they ſpring out of the affection of love, wherewith we embrace one another, as the members of one body: ſo they are alſo referred to the unity of the head. Since therefore they alſo are made in the name of Chriſt, what do they elſe but teſtify that no man can be aſſiſted by any prayers at all, but with the interceſſion of Chriſt? And as Chriſt with his interceſſion withſtandeth not, but that in the church we may with prayers be advocates one for another: ſo let this remain certain, that all the interceſſors of the whole church ought to be directed to that only one. Yea, and for this cauſe we ought ſpecially to beware of unthankfulneſs, becauſe God pardoning our unworthineſs, doth not only give leave to every one of us to pray for himſelf, but alſo admitteth us to be entreaters one for another. For, where God appointeth advocates for his church which deſerve worthily to be rejected if they pray privately every one for himſelf: what a pride were it, to abuſe this liberty to darken the honour of Chriſt.

Chriſt the only mediator not only of redemption but interceſſion alſo.

20. Now it is a meer trifling which the Sophiſters babble, that Chriſt is the mediator of redemption, but the faithful are mediators of interceſſion. As though Chriſt having performed a mediation for a time, hath given to his ſervants that eternal mediatorſhip which ſhall never die. Full courteouſly forſooth they handle him, that cut away ſo little a portion of honour from him. But the ſcripture ſaith far otherwiſe, with the ſimplicity whereof a good man ought to be contented, leaving theſe deceivers. For where John ſaith, that if any do ſin, we have an advocate with the father, Chriſt Jeſus: 1 John. ii. 2. doth he mean that he was once in old time a patron for us, and not rather aſſigned to him an everlaſting interceſſion? How ſay we to this that Paul alſo affirmeth, that he ſitteth at the right hand of God the father and maketh interceſſion for us? Rom. viii. 32. And when in another place he calleth him the only mediator of God and men: 1 Tim. ii. 5. meaneth he not of prayers, of which he had a little before made mention? For when he had before ſaid that interceſſion muſt be made for all men: for proof of that ſaying, he by and by addeth, that for all men there is one God and one mediator. Rom. xv. 30. And none otherwiſe doth Auguſtine expound it, when he ſaith thus: Chriſtian men do mutually commend themſelves in their prayers. But he for whom none maketh interceſſion, but he for all, he is the only and true mediator. (Lib. cont. Par. ii. cap. 1.) Paul the apoſtle, though he was a principal member under the head (yet becauſe he was a member of the body of Chriſt, and knew that the greateſt and trueſt prieſt of the church entred, not by a figure, into the inward places of the vail, to the holy of holy places, but by expreſs and ſtedaſt truth into the innermoſt places of heaven, to a holineſs not ſhadowiſh but eternal) commendeth himſelf alſo to the prayers of the faithful. Rom. xv. 30. Epheſ. vi. 3. Col. iv. 3. 1 Cor. xii. 25. Neither doth he make himſelf a mediator between the people and God, but prayeth that all the members of the body of Chriſt ſhould mutually pray for him: becauſe the members are careful one for another: and if one member ſuffer, the others ſuffer with it. And that ſo the mutual prayers one for another of all the members yet travailing in earth, may aſcend to the head head which is gone before into heaven, in whom is ſatisfaction for our ſins. For if Paul were a mediator, the other apoſtles ſhould alſo be mediators: and if there were many mediators, then neither ſhould Paul's own reaſon ſtand faſt, Ephe. iv. 3. in which he had ſaid, for there is one God, one mediator of one God and men, the man Chriſt, in whom we alſo are one if we keep the unity of faith in the bond of peace. Again in another place. But if thou ſeek for a prieſt, he is above the heavens, where he maketh interceſſion for the, which in earth died for thee. Yet do we not dream that he falleth down at the Father's knees and in a humble way entreateth for us: but we underſtand with the apoſtle, that he ſo appeareth before the face of God, that the virtue of his death availeth to be a perpetual interceſſion for us: yet ſo that being entred into the ſanctuary of heaven, unto the end of the ages of the world he alone carrieth to God the prayers of the people abiding a far off in the porch.

No ſaint hath acceſs unto God but by Chriſt: and therefore we cannot without injury unto him, make them our interceſſors.

21. As touching the ſaints, which being dead in the fleſh do live in Chriſt, if we give any prayer at all to them, let us not dream that they themſelves have any other way of aſking than Chriſt which only is the way, or that their prayers be acceptable to God in any other name. Therefore ſince the ſcripture calleth us back from all to Chriſt only: ſince the heavenly Father's will is to gather together all in him: it was a point of too much dulneſs, I will not ſay madneſs, ſo to deſire to make for our ſelves an entry by them, that we ſhould be led away from him without whom even they themſelves have no entry open. But, that this hath been uſually done in certain ages paſt, and that it is at this day done whereſoever papiſtry reigneth, who can deny? Their merits are from time to time thruſt in, to obtain the good will of God: and for the moſt part, Chriſt being paſſed over, God is prayed to by their names. Is not this, I beſeech you, to convey away to them the office of that only interceſſion, which we have affirmed to belong to Chriſt alone? Again, what angel or devil ever revealed to any man any one ſyllable of this their interceſſion which theſe men feign? For in the ſcripture is nothing of it. What is the reaſon therefore of inventing it? Truly when the wit of man ſo ſeeketh for it ſelf ſuccours, wherewith we are not certifyed by the word of God, it plainly bewrayeth his own diſtruſtfulneſs. If we appeal to all their conſciences that are delighted with the interceſſion of ſaints, we ſhall find that the ſame cometh from no other ground, but becauſe they are grieved with carefulneſs, as though Chriſt were in this behalf either too weak or too rigorous. By which doubtfulneſs firſt they diſhonour Chriſt, and rob him of the title of only mediator, which as it is given him of the Father for a ſingular prerogative, ſo ought not alſo to be conveyed away to any other. And in this very doing they darken the glory of his birth, they make void his croſs, finally whatſoever he hath done or ſuffered they ſpoil and defraud it of the due praiſe thereof: for all tend to this end that he may be in deed and be accounted the only mediator. And therewith they caſt away the goodneſs of God, which gave himſelf to be their father. For he is not their father, unleſs they acknowlege Chriſt to be their brother. Which they utterly deny unleſs they think that he beareth a brotherly affection toward them, than which there can nothing be more kind or tender. Wherefore the ſcripture offereth only him to us, ſendeth us to him, and ſtayeth us in him. He (ſaith Ambroſe) is our mouth, by which we ſpeak to the Father: our eye, by which we ſee the Father: our right hand, by which we offer us to the Father, otherwiſe than by whoſe interceſſion neither we nor all the ſaints have any thing with God. [Lib. de Iſa. & anima.] If they anſwer that the common prayers which they make in churches, are ended with this concluſion adjoined, through Chriſt our Lord: this is a trifling ſhift: becauſe the interceſſion of Chriſt is no leſs prophaned when it is mingled with the prayers and merits of dead men, than if it were utterly omitted and only dead men were in our mouth. Again, in all their litanies, hymns, and proſes, where no honour is withheld from dead ſaints, there is no mention of Chriſt.

How far ſuperſtition hath gone in prayer unto ſaints,

22. But their fooliſh dulneſs proceeded ſo far, that here we have the nature of ſuperſtition expreſſed, which when it hath once ſhaken off the bridle, is wont to make no end of running aſtray. For after that men once begun to look to their interceſſion of ſaints, by little and little there was given to every one his peculiar work, that according to the diverſity of buſineſs, ſometimes one and ſometimes another ſhould be called upon to be interceſſor: then they took to themſelves every one one his peculiar saint, into whose faith they committed themselves as it were to the keeping of safeguarding gods. And not only (wherewith the prophet in the old time reproached Israel) gods were set up according to the number of cities, Jeremiah. ii. 18. and xi. 13. but even to the number of persons. But since the saints refer their desires to the will of God only, and behold it and rest upon it: he thinketh foolishly, and carnally, yea and slanderously of them, which assigneth to them any other prayer, than whereby they pray for the coming of the kingdom of God: from which that is most remote which they feign to them, that every one is with private affection more partially bent to his own worshippers. At length many abstained not from horrible sacrilege, in calling now upon them not as helpers but as principal rulers of their salvation. Behold what foolish men do fall into, when they wander off their true foundation, that is, the word of God. I speak not of the grosser monstrousness of ungodliness, wherein although they be abominable to God, angels, and men, they are not yet ashamed nor weary of them. They falling down before the image or picture of Barbara, Catherine, and such others, do mumble Pater noster, Our father. This madness the pastors do not so care to heal or restrain, but being allured with the sweet savour of gain they allow it with rejoicing at it. But although they turn from themselves the blame of so hainous an offence, yet by what colour will they defend this that Loy or Medard are prayed unto, to look down upon and help their servants from heaven? that the holy virgin is prayed unto, to command her son to do that which they ask? In the old time it was forbidden in the council at Carthage, that at the altar no direct prayer should be made to saints. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether suppress the force of the naughty custom, yet they added at least this restraint that the public prayers should not be corrupted with this form: Saint Peter pray for us. But how much further hath their devilish importunity ranged, which stick not to give away to dead men that which properly belongeth only to God and Christ?

Vain labouring to ground the intercession of saints upon scripture.

23. But whereas they labour to bring to pass that such intercession may seem to be grounded upon the authority of scripture, therein they labour in vain. We read oftentimes (say they) of the prayers of angels: and not that only: but it is said that the prayers of the faithful are by their hands carried into the sight of God. But if they list to compare holy men departed out of this life, to angels: they should prove that they are ministring spirits, Heb. i. 14. to whom is committed the ministry to look to our safety, to whom the charge is given to keep us in all our ways, Psal. xci. 11. to go about us, to admonish and counsel us, to watch for us: Psal. xxxiv. 8. all which things are given to angels, but not to them. How wrongfully they wrap up dead holy men with angels, appeareth largely by so many divers offices, whereby the scripture putteth difference between some and other some. No man dare execute the office of an advocate before an earthly judge, unless he be admitted, from whence then have worms so great liberty, to thrust unto God those for patrons, to whom it is not read that the office is injoined? God's will was to appoint the angels to look unto our safety, wherefore they do both frequent holy assemblies, and the church is a stage to them, wherein they wonder at the diverse and manifold wisdom of God. Whoso convey away to others that which is peculiar to them, verily they confound and pervert the order set by God, which ought to have been inviolable. With like handsomeness they proceed in allegeing other testimonies. God said to Jeremiah: if Moses and Samuel should stand before me, my soul is not to this people. Jeremiah. xv. 1. How (say they) could he have spoken thus of dead men, unless he knew that they made intercession for the living? But I on the contrary side gather thus, that since it thereby appeareth that neither Moses nor Samuel made intercession for the people of Israel, there was then no intercession at all of dead men. For which of the saints is to be thought careful for the safety of the people, when Moses ceaseth, which in this behalf far surpassed all other when he lived. But if they follow such slight subtleties, to say that the dead make intercession for the living, because the Lord said, if they should make intercession: I will much more colourably reason in this manner: in the extreme necessity of the people Moses made not intercession, of whom it is said, if he shall make intercession. Therefore it is likely that none other maketh intercession, since they are all so far from the gentleness, goodness, and fatherly carefulness of Moses. This forsooth they get with cavilling, that they be wounded with the same weapons, wherewith they thought themselves sufficiently fenced. But it is very foolish that a simple sentence should so be wrested, because the Lord pronounceth ceth only that he will not ſpare the offences of the people, although they had ſeen Moſes to be their patron, or Samuel, to whoſe prayers he had ſhewed himſelf ſo tender. Which ſenſe is moſt clearly gathered out of a like place of Ezekiel. If (ſaith the Lord) theſe three men were in the city, Noah, Daniel, and Job, they ſhall not deliver their ſons and daughters in their righteouſneſs: but they ſhall deliver only their own ſouls. Ezek. xiv. 14. Where it is no doubt that he meant if two of them ſhould happen to revive again, for the third was then alive, namely Daniel, who (as it is known) did in the firſt flouriſhing of his youth ſhew an incomparable example of godlineſs: let us then leave them whom the ſcripture plainly ſheweth to have ended their courſe. Therefore Paul, when he ſpeaketh of David, teacheth not that he doth with prayers help his poſterity, but only that he ſerved his own time. Acts. xiii. 36.

24. They anſwer again: ſhall we then take from them all prayer of charity, which in the whole courſe of their life breathed nothing but charity and mercy? Verily as I will not curiouſly ſearch what they do, or what they muſe upon: ſo it is not likely that they are carried about hither and thither with divers and particular requeſts: but rather that they do with a ſtayed and unmoved will, long for the kingdom of God, which ſtandeth no leſs in the deſtruction of the wicked, than in the ſalvation of the godly. If this be true, it is no doubt that their charity is contained in the communion of the body of Chriſt, and extendeth no further, than the nature of that communion beareth. But now though I grant that they pray in this manner for us, yet they do not therefore depart from their own quietneſs, to be diverſly drawn into earthly cares: and much leſs muſt we therefore by and by call upon them. Neither doth it thereby follow that they muſt ſo do, becauſe men which live in earth may commend one another in their prayer. For this doing ſerveth for nouriſhing of charity among them, when they do as it were part and mutually take upon them their neceſſities among themſelves. And this they do by the commandment of the Lord, and are not without a promiſe, which two things, have always the chief p ace in prayer. All ſuch conſiderations are far from the dead, whom when the Lord hath conveyed from our company, he hath left to us no interchange of doings with them, nor to them with us, ſo far as we may gather by conjectures. But if any man allege, that it is impoſſible but that they muſt keep the ſame charity toward us, as they be joined in one faith with us: yet who hath revealed that they have ſo long ears to reach to our voices? and ſo piercing eyes to watch our neceſſities? They prate in their ſimilitudes of the brightneſs of the countenance of God extending his beams upon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on high behold the matters of men beneath. But to affirm that, ſpecially with ſuch boldneſs as they dare, what is it elſe but to go about by the drunken dreams of our own brain, without his word to penetrate and break into the hidden judgments of God, and to tread the ſcripture under feet which ſo oft pronounceth that the wiſdom of the fleſh is an enemy to the wiſdom of God, Rom. viii. 6. which wholly condemneth the vanity of our natural wiſdom, which willeth all our reaſon to be thrown down, and the will of God only to be looked unto of us.

A fourth argument.

25. The other teſtimonies of ſcripture which they bring to defend this their lie, they moſt naughtily wreſt. But Jacob (ſaid they) prayeth that his name and the name of his fathers Abraham and Iſaac be called upon over his poſterity. Gen. xlvi. 16. Firſt let us ſee what form of calling upon this is among the Iſraelites. For they call not upon their fathers to help them: but they beſeech God to remember his ſervants Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for them that ſpeak to the ſaints themſelves. But becauſe thoſe blocks (ſuch is their dulneſs) neither underſtand what it is to call upon the name of Jacob, nor why it is to be called upon, it is no marvel if in the very form alſo they ſo childiſh ſtumble. This manner of ſpeech is not ſeldom found in the ſcriptures. For Iſaiah ſaith that the name of the men is called upon over the women, when they have them as their huſbands under whoſe charge and defence they live. Iſa. iv. 1. Therefore the calling upon of the name of Abraham upon the Iſraelites, ſtandeth in this when they derive their pedigree from him, and do with ſolemn memory honour him for their author and parent. Neither doth Jacob this becauſe he is careful for the enlarging of the renown of his name: but foraſmuch as he knew that the whole bleſſedneſs of his poſterity conſiſted in the inheritance of the covenant which God had made with him: he wiſhed that that which he ſeeth ſhould be the chief of all good things to them, that they be accounted in his kindred: for, that is nothing elſe but to convey to them the ſucceſſion of the covenant. They again when they bring ſuch remembrance into their prayers, do not flee to the interceſſions of dead men: but do put the Lord in mind of his covenant, whereby the moſt kind father hath promiſed that he will be favourable and beneficial to them for Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob's ſake. How little the ſaints did otherwiſe lean upon the merits of their father, the common ſaying of the church in the prophet teſtifieth. thou art our father and Abraham knew us not, and Iſrael was ignorant of us. Thou Lord art our father and our redeemer. Iſa. lxiii. 16. And when they ſay thus, they add there withal, Return O Lord for thy ſervants ſakes: yet thinking upon no interceſſion, but bending their mind to the beneſit of the covenant. But now ſince we have the Lord Jeſus, in whoſe hand the eternal covenant of mercy is not only made, but alſo confirmed to us: whoſe name ſhould we rather uſe in our prayers? And becauſe theſe good maſters will have the patriarchs to be by theſe words made interceſſors, I would fain know of them why in ſo great a rout Abraham the father of the church hath no place at all among them. Out of what ſink they fetch their advocates, it is not unknown. Let them anſwer me, how fit it is that Abraham, whom God preferred above all others, and whom he advanced to the higheſt degree of honour, ſhould be neglected and ſuppreſſed. Verily when it was evident that ſuch uſe was unknown to the old church, they thought good for hiding of the newneſs to ſpeak nothing of the old fathers: as though the diverſity of names excuſed the new and forged manner. But whereas ſome object that God is prayed unto, to have mercy on the people for David's ſake, it doth ſo nothing at all make for defence of their error, that it is a moſt ſtrong proof for the confutation thereof. For if we conſider what perſon David did bear: he is ſevered from all the aſſembly of the ſaints, that God ſhould ſtabliſh the covenant which he hath made in his hand. So both the covenant is rather conſidered than the man and under a figure the only interceſſion of Chriſt is affirmed. For it is certain that that which belonged only to David, in ſo much as he was the type of Chriſt, agreeth not with any other.

A fifth argument.

26. But this forſooth moveth ſome, that it is often times read that the prayers of ſaints have been heard. Why ſo? Even becauſe they prayed. They truſted in thee (ſaith the prophet) and they were ſaved: they cried, and they were not confounded. Pſal. xxii. 5. Therefore let us alſo pray as they did, that we may be heard as they were. But theſe men, otherwiſe than they ought, do wrongfully reaſon, that none ſhall be heard but they that have once been heard. How much better doth James ſay? Jam. vi. 17. Elias (ſaith he) was a man like to us: and he prayed with prayer that it ſhould not rain, and it rained not upon the earth in three years and ſix months. Again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth gave her fruit. What? doth he gather any ſingular prerogative of Elias, to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is the continual ſtrength of godly and pure prayer, to exhort us likewiſe to pray. For we do narrowly limit the readineſs and gentleneſs of God in hearing them, unleſs we be by ſuch experiences confirmed into a more ſure affiance of his promiſes, in which he promiſeth that his ear ſhall be inclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a few, but to all that call upon his name. Pſal. cxlii. 8. And ſo much leſs excuſable is his fooliſhneſs, becauſe they ſeem as it were of ſet purpoſe to deſpiſe ſo many admonitions of ſcripture. David was oft delivered by the power of God. Was it that he ſhould confine that power to himſelf, that we ſhould be delivered by his help? He himſelf affirmeth far otherwiſe: the righteous look for me, till thou render to me. Pſal. lii. 8. Again, the righteous ſhall ſee, and they ſhall rejoice, and truſt in the Lord. Behold, this poor man hath cried to God, and he hath anſwered him: Pſal. xxxiv. 7. there be in the Pſalms many ſuch prayers, in which to crave that which he requireth he moveth God by this manner, that the righteous be not made aſhamed, but many by his example be raiſed up to hope well. Let us now be contented with this one example. Therefore every ſaint ſhall pray to thee in fit time. Pſal. xxxii. 6. Which place I have the rather rehearſed, becauſe the lewd babblers which do let out to hire the ſervice of their waged tongue have not been aſhamed to allege it to prove the interceſſion of the dead. As though David meant any thing elſe, than to ſhew the fruit that ſhall come of the mercifulneſs and gentleneſs of God, when he ſhall be heard. And in this kind, we muſt learn, that the experience of the grace of God, as well toward our ſelves as others, is no ſlender help to confirm the credit of his promiſes. I have not rehearſed many places, where David ſetteth before himſelf, the benefits of God for matter of confidence, becauſe the readers of the pſalms ſhall commonly find them without ſeeking. This ſelf ame thing had Jacob before taught by his own example: I am unworthy of the leaſt of all thy mercies, and of the truth which thou haſt performed formed to thy ſervant. I with my ſtaff have paſſed over this Jordan, and now I come forth with two bands. Gen. xxxviii. 10. He allegeth indeed the promiſe, but not alone: but he alſo joineth the effect, that he may the more couragiouſly in time to come truſt that God will be the ſame toward him. For he is not like to mortal men, which are weary of their liberality, or whoſe ability is waſted; but he is to be weighed by his own nature, as David wiſely doth, where he ſaith, thou haſt redeemed me, O God that ſpeakeſt truth. After that he hath given to God the praiſes of his ſalvation, he addeth that he is a true ſpeaker: Pſal. xxxi. 6. becauſe unleſs he were continually like himſelf, there could not be gathered of his benefits a ſufficiently ſtrong reaſon of affiance and calling upon him. But when we know that ſo oft as he helpeth us, he ſheweth an example and proof of his goodneſs, we need not to fear that our hope ſhall be put to ſhame or diſappoint us.

The directing of prayers unto ſaints departed is the offering of injury unto God, and of diſgrace unto Chriſt's interceſſion, which by the mutual prayers of ſaints as yet living, is not prejudiced.

27. Let this be the ſum. Whereas the ſcripture ſetteth out this unto us for the chief point in the worſhipping of God, (as refuſing all ſacrifices, he requireth of us this duty of godlineſs) prayer is not without manifeſt ſacrilege directed to others. Wherefore alſo it is ſaid in the Pſalm, if we ſtretch forth our hands to a ſtrange God, ſhall not God require theſe things? Pſal. xliv. 21. Again, whereas God will not be called upon but of faith, and expreſly commandeth prayers to be framed according to the rule of his word: finally whereas faith founded upon the word is the mother of right prayer: ſo ſoon as we ſwerve from the word, our prayer muſt needs be corrupted. But it is already ſhewed, that if the whole ſcripture be ſought, this honour is therein challenged to God only. As touching the office of interceſſion, we have alſo ſhewed that it is peculiar to Chriſt, and that there is no prayer acceptable to God, but which that mediator halloweth. And though the faithful do one for another offer prayers to God for their brethren, we have ſhewed that this abateth nothing from the only interceſſion of Chriſt: becauſe they altogether ſtanding upon it do commend both themſelves and others to God. Moreover we have taught that this is unfitly applied to dead men, to whom we never read that it hath been commanded that they ſhould pray for us. The ſcripture doth oftentimes exhort us to mutual doings of this duty one for another: but of dead men there is not ſo much as one ſyllable: yea and James joining theſe two things together, that we ſhould confeſs our ſelves, James. v. 8. among our ſelves, and mutually pray one for another, doth ſecretly exclude dead men. Therefore to condemn this error, this one reaſon ſufficeth, that the beginning of praying rightly, ſpringeth out of faith, and that faith cometh by hearing of the word of God, where is no mention of the feigned interceſſion becauſe ſuperſtition hath raſhly gotten to it ſelf patrons which were not given them of God. For whereas the ſcripture is full of many forms of prayer, there is no example found of this patronſhip, without which in the papacy they believe that there is no prayer. Moreover it is certain that this ſuperſtition hath ſprung from diſtruſtfulneſs, either becauſe they were not content with Chriſt to be their interceſſor, or have altogether robbed him of his praiſe. And this latter point is eaſily proved by their ſhameleſneſs: becauſe they have no ſtronger argument to prove, that we have need of the interceſſion of ſaints, than when they object that we are unworthy of familiar acceſs to God. Which we indeed grant to be moſt true: but thereupon we gather, that they leave nothing to Chriſt, which eſteem his interceſſion nothing worth, unleſs there be adjoined Gorge, Hippolite, or ſuch other viſors.

The kindneſs of prayer.

28. But although prayer properly ſignifieth only wiſhes and petitions: yet there is ſo great affinity between petition and thankſgiving, that they may be fitly comprehended both under one name, For, theſe ſpecial ſorts which Paul rehearſeth, fall under the firſt part of this diviſion. With aſking and craving we pour forth our deſires, before God, requiring as well thoſe things that ſeem to ſpread abroad his glory and ſet forth his name, as the benefits that are profitable to our uſe. With giving of thanks, we do with due praiſe magnify his good doings toward us, acknowleging to be received of his liberality whatſoever good things do come to us. Therefore David comprehended theſe two parts together, ſaying: Call upon me in the day of neceſſity: I will deliver thee, and thou ſhalt glorify me. Pſal. l. 15. The ſcripture not in vain commandeth us to uſe both. For we have ſaid in another place, that our needineſs is ſo great, and experience it ſelf crieth out that we are on every ſide pinched and preſſed with ſo great diſtreſſes, that all have cauſe enough why they ſhould both ſigh to God, and humbly call upon him. For though they be free from adverſities, yet their guiltineſs, and the innumerable aſſaults of temptations ought to prick forward the moſt holy to aſk remedy. But in the ſacrifice of praiſe and thankſgiving there can be no interruption without hainous ſin, foraſmuch as God ceaſeth not to heap upon diverſe men benefits to drive us though we be ſlack and ſlow, to thankfulneſs. Finally, ſo great and ſo plenteous liberality of his benefits doth in a manner overwhelm us: there are ſo many and ſo great miracles of his ſeen on every ſide which way ſoever thou turn thee, that we never want ground and matter of praiſe and thankſgiving. And that theſe things may be ſomewhat plainlier declared ſince all our hopes and wealth ſtand in God (which we have before ſufficiently proved) that neither we nor all our things can be in proſperity but by his bleſſing: we muſt continually commit our ſelves and all our things to him. Then whatſoever we purpoſe, ſpeak, or do, let us purpoſe, ſpeak, and do under his hand and will, finally under the hope of his help. John: iv. 14. For, all are pronounced accurſed of God, which deviſe or determine any purpoſes upon truſt of themſelves or of any other, which without his will, and without calling upon him do enterpriſe or attempt to begin any thing. Iſa. xxx. 1. And whereas we have diverſe times already ſaid, that he is duely honoured when he is acknowleged the author of all good things: thereupon followeth that all thoſe things are ſo to be received at his hand, that we yield continual thanks for them: and that there is no other right way for us to uſe his benefits, which flow and proceed from his liberality to no other end, but that we ſhould be continually buſied in confeſſing his praiſe and giving of thanks. For Paul, when he teſtifieth that they are ſanctified by the word and prayer, doth therewithal ſignify that they are not holy and clean to us without the word and prayer, 1 Tim. iv. 5. underſtanding by the word, faith by a metonymical figure. Therefore David ſaith very well, when having received the liberality of the Lord, he declareth that there is given him into his mouth a new ſong: Pſal. xl. iv. whereby verily he ſignifieth that it is a malicious ſilence, if we paſs over any of his benefits without praiſe: ſince he ſo oft giveth us matter to ſay good of him, as he doth good to us. As alſo Iſaiah Iſa. ii. 10 ſetting out the ſingular grace of God, exhorteth the faithful to a new and unwonted ſong. In which ſenſe David ſaith in another place, Lord open thou my lips, and my mouth ſhall ſhew forth thy praiſe. Pſal. li. 17. Likewiſe Hezekiah and Jonah teſtify that this ſhall be to them the end of their deliverance, to celebrate the goodneſs of God with ſongs in the temple. Iſa. viii. 20. The ſame law David preſcribeth to all the godly. What ſhall I repay to the Lord (ſaith he) for all the things that he hath beſtowed upon me? I will take the cup of ſalvatton, and will call upon the name of the Lord. Pſal. cxvi. 12. And the ſame law the church followeth in another pſalm, Save us our God, that we may confeſs to thy name, and glory in thy praiſe. Pſal. cvi. 47. Again, he hath looked unto the prayer of the ſolitary, and he hath not deſpiſed their prayers. This ſhall be written to the generation that ſhall follow, and the people created ſhall praiſe the Lord, that they may declare his name in him and his praiſe in Jeruſalem. Pſal. ci. 18. Yea ſo oft as the faithful beſeech God to do for his names ſake: as they profeſs themſelves unworthy to obtain any thing in their own name, ſo they bind themſelves to give thanks, and they promiſe that this ſhall be to them the right uſe of the bountifulneſs of God that they ſhall be publiſhers of it. So Hoſea ſpeaking of the redemption to come of the church, ſaith: take away iniquity O God, and lift up good: and we will pay the calves of lips. Hoſea. xiv. 13. And the benefits of God do not only claim to themſelves the praiſe of the tongue, but alſo do naturally procure love. I have loved (ſaith David) becauſe the Lord hath heard the voice of my prayer. Pſal. cxvi. 1. Again, in another place, rehearſing the helps which he had felt, he ſaith: I will love thee O God my ſtrength Pſal. xviii. 1. Neither ſhall the praiſes ever pleaſe God, which ſhall not flow out of this ſweetneſs of love. Yea and alſo we muſt hold faſt this ſaying of Paul, that all prayers are wrongful and faulty to which is not adjoined giving of thanks. For thus he ſaith, in all prayer and beſeeching with thankſgiving let your petitions, be known with God. Phil. iv. 6. For ſince peeviſhneſs, tediouſneſs, impatience, bitterneſs of grief, and fear do move many in praying to murmur, he commmandeth that our affections be ſo tempered, that the faithful ere they have obtained that which they deſire, ſhould nevertheleſs chearfully bleſs God. If this knot ought to have place in things in a manner contrary, with ſo much more holy a band doth God bind us to ſing his praiſes, ſo oft as he maketh us to enjoy our requeſts. But as we have taught that our prayers are hallowed by the interceſſion of Chriſt, which otherwiſe ſhould be unclean: ſo the apoſtle, where he commandeth mandeth us to offer a ſacrifice of praiſe by Chriſt, putting in mind that we have not a mouth clean enough to praiſe the name of God, unleſs the prieſthood of Chriſt become the mean. Heb. xiii. 15. Whereupon we gather that men have been monſtrouſly bewitched in the papacy, where the greater part marvelleth that Chriſt is called an advocate. This is the cauſe why Paul commandeth both to pray and give thanks without ceaſing: 1 Theſſ. v. 13. namely for that he willeth that with ſo great continuing as may be, at every time in every place, in all matters aud buſineſſes, the prayers of all men ſhould be lifted up to God, which may both look for all things at his hand and yield to him the praiſe of all things, as he offereth us continual matter to praiſe and pray.

Order for aſſiduity of prayer both private and public in the church.

29. But this continual diligence of praying, although it ſpecially concern the proper and private prayers of every man, yet ſomewhat alſo pertaineth to the public prayers of the church. But thoſe can neither be continual, nor ought otherwiſe to be done than according to the politic order that ſhall by common conſent be agreed upon among all. I grant the ſame in deed. For therefore certain hours are ſet and appointed, as indifferent with God, ſo neceſſary for the uſes of men, that the intereſt of all men may be provided for, and all things (according to the ſaying of Paul) may be comlily and orderly done in the church. 1 Cor. xv. 40. But this maketh nothing to the contrary but that every church ought both from time to time to ſtir up it ſelf to often uſe of prayers, and when it is admoniſhed by any great neceſſity, to be fervent with moſt earneſt endeavour. As for perſeverance which hath a great affinity with continual diligence, there ſhall be a fit place to ſpeak of it about the end. Now theſe make nothing for the much babbling which Chriſt willed that we ſhould be forbidden. For he forbiddeth not to continue long, nor oft, nor with much affection in prayers, Matth. vi 7. but that we ſhould not truſt that we may wring any thing out of God, by dulling his ears with much babbling talk, as if he were to be perſuaded after the manner of men. For we know that hypocrites, becauſe they do not conſider that they have to do with God, do no leſs make a pompous ſhew in their prayers than in a triumph. For, the Phariſee which thanked God that he was not like other men, without doubt rejoiced at himſelf in the eyes of men, as if he would by prayer ſeek to get a fame of holineſs. Hereupon came that much babbling, which at this day upon a like cauſe is uſed in the papacy: while ſome do vainly ſpend the time in repeating the ſame prayers, and other ſome do ſet out themſelves among the people with a long heap of words. Since this childiſh babbling mocketh God, it is no wonder that it is forbidden out of the church, to the end that nothing ſhould there be uſed but earneſt and proceeding from the bottom of the heart. Of a near kind and like to this corruption there is another, which Chriſt condemneth with this, namely that hypocrites for boaſting ſake do ſeek to have many witneſſes, and do rather occupy the market place to pray in, than that their prayers ſhould want the praiſe of the world. But whereas we have already ſhewed that this is the mark that prayer aimeth at, that our minds may be carried upward to God, both to confeſſion of praiſe and to craving of help: thereby we may underſtand that the chief duties thereof do ſtand in the mind and the heart, or rather that prayer it ſelf is properly an affection of the inward heart, which is poured forth and laid open before God the ſearcher of hearts. Wherefore (as it is already ſaid) the heavenly ſchoolmaſter, when he minded to ſet out the beſt rule of praying, commanded us to go into our chamber, and there the door being ſhut to pray to our Father which is in ſecret, that our Father which is in ſecret may hear us. Matth. vi. 6. For when he hath drawn them away from the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boaſting ſhew of prayers ſought the favour of men, he therewithal addeth what is better, namely, to enter into our chamber, and there to pray the door being ſhut. In which words (as I expound them) he willed us to ſeek being ſolitary which may help us to deſcend and to enter throughly with our whole thought into our heart, promiſing to the affections of our heart that God ſhall be near us whoſe temples our bodies ought to be. For he meant not to deny but that it is expedient alſo to pray in other places: but he ſheweth that prayer is a certain ſecret thing, which both is chiefly placed in the ſoul, and requireth the quiet thereof far from all troubles of cares. Nor without cauſe therefore the Lord himſelf alſo, when he was diſpoſed to apply himſelf more earneſtly to prayer conveyed himſelf into ſome ſolitary place far from the troubleſome company of men: but to teach us by his example that theſe helps are not to be deſpiſed, by which our mind being too ſlippery of it ſelf is more bent to earneſt applying of prayer. But in the mean time even as he in the midſt of the multitude of men abſtained not from praying, if occaſion at any time ſo ſerved: ſo ſhould we in all places where need ſhall be, lift up pure hands. 1 Tim. ii. 8. Finally, thus it is to be holden, that whoſoever refuſeth to pray in the holy aſſembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray apart, or in ſolitarineſs, or at home. Again, that he that neglecteth to pray alone or privately how diligently ſoever he haunt public aſſemblies, doth there make but vain prayers: becauſe he giveth more to the opinion of men than to the ſecret judgment of God. In the mean time, that the common prayers of the church ſhould not grow into contempt, God in old time garniſhed them with glorious titles, ſpecially where he called the temple the houſe of prayer. Iſa. lvi. 7. For, by this ſaying he both taught that the chief part of the worſhipping of him is the duty of prayer: and that to the end that the faithful ſhould with one conſent exerciſe themſelves in it, the temple was ſet up as a ſtandard for them. There was alſo added a notable promiſe: there abideth for thee, O God, praiſe in Sion: and to thee the vow ſhall be paid. Pſal lxv. 2. By which words the prophet telleth us, that the prayers of the church are never void: becauſe the Lord alway miniſtreth to his people matter to ſing upon with joy. But although the ſhadows of the law are ceaſed: yet becauſe the Lord's will was by this ceremony to nouriſh among us alſo the unity of faith, it is no doubt that the ſame promiſe belongeth to us, which both Chriſt hath ſtabliſhed with his own mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for ever.

Churches ordained to be houſes of prayer.

30. Now as the Lord by his word commanded the faithful to uſe common prayers: ſo there muſt be common temples appointed for the uſing of them: where who ſo refuſe to communicate their prayer with the people of God, there is no cauſe why they ſhould abuſe this pretence, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the commandment of the Lord. For he that promiſeth that he will do whatſoever two or three ſhall aſk being gathered together in his name, Matth. xviii. 20. teſtifieth that he deſpiſeth not prayers openly made: ſo that boaſting and ſeeking of glory of men be abſent, ſo that unfeigned and true affection be preſent which dwelleth in the ſecret of the heart. If this be the right uſe of temples (as truely it is) we muſt again beware that neither (as they have begun in certain ages paſt to be accounted) we take them for the proper dwelling places of God from whence he may more nearly bend his ear unto us: nor feign to them I wot not what ſecret holineſs, which may make our prayer more holy before God. For ſince we our ſelves be the true temples of God we muſt pray in our ſelves if we will call upon God in his own holy temple. As for that groſſneſs, let us which have a commandment to call upon the Lord in ſpirit and truth without difference of place, leave it to the Jews or the Gentiles. John. iv. 23. There was indeed a temple in old time by the commandment of God for offering of prayers and ſacrifices: but that was at ſuch time as the truth lay hid figured under ſuch ſhadows, which being now lively expreſſed unto us doth not ſuffer us to ſtick in any material temple. Neither was the temple given to the Jews themſelves with this condition, that they ſhould incloſe the preſence of God, within the walls thereof, but whereby they might be exerciſed to behold the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any part thought that God dwelleth in temples made with hands, were ſharply rebuked of Iſaiah and Stephen. Iſa. lxvi. 1. Act. vii. 48.

The ſound of the voice without the inward feeling of the heart in prayer availeth not.

31. Here moreover it is more than evident, that neither voice nor ſong, if they be uſed in prayer, have any force, or do any whit profit before God, unleſs they proceed from the deep affection of the heart. But rather they provoke his wrath againſt us, if they come only from the lips and out of the throat: for as much as that is to abuſe his holy name, and to mock his majeſty: as we gather out of the words of Iſaiah, which although they extend further, yet pertain alſo to reprove this fault. This people (ſaith he) cometh near to me with their mouth, and honoureth with their lips: but their heart is far from me: and they have feared me with the commandment and doctrine of men. Therefore behold I will make in this people a miracle great and to be wondered at. For, wiſdom ſhall periſh from their wiſe men, and the prudence of the elders ſhall vaniſh away. Iſa. ix. 13. Matth. xv. 8. Neither yet do we here condemn voice or ſinging, but rather do highly commend them, ſo that they accompany the affection of the mind. For ſo they exerciſe the mind and hold it intent in thinking upon God: which as it is ſlippery and rolling, eaſily ſlacketh and is diverſely drawn unleſs it be ſtayed with diverſe helps. Moreover whereas the glory of God ought after a certain manner to ſhine in all the parts of our body it ſpecially behoveth that the tongue be applied and devoted to this ſervice both in ſinging and in ſpeaking, which is properly created to ſhew forth and diſplay the praiſe of God: but the chief uſe of the tongue tongue is in public prayers, which are made in the assembly of the godly: which tend to this end, that we may all with one [illegible] voice, and as it were with one mouth together glorify God whom we worship with one spirit and one faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, every one of his brother, may receive the confession of faith, by the example whereof they may be both allured and stirred.

The use of singing in the church.

32. As for the use of singing in churches (that I may touch this also by the way) it is certain that it is not only most ancient: but that it was also in use among the apostles, we may gather by these words of Paul. I will sing in spirit, I will sing also in mind. 1 Cor. xiv. 13. Again to the Colossians, teaching and admonishing you, mutually in hymns psalms and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. For in the first place he teacheth that we should sing with voice and heart: in the other he commandeth spiritual songs, wherewith the godly do mutually edify themselves. Yet that it was not universal, Augustine testifieth [Confess. lib. ix. cap. 7.] who reporteth that in the time of Ambrose the church of Milan first began to sing, when while Justina the mother of Valentinian, cruelly raged against the true faith, the people more used watchings than they were wont: and that afterward the other western churches followed. For he had a little before said that this manner came from the eastern churches. He telleth also in his second book of retractions that it was in his time received in Africa. One Hilary (saith he) a ruler did in every place wheresoever he could, with malicious blaming rail at the manner which then began to be at Carthage, that the hymns at the altar should be pronounced out of the book of psalms, either before the oblation, or when that which had been offered was distributed to the people. Him I answered at the commandment of my brethren. And truly if songs be tempered to that gravity which becometh the presence of God and angels, it both procureth dignity and grace to the holy actions, and much availeth to stir up the minds to true affection and ferventness of praying. But we must diligently beware that our ears be not more heedfully bent to the note, than our minds to the spiritual sense of the words. With which peril Augustine in a certain place saith, that he was so moved, that he sometimes wished that the manner which Athanasius kept should be established, which commanded that the reader should sound his words with so small a bowing of his voice, that it should be liker to one that readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembred how much profit he himself had received by singing, he inclined to the other side. [Confess. lib. x. cap. 33.] Therefore using this moderation, there is no doubt that it is a most holy and profitable ordinance. As on the other side what songs soever are framed only to sweetness and delight of the ears, they both become not the majesty of the church, and cannot but highly displease God.

Public prayer in what tongue and with what gesture to be made.

33. Whereby it also plainly appeareth that common prayers are to be spoken not in Greek among Latin men, nor in Latin among Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore been each where commonly done) but in the people's mother tongue which commonly may be understood of the whole assembly: forasmuch as it ought to be done to the edifying of the whole church, who receive no fruit at all of a sound not understood. But they which have no regard neither of charity nor of humanity, should at least have been somewhat moved with the authority of Paul, whose words are no way dubious; If thou bless (saith he) in spirit, how shall he that occupieth the place of the unlearned say, Amen, to thy giving of thanks, since he knoweth not what thou sayest? For thou indeed givest thanks, but the other is not edified, 1 Cor. xiv. 16. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the unbridled licentiousness of the Papists, whilst the apostle so openly crieth out against it, fear not to roar out in a strange tongue the most babbling prayers of which they themselves sometimes understand not one syllable, nor would have other folks to understand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to do otherwise. How then? I will pray (saith he) with the spirit, I will pray also with the mind: I will sing with spirit; I will sing also with mind. Signifying by the name of spirit, the singular gift of tongues, which many being endowed with, abused it, when they severed it from the mind, that is, from understanding. But this we must altogether think, that it is by no means possible, neither in public nor in private prayer, but that the tongue without the heart, must highly displease God. Moreover we must think, that the mind ought to be kindled with ferventness of thought, that it may far surmount all that the tongue may express with utterance. Finally that the tongue is not necessary at all for private prayer, but so far as the inward feeling either is not sufficient to enkindle itself, or the vehemency of enkindling violently carrieth the work of the tongue with it. For though very good prayers ſometimes be without voice; yet oftentimes it happeneth, that when the affection of the mind is fervent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voice, and the other members into geſturing without exceſſive ſhew. Hereupon came the muttering of Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 13. and ſuch a like thing all the ſaints always feel in themſelves, when they burſt out into broken and imperfect voices. As for the geſtures of the body which are wont to be uſed in prayer (as kneeling and uncovering of the head) they are exerciſes by which we endeavour to riſe up to a greater reverencing of God.

A preſcribed form of prayer delivered by Chriſt.

34. Now we muſt learn not only a more certain rule, but alſo the very form of praying: namely the ſame, which the heavenly Father hath taught us by his beloved ſon: Matth. vi. 9. Luke xi. 9. wherein we may acknowledge his unmeaſurable goodneſs and kindneſs. For beſide this he warneth and exhorteth us to ſeek him in all our neceſſity (as children are wont to fly to their father's defence, ſo oft as they are troubled with any diſtreſs) becauſe he ſaw, that we did not ſufficiently perceive this, how great our indigence was, what was meet to be aſked, and what was moſt for our profit: he provided alſo for this our ignorance, and what our capacity wanted, he ſupplied and furniſhed of his own. For he hath preſcribed to us a form, wherein he hath, as in a table, ſet out whatſoever we may deſire of him, whatſoever availeth for our profit, and whatſoever is neceſſary to aſk. Of which condeſcenſion of his we receive a great fruit of comfort that we underſtand that we aſk no inconvenient thing, no unſeeming or unfit thing; finally, nothing that is not acceptable to him, ſince we aſk in a manner after his own mouth. When Plato ſaw the folly of men in making requeſts to God, which being granted, it many times befel much to their own hurt: he pronounced that this is the beſt manner of praying taken out of the old poet: King Jupiter, give unto us the beſt things, both when we aſk them, and when we do not aſk them, but command evil things to be far from us even when we aſk them. (Alcib. vel de voto) And verily the heathen man is wiſe in this, that he judgeth it perilous to aſk of the Lord that which our own deſire moveth us to: and therewithal he bewrayeth our unhappy caſe, that we cannot once open our mouths before God without danger, unleſs the ſpirit do inſtruct us to a right rule of praying. Rom. viii. 6. And in ſo much greater eſtimation this privilege is worthy to be had of us, ſince the only begotten Son of God miniſtreth words unto our mouth which may deliver our mind from all doubting.

The diviſion of the Lord's prayer into parts.

35. This, whether you call it form or rule of praying is made up of ſix petitions. For, the cauſe why I agree not to them that divide it into ſeven parts, is this, that by putting in this adverſative word (But) it ſeemeth that the Evangeliſt meant to join theſe two pieces together, as if he had ſaid: Suffer us not to be oppreſſed with temptation, but rather help our weakneſs, and deliver us that we faint not. The old writers alſo think on our ſide, (Aug. in Enchi. ad Laur. cap. 116. Chryſ. aut oper. imperf.) ſo that now that which is in Matthew added in the ſeventh place, is by way of declaration to be joined to the ſixth petition. But although the whole prayer is ſuch, that in every part of it regard is ſpecially to be had to the glory of God, yet the three firſt petitions are peculiarly appointed to God's glory, which alone we ought in them to look into without any reſpect (as they ſay) to our own profit. The other three have care of us, and are properly aſſigned to aſk thoſe things that are for our profit. And when we pray that the name of God be hallowed; becauſe God will prove whether he be loved and honoured of us freely or for hope of reward, we muſt then think nothing of our own ſelf-intereſt, but his glory muſt be ſet before us, which alone we muſt behold with fixed eyes: and no otherwiſe ought we to be minded in the other prayers of this ſort. And even this turneth to our great profit, that when it is ſanctified as we pray, it is alſo likewiſe made our ſanctification. But our eyes (as it is ſaid, muſt wink, and after a certain manner be blind to ſuch profit, ſo as they may not once look at it: that if all hope of our private benefit were cut off, yet we ſhould not ceaſe to wiſh and pray for this ſanctification and other things which pertain to the glory of God. As it is ſeen in the example of Moſes and Paul, Exod. xxxii. 32. Rom. ix. 3. to whom it was not grievous to turn away their minds and eyes from themſelves, and with vehement and inflamed zeal to wiſh their own deſtruction, that though it were with their own loſs they might advance the glory and kingdom of God. On the other hand, when we pray that our daily bread be given us; although we wiſh that which is for our own intereſt, yet here alſo we ought chiefly to ſeek the the glory of God, ſo that we ſhould not aſk it unleſs it might turn to his glory. Now let us come to the declaring of the prayer itſelf.

Our Father which art in heaven.

A comfort unto Chriſtians that they may call God their father.

36. Firſt in the very entry we meet with this which we ſaid before, that all prayer ought no otherwiſe to be offered of us to God than in the name of Chriſt, as it can by no other name be made acceptable unto him. For ſince we call him Father, truly we allege for us the name of Chriſt. For by what boldneſs might any man call God, Father? who ſhould burſt forth into ſo great raſhneſs, to take to himſelf the honour of the ſon of God, unleſs we were adopted the children of grace in Chriſt? Who being the true ſon, is given of him to us to be our brother: that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefit of adoption be made ours, if we do with ſure faith embrace ſo great bountifulneſs. As John ſaith, that power is given to them which believe in the name of the only begotten ſon of God, that they alſo may be made the children of God. John. i. 12. Therefore he both calleth himſelf our Father, and will be ſo called of us, by this ſavoury name delivering us from all diſtruſt, ſince there can no where be found any greater affection of love than in a Father. Therefore he could by no ſurer example teſtify his unmeaſurable dear love toward us than by this, that we are named the ſons of God. 1 John iii. 1. But his love is ſo much greater and more excellent toward us than all love of our parents, as he paſſeth all men in goodneſs and mercy; that if all the fathers that are in the earth, having ſhaken off all feeling of fatherly naturalneſs, would forſake their children, yet he will never fail us, Pſal. xxvii. 10. Iſa. lxiii. 16. becauſe he cannot deny himſelf. 2 Tim. ii. 13. For we have his promiſe, if you being evil can give good gifts to your children, how much more can your Father which is in heaven? Matth. vii. 11. Again in the prophet, Can a mother forget her children? Though ſhe forget them, yet I will not forget thee. Iſa. xxxix. 15. If we be his children: then as a child cannot give himſelf into the tuition of a ſtranger and foreign man, unleſs he complain either of the cruelty or poverty of his father: ſo we cannot ſeek ſuccours from elſe where than from him alone, unleſs we reproach him with poverty and want of ability, or with cruelty or too extream rigerouſneſs.

What the name of a father doth import and teach.

37. Neither let us allege that we are juſtly made fearful with conſcience of ſins, which may make a father, be he never ſo merciful and kind, daily to be diſpleaſed. For if among men the ſon can with no better advocate plead his cauſe to his father, and by no better mean get and recover his favour being loſt, than if he himſelf humbly and lowly, acknowlegeing his fault, do beſeech his father's mercy (for then the fatherly bowels cannot hide themſelves but muſt be moved at ſuch prayers) what ſhall that father of mercy do, and the God of all comfort? 2 Cor. i. 3. ſhall not he rather hear the tears and groanings of his children intreating for themſelves (ſpecially ſince he doth call and exhort us to do ſo) than any other interceſſions whatſoever they be to the ſuccour whereof they do ſo fearfully flee, not without ſome ſhew of deſpair, becauſe they diſtruſt of the kindneſs and mercifulneſs of their father? This overflowing plenty of fatherly kindneſs he illuſtrateth and ſetteth out unto us in the parable, where the Father lovingly embraceth the ſon that had eſtranged himſelf from him, that had riotouſly waſted his ſubſtance, that had every way grievouſly offended againſt him, and he tarrieth not till he do with words crave pardon, but he himſelf preventeth him, knoweth him a far off returning, of his own will goeth to meet him, comforteth him and receiveth him into favour. Luk. xv. 20. For, ſetting out in a man this example of ſo great gentleneſs, he minded to teach us how much more plentiful kindneſs we ought to look for at his hand, who is not only a Father, but alſo the beſt and moſt merciful of all fathers, howſoever we be unkind, rebellious and naughty children: ſo that yet we caſt our ſelves upon his mercy. And that he might make it to be more aſſuredly believed, that he is ſuch a father to us, if we be Chriſtians: he willed not only to be called father, but alſo by expreſs name our father: as if we might thus talk with, O Father which haſt ſo great natural kindneſs toward thy children, ſo great eaſineſs to pardon, we thy children call to thee and pray to thee, being aſſured and fully perſuaded, that thou beareſt no other affection to us than fatherly, howſoever we be unworthy of ſuch a father. But becauſe the ſmall capacities of our heart conceive not ſo great unmeaſurableneſs of favour, not only Chriſt is to us a pledge and earneſt of our adoption, but alſo he giveth us the ſpirit for a witneſs of the ſame adoption, through whom we may with a free and loud voice cry Abba, Father. Gal. iv. 6. So oft there-work of the tongue with it. For though very good prayers ſometimes be without voice; yet oftentimes it happeneth, that when the affection of the mind is fervent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voice, and the other members into geſturing without exceſſive ſhew. Hereupon came the muttering of Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 13. and ſuch a like thing all the ſaints always feel in themſelves, when they burſt out into broken and imperfect voices. As for the geſtures of the body which are wont to be uſed in prayer (as kneeling and uncovering of the head) they are exerciſes by which we endeavour to riſe up to a greater reverencing of God.

A preſcribed form of prayer delivered by Chriſt.

34. Now we muſt learn not only a more certain rule, but alſo the very form of praying: namely the ſame, which the heavenly Father hath taught us by his beloved ſon: Matth. vi. 9. Luke xi. 9. wherein we may acknowledge his unmeaſurable goodneſs and kindneſs. For beſide this he warneth and exhorteth us to ſeek him in all our neceſſity (as children are wont to fly to their father's defence, ſo oft as they are troubled with any diſtreſs) becauſe he ſaw, that we did not ſufficiently perceive this, how great our indigence was, what was meet to be aſked, and what was moſt for our profit: he provided alſo for this our ignorance, and what our capacity wanted, he ſupplied and furniſhed of his own. For he hath preſcribed to us a form, wherein he hath, as in a table, ſet out whatſoever we may deſire of him, whatſoever availeth for our profit, and whatſoever is neceſſary to aſk. Of which condeſcenſion of his we receive a great fruit of comfort that we underſtand that we aſk no inconvenient thing, no unſeeming or unfit thing; finally, nothing that is not acceptable to him, ſince we aſk in a manner after his own mouth. When Plato ſaw the folly of men in making requeſts to God, which being granted, it many times befel much to their own hurt: he pronounced that this is the beſt manner of praying taken out of the old poet: King Jupiter, give unto us the beſt things, both when we aſk them, and when we do not aſk them, but command evil things to be far from us even when we aſk them. Rom. viii. 6. And in ſo much greater eſtimation this priviledge is worthy to be had of us, ſince the only begotten Son of God miniſtreth words unto our mouth which may deliver our mind from all doubting.

The diviſion of the Lord's prayer into parts.

35. This, whether you call it form or rule of praying is made up of ſix petitions. What the name of a father doth import and teach.

37. Neither let us allege that we are juſtly made fearful with conſcience of ſins, which may make a father, be he never ſo merciful and kind, daily to be diſpleaſed. Gal. iv. 6. So oft therefore as any delay ſhall withſtand us, let us remember to aſk of him, that correcting our fearfulneſs he will give us that ſpirit of fortitude to be our guide to pray boldly.

When we call God our father the holy fellowſhip which we have one with another is commended and we admoniſhed to pray for others not only for our ſelves.

38. Whereas we are not ſo taught that every one ſhould ſeverally call him his own father, but rather that we ſhould all in common together call him our father: thereby we are put in mind, how great affection of brotherly love ought to be among us, which are altogether by one ſame right of mercy and liberality, the children of ſuch a father. For we all have one common father, from whom cometh whatſoever good thing may befal us: Matth xxiii. 9. there ought to be nothing ſeparately among us, which we are not ready with great cheartulneſs of mind to communicate one to another, ſo much as need requireth. Now if we be ſo deſirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand and help one to another, there is nothing wherein we may more profit our brethren, than to commend them to the care and providence of the moſt good father, who being well pleaſed and favouring, nothing at all can be wanted. And verily even this ſame we owe to our father. For as he that truly and heartily loveth any father of a houſhold, doth alſo embrace his whole houſhold, with love and good will: likewiſe what love and affection we bear to this heavenly Father, we muſt ſhew toward his people, his houſhold and his inheritance, which he hath ſo honoured, that he hath called it the fulneſs of his only begotten ſon. Epheſ. i. 24. Let a chriſtian man therefore frame his prayers by this rule, that they be common, and may comprehend all them that be brethren in Chriſt with him: and not only thoſe whom he preſently ſeeth and knoweth to be ſuch, but all men that live upon earth: of whom, what God hath determined, it is out of our knowlege: ſaving that it is no leſs godly than natural to wiſh the beſt to them, and hope the beſt of them. Howbeit we ought with a certain ſingular affection to bear a ſpecial inclination to them of the houſhold of faith, Gal. vi. 10. whom the apoſtle hath in every thing peculiarly commended unto us. In ſum, all our prayers ought to be ſo made, that they have reſpect to that community which our Lord hath eſtabliſhed in his kingdom and his houſe.

The conceiving of prayer in common is no hinderance to the private and particular commending of our own, or our brethrens neceſſities unto God.

39. Yet this withſtandeth not, but that we may ſpecially pray both for our ſelves and for certain others: ſo that yet our mind depart not from having an eye to this community, nor once ſwerve from it, but apply all things unto it. For though they be ſingularly ſpoken in form, yet becauſe they are directed to that mark, they ceaſe not to be common. All this may be eaſily underſtood by a like example. The commandment of God is general, to relieve the need of all poor: and yet they obey this commandment who to this end do help their poverty whom they know or ſee to be in need, although they paſs over many whom they ſee to be preſſed with no leſs neceſſity: either becauſe they cannot know all, or are not able to help all. After this manner they alſo do not againſt the will of God, which having regard unto, and thinking upon this common fellowſhip of the church, do make ſuch particular prayers, by which they do with a common mind in particular words, commend to God themſelves or others, whoſe neceſſity God willed to be more nearly known to them. Howbeit in the caſes of prayer and beſtowing of goods, all circumſtances are not parallel. For, the liberality of giving cannot be uſed but toward them whoſe need we have perceived: but with prayers we may help even them that are moſt ſtrange and moſt unknown to us, by how great a ſpace of ground ſoever they be diſtant from us. This is done by the general form of prayer, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they alſo are. Hereto we may apply that which Paul exhorteth the faithful of his time, that they lift up every where pure hands, without ſtrife: 1 Tim. ii. 8. becauſe when he warneth them that ſtrife ſhutteth the gate againſt prayers, he willeth them with one mind to lay their petitions in common together.

How God is ſaid to be in heaven and a triple uſe which this doctrine hath.

40. It is added, that he is in heaven. Whereupon it is not by and by to be gathered that he is bound faſt incloſed and compaſſed with the circle of heaven, as within certain bars. For Solomon alſo confeſſeth that the heavens of of heavens cannot contain him. 1 King. viii. 37. And he himſelf ſaith by the prophet that heaven is his ſeat, and the earth his footſtool. Iſa. lxvi. 1. Act. vii. 49. and xvii. 24. Whereby verily he ſignifieth nifieth that he is not limited in any certain ſpace, but is ſpread abroad throughout all things. But becauſe our mind (ſuch is the groſſneſs of it,) could not otherwiſe conceive his unſpeakable glory, it is ſignified to us by the heaven, than which there can nothing come under our ſight more ample or fuller of majeſty. Since therefore whereſoever our ſenſes comprehend any thing, there they uſe to faſten it: God is ſet out of all place, that when we will ſeek him, we ſhould be raiſed up above all ſenſe both of body and ſoul: Again by this manner of ſpeaking he is lifted above all chance of corruption and change: finally it is ſignified that he comprehendeth and containeth the whole world and governeth it with his power. Wherefore this is all one as if he had been called of infinite greatneſs or height, of incomprehenſible ſubſtance, of unmeaſurable power, of everlaſting immortality. But while we have this, we muſt lift up our mind higher when God is ſpoken of, that we dream not any earthly or fleſhly thing of him, that we meaſure him not by our ſmall proportions, nor draw his will to the rule of affections. And therewithal is to be raiſed up our affiance in him, by whoſe providence and power we underſtand heaven and earth to be governed. Let this be the ſum, that under the name of Father is ſet before us that God which hath in his own image appeared to us, that he may be called upon with aſſured faith: and that the familiar name of father is not only applied to eſtabliſh affiance, but alſo availeth to hold faſt our minds that they be not drawn to doubtful or feigned Gods, but ſhould from the only begotten ſon climb up to the only Father of angels and of the church: then that becauſe his ſeat is placed in heaven, we are by the government of the world put in mind that not without cauſe we come to him who with preſent care cometh of his own will to meet us. Whoſo come to God (ſaith the apoſtle) they muſt firſt believe that God is, then that he is a rewarder to all them that ſeek him. Heb xi. 6. Both theſe things Chriſt affirmeth to be proper to his father, that our faith may be ſtayed in him: then, that we may be certainly perſuaded that he is not careleſs of our ſafety: becauſe he vouchſafeth even to us to extend his providence. With which introductions Paul prepareth us to pray rightly. For before that he biddeth our petitions to be opened before God, he ſaith thus. Be ye careful for nothing, the Lord is at hand. Phil. iv. 6. Whereby appeareth that they doubtfully and with perplexity toſs their prayers in their mind which have not this well ſettled in them, that the eye of God is upon the righteous.

41. The firſt petition is, That the name of God be hallowed, the need whereof is joined with our great ſhame. For what is more ſhameful than that the glory of God ſhould be partly by our unthankfulneſs, partly by our maliciouſneſs darkned: and (ſo much as in it lieth) by our boldneſs and furious ſtubborneſs, utterly blotted out? Though all the wicked would burſt themſelves with their wilfulneſs full of ſacrilege, yet the holineſs of the name of God glorioufly ſhineth. And not without cauſe the prophet crieth out, as thy name O God, ſo is thy praiſe unto all the ends of the earth, Pſal. xxxiii. 18. Pſal. xlviii. 11. For whereſoever the name of God is known, it cannot be but that his ſtrength, power, goodneſs, wiſdom, righteouſneſs, mercy, and truth muſt ſhew forth themſelves, which may draw us into admiration of him, and ſtir us up to publiſh his praiſe. Since therefore the holineſs of God is ſo ſhamefully taken from him in earth, if we be not able to reſcue it, we are at leaſt commanded to take care of it in our prayers. The ſum is, that we wiſh the honour to be given to God which he is worthy to have, that men never ſpeak or think of him without the higheſt reverence: whereunto is contrary the unholy abuſing, which hath always been too common in the world, as at this day alſo it rangeth abroad. And hereupon cometh the neceſſity of this petition, which if there lived in us any godlineſs, though it were but a little, ought to have been ſuperfluous. But if the name of God have his holineſs ſafe, when being ſevered from all other, it breatheth out nothing but glory, here we are commanded not only to pray, that God will deliver that holy name from all contempt and diſhonour, but alſo that he will ſubdue all mankind to the reverence of it. Now whereas God diſcloſeth himſelf to us, partly by doctrine, and partly by works, he is no otherwiſe ſanctified of us, than if we give to him in both behalfs that which is his, and ſo embrace whatſoever ſhall come from him: and that his ſeverity have no leſs praiſe among us than his mercifulneſs, for as much as he hath in the manifold diverſity of his works imprinted marks of his glory which may worthily draw out of all tongues a confeſſion of his praiſe. So ſhall it come to paſs that the ſcripture ſhall have full authority with us, and that no good ſucceſs ſhall hinder the bleſſing which God deſerveth in the whole courſe of the governing of the world. Again, the petition alſo tendeth to this purpoſe, that all ungodlineſs which defileth this holy name, may be deſtroyed and taken away: that whatſoever things do darken and diminiſh this ſanctifying, as well ſlanders as mockings, may be driven away: and when God ſubdueth all ſacrileges, his glory may thereby more and more ſhine abroad.

The hallowing of the name of God which is the firſt petition both in that which he teacheth and that which he worketh, earneſtly to be longed for and craved in prayer.

The parts and proceſs of the kingdom of God amongſt men: which is the ſecond petition.

42. The ſecond petition is, that Thy kingdom come: which although it contain no new thing, is yet not without cauſe ſevered from the firſt: becauſe if we conſider our own drowſineſs in a thing greateſt of all others, it is profitable that the thing which ought of it ſelf to have been moſt well known, be with many words oft beaten into us. Therefore after that we have been commanded to pray to God to bring into ſubjection, and at length utterly to deſtroy whatſoever ſpotteth his holy name: now is added a like and in a manner the ſame requeſt, that his kingdom come. But although we have already ſet forth the definition of his kingdom, yet I now briefly rehearſe, that God reigneth when men as well with forſaking of themſelves, as with deſpiſing of the world and of the earthly life, do ſo yield themſelves to his righteouſneſs, that they aſpire to the heavenly life. Therefore there are two parts of this kingdom: the one that God correct with the power of his ſpirit all corrupt deſires of the fleſh, which do by multitudes make war againſt him: the other, that he frame all our ſenſes to the obedience of his government. Therefore none do keep right order in this prayer, but they which begin at themſelves, that is to ſay, that they be cleanſed from all corruptions which trouble the quiet ſtate of the kingdom of God, and infect the pureneſs thereof. Now becauſe the word of God is like a kingly ſcepter, we are here commanded to pray he will ſubdue the minds and hearts of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the ſecret inſtinct of his ſpirit he uttereth the effectual force of his word, that it may be advanced in ſuch degree as it is worthy. Afterward we muſt come down to the wicked who do obſtinately and with deſperate rage reſiſt his authority. God therefore ſetteth up his kingdom by humbling the whole world; but that in diverſe manners: becauſe he tameth the wantonneſs of ſome, and of other ſome he breaketh the untamed pride. This is daily to be wiſhed that it be done, that it may pleaſe God to gather to himſelf churches out of all the coaſts of the world: to enlarge and increaſe them in number, to enrich them with his gifts, to eſtabliſh right order in them: on the other ſide to overthrow all the enemies of pure doctrine and religion, to ſcatter abroad their counſels, to caſt down their enterpriſes. Whereby it appeareth that the endeavour of daily proceeding is not in vain commanded us: becauſe the matters of men, are never in ſo good caſe, that filthineſs being ſhaken away and cleanſed, full pureneſs flouriſheth and is in lively force. But the fulneſs of it is deferred unto the laſt coming of Chriſt, when Paul teacheth that God ſhall be all in all. 1 Cor. xv. 28. And ſo this prayer ought to withdraw us from all the corruptions of the world, which do ſo ſever us from God that his kingdom ſhould not flouriſh in us, and alſo to kindle our endeavour to mortify the fleſh, finally to inſtruct us to the bearing of the croſs: foraſmuch as God will in this wiſe have his kingdom ſpread abroad. Neither ought we to take it diſcontentedly, that the outward man be deſtroyed, ſo that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdom of God, when we ſubmit our ſelves to the righteouſneſs thereof, to make us partakers of his glory. This is done when brightly ſetting forth his light and truth with always new increaſes, whereby the darkneſs and lies of Satan and his kingdom may vaniſh away, be deſtroyed and periſh, he defendeth them that are his, with the help of his ſpirit, directeth them to uprightneſs, and ſtrengthneth them to continuance: but overthroweth the wicked conſpiracies of his enemies, ſhaketh abroad their treaſons and deceits, preventeth their malice, and beateth down their ſtubborneſs, till at length he kill Antichriſt with the ſpirit of his mouth, and deſtroy all ungodlineſs with the brightneſs of his coming.

43. The third petition is, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Which although it dependeth upon his kingdom, and cannot be ſevered from it, is not in vain added by it ſelf, for our groſſneſs, which doth not eaſily or readily conceive what it is for God to reign in the world. It ſhall therefore be no abſurdity if this be taken by way of plainer expoſition: that God ſhall then be king in the world when all things ſhall ſubmit themſelves to his will. Now here is not meant of his ſecret will whereby he governeth all things and directeth them to their end.

end. For though Satan and men are violently carried againſt him, yet he can by his incomprehenſible counſel not only turn aſide their violent motions, but alſo drive them into order that he may do by them that which he hath purpoſed. But here is mention of another will of God, namely that, whereunto anſwereth willing obedience: and therefore the heaven is by name compared with the earth: becauſe the angels, as it is ſaid in the pſalm, do willingly obey God and are diligently bent to do his commandments. Pſal. ciii. 20. We are therefore commanded to wiſh, that as in heaven nothing is done but by the beck of God, and the angels are originally, framed to all uprightneſs: ſo the earth, all ſtubborneſs and perverſeneſs being ſubdued, may be ſubject to ſuch government. And when we require this, we renounce the deſires of our own fleſh: becauſe whoſoever doth not reſign and yield his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth ſet himſelf againſt him, foraſmuch as nothing cometh out of us but depravity. And we are again by this prayer diſpoſed to the forſaking of our ſelves, that God may govern us after his will: and not only that, but that he may alſo create in us new minds, and new hearts, our old being brought to nought: that we may feel in our ſelves no other motion of deſire than a meer conſent with his will: ſummarily, that we may will nothing of our ſelves, but that his ſpirit may govern our hearts, by whom, inwardly teaching us, we may learn to love thoſe things that pleaſe him, and to hate thoſe things that diſpleaſe him. Whereupon this alſo followeth, that whatſoever affections fight againſt his will, he make them vain and void. Lo here be the firſt three chief points of this prayer, in aſking whereof we ought to have the glory of God only before our eyes, leaving the reſpect of our ſelves, and having no regard to any of our own profit, which although it come hereof largely unto us, yet we ought not here to ſeek it. But albeit all theſe things, though we never think of them, nor wiſh them, nor aſk them, muſt nevertheleſs come to paſs in their due time, yet we muſt wiſh them and require them. And to do this is no ſmall profit for our labour, that we may ſo teſtify and profeſs our ſelves to be the ſervants and children of God, as much as in us lieth endeavouring and being truly and throughly given to ſet forth his honour, which is due to him being both a Lord and a Father. Whoſo therefore do not with affection and zeal of advancing the glory of God, pray that the name of God be hallowed, that his kingdom come, that his will be done: they are not to be accounted among the children and ſervants of God; and as all theſe things ſhall be done againſt their wills; ſo they ſhall turn to their confuſion and deſtruction.

The ſenſe of the fourth petition wherein our corporal and earthly neceſſities are commended unto God.

44. Now followeth the ſecond part of the prayer, in which we come down to our own intereſts: not that bidding farewel to the glory of God (which as Paul witneſſeth, is to be regarded even in meat and drink, 1 Cor. x. 31.) we ſhould ſeek only what is profitable for ourſelves: but we have already given warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himſelf, doth draw us to himſelf wholly, that he may in this wiſe prove our godlineſs. Then he granteth us alſo to have an eye to our own intereſts, but with this condition, that we aſk nothing for ourſelves, but to this end that whatſoever benefits he beſtoweth upon us, they may ſet forth his glory: foraſmuch as nothing is more rightful than that we live and die to him. But in this petition we ask of God generally all things which the uſe of the body needeth under the elements of this world, not only wherewith we may be fed and cloathed, but alſo whatſoever he foreſeeth to be profitable for us, that we may eat our bread in peace. By which prayer briefly we yield ourſelves into his care, and commit us to his providence, that he may feed, cheriſh, and preſerve us. For the moſt good Father diſdaineth not to receive alſo our body into his faithful ſafe-guard and keeping, to exerciſe our faith in theſe ſmall things, when we look for all things at his hands even to a crumb of bread and a drop of water. For whereas it is come to paſs, I wot not how, by our iniquity, that we are moved and vexed with greater care of the fleſh than of the ſoul: many which dare truſt to God for their ſoul, are yet anxiouſly careful for their body, are yet in doubt what they ſhall eat, and wherewith they ſhall be clothed: and if they have not plenty of wine, wheat and oil beforehand, they tremble for fear. So much more do we eſteem the ſhadow of this life which laſteth but a moment, than that everlaſting immortality. But whoſo truſting to God have once caſt away that carefulneſs for the proviſion of the fleſh, do alſo by and by look for ſalvation and everlaſting life at his hand, which are greater things. It is therefore no ſmall exerciſe of faith, to hope for thoſe things of God, which otherwiſe do ſo much, hold us in care: and we have not finally profited when we have put off this unbelievingneſs which ſticketh faſt within the bones almoſt of all men.

As for that which ſome do here teach of tranſubſtantial bread, it ſeemeth but ſmally to agree with the the meaning of Chriſt: yea, but if we did not even in this frail life give to God the office of a nouriſhing father, our prayer ſhould be imperfect. The reaſon which they bring is too much prophane: that it is not meet that the children of God, who ought to be ſpiritual, ſhould not only caſt their mind to earthly cares, but alſo wrap God therein with them. As though his bleſſing and fatherly favour doth not alſo appear in the ſuſtenance of our life, or as though it were written in vain that godlineſs hath promiſes not only of the life to come, but alſo of this preſent life, 1 Tim iv. 8. But although the forgiveneſs of ſins is of much greater value than the ſuſtenance of the body, yet Chriſt hath ſet the inferior thing in the firſt place, to the intent to lift us up by degrees to the other two petitions which do properly belong to the heavenly life, wherein he had regard to our groſſneſs. We are commanded to aſk our bread, that we ſhould be content with the quantity which our heavenly father vouchſafeth to give to us, and ſhould not ſeek for gain by unlawful crafty means. In the mean time we muſt learn that it is made ours by title of gift, becauſe neither our diligence, nor our labour, nor our hands (as it is ſaid in Moſes Lev. xxvi. 20.) do by themſelves get us any thing, unleſs the bleſſing of God be preſent: yea, the plenty of the bread ſhould nothing at all profit us, unleſs it were by God turned into nouriſhment. And therefore this liberality of God is no leſs neceſſary for the rich than for the poor: becauſe having their cellars and their barns full, they ſhould yet faint for thirſt and hunger, unleſs they did by his grace enjoy their bread. The word this day, or every day, as it is in the other Evangeliſt, and alſo the adjective daily, do bridle the too much greedineſs of periſhing things, wherewith we are wont to luſt out of meaſure, and whereunto are joined other evils: ſince if we have plentiful abundance, we do laviſh it out upon pleaſure, delights, boaſting, and other kinds of riotous exceſs. Therefore we are commanded to aſk only ſo much as is enough for our neceſſity, and as it were from day to day, with this affiance, that when our heavenly Father hath fed us this day, he will alſo not fail us to morrow. Therefore how great plenty of things ſoever do flow unto us; yea when our barns are ſtuffed and our cellars full; yet we ought always to aſk our daily bread: becauſe we muſt certainly believe that all ſubſtance is nothing, but inſomuch as the Lord doth by pouring out of his bleſſing with continual increaſe make it fruitful: and that the very ſame ſubſtance that is in our hand, is not our own, but inſomuch as he doth every hour give us a portion and grant us the uſe of it. Thus whereas the pride of men doth hardly ſuffer itſelf to be perſuaded; the Lord teſtifieth that he hath ſhewed a ſingular example thereof for all ages, when he fed his people with Manna in the wilderneſs, to teach us that man liveth not by bread only, but rather in the word that cometh out of his mouth, Deut. viii. 3. Mat. iii. 4. Whereby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and ſtrength are ſuſtained, although he doth miniſter it unto us by means of bodily inſtruments. As he is wont alſo to teach us by the contrary example, when he ſo oft as he will, breaketh the ſtrength and (as he calleth it) the ſtaff of bread, that men eating may pine with hunger, and drinking may be dried up with thirſt. Lev. xxvi. 26. But whoſo not being contented with daily bread, but with inſatiable greedineſs are gaping for endleſs ſtore, or whoſo being full with their abundance, and careleſs by reaſon of the heap of their riches, do nevertheleſs ſue to God with this prayer, they do nothing elſe but mock him. For, the firſt ſort ſuch men aſk that which they would not obtain, yea that which they moſt of all abhor, that is, to have only daily bread, and ſo much as in them lieth they diſſembling hide from God the affection of their covetouſneſs: whereas true prayer ought to pour out before him the very whole mind it ſelf, and whatſoever inwardly lieth hidden. But the other ſort do aſk that which they look not for at his hand, namely that which they think they have with themſelves. In this that it is called ours the bountifulneſs of God (as we have ſaid) ſo much more appeareth, which maketh that ours, that is by no right due to us. Yet that expoſition is not to be rejected which I have alſo touched, that by our bread is meant that which is earned with rightful and harmleſs labour, and not gotten with deceit and extortion: becauſe that is always other mens which we get to ourſelves with any evil doing. Whereas we pray that it be given us, thereby is ſignified that it is the only and free gift of God, from whence ſoever it come to us, yea when it ſhall moſt of all ſeem to be gotten by our own policy and labour, and earned with our own hands; foraſmuch as it cometh to paſs by his bleſſing only that our labours proſper well.

The fifth petition wherein our ſins are confeſſed to be debts, our imperfections ac-

45. Now followeth; Forgive us our debts: in which petition and the next following, Chriſt hath briefly contained whatſoever maketh for the heavenly life; as in theſe two parts ſtandeth the ſpiritual knowleged during the term of this preſent life, a profeſſion made of our own willingneſs to expel from our hearts all revengeful cogitations towards them that have privately injured us.

ſpiritual covenant which God hath made for the ſalvation of his church, I will write my laws in their hearts, and I will be merciful to their iniquity. Jeremiah. xxxi.33. & xxxiii. 8. Here Chriſt begins the forgiveneſs of ſins: after this, he will by and by adjoin the ſecond grace, that God defend us with the power of his ſpirit, and ſuſtain us with his help, that we may ſtand invincible againſt all temptations. And ſins he calleth debts, becauſe we are debt-bound to pay the penalty of them, and were by no means able to ſatisfy it, unleſs we were accquitted by this forgiveneſs. Which pardon is of his free mercy, when he himſelf generouſly wipeth out theſe debts, taking no payment of us, but with his own mercy ſatisfying himſelf in Chriſt, who hath once given himſelf for recompence. Therefore whoſo truſt that God ſhall be ſatisfied by their own or other mens merits, and that with ſuch ſatisfactions the forgiveneſs of ſins is recompenced and redeemed, they have no ſhare in the communication of this free forgiveneſs: and when they call upon God in this manner, they do nothing but ſubſcribe to their own accuſation, yea and ſeal their own condemnation with their own witneſs. For they confeſs themſelves debtors, unleſs they be accquitted by the benefit of forgiveneſs, which yet they do not receive, but rather refuſe, when they thruſt unto God their own merits and ſatisfactions. For, ſo they do not beſeech his mercy, but do appeal to his judgment. As for them that dream of a perfection in themſelves, which maketh it needleſs to crave pardon, let them have ſuch diſciples whom the itching of their ears driveth to errors: ſo that it be certain that ſo many diſciples as they get, are taken away from Chriſt: foraſmuch as he inſtructing all to confeſs their guiltineſs, receiveth none but ſinners: not for that he cheriſheth ſins with flatterings, but becauſe he knew that the faithful are never throughly diveſted of the vices of their fleſh, but that they always remain ſubject to the judgment of God. It is indeed to be wiſhed, yea and to be earneſtly endeavoured, that we having performed all the parts of our duty may truly rejoice before God that we are clean from all ſpot: but foraſmuch as it pleaſeth God by little and little to reſtore his image in us, that there always remaineth ſome infection in our fleſh, the remedy ought not to have been deſpiſed. If Chriſt by the authority given to him of his father, commandeth us throughout the whole courſe of our life, to flee to him craving pardon of our guiltineſs: who ſhall be able to ſuffer theſe new maſters, which go about with this chimerical phantom of perfect innocency to dazle the eyes of the ſimple, to make them to truſt that they may be made free from all fault? Which, as John witneſſeth, is nothing elſe but to make God a liar. 1 John. i. 10. And withal one work theſe lewd men by cancelling one article do tear in ſunder and by that means do weaken from the very foundation the whole covenant of God, wherein we have ſhewed that our ſalvation is contained: ſo as they are not only robbers of God becauſe they ſever thoſe things ſo conjoined, but alſo wicked and cruel becauſe they overwhelm poor ſouls with deſpair: and traitors to themſelves and others, that are like them, becauſe they bring themſelves into a ſlothfulneſs directly contrary to the mercy of God. But whereas ſome object, that in wiſhing the coming of the kingdom of God, we do alſo aſk the putting away of ſin: that is too childiſh; becauſe in the firſt table of this prayer is ſet forth unto us moſt high perfection, but in this part is ſet forth our weakneſs. So theſe two things do fitly agree together, that in a ſpring toward the mark we deſpiſe not the remedies which our neceſſities requireth. Finally, we pray that we may be forgiven, as we our ſelves do forgive our debtors, that is, as we do forgive and pardon all of whomſoever we have been in any thing offended, either unjuſtly handled in deed, or reproachfully uſed in word. Not that it lieth in us to pardon the guiltineſs of the fault and offence which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgiving, of our own willingneſs to baniſh out of our mind wrath, hatred, and deſire of revenge, and with voluntary forgetfulneſs to tread under foot the remembrance of injuries. Iſa. xliii. 29. Wherefore we may not aſk forgiveneſs of ſins at the hand of God, if we do not alſo forgive their offences toward us which either do or have done us wrong. But if we keep any hatred in our hearts, and purpoſe any revenge, and deviſe by what occaſion we may hurt, yea, and if we do not endeavour to come into favour again with our enemies, and to deſerve well of them with all kind of friendly doings, and to win them unto us: we do by this prayer beſeech God that he do not forgive us. For we require that he grant to us the ſame forgiveneſs which we grant to others. But this is to pray that he grant it not to us, unleſs we grant it to them. Whoſo therefore be ſuch, what do they obtain by their prayer but a more grievous judgment? Laſt of all it is to be noted, that this condition that he forgive us, as we forgive our debtors, not therefore added for that we deſerve his forgiveneſs by the forgiveneſs which we grant to others, as if that cauſe of forgiveneſs to us were there expreſſed: but by this word partly the Lord's will was to confirm the weakneſs of our faith, for he added this as a ſign whereby we may be aſſured that he hath as ſurely granted to us forgiveneſs of our ſins, as we ſurely know in our conſcience that we have granted the ſame to others, if our mind be void and cleanſed of all hatred, envy, and revenge, and partly by this as it were by a mark, he wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not be bold to call upon him as their father, who being reſolutely haſty to revenge, and hardly entreated to pardon, do tenaciouſly retain enmity, and cheriſh in themſelves the ſame diſpleaſure toward others which they pray to be averted from themſelves. Which is alſo in Luke expreſly ſpoken in the words of Chriſt.

The ſixth petition of aid and ſuccour againſt the power of thoſe means which provoking unto evil we are not able of our ſelves to withſtand.

46. The ſixth petition (as we have ſaid) anſwereth to the promiſe of engraving the law of God in our hearts. But becauſe we do not without continual warfare and hard and great ſtriving obey God, we do here pray to be furniſhed with ſuch weapons and defended with ſuch ſuccour, that we may be able to get the victory: whereby we are warned that we ſtand in need not only of the grace of the ſpirit, which may ſoften, bow, and direct our hearts to the obedience of God, but alſo of his help whereby he may make us invincible both againſt all the treacherous entanglements and violent conflicts of Satan. But now oftentimes there are many and diverſe ſorts. For, both the perverſe thoughts of mind provoking us to treſpaſſing againſt the law, which either our own luſt doth miniſter unto us, or the devil ſtirreth up, are temptations: and alſo thoſe things which of their own nature are not evil, yet by the craft of the devil are made temptations, when they are ſo ſet before our eyes, that by the occaſion of them we be drawn away or do ſwerve from God. Jam. i. 2. and 14. Mat. iv. 1. and 3. And theſe temptations are either on the right hand or on the left. On the right hand, as riches, power, honours, which commonly do with their gliſtering and ſhew of good ſo dazle the ſight of men, and catch them with the baited hook of their flatterings, that being enſnared with ſuch deceits, or drunk with ſuch ſweetneſs, they may forget their God. On the left hand, as poverty, reproaches, deſpiſings, troubles, and ſuch others: that they being grieved with the bitterneſs and hardneſs thereof may be utterly diſcouraged, caſt away faith and hope, and finally be altogether eſtranged from God. To theſe temptations of both ſorts, which fight with us either being kindled in us by our own luſt, or being ſet againſt us by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heavenly Father that he ſuffer us not to yield: but rather that he uphold us and raiſe us up with his hand, that being ſtrong by his ſtrength, we may ſtand faſt againſt all the aſſaults of the malicious enemy, whatſoever thoughts he put into our mind: then, that whatſoever is ſet before us on either ſide, we may turn it to good, that we neither be puffed up with proſperity, nor thrown down with adverſity. Neither yet do we here require that we may feel no temptations at all, with which we have great need to be ſtirred up, pricked and pinched, leaſt by too much reſt we grow dull. For not in vain did David wiſh to be tempted Pſal. xxvi. 2.: and not without cauſe the Lord daily tempteth his elect, chaſtiſing them by ſhame, poverty, trouble, and other kinds of croſſes. Gen. xxii. 1. Deut. viii. 2. and xiii. 3 But God tempteth after one manner, and Satan after another: Satan, to deſtroy, damn, confound, and throw down headlong: but God, that by proving them that are his, he may have a trial of their ſincerity, and by exerciſing them may confirm their ſtrength, to mortify, purge by fire, and ſear their fleſh, which unleſs it were this way reſtrained, would wax wanton, and would wildly outrage above meaſure. Moreover Satan aſſaulteth men unarmed and unready, that he may oppreſs them unawares. God even with tempting worketh the effect, that they which be his may patiently bear whatſoever he ſendeth upon them. By the name of the evil, whether we underſtand the devil or ſin, it maketh little matter. Satan indeed himſelf is the enemy that lieth in wait for our life: but with ſin he is armed to deſtroy us. 1 Cor. x. 13. 2 Pet. ii. 9. 1 Pet. v. 8. This therefore is our requeſt, that we may not be overcome or overwhelmed with any temptations, but may by the power of the Lord ſtand ſtrong againſt all contrary powers wherewith we are aſſaulted: which is, not to yield us vanquiſhed to temptations, that being received into his keeping and charge, and being ſafe by his protection: we may endure unovercome by ſin, death, the gates of hell, and the whole kingdom of the devil: which is to be delivered from evil. Where it is alſo to be diligently marked, that it is above our ſtrength to match with the devil ſo great a warrior, and to bear his force and violence. Otherwiſe we ſhould but vainly or as it were in mockage aſk that which we had already in our ſelves. Surely, they which prepare them to ſuch a battle with truſt in themſelves, do not ſufficiently underſtand with how fierce and well armed an enemy they have to do. Now we pray to be delivered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad and raging lion, whereas we ſhould be torn in pieces with his teeth and paws, and ſwallowed with his throat, unleſs the Lord do deliver us out of the midſt of death: yet therewithal knowing this, that if the Lord ſhall ſtand by us, and fight for us when we are overthrown, we ſhall in his ſtrength ſhew ſtrength. Let others truſt as they liſt to their own abilities and ſtrength of free-will, which they think they have of themſelves: but let it ſuffice us that we ſtand and are ſtrong only by the ſtrength of God. But this prayer containeth more than at the firſt ſight appears in it. For if the ſpirit of God be our ſtrength to fight out our combat with Satan, we ſhall not be able to get the victory until we being filled with that Spirit ſhall have put of all the weakneſs of our fleſh. When therefore we pray to be delivered from Satan and the devil, we pray to be from time to time enriched with new increaſes of the grace of God, till being fully furniſhed with them, we may triumph over all evil. It ſeemeth hard and harſh to ſome, that we crave of God that he lead us not into temptation, foraſmuch as it is contrary to his nature to tempt, as James witneſſeth. Jam. i. 13. But this queſtion is already partly cleared, where we ſaid, that our own luſt is properly the cauſe of all the temptations wherewith we are overcome, and therefore worthily beareth the blame thereof. Neither doth James mean any thing elſe, but that the faults are without cauſe and wrongfully laid upon God, which we are driven to impute to our ſelves, becauſe we know our ſelves in our conſcience guilty of them. But this withſtandeth not but that God may when it pleaſeth him, make us bound to ſatan, caſt us away into a reprobate ſenſe, and to filthy luſts, and ſo lead us into temptation by his judgment which is righteous indeed but yet oftentimes ſecret: for as much as the cauſe of it is often hid from men, which is yet certainly known with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no unfit manner of ſpeaking, if we be perſuaded that he doth not without cauſe ſo oft threaten, that when the reprobate ſhall be ſtricken with blindneſs and hardneſs of heart, theſe ſhall be ſure tokens of his vengeance.

That which is added in the Lord's prayer, concerning his kingdom, power and glory to whom we pray, giveth us bath boldneſs to aſk and great truſt to obtain that we pray for.

47. Theſe three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarly commend us and our affairs to God, do evidently ſhew this which we have before ſaid, that the prayers of Chriſtians ought to be common edifying of the church, and to the increaſe of the communion of the faithful. For there doth not every man pray to have any thing privately given, but all in common together do pray for our bread, for forgiveneſs of ſins, that we may not be led into temptation, that we may be delivered from evil. There is furthermore adjoined a cauſe why we have both ſo great boldneſs to aſk, and ſo great truſt to obtain: which although it be not in the Latin copies, yet it agreeth more fitly in this place than that it ſhould ſeem worthy to be omitted, namely that his is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever, This is the perfect and quiet reſt of our ſoul. For if our prayers were to be commended to God by their own worthineſs, who ſhould be ſo bold, as once to open his mouth before him? Now howſoever we be moſt miſerable, howſoever moſt unworthy of all men, howſoever void of all commendation: yet we ſhall never want cauſe to pray, and never be deſtitute of confidence: foraſmuch as our father cannot have his kingdom, power and glory taken away from him. At the end is added, Amen, whereby is expreſſed our ferventneſs of deſire to obtain thoſe things that we have aſked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all ſuch things are already obtained and ſhall ſurely be given us becauſe they are promiſed by God, who cannot deceive. And this agreeth with that manner of prayer which we have here before rehearſed, do it Lord for thy name's ſake, not for our ſakes or our righteouſneſs: whereby the ſaints do not only expreſs the end of their prayers, but alſo confeſs that they are unworthy to obtain unleſs God fetch the cauſe from himſelf, and that their truſt to ſpeed cometh only of the nature of God.

The perfection of the Lord's prayer, and the danger of preſuming to crave things without the compaſs thereof.

48. Thus have we whatſoever we ought, yea, or in any wiſe may aſk of God, ſet forth in this form and as it were a rule of praying taught by the beſt ſchoolmaſter Chriſt, whom the Lord hath ſet over us to be our teacher, and whom alone he commands us to hear. Matth. xvii. 5. For he both always hath been his eternal wiſdom, and being made man is given to men as the angel of great counſel. Iſa. xi. 2. And this prayer is in all points, ſo fully perfect, that whatſoever foreign or ſtrange thing is added which cannot be referred to it, it is ungodly and unworthy to be allowed of God. For in this ſum he hath ſet forth, what is meet for him, what is pleaſing to him, what is neceſſary for us: finally what he will grant. Wherefore whoſo dare go further, and to aſk any thing of God beſide theſe, firſt they will add of their own to the wiſdom of God (which cannot be done without made blaſphemy) then they hold not themſelves under the will of God, but deſpiſing it do with greedineſs wander further: See [Auguſt. Of prayer to Proba.] finally they ſhall never obtain any thing, foraſmuch as they pray without faith. And there is no doubt that all ſuch prayers are made without faith, becauſe here wanteth the word of God, upon which unleſs faith be grounded, it can in no wiſe ſtand. But they which forſaking the maſter's rule, do follow their own deſires, are not only without the word of God, but alſo ſo much as they be able with their whole endeavour are againſt it. Therefore Tertullian no leſs fitly than truly hath called this a lawful prayer, ſecretly ſignifying that all other are lawleſs and unlawful. [Defuga in perſecut.]

Our requeſts when we pray are not tied to the words and ſyllables, but to thoſe things which are contained within the compaſs of the Lord's prayer.

49. We would not have theſe things ſo taken as though we were ſo bound with this form of prayer, that we may not change a word or a ſyllable. For there are each where read many prayers in the ſcripture, far differing from this in words, yet written by the ſame ſpirit, and which are at this day profitable to be uſed of us. Many are continually put into the mouths of the faithful by the ſame ſpirit, which in likeneſs of words do not ſo much agree. This only is our meaning in ſo teaching, that no man ſhould ſeek, look for, or aſk any other thing at all than that which is ſummarily comprehended in this prayer, and which though it moſt differ in words, yet differeth not in ſenſe. Like as it is certain that all the prayers which are found in the ſcriptures, and which do come out of godly hearts, are applied to this, ſo verily none can any where be found, which may match, much leſs ſurpaſs, the perfectneſs of this prayer. Here is nothing left out, that might be thought upon to the praiſes of God, nothing that ought to come into the mind of man for his own profit: and the ſame ſo fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In ſum, let us remember that this is the doctrine of the wiſdom of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needful.

The neceſſity of prayer and of ſet times for that purpoſe.

50. But although we have above ſaid, that we ought always to breath upward with minds lifted up to God, and pray without ceaſing: yet foraſmuch as ſuch is our weakneſs, that it needeth to be upholden with many helps: ſuch is our dulneſs, that it needeth to be pricked forward with many ſpurs: it is good that every one of us appoint to himſelf privately certain hours which may not paſs away without prayer, and which may have the whole affections of our mind thoroughly buſied to that purpoſe: as, when we riſe in the morning, before that we go to our day's work, when we ſit down to meat, when we have been fed by the bleſſing of God, when we take us to reſt. Only let this not be a ſuperſtitious obſerving of hours, by which, as praying a taſk to God, we may think our ſelves diſcharged for the other hours: but a training of our weakneſs, whereby it may ſo be exerciſed and from time to time ſtirred up. Specially we ought carefully to look that ſo oft as either we our ſelves are in diſtreſs, or we ſee other to be in diſtreſs with any hardneſs of adverſity, we run ſtraightway to him, not with feet but with hearts: then, that we ſuffer not any proſperity of our own or other mens to paſs, but that we teſtify that we acknowlege it to be his with praiſe and thankſgiving. Finally, this is diligently to be obſerved in all prayer, that we go not about to bind God to certain circumſtances, nor to appoint to him what he ſhall do, at what time, in what place, and in what manner: as by this prayer we are taught to make to him no law, nor to appoint to him any condition, but to leave to his will that thoſe things which he will do, he may do in what manner, at what time, and in what place it pleaſeth him. Wherefore ere we make any prayer for our ſelves, we firſt pray that his will be done: where we do already ſubmit our will to his; with which when it is reſtrained as with a bridle put upon it, it may not preſume to bring God into rule, but make him the judge and governor of all her deſires.

Conſtancy and patience in prayers needful.

51. If we do with minds framed to this obedience ſuffer our ſelves to be ruled with the laws of God's providence, we ſhall eaſily learn to continue in prayer, and with long deſires patiently to wait for the Lord: being aſſured that although he appear not, yet yet he is always preſent with us, and will when he ſeeth his time declare how ready he was to hear the prayer, which in the eyes of men ſeemed to be deſpiſed. And this ſhall be a moſt preſent comfort, that we faint not and fall down by deſpair, if at any time God do not anſwer at our firſt requeſts. Like as they are wont to do, which while they are carried with their ſudden heat, do ſo call upon God, that if he come not to them at their firſt brunts and bring them preſent help, they by and by imagine him to be angry and hatefully bent againſt them, and caſting away all hope of obtaining do ceaſe to call upon him. But rather deferring our hope with a well tempered evenneſs of mind, let us go forward in that perſeverance which is ſo much commended to us in the ſcriptures. For in the Pſalms we may oftentimes ſee how David and other faithful men, when they ſeem in a manner wearied with praying, did beat the air, becauſe they threw away their words to God that heard them not, and yet they ceaſe not from praying: becauſe the word of God hath not its full authority maintained, unleſs the credit thereof be ſet above all ſucceſſes of things. Moreover let us not tempt God and provoke him againſt us being wearied with our importunity, which many uſe to do, who do nothing but indent with God upon a certain condition, and bind him to the laws of their covenanting, as though he were ſervant to their deſires: which if he do not preſently obey, they diſdain, they fret, they carp againſt him, they murmur, they turmoil. Therefore to ſuch oftentimes in his fury, he being angry, granteth that, which to others in his mercy, he being favourable denieth. An example hereof are the children of Iſrael, for whom it had been better not to have been heard of the Lord, than with fleſh to eat up his wrath. Numb. xi. 18.

Our prayers not fruitleſs though the fruit thereof be not always ſenſible.

52. But if yet at length after long looking for it our ſenſe do not perceive that we have prevailed with praying, and feeleth no fruit thereof: yet our faith ſhall aſſure us of that, which cannot be perceived by ſenſe, namely that we have obtained that which was expedient for us, foraſmuch as the Lord doth ſo oft and ſo certainly take upon him that he will have care of our grievances, after that they have been once laid in his boſom. And ſo he will make us to poſſeſs abundance in poverty, comfort in affliction. For howſoever all other things do fail us, yet God will never fail us, who ſuffereth the waiting and patience of them that are his to be diſappointed. He alone ſhall ſuffice us inſtead of all things, foraſmuch as he containeth in himſelf all good things, which he ſhall one day diſcloſe unto us at the day of judgment when he ſhall plainly ſhew forth his kingdom. Beſide this although God grant to us, yet he doth not always anſwer according to the expreſs form of our requeſt, but holding us according to appearance inſuſpence, yet by a mean unknown he ſheweth that our prayers were not vain. This is meant by the words of John, 1 John v. 15. If we know that he heareth us when we aſk any thing of him, we know that we have the petitions which we aſk of him. This ſeemeth a weak ſuperfluouſneſs of words: but it is a ſingularly profitable declaration, namely that God even when he doth not follow our deſires, is yet gentle and favourable to our prayers, that the hope which reſteth upon his word may never diſappoint us. But with this patience the faithful do ſo far need to be ſuſtained, that they ſhould not long ſtand unleſs they did ſtay upon it. For the Lord doth by no light trials prove them that are his, and doth not tenderly exerciſe them: but oftentimes driveth them to the greateſt extremities, and when they are driven thither, he ſuffereth them long to ſtick faſt in the mire, ere he give them any taſte of his ſweetneſs: and, as Hannah ſaith, He ſlayeth and quickneth: he leadeth down to the grave, and bringeth back again, 1 Sam. ii. 6. What could they here do but be diſcouraged, and fall headlong into deſpair: unleſs when they are in diſtreſs and deſolate and already half dead, this thought did raiſe them up, that God doth look upon them, and that there ſhall be at hand an end of their evils. But howſoever they ſtand faſt upon the aſſuredneſs of that hope, they ceaſe not in the mean time to pray: becauſe if there be not in prayer a ſtedfaſtneſs of continuance, we nothing prevail with praying.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the eternal election, whereby God hath predestinated some to salvation, and others to destruction.

The necessity of knowing the truth in the question of predestination that God may be glorified, our minds both humbled and confirmed, and the danger of curious diving therein beyond the bounds of scripture.

BUT now whereas the covenant of life is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually find like place: in this diversity, the wonderous depth of the judgment of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversity also serveth the free choice of God's eternal election. If it be evident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, and other some are debarred from coming to it: here by and by arise great and hard questions which cannot otherwise be discussed, than if the godly minds have that certainly established which they ought to hold concerning election and predestination. This is (as many may think) a cumbersome question: because they think nothing to be less reasonable than of the common multitude of men some are foreordained to salvation, other some to destruction. But how they wrongfully encumber themselves, shall afterward be evident by the framing of the matter together. Beside that in the very same darkness which maketh men afraid, not only the profitableness of this doctrine, but also the most sweet fruit sheweth forth itself. We shall never be clearly persuaded as we ought to be, that our salvation floweth out of the fountain of the free mercy of God, till his eternal election be known to us, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation, but giveth to some that which he denieth to others. How much the ignorance of this principle detracteth from the glory of God, how much it withdraweth from true humility, it is plain to see. But Paul denieth that that which is so necessary to be known, is possible to be known, unless God leaving altogether the respect of works do chuse them whom he hath determined with himself. In this time (saith he) the remnants were saved according to the free election, Rom. xi. 5. And if by grace, then it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then it is no more grace: otherwise work is no more work. If we must be brought back to the beginning of election, that it may be certain that salvation cometh to us from no other where than from the mere liberality of God: they who will have this principle suppressed, do niggardly so much as in them lieth darken that which ought gloriously and with full mouth to have been published, and they pluck up the very root of humility. Paul, where the salvation of the remnant of the people is ascribed to free election, clearly testifieth that only then it is known that God doth by his mere good pleasure save whom he will, and not render reward which cannot be done. They which shut the gates that none may be bold to come to the tasting of this doctrine, do no less wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feel from our heart how much we are bound to God. Neither yet is there any other where the sure foundation of sound affiance, as Christ himself teacheth, who to deliver us from all fear, and to make us invincible among so many dangers, ambushes, and deadly battles, promiseth that whatsoever he hath received of his Father to keep, shall be safe. John x. 25. Wherefore we gather that they shall with continual trembling be miserable, whosoever they be that know not themselves to be the proper possession of God: and therefore that they do very ill provide both for themselves and for all the faithful, who being blind at these three profits which we have touched, would wish the whole foundation of our salvation to be quite taken from among us. Moreover, hereby the church appeareth unto us, which otherwise (as Bernard rightly teacheth, Ser. in Cant. 78.) were not possible to be found, nor to be known among creatures: because both ways it lieth mysteriously hidden within the bosom of blessed predestination and within the mass of miserable damnation. But ere I enter into the matter itself, I must beforehand in two sorts speak to two sorts of men. That the treating of predestination, whereas of itself it is somewhat cumbersome, is made very doubtful yea and dangerous, the curiousness of men is the cause: which can by no stops be restrained from wandering into forbidden compasses, and climbing up on high; which, if it may, will leave to God no secret which it will not search and turn over. Into this boldness and importunity forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, and among those some

that are otherwiſe not evil men: here is fit occaſion to warn them what is in this behalf the due meaſure of their duty. Firſt therefore let them remember, that when they enquire about predeſtination, they pry into the ſecret cloſets of the wiſdom of God; whereinto if any man do curiouſly and boldly intrude, he ſhall not attain wherewith to ſatisfy his curioſity, but ſhall enter into a labyrinth from which he ſhall find no way to extricate himſelf again. For it is not meet that man ſhould freely ſearch thoſe things which God hath willed to be hidden in himſelf, and to turn over from eternity itſelf the height of wiſdom, which he willed to be reverenced and not comprehended, that by it alſo he might be marvellous unto us. The ſecrets of his will which he hath determined to be opened unto us, he hath diſcloſed in his word: and he hath determined, ſo far as he ſaw to pertain to us, and to be profitable for us.

Gods word the only ſafe way to walk in, and the light to direct our walking in matters of ſo great difficulty as this is.

2. We are come (ſaith Auguſtine Hom. in John) into the way of faith, let us ſteadfaſtly hold it. It bringeth into the kings chamber, in which all the treaſures of knowlege and wiſdom are hidden. For, the Lord Chriſt himſelf did not envy his excellent and moſt choſen diſciples, when he ſaid, I have many things to be ſaid to you, but ye cannot bear them now. John. viii. 26. We muſt walk, we muſt profit, we muſt increaſe, that our hearts may be able to conceive thoſe things which now we cannot conceive. If the laſt day find us profiting, there we ſhall learn that which here we could not. If this thought be of force with us, that the word of the Lord is the only way, that may lead us to ſearch whatſoever is lawful to be learned of him, that it is the only light, which may give us light to ſee whatſoever we ought to ſee of him: it ſhall eaſily hold back and reſtrain us from all raſhneſs. For we ſhall know that ſo ſoon as we be gone out of the bounds of the world we run out of the way, and in darkneſs, in which race we muſt needs oftentimes ſtray, ſlip, and ſtumble. Firſt therefore let this be before our eyes, that to covet any other knowlege of predeſtination than that which is ſet forth by the word of God is a point of no leſs madneſs than if a man ſhould have a will to go by an unpaſſable way, or to ſee in darkneſs. Neither let us be aſhamed, to be ignorant of ſomewhat in it wherein there is ſome learned ignorance. But rather let us willingly abſtain from the ſearching of that knowlege, whereof the exceſſive coveting is both fooliſh and perilous, yea and deadly. But if the vain curioſity provoke us, it ſhall be profitable always to ſet this againſt it, whereby it may be beaten back, that as too much of honey is not good, ſo the ſearching of glory doth not turn unto glory to the curious. Pro. xxv. 27. For there is good cauſe why we ſhould be ſcared from that boldneſs, which can do nothing but throw us down headlong into ruin.

The doctrine of predeſtination not utterly to be ſhunned and buried in ſilence.

3. There are others who when they have a will to remedy this evil, do command all mention of predeſtination to be in a manner buried, at the leaſt they teach men to flee from every manner queſtioning thereof as from a rock. Although the moderation of theſe men be herein worthily to be praiſed that they judge that myſteries ſhould be taſted of with ſuch ſobriety: yet becauſe they deſcend too much beneath the mean: they little prevail with the wiſdom of man, which doth not lightly ſuffer it ſelf to be reſtrained. Therefore, that in this behalf alſo we may keep a right end, we muſt return to the word of the Lord, in which we have a ſure rule of underſtanding. For the ſcripture is the ſchool of the holy Ghoſt, in which as nothing is left out which is both neceſſary and profitable to be known, ſo nothing is taught but that which it behoveth us to learn. Whatſoever therefore is uttered in the ſcripture concerning predeſtination, we muſt beware that we debar not the faithful from it, leaſt we ſhould ſeem either enviouſly to defraud them of the benefit of their God, or to blame and accuſe the holy Ghoſt who hath publiſhed thoſe things which it is in any wiſe profitable to be ſuppreſſed. Let us (I ſay) give leave to a chriſtian man, to open his mind and his ears to all the ſayings of God which are directed to him, ſo that it be done with this limitation, that ſo ſoon as the Lord hath cloſed his holy mouth, he may alſo block up to himſelf all ways to enquire further. This ſhall be the beſt bond of ſobriety, if not only in learning we may follow the Lord going before us, but alſo when he maketh an end of teaching, we ceaſe to will to learn. Neither is the danger which they fear of ſo great importance, that we ought therefore to turn away our minds from the oracles of God. Notable is the ſaying of Solomon, that the glory of God is to conceal a word. Prov. xxiii. 2. But ſince both godlineſs and common reaſon teacheth that this is not generally meant of every thing, we muſt ſeek a difference, leſt brutiſh ignorance ſhould pleaſe us under colour of modeſty and ſobriety. That difference is in few words plainly ſet out by Moſes, to the Lord our God (ſaith he) belong his ſecrets: but to us and to our children he hath diſcloſed theſe things. Deut. xxix 26. For we ſee how he commendeth to the people the ſtudy of the doctrine of the law, only by reaſon of the decree of God, becauſe it pleaſed God to publiſh it: and how he holdeth the people within thoſe bounds, by this reaſon only, becauſe it is not lawful for mortal men to thruſt themſelves into the ſecrets of God.

Predeſtination not therefore to be concealed becauſe prophane men carp, or bark, or ſcoff at it, as they do alſo at other parts of chriſtian doctrine which are not for that cauſe to be overlooked.

4. Prophane men (I grant) do in the matter of predeſtination ſuddenly catch hold of ſomewhat which they may carp, or cavil, or bark, or ſcoff at. But if their frowardneſs do affright us away from it, the chief articles of the faith muſt be kept ſecret, of which there is almoſt none which they or ſuch as they be do leave untouched with blaſphemy. A froward wit will no leſs proudly outrage when he heareth that in the eſſence of God there are three perſons, than if he hear that God foreſaw what ſhould become of man when he created him. Neither will they abſtain from laughing, when they ſhall underſtand that there is little more than five thouſand years paſſed ſince the creation of the world: for they will aſk why the power of God was ſo long idle and aſleep. Finally there can be nothing brought forth, which they will not ſcoff at. For the reſtraining of theſe ſacrileges, muſt we hold our peace of the Godhead of the Son, and of the holy Ghoſt? or muſt we paſs over in ſilence the creation of the world? Yea but the truth of God is both in this behalf and every where mightier than that it need to fear the evil ſpeaking of the wicked: as Auguſtine ſtrongly maintaineth in his work of the good of perſeverance. [Cap. xv. uſque ad 20.] For we ſee that the falſe apoſtles could not by defaming and ſlandering the true doctrine of Paul, make him to be aſhamed of it. But whereas they ſay that this whole diſputation is perilous alſo for godly minds, becauſe it maketh againſt exhortations, becauſe it ſhaketh faith, becauſe it troubleth the heart it ſelf: this is vain. Auguſtine ſcrupleth not to confeſs, that for theſe cauſes he was wont to be blamed, for that he did too freely preach predeſtination: but, as he had in readineſs wherewithal, he largely confuteth them. [De bono perſever. cap. xiv.] But we, becauſe many and divers abſurdities are thruſt into this place, had rather to reſerve every one to be wiped away in place fit for it. Only this I deſire generally to obtain of them, that thoſe things which the Lord hath laid up in ſecret, we may not ſearch: thoſe things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: leſt either on the one part we be condemned of vain curioſity, or on the other part, of unthankfulneſs. For, this alſo is very well ſaid of Auguſtine, that we may ſafely follow the ſcripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth ſtoopingly, leſt it ſhould forſake our weakneſs. [Lib. v. de Gen. ad lit.] But whoſo are ſo wary and ſo fearful that they would have predeſtination to be buried, leſt it ſhould trouble weak ſouls: with what colour, I beſeech you, will they cover their arrogancy, when they indirectly accuſe God of fooliſh unadviſedneſs, as though he foreſaw not the danger, which they think themſelves to have wiſely met with? Whoſoever therefore laboureth to bring the doctrine of predeſtination into miſliking, he openly ſaith evil of God: as though ſomewhat had unadviſedly ſlipped from him which is hurtful to the church.

Predeſtination obſcured by ſuch as make God's foreknowlege the cauſe thereof: what knowlege is, and what predeſtination, examples of both.

5. Predeſtination whereby God adopteth ſome into the hope of life, and judgeth ſome to eternal death, no man that would be accounted godly dare ſimply deny: But they wrap it up with many cavillations, ſpecially they which make foreknowlege the cauſe of it. We indeed do ſay that they be both in God, but we ſay that the one is wrongfully made ſubject to the other. When we give foreknowlege to God, we mean that all things always have been and perpetually do remain under his eyes, ſo that to his knowlege there is nothing to come or paſt, but all things are preſent, and ſo preſent that he doth not imagine only by conceived forms (as thoſe things are preſent to us, wherof our mind holdeth faſt the remembrance (but he truly beholdeth and ſeeth them as ſet before him. And this foreknowlege extendeth to the whole compaſs of the world and to all creatures. Predeſtination we call the eternal decree of God, whereby he had it determined with himſelf what he willed to become of every man. For all are not created to like eſtate: but to ſome eternal life, and to ſome eternal damnation is fore-appointed. Therefore as every man is created to the one or other end, ſo we ſay that he is predeſtinate either to life or to death. But this predeſtination God hath not only teſtified in every ſeveral perſon, but hath ſhewed an example thereof in the whole iſſue of Abraham, whereby might plainly appear that it lieth in his will what ſhall be the eſtate of every nation. When the High-

eſt divided the nations, and ſevered the children of Adam, his part was the people of Iſrael, the cord of his inheritance. Deut. xxxii. 8. The ſeparation is before the eyes of all men: in the perſon of Abraham as in a dry ſtock one people is peculiarly choſen, all other being refuſed: but the cauſe appeareth not, ſaving that Moſes, to cut off all occaſion of glorying from poſterity, teacheth that they excel only by the free love of God. For he aſſigneth this to be the cauſe of their deliverance, for that God loved the fathers, and choſe their ſeed after them. Deut. iv. 37. chap. vii. 8. More plainly in another chapter: he was pleaſed in you to chooſe you, not becauſe you paſſed other nations in number, but becauſe he loved you. Deut. x. 14. The ſame admonition is often repeated with him, Behold, to the Lord thy God belongeth the heaven, the earth, and whatſoever things are in it: and he hath pleaſed himſelf only in your fathers, and hath loved them, and hath choſen you their ſeed. Deut. xxiii. 5. Again in another place ſanctification is commanded them, becauſe they are choſen to be a peculiar people. And again in an other place, love is affirmed to be the cauſe of protection. Which alſo the faithful do declare with one voice, ſaying: he hath choſen for us our inheritance, the glory of Jacob, whom he hath loved. Pſal. xlvii. 5. For they do all impute to free love all the gifts wherewith they were garniſhed of God: not only becauſe they knew that they themſelves had obtained them by no deſervings, but alſo that even the holy Patriarch was not endued with ſuch vertue, that he could purchaſe to himſelf and his poſterity ſo great a prerogative of honour. And, the more ſtrongly to tread down all pride, he upbraided them that they have deſerved no ſuch thing, foraſmuch as they are a ſtubborn and hard-necked people. Deut. ix. 6. And oftentimes the prophets do hatefully and as by way of reproach caſt the Jews in the teeth with this election, becauſe they had foully departed from it. Whatſoever it be, now let them come forth which will bind the election of God either to the worthineſs of men, or to the merits of works. When they ſee one nation to be preferred before all others, and when they hear that God was led with no reſpect to be more favourably bent to a few and ignoble, yea and froward and diſobedient men: will they quarrel with him, becauſe his will was to ſhew ſuch an example of mercy? But they ſhall neither with their pratling voices hinder his work, nor with throwing ſtones of taunts into heaven ſhall hit or hurt his righteouſneſs, but rather they fall back upon their own heads. Moreover the Iſraelites are called back to this principle of the free covenant, when either thanks are to be given to God, or their hope to be raiſed up againſt the time to come. He made us, and not we our ſelves, (ſaith the prophet) his people and the ſheep of his paſtures. The negative is not ſuperfluous, which is added to exclude us, that they may know that of all the good things wherewith they excel, God is not only the author, but fetched the cauſe thereof from himſelf, becauſe there was nothing in them worthy of ſo great honour. Alſo he biddeth them to be contented with the mere good pleaſure of God, in theſe words. The ſeed of Abraham are his ſervants: the children of Jacob his elect. Pſal. cv. 6. And after that he hath rehearſed the continual benefits of God as fruits of the election, at length he concluded, that he dealt ſo liberally becauſe he remembred his covenant. With which doctrine agreeth the ſong of the whole church, thy right hand and the light of thy countenance gave the land to our fathers, becauſe thou waſt pleaſed in them. Pſal. xliv. 4. But it is to be noted, that where mention is made of the land, it is a viſible ſign of the ſecret ſeparation wherein the adoption is contained. To the ſame thankfulneſs David in another place exhorteth the people, ſaying, Bleſſed is the nation whoſe God the Lord is, the people which he hath choſen for an inheritance to himſelf. Pſal. xxxiii. 12. And Samuel encourageth them to good hope, ſaying, the Lord will not forſake you, for his own great name's ſake, becauſe it pleaſed him to create you for a people to himſelf. 1 Sam. xx. 22. Likewiſe David when his faith is aſſailed armeth himſelf to fight, ſaying, bleſſed is he whom thou haſt choſen, he ſhall dwell in thy courts. Pſal. lxv. 5. But for as much as the election hidden in God was ſtabliſhed as well by the firſt deliverance as by the ſecond, and other mean benefits: in Iſaiah the word of electing is transferred to this, God ſhall have mercy on Jacob, and he ſhall yet chooſe out of Iſrael: Iſa. xiv. 2. becauſe he ſignifying the time to come, ſaith that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which he ſeemed to have forſaken, ſhall be a ſign of the ſtable and ſtedfaſt election, which once ſeemed to have been fallen away. When alſo it is ſaid in another place, I have choſen thee and have not caſt thee away: Iſa. xli. 9. he ſetteth out the continual courſe of the notable liberality of his fatherly good will. And yet more plainly the angel ſaith in Zachariah God ſhall yet chooſe Jeruſalem: Zach. ii. 12. as though in hardly chaſtning it, he had rejected it: or as though the exile were an interrupting rupting of the election: which yet remaineth inviolable, although the ſigns thereof do not always appear.

Of election and predeſtination both general and ſpecial.

6. There is to be added a ſecond degree more narrowly reſtrained, or in which was ſeen a more ſpecial grace of God: when of the ſame kindred of Abraham God refuſed ſome, and other ſome by nouriſhing them in the church he ſhewed that he retained among his children. Iſhmael had at the beginning obtained equal degree with his brother Iſaac, becauſe the ſpiritual covenant had been no leſs ſealed in him by the ſign of circumciſion. He is cut off, and then Eſau: at the laſt an innumerable multitude and almoſt Iſrael. In Iſaac was the ſeed called: the ſame calling endured in Jacob. A like example God ſhewed in rejecting Saul: which thing is alſo glorioufly ſet forth in the pſalm. He hath put back the tribe of Joſeph, and the tribe of Ephraim he hath not choſen, but he hath choſen the tribe of Judah. Pſal. lxxvii. 69. Which the holy hiſtory divers times repeateth, that the wonderful ſecret of the grace may the better appear in this change. Iſhmael, Eſau, and ſuch others, (I grant) fell from the adoption by their own fault and guiltineſs: becauſe there was a condition adjoined, that they ſhould faithfully keep the covenant of God, which they falſely brake. But this was yet a ſingular benefit of God, that he vouchſafed to prefer them above the other Gentiles: as it is ſaid in the pſalm, he hath not ſo done to other nations, nor hath opened his judgments to them. Pſal, xlvii. 20. But here I have not without cauſe ſaid that there are two degrees to be noted: becauſe now in the chooſing of the whole nation God ſhewed that he is in his own mere liberality bound to no laws: but he is free, ſo that equal portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the inequality whereof ſheweth that it is truly of free gift. Therefore Malachi amplifieth the unthankfulneſs of Iſrael, becauſe they being not only choſen out of all mankind, but alſo ſeparated out of a holy houſe to be a peculiar people, do unfaithfully and wickedly deſpiſe God ſo beneficial a father. Was not Eſau the brother of Jacob? (ſaith he) and yet Jacob I loved, but Eſau I hated. Mal. i. 2. For, God taketh it for confeſſed that when either of them was born of a holy father, and ſucceſſor of the covenant, finally a branch of the holy root: now the children of Jacob were more than commonly bound, which were taken into that dignity. But when Eſau the firſt begotten being refuſed, their father who was by nature inferior was made the heir, he proveth them doubly unthankful, and complaineth that they were not holden with that double bond.

Election outward and inward, in the general body of men outwardly elected ſundry, which inwardly are not elected in the ſpirit.

7. Although it be already ſufficiently evident, that God doth by his ſecret counſel freely chooſe whom he will, rejecting others, yet his free election is hitherto but half ſhewed, till we come to all particular perſons, to whom God not only offereth ſalvation, but ſo aſſigneth it, that the certainty of the effect thereof is not in ſuſpenſe or doubtful. For, theſe are accounted in that only ſeed, whereof Paul maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet becauſe many of his poſterity were cut off as rotten members: that the election may be effectual and truly ſtedfaſt, we muſt needs aſcend to the head, in whom the heavenly father hath bound together his elect one with another, and hath knit them to himſelf with a knot impoſſible to be looſed. So in the adoption of the kindred of Abraham, ſhined the liberal favour of God, which he denied to other men: yet in the members of Chriſt appeareth a much more excellent ſtrength of grace, becauſe they being graffed into their head do never fall away from ſalvation. Therefore Paul doth fitly reaſon out of the place of Malachi which I even now alleged: that where God with making a covenant of eternal life calleth any people to himſelf, there is in part a ſpecial manner of election, that he doth not chooſe all effectually with common grace. Whereas it is ſaid, I have loved Jacob, this pertaineth to the whole iſſue of the patriarch, which the prophet there ſetteth in compariſon againſt the poſterity of Eſau. Yet this withſtandeth not but that in the perſon of one man was ſet forth to us an example of the election, which cannot miſgive, but muſt come to the mark that it tendeth to. Theſe Paul doth not vainly note to be called remnants: becauſe experience teacheth that of a great multitude many ſlide and apoſtatize, ſo that oftentimes there remaineth but a ſmall portion. But why the general election of a people is not always firm and ſtedfaſt, there is a reaſon offering it ſelf in readineſs: becauſe with whom God covenanteth he doth not by and by give to them the ſpirit of regeneration, by the power whereof they may continue in the covenant to the end: but the outward changing without the inward effectualneſs of grace, which might be of force to hold them in, is a certain medium between

tween the forſaking of whole mankind, and the election of a ſmall number of the godly. The whole people of Iſrael were called the inheritance of God, of whom yet there were many ſtrangers. But becauſe God had not for nothing made covenant with them that he would be their father and redeemer, he rather hath reſpect to his own free favour, than to the unfaithful falling away of many, by whom alſo his truth was not aboliſhed: becauſe where he reſerved any remnant, it appeared that his calling was without repentance. For whereas God did from time to time chooſe unto himſelf a church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, he had regard to his covenant, which being broken by the whole multitude he reſtrained it to a few, that it ſhould not utterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the ſeed of Abraham was a certain viſible image of a greater benefit, which God hath vouchſafed to grant to a few of many. This is the reaſon why Paul ſo diligently putteth a difference between the children of Abraham according to the fleſh, and his ſpiritual children which were called after the example of Iſaac. Not that it was a vain and unfruitful thing ſimply to be the child of Abraham, (which might not be ſaid without diſhonour of the covenant) but becauſe the unchangeable counſel of God, whereby he hath predeſtinate whom he would, is by it ſelf effectual only to this latter ſort unto ſalvation. But I warn the readers that they bring not a foreconceived judgment on either ſide, till it appear by the places of ſcripture brought forth what is to be thought. That therefore which the ſcripture clearly ſheweth, we ſay that God by eternal and unchangeable counſel hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to ſalvation, and on the other ſide whom he would condemn to deſtruction. This counſel as touching the elect, we ſay is grounded upon his free mercy without any reſpect of the worthineſs of man, but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his juſt indeed and irreprehenſible, but alſo incomprehenſible judgment, the entry of life is blocked up. Now in the elect we ſet vocation to be the teſtimony of election: and then juſtification to be another ſign of the manifeſt ſhewing of it, till they come to glory wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: ſo by ſhutting out the reprobate either from the knowlege of his name or from the ſanctification of his Spirit, he doth as it were by theſe marks open what judgment abideth for them. I will here paſs over many feigned inventions, which fooliſh men have forged to overthrow predeſtination. For they need no confutation, which ſo ſoon as they are brought forth, do largely bewray their own falſeneſs. I will tarry only upon thoſe, which either are in controverſy among the learned, or which may bring any hardneſs to the ſimple, or which ungodlineſs with fair ſeeming ſhew pretendeth, to ſcoff at the righteouſneſs of God.

CHAP. XXII.

A confirmation of this doctrine by teſtimonies of the ſcripture.

God was not moved with the foreſight of mans merit, to predeſtinate, neither is to be grudged at for preferring ſome, and paſſing by others, whom particularly and freely he hath choſen.

ALL theſe things which we have ſet are not without controverſy among many, ſpecially the free election of the faithful: which yet cannot be weakned. For the common ſort do think that God, as he foreſeeth that every man's deſerving ſhall be, ſo maketh difference between men: that therefore whom he foreknoweth that they ſhall be not unworthy of his grace, them he adopteth into the place of children: and whoſe natures he eſpieth that they will be bent to wickedneſs and ungodlineſs, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by cloaking it with the vail of foreknowlege they do not only darken election, but feign that it hath beginning from elſewhere. And this opinion received of the common ſort is not the opinion of the common ſort alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintainers. Which I do plainly confeſs, to the intent that no man ſhould truſt that it ſhall much hurt our cauſe if their names be objected againſt us. For, the truth of God herein is more certain, than that it may be ſhaken: more clear, than that it may be darkned with the authority of men. But ſome others, neither exerciſed in the ſcripture nor worthy of any notice, do rail at this doctrine with greater malicioufneſs, than that their forward pride ought to be ſuffered. Becauſe God chooſing ſome after his own will, leaveth other ſome, they pick a quarrel againſt him. But if the thing it ſelf be known for true, what ſhall they prevail with brawling ling againſt God? We teach nothing but that which is approved by experience, that it was always at liberty for God, to beſtow his grace to whom he will. I will not enquire whereby the poſterity of Abraham excelled others, but by that vouchſafing, whereof there is found no cauſe elſewhere than in God. Let them anſwer why they be men rather than oxen or aſſes. When it was in the hand of God to make them dogs, he faſhioned them after his own image. Will they give leave to brute beaſts to quarrel with God for their eſtate, as though the difference were unrighteous? Truly it is no more righteous, that they ſhould enjoy the prerogative which they have obtained by no deſervings, than for God diverſly to deal abroad his benefits according to the meaſure of his own judgment. If they ſkip over to perſons, where the inequality is more hateful to them, at the leaſt at the example of Chriſt, they ought to be afraid to prate ſo boldly of ſo high a myſtery. He is conceived of the ſeed of David, a mortal man: by what vertues will they ſay that he deſerved to be in the very womb made the head of angels, the only begotten ſon of God, the image and glory of the father, the light, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation of the world? This thing Auguſtine wiſely noted, that in the very head of the church is a moſt clear mirror of free election, leſt it ſhould trouble us in the members: and that he was not by righteouſly living made the ſon of God, but that he had ſo great honour freely given him, that he might afterward make others partakers of his gifts. [De correpti. & grat. ad Valent. c. xv. De bono perſe. c. ult. De verb. Apo. ſer. xviii.] Here if any man aſk why others were not the ſame that he was, or why all we are ſo far diſtant from him, why we all are corrupt and he pureneſs: ſuch a man ſhall bewray not only his madneſs, but therewithal alſo his ſhameleſneſs. But if they go forward to labour to take from God the free power to chooſe and refuſe, let them alſo take away that which is given to Chriſt. Now it is worth while to conſider what the ſcripture pronounceth of every one. Paul verily, when he teacheth that we were choſen in Chriſt, Eph. i. 4. taketh away all reſpect of our own worthineſs. For it is all one as if he had ſaid: becauſe in the whole ſeed of Adam the heavenly Father found nothing worthy of his election, he turned his eyes unto his Chriſt, to chooſe as it were members out of his body them whom he would take into the fellowſhip of life. Let this reaſon then be of force among the faithful, that we were therefore adopted in Chriſt into the heavenly inheritance, becauſe in our ſelves we are not able to receive ſo great excellency. Which alſo he touched in another place, when he exhorteth the Coloſſians to giving of thanks, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints. Col. i. 12. If election go before this grace of God that we be made fit to obtain the glory of the life to come: what ſhall God himſelf now find in us whereby he may be moved to elect us? My meaning ſhall yet be more openly expreſſed by another ſaying of his. He hath choſen us (ſaith he) ere the foundations of the world were laid, according to the good pleaſure of his will, that we might be holy, and unſpotted, and unreprovable in his ſight: Eph. i. 4. where he ſetteth the good pleaſure of God againſt all our deſervings whatſoever they be.

Special and free election without reſpect of merits going before or following after, demonſtrated out of Paul's words to the Epheſians.

2. That the proof may be more ſtrong, it is worth while to note all the parts of that place, which being coupled together do leave no doubt. Where he nameth the elect, it is no doubt that he ſpeaketh to the faithful, as he alſo by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they do with too foul a gloſs abuſe that name, who wreſt it to the age wherein the goſpel was firſt publiſhed. Where he ſaith that they were elect before the beginning of the world, he taketh away all reſpect of worthineſs. For what reaſon of difference is there between them which yet were not, and thoſe which afterward ſhould in Adam be equal? Now if they be elect in Chriſt, it followeth that not only every man is ſevered without himſelf, but alſo one of them from another, foraſmuch as we ſee that all are not the members of Chriſt. That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holy, plainly confuteth the error which deriveth election from foreknowlege, foraſmuch as Paul crieth out againſt it, and ſaith, that whatſoever virtue appeareth in men, it is the effect of election. Now if a higher cauſe be ſought, Paul anſwereth that God hath ſo predeſtinate, yea and that according to the good pleaſure of his will. In which words he overthroweth whatſoever means of their election men do imagine in themſelves. For he alſo teacheth that whatſoever things God giveth toward ſpiritual life, they flow out of this one fountain, becauſe God hath choſen whom he would, and ere they were born he had ſeverally laid up for them the grace which he vouchſafed to give them.

Our ſanctification the end where-

3. But whereſoever this pleaſure of God reigneth, there no works come to be conſidered.

He

unto, not the cauſe wherefore we were choſen.

He doth not here indeed purſue the compariſon of contraries, but it is to be underſtood ſuch as he himſelf declareth. He hath called us (ſaith he) with a holy calling, not according to his purpoſe and the grace which is given of Chriſt before the world began. 2 Tim. i. 9. And we have already ſhewed that all doubt is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holy and unſpotted. For if thou ſay, becauſe he foreſaw that we ſhould be holy, therefore he choſe us, thou ſhalt pervert the order of Paul. Thus therefore thou mayeſt ſafely gather. If he choſe us that we might be holy: then he choſe us, not becauſe he foreſaw that we would be ſuch. For theſe two things are contrary the one to the other: that the godly have it of election that they be holy, and that they come to it by mean of works. Neither is their objection here any thing worth to which they commonly flee, that the Lord doth not render the grace of election to any works going before, but yet granteth it to works to come. For when it is ſaid that the faithful were choſen, that they might be holy: therewithal is ſignified that the holineſs which was to come in them took beginning at election. And how ſhall this ſaying agree together, that thoſe things which are derived from election gave cauſe to election? The ſame thing which he ſaid he ſeemeth afterward to confirm more ſtrongly, where he ſaith, according to the purpoſe of his will which he had purpoſed in himſelf. Eph. i. 5. For, to ſay that God purpoſed in himſelf, is as much in effect as if it had been ſaid, that without himſelf he conſidered nothing whereto he had any regard in decreeing. Therefore he by and by addeth, that the whole ſum of our election tendeth to this end, that we ſhould be to the praiſe of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God deſerveth not to be praiſed alone in our election, unleſs our election be free. But free it ſhall not be, if God in electing his, do conſider what ſhall be the works of every one. Therefore we find that that which Chriſt ſaid to his diſciples, hath place univerſally among all the faithful, ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you. John xv. 16. Where he not only excludeth deſervings paſt, but alſo ſignifieth that they had nothing in themſelves why they ſhould be choſen, if he had not prevented them with his mercy. Like as this ſaying of Paul is alſo to be underſtood: who firſt gave to him, and he ſhall receive recompence. Rom. xi. 35. ? For he meaneth to ſhew that the goodneſs of God ſo preventeth men, that it findeth nothing in them neither paſt nor to come, whereby he may be won to be favourable to them.

Special and free election proved out of S. Paul. to the Romans.

4. Now to the Romans, where he fetcheth this queſtion further off, and followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Iſraelites, which are iſſued of Iſrael: becauſe although by right of inheritance they were all bleſſed, yet the ſucceſſion did not equally paſs to them all. The beginning of this diſputation proceeded of the pride and deceitful glorying of the Jewiſh people. For when they claimed to themſelves the name of the church, they would have the credit of the goſpel to hang upon their will: as the papiſts at this day would gladly with this feigned pretext thruſt themſelves into the place of God. Paul, although he grant that the offspring of Abraham is holy by reaſon of the covenant, yet affirmeth that the moſt part of them are ſtrangers in it: and that not only becauſe they ſwerve out of kind, ſo that of lawful children they become baſtards, but becauſe the ſpecial election of God ſtandeth above and reigneth in the higheſt top, which alone maketh the adoption thereof ſure. If their own godlineſs eſtabliſhed ſome in the hope of ſalvation, and their own falling away alone diſinherited other ſome: Paul verily ſhould both fooliſhly and inconveniently lift up the readers even to the ſecret election. Now if the will of God (the cauſe whereof neither appeareth nor is to be ſought, without himſelf) maketh the one ſort differing from the other, ſo that not all the children of Iſrael are true Iſraelites, it is vainly feigned that every man's ſtate hath a beginning in himſelf. Then he further followeth the matter under the example of Jacob and Eſau. For when they both were the ſons of Abraham, both together incloſed in one mother's womb, it was a monſter-like change that the honour of firſt-birth was removed to Jacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was teſtified the election of the one, and the reprobation of the other. The original and cauſe of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowlege will have to be ſet out in the virtues and vices of men. For this is an eaſy ſhort way with them that God ſhewed in the perſon of Jacob, that he chuſeth the worthy of his grace: and in the perſon of Eſau he refuſeth them whom he ſeeth to be unworthy. Thus they ſay boldly. But what ſaith Paul? When they were not yet born, and had not done any good or evil, that the purpoſe of God according to election might ſtand, not of works, but of him that calleth, it is ſaid: The elder ſhall ſerve the younger: as it is written, Jacob

I have loved, but Esau I have hated. Rom. ix. 11. If foreknowlege were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were unfitly made of the time. Let us grant that Jacob was chosen, because he had worthiness gotten by works to come: to what purpose should Paul say that he was not yet born; and this now should be unadvisedly added, that he had yet done no good: because this shall be a ready answer, that nothing is hidden from God, and that so the godliness of Jacob was present before him. If works do win grace, they should then worthily have had their price before that Jacob was born as if he had been grown to full age. But the apostle goeth forward in undoing this knot, and teacheth that the adoption of Jacob was not made of works, but of the calling of God. In works he interlaceth not the time to come or time past: and then he directly setteth them against the calling of God, meaning by establishing the one, expressly to overthrow the other: as if he had said, that it is to be considered what hath pleased God, not what men have brought of themselves. Last of all it is certain that by the words of election and purpose, all causes whatsoever men are wont to feign elsewhere than in the secret counsel of God, are quite removed from this matter.

The doctrine is so clear and the example so plain which S. Paul produceth, that there is no place at all left to cavil.

5. What colour will they bring to darken these things, who in election assign some place to works either past or to come? For this is utterly to mock at that which the apostle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeth not upon any consideration of works, but upon the mere calling of God, because it was put between them when they were not yet born. Neither had he been ignorant of this their subtilty, if it had had any soundness in it: but because he very well knew, that God can foresee no goodness in man, but that which he hath first determined by the benefit of his election to give him: he fleeth not to that backward order, to set good works before the cause of themselves. Thus have we by the words of the apostle, that the salvation of the faithful is founded upon the will of the election of God only: and that the same favour is not gotten by works, but cometh of free calling. We have also as it were an image of that thing set before us. Esau and Jacob are brethren, issuing both of the same parents, inclosed yet both in one womb, not yet brought out into the world. In them all things are equal, yet of them the judgment of God is diverse. For he taketh the one and forsaketh the other. There was nothing but only the first birth, by right whereof the one excelled the other. But this also being passed over, that thing is given to the younger which is denied in the elder. Yea, and in others also God seemeth always as of set purpose to have despised first birth, to cut off from the flesh all matter of glorying, refusing Ishmael, he cast his mind to Isaac. Plucking back Manasseh, he more honoured Ephraim.

Their election whom S. Paul speaketh of, was not only to an earthly inheritance but an heavenly.

6. If any man interrupt me with saying, that we must not by these inferior and small benefits determine of the sum of the life to come, that he which hath been advanced to the honour of the birthright, should therefore be reckoned to be adopted into the inheritance of heaven: (for there be some which spare not Paul himself, as though in allegeing these testimonies he had wrested the scripture to a strange sense:) I answer as I have done here before, that the apostle neither slipped by unadvisedness, nor wilfully abused the testimonies of the scripture. But he saw (which they cannot abide to consider) that God intended by an earthly sign to declare the spiritual election of Jacob, which otherwise was hidden in his inaccessible throne. For unless we refer the birth-right granted to him unto the world to come, it should be a vain and foolish form of blessing whereby he obtained nothing but manifold miseries, discommodities, grievous banishent, and many bitterness of sorrow and cares. Therefore when Paul saw without doubting, that God by outward blessing testified the blessing which he had in his kingdom prepared spiritual and never decaying for his servant: he doubted not for proof of this spiritual blessing, to fetch an argument from that outward blessing. This also we must remember that to the land of Canaan was adjoined the pledge of the heavenly dwelling: so that it ought not at all to be doubted that Jacob was graffed with the angels into the body of Christ, that he might be partaker of the same life. Jacob therefore is chosen, when Esau is rejected, Rom. ix. 15. and by the predestination of God is made different from him, from whom he differed not in any deservings. If you ask a cause, the apostle rendereth this, because it is said to Moses, I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will vouchsafe to grant mercy to whom soever I will vouchsafe to grant mercy. And what I beseech you meaneth this? Verily, the Lord himſelf moſt plainly pronounceth that men have in themſelves no cauſe why he ſhould do good to them, but he fetcheth the cauſe from his own mercy only: and therefore that the ſalvation of his is his own work. When God ſetteth thy ſalvation in himſelf alone, why wilt thou deſcend to thy ſelf? When he appointeth to thee his mercy alone, why wilt thou run to thine own deſervings? When he holdeth thy thought wholly in his mercifulneſs alone, why wilt thou turn part to the beholding of thine own works? Therefore we muſt needs come to that leſſer people, which Paul in another place ſaith were foreknown to God, Rom. xi. 2.: not in ſuch ſort as theſe men imagine, to foreknow out of an idle watch-tower the things that he worketh not: but in ſuch ſenſe as it is oft read. For truly when Peter ſaith in Luke that Chriſt was by the determinate council and foreknowlege of God appointed to death, Acts ii. 23.: he doth not bring God as a looker on, but the author of our ſalvation. So the ſame Peter alſo, where he ſaith that the faithful to whom he wrote were choſen according to the foreknowlege of God, properly expreſſeth that ſecret predeſtination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And the word purpoſe, which he joineth for a divers word, expreſſing all one thing, for as much as it doth every where ſignify a ſtedfaſt determination as they commonly call it, undoubtedly teacheth that God when he is author of our ſalvation goeth not out of himſelf. In which ſenſe he ſaith in the ſame chapter that Chriſt was the lamb foreknown before the creation of the world. For what is more fooliſh or trifling, than to ſay that God from on high did ſtand looking whence ſalvation ſhould come to mankind? Therefore in Paul the foreknowing of people is as much as a ſmall portion mingled with the multitude which falſely pretendeth name of God. In another place alſo Paul to beat down their boaſting which being covered with a viſor, do take upon themſelves the chief preheminence among the godly before the world, ſaith that God knoweth who are his, 2 Tim. ii. 19. Finally, by that ſaying Paul pointeth unto us two ſorts of people: the one of the whole kindred of Abraham: the other, ſeverally choſen out of it, and which being laid up under the eyes of God, is hidden from the ſight of men. And it is no doubt that he took this out of Moſes, who affirmeth that God will be merciful to whom he will (although he there ſpeaks of the elect people, whoſe ſtate in outward ſeeming was equal) as if he ſhould have ſaid, that in the common adoption is included with him a ſpecial grace toward ſome, as it were a more holy treaſure: and that the common covenant withſtandeth not but that the ſame ſmall number may be exempt in degree: and he willing to make him ſelf the free diſpoſer and ruler of this thing, preciſely denieth that he will be merciful to one rather than to another, for any other reaſon, but for that it ſo pleaſeth him: becauſe when mercy cometh to him that ſeeketh it, though he indeed ſuffer not a denial, yet he either preventeth or partly getteth to himſelf the favour whereof God claimeth to himſelf the praiſe.

Special and free election proved by the words of Chriſt in S. John.

7. Now let the ſovereign judge and maſter pronounce of the whole matter. When he ſaw ſo great hardneſs in his hearers, that he did in a manner waſte his words without fruit among the multitude: to remedy this offence, he crieth out, whoſoever my father giveth me, ſhall come to me. For this is the will of my father, that whatſoever my father hath given me, I ſhall not loſe any thing of it. John. vi. 37. Note that the beginning is taken at the father's gift, that we may be delivered into the faithful keeping and defence of Chriſt. Here ſome man peradventure will turn a circle about, and will take exception, ſaying that they only are accounted in the proper poſſeſſion of the father, whoſe yielding hath been voluntary by faith. But Chriſt ſtandeth only upon that point, that although the fallings away of great multitudes do ſhake the whole world, yet the counſel of God ſhall be ſtedfaſt and ſtand faſter than the heavens themſelves, that his election may never fail. They are ſaid to have been the elect of the father, before that he gave to them his only begotten Son. They aſk whether it were by nature: yea rather, them which were ſtrangers he made his own by drawing them to him. There is a greater clearneſs in the words of Chriſt than can by ſhifting be covered with any darkneſs. No man (ſaith he) can come to me, unleſs my father draw him. John vi. 44. But whoſo hath heard and learned of my father, he cometh to me. If all generally without difference ſhould bow their knee before Chriſt, then the election were common: but now in the fewneſs of the believers appeareth a manifeſt diverſity: Therefore after that Chriſt had affirmed that the diſciples which were given him, were the peculiar poſſeſſion of God the father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the world, but for thoſe whom thou haſt given me, becauſe they are thine. John xvii. Whereby is proved that the whole world belongeth not to the creator of it, ſaving that grace deliver-eth a few from the wrath of God, and from eternal death, which otherwiſe ſhould have periſhed: but the world it ſelf is left in his own deſtruction to which it was appointed. In the mean time although Chriſt put himſelf mean between, yet he claimeth to himſelf the power of chooſing in common with the father. I ſpeak not (ſaith he) of all: I know whom I have choſen. John. xiii. 18. John xv. 19. If any man aſk from whence he hath choſen them, he anſwereth in another place, out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when he commendeth his diſciples to his father. This is to beholden, that when he affirmeth that he knoweth whom he hath choſen, there is ſignified ſome ſpecial ſort in the general kind of men: then, that the ſame ſpecial ſort is made to differ not by the quality of their own vertues, but by the heavenly decree. Whereupon followeth that many excel by their own force or diligence, when Chriſt maketh himſelf the author of election. For when in another place he reckoneth Judas among the elect, whereas he was a devil, this is referred only to the office of apoſtleſhip, which although it be a clear mirror of the favour of God (as Paul ſo oftentimes acknowlegeth in his own perſon,) yet it containeth not in it ſelf the hope of eternal ſalvation. Judas therefore, when he did unfaithfully bear the office of an apoſtle, might be worſe than the devil: but of thoſe whom Chriſt hath once graffed into his body, he will ſuffer none to periſh: becauſe in preſerving their ſalvation he will perform that which he hath promiſed, that is, he will ſtretch forth the power of God which is greater than all. For whereas he ſaith in another place, Father, of thoſe whom thou haſt given me, I have loſt none but the ſon of perdition, John xvii. 28.: although it be an abuſive ſpeech by figure, yet it hath no dobutful meaning. The ſum is, that God maketh them his children by free adoption whom he will have to be his children: and that the inward cauſe thereof is in himſelf: becauſe he is content with his own ſecret good pleaſure.

The opinion of ancient fathers touching the cauſe of election.

8. But Ambroſe, Origen, and Jerom thought that God diſtributeth his grace among men, as he foreſeeth that every man will uſe it well: Yea and Auguſtine was once in the ſame opinion. (Retract. lib. 1. cap. 2.) But when he had made greater proficiency in the knowlege of the ſcripture, he not only revoked it as evidently falſe, but alſo ſtrongly confuted it: yea and after his revoking of it, in reproving the Pelagians for that they continued in the ſame error, ſaith: (Epi. ad Sixt. 106.) Who cannot wonder that the apoſtle knew not this moſt ſubtile ſenſe? For when he had ſet out a thing to be wondered at of theſe brethren, while they were not yet born, and afterward objected a queſtion againſt himſelf, ſaying; What then? Is there injuſtice with God? Here was a fit place for him to anſwer, that God ſaw the merits of them both: yet he ſaith not this, but fleeth to the judgments and mercy of God. And in another place, when he had taken away all merits before election: Here (ſaith he) is confuted their vain reaſoning who defend the foreknowlege of God againſt the grace of God, and therefore ſay that we are choſen before the making of the world, becauſe God foreknew that we would be good, not that he himſelf would make us good. (Hom. in Joh. 8.) He ſaith not this, who ſaith, Ye have not choſen me, but I have choſen you, John. xv. 16. For if he had therefore choſen us, becauſe he foreknew that we would be good: he ſhould therewithal alſo have foreknown that we would chooſe him: and ſo forſooth as followeth to that effect. Let the teſtimony of Auguſtine be of force among them that willingly reſt in the authority of the fathers. Howbeit Auguſtine ſuffereth not himſelf to be ſeparated from the reſt; but by clear teſtimonies ſheweth that this diſagreement is falſe with the malice whereof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the xix. chapter of his book of the predeſtination of ſaints, he allegeth out of Ambroſe, Chriſt calleth whom he hath mercy on. Again, if he had pleaſed, of the undevout he might have made devout. But God calleth whom he vouchſafeth, and whom he will he maketh religious. If I liſted to knit together a whole volume out of Auguſtine, I could readily ſhew to the readers that. I need no other words but his: but I will not load them with tediouſneſs. But go to, let us imagine that they ſpeak not at all: but let us give heed to the matter itſelf. A hard queſtion was moved, whether God did righteouſly in this that he vouchſafed to grant his grace but to ſome: of which queſtion Paul might have diſintangled himſelf with one word if he had alleged the reſpect of works. Why therefore doth he it not, but rather continueth on a diſcourſe which is ſubject to the ſame difficulties? Why, but becauſe he ought not? For the Holy Ghoſt who ſpake by his mouth, had not the diſeaſe of forgetfulneſs. Therefore without any circumſtances he anſwereth, that God therefore favoureth his elect, becauſe he will; therefore hath mercy, becauſe he will. For this oracle of God, I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and

I will ſhew mercy to whom I will ſhew mercy, Exod. xxxiii. 15. is as much in effect as if it had been ſaid, that God is moved to mercy by no other reaſon, but becauſe he will have mercy. Therefore this ſaying of Auguſtine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be choſen, but maketh them ſo.

The ſhift which Thomas uſeth in ſolving this queſtion, rejected.

9. Neither do we any thing paſs upon the ſubtilty of Thomas, that the foreknowing of deſervings, is not indeed the cauſe of predeſtination on the behalf of the act of him that doth predeſtinate, but on our behalf it may after a certain manner be ſo called, that is, according to the particular weighing of predeſtination: as when it is ſaid, that God predeſtinateth glory to man by merits, becauſe he hath decreed to give to him grace by which he may deſerve glory. For ſince the Lord will in election have us to look unto nothing but his mere goodneſs, if any man ſhall covet here to ſee any more, it ſhall be a wrongful greedineſs. If we luſted to ſtrive in ſubtlety, we want not wherewith to beat back this ſilly ſubtlety of Thomas. He affirmeth, that to the elect glory is after a certain manner predeſtinate by deſervings, becauſe the Lord doth after a certain manner predeſtinate to them the grace, by which they may deſerve glory. What if I anſwer on the contrary ſide and ſay that predeſtination unto grace, ſerveth election unto life, and is as it were a waiting maid after it? That grace is predeſtinate to them, to whom the poſſeſſion of glory hath been long ago appointed: becauſe it pleaſeth the Lord to bring his children from the election into juſtification? For thereupon it ſhall follow that the predeſtination of glory was rather the cauſe of the predeſtination of grace, than contrariwiſe. But away with thoſe ſtrivings as things ſuperfluous for ſuch as ſhall think that there is wiſdom enough for them in the word of God. For this was in old time truly written of an eccleſiaſtical writer, that they who allow the election of God to merits are more wiſe than they ought to be. Ambroſe de vocat. gent. lib. 1. cap 1.

There is no repugnancy between God's calling of all, and calling effectually his choſen only.

10. Some do object that God ſhould be contrary to himſelf if he ſhould univerſally call all men to him, and receive but a few elect. So by their opinion the univerſalneſs of the promiſe taketh away the difference of ſpecial grace. And thus certain ſober men ſpeak, not ſo much to ſuppreſs the truth, as to debar crabbed queſtions, and to bridle the curioſity of many. Their will is praiſe-worthy, but their counſel is not to be allowed: becauſe daliying by ſhifts is never excuſable. But their objecting of it which do more railingly inveigh againſt it, is verily too fooliſh a cavil, or too ſhameful an error. How the ſcripture maketh theſe two to agree together, that by outward preaching all men are called to repentance and faith, and yet that the ſpirit of repentance and faith is not given to all men, I have in another place already declared, and by and by ſomewhat of it muſt be repeated again. Now that which they require I deny to them, ſince it is two ways falſe. For he that threateneth that while it raineth upon one city, there ſhall be drought upon another: Amos iv. 7. & viii. 11. He that pronounceth that there ſhall in another place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himſelf with any certain law to call all men equally. And when he who forbidding Paul to ſpeak in Aſia, and turning him from Bythinia, draweth him into Macedonia, (Acts xvi. 6.) ſheweth, that it is in his own power to diſtribute this treaſure to whomſoever it ſhall pleaſe him. Yet more plainly he ſheweth by Iſaiah, chap. viii. 16. how he peculiarly directeth to the elect the promiſes of ſalvation: for he ſaith of them only, and not of all mankind indifferently, that they ſhall he his diſciples Whereby it is certain that the doctrine of ſalvation is wrongfully ſet open in common to all men to profit effectually, which is ſaid to be ſeverally laid up only for the children of the church. Let this ſuffice at this preſent, that although the voice of the goſpel ſpake generally to all, yet the gift of faith is rare. Iſaiah aſſigneth the cauſe, for that the arm of the Lord is not revealed to all men, Iſa. liii. 1. If he had ſaid that the goſpel is maliciouſly and frowardly deſpiſed, becauſe many do ſtubbornly refuſe to hear: peradventure this colour touching univerſal calling ſhould prevail. Neither is it the purpoſe of the prophet to diminiſh the fault of men, when he teacheth that the fountain of blindneſs is, that God vouchſafeth not to open his arm to them: only he giveth warning, that becauſe faith is a ſingular gift, the ears are beaten in vain with outward doctrine. But I would fain know of theſe doctors, whether only preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is ſaid in the firſt chapter of John, whoſoever believe in the only begotten ſon of God, John. i. 12. are themſelves alſo made the children of God, there is not in that place a confuſed heap jumbled up together: but a ſpecial order is given to the faithful, which are born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. But (say they) there is a mutual consent of faith with the word, namely, whereſoever is faith. But it is no new thing that seed fall among thorns or in stony places: not only because the greater part appeareth indeed obstinate against God, but also because all men have not eyes and ears. How then shall it agree that God calleth to him them whom he knoweth will not come? Let Augustine answer for me. Wilt thou dispute with me? Admire with me, and cry out O depth, let us both agree in fear, lest we perish in error. Moreover if election (as Paul witnesseth) be the mother of faith, I turn back the argument upon their own head, that faith is therefore not general, because election is special. For by the orderly dependance of causes and effects, it is easily gathered, that where Paul saith, that we are full of all spiritual blessing, as God had chosen us before the creation of the world: therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath chosen only whom he would, This is the reason why in another place he commendeth the faith of the elect, lest it should be thought that any man doth by his own motion get faith to himself: but that this glory may remain with God, that they are freely enlightned of him, whom he had chosen before. Tit. i. 1. For Bernard saith rightly, [Ad Tho. prebof. Beruel. Epi. 1007.] friends do severally bear, to whom he also saith, fear not thou small flock: for to you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of heaven. Who are these? even they whom he hath foreknown and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Son. A great and secret counsel is made known. The Lord knew who are his: but that which was known to God is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any others partakers of so great a mystery, but those self same men, whom he hath foreknown and predestinate to be his. A little after he concludeth: the mercy of God is from eternity even to eternity upon them that fear him: from eternity, by reason of predestination: to eternity, with respect to blessedness: the one without beginning, the other without ending. But what need I to cite Bernard for witness, when we hear from the master's own mouth (John vi. 46.) that none do see but they which are of God? By which words he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten again of God, do dazle at the brightness of his countenauce. And to election faith indeed is fitly joined, so that it keep the second degree. Which order the words of Christ do clearly express in another place, This is the will of my father, that I lose not that which he hath given. For this is his will, that whosoever believeth in the Son, shall not perish. If he would have all saved, he would appoint over them his Son to be their keeper, and would graff them all into his body with the holy bond of faith. Now it is certain that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly love, laid up for his children whom he hath adopted. Therefore Christ in another place saith, that the sheep follow the shepherd, because they know his voice: but they follow not a stranger, because they know not the voice of strangers, John x. 4. Whence cometh this difference, but because their ears are bored by God? For no man maketh himself a sheep: but he is made one by the heavenly grace. For which cause also the Lord teacheth that our safety shall always be certain and free from danger, because it is kept by the invincible power of God. Wherefore he concludeth that the unbelievers are not of his sheep: namely because they are not of the number of them, whom God hath promised by Isaiah that they shall be his disciples. Now because in the testimonies which I have alleged is expressed perseverance, they do therewithal testify the unmoveable stedfastness of election.

11. Now let us speak of the reprobate, whom the apostle joineth there together. For as Jacob, having yet with good works deserved nothing, is taken into grace, so Esau, being yet defiled with no wicked doing, is hated. Rom. ix. 13. If we turn our eyes to works, we do wrong to the apostle, as though he saw not the same thing which we clearly see. It is proved that he saw it not, forasmuch as he expresly enforceth this point, that when they had not yet done any good or evil, the one was chosen, and the other refused, to prove that the foundation of the predestination of God is not in works. Again when he moved the objection, whether God be unrighteous, he allegeth not that which had been the most certain and plain defence of his righteousness, namely, that God rendered to Esau according to his wickedness: but he was content with another solution, that the reprobate are stirred up to this end, that the glory of God may be set forth by them. Last of all he adjoineth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercy upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not how he imputeth both to the will of God only? Therefore if we cannot declare a reason why he vouchsafeth to grant mercy to them that are his, but because it so pleaseth him: neither also shall we

The ground of reprobation the will of God to reject, and not men's deserving to be rejected.

we have any other cauſe in rejecting of others, than his own will. For when it is ſaid that God hardeneth, or ſheweth mercy to whom he will, men are thereby warned to ſeek no cauſe elſewhere than in his will.

CHAP. XXIII.

A confutation of the ſlanders wherewith this doctrine hath always been wrongfully burdened.

Election granted by ſome who notwithſtanding deny reprobation.

BUT when the wit of man heareth theſe things, the frowardneſs thereof cannot be reſtrained, but that by and by as at the bloody blaſt of a trumpet ſounding to battle, it diverſely and exceſſively turmoileth. And many indeed, as though they would drive away the malice from God, do ſo grant election, that they deny that any man is reprobated: but they do too ignorantly and childiſhly; forasmuch as election itſelf could not ſtand unleſs it were ſet contrary to reprobation: God is ſaid to ſeparate them whom he adopteth unto ſalvation: it ſhould be more that fooliſhly ſaid that others do either by chance or by their own endeavour obtain that which only election giveth to a few. Therefore whom God paſſeth over, he rejecteth: and for no other couſe, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predeſtinate to be his children's. Neither is the backwardneſs of men tolerable, if it ſuffer not itſelf to be bridled with the word of God, where the incomprehenſible counſel of God is treated of which the angels themſelves do worſhip. But we have already heard, that hardening is no leſs in the hand and will of God than mercy. Neither doth Paul, Rom. ix 20. (as the men do that I have ſpoken of) buſily labour to excuſe God with a lying defence: but only he teacheth that it is not lawful for the thing formed to quarrel with him that formed it. Now whoſo do not admit that they are rejected of God, how will they diſintangle themſelves from that ſaying of Chriſt, Every tree which my Father hath not planted, ſhall be plucked up by the root, Matth. xv. 13. They plainly hear that all theſe are adjudged and doomed to deſtruction, whom the heavenly Father hath not vouchſafed to plant as holy trees in his grounnd. If they deny this to be a ſign of reprobation, then is there nothing ſo clear that it may be proved to them. But if they ceaſe not to wrangle, let the ſobriety of faith be contented with this admonition of Paul, that there is no cauſe to quarrel with God, if he be willing on the one ſide to ſhew his wrath and to make his power known, do with long-ſuffering and lenity bear with the veſſels of wrath prepared to deſtruction: and on the other ſide he make known the riches of his glory toward the veſſels of mercy which he hath prepared to glory. Rom. ix. 21. Let the readers mark, how Paul, to cut off occaſion from whiſperings and backbitings, giveth the chief rule to the wrath and power of God: becauſe it is unjuſt that thoſe deep judgments which ſwallow up all our ſenſes, ſhould be made ſubject to our determination. Our adverſaries anſwer is very trifling, that God doth not utterly reject them whom he ſuffereth in lenity, but abideth with a mind hanging in ſuſpence toward them, if peradventure they may repent. As tho' Paul aſcribed to God a patience, to look for their turning, whom he ſaith are fitted for deſtruction. For Auguſtine ſaith rightly where he expoundeth this place, where power is joined to permiſſion, God doth not permit, but govern with his power. (Lib. 5. contra Jul. cap. 5.) They further ſay alſo, that it is not for nothing ſaid, that the veſſels of wrath are prepared to deſtruction: but, that God hath prepared the veſſels of mercy: becauſe by this means he aſcribeth and challengeth the praiſe of ſalvation to God, but the blame of deſtruction he caſteth upon them who by their own will do bring it upon themſelves. But although I grant to them that Paul by the divers manner of ſpeaking did ſoften the harſhneſs of the firſt part of the ſentence, yet it is not meet to aſſign the preparing unto deſtruction to any other thing than to the ſecret counſel of God: which alſo is affirmed a little before in the reſt of the text. That God ſtirred up Pharaoh; then that he hardeneth whom he will. Whereupon followeth that the hidden counſel of God is the cauſe of hardening. This at the leaſt I get which Auguſtine ſaith (Lib. 1. de prædeſt. ſanct. c. 2.) that when God of wolves maketh ſheep, he doth with a mightier grace reform them, that their hardneſs may be tamed: and therefore God for this cauſe doth not convert the obſtinate, becauſe he doth not ſhew forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth not if he would ſhew it forth.

There is no striving against God in this cause.

2. These sayings indeed should be sufficient for the godly and sober, and them who remember themselves to be men. But forasmuch as these venomous dogs do cast up not only one sort of venom against God, we will, as the matter shall serve answer to every one particularly. Foolish men divers ways quarrel with God, as though they had him subject to their accusations. First therefore they ask, by what right the Lord is angry with his creatures of whom he hath not been first provoked by any offence: for to condemn to destruction whom he will, agreeth rather with the wilfulness of a tyrant, than the lawful sentence of a judge. Therefore they say that there is cause why men should blame God, if by his bare will, without their own deserving, they be predestinate to eternal death. If such thoughts do at any time come into the mind of the godly, to break their violent assaults they shall be sufficiently armed with this, although they had no more, if they consider how great wickedness it is, even so much as to enquire of the causes of the will of God; since it is the cause of all things that exist, and worthily so ought to be. For if it have any cause, then somewhat must go before it, whereto it must be as it were connected; which it is unlawful once to imagine. For the will of God is so the highest rule of righteousness, that whatsoever he willeth, even for this that he willeth it, it ought to be taken for righteous. When therefore it is asked, why the Lord did it: it is to be answered, because he willed it. But if thou go further in asking why he willed it, thou askest some greater and higher thing than the will of God; which cannot be found. Let therefore the rashness of man restrain itself, and not seek that which is not, lest peradventure it may not find that which is. With this bridle (I say) he shall be well withholden whosoever he be that will dispute the secrets of God with reverence. (Augustine lib. 1. de Gent. contra Manic. cap. 3.) As for the boldness of the wicked, who dread not openly to speak evil of God: against it the Lord with his own righteousness without any of our defence shall sufficiently vindicate himself, when he shall take all shifting from their consciences, and hold them fast convinced, and condemn them. Neither do we yet thrust in the feigned device of absolute power, which as it is prophane, so worthily ought to be abhorred of us. We feign not God lawless, who is a law to himself (as Plato saith) men stand in need of laws who are troubled with unlawful lusts: but the will of God is not only pure from all fault, but also is the highest rule of perfection, and the law of all laws. But we deny that he is subject to yield account. We deny also that we are meet judges, who would pronounce of this cause after our own sense. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawfully may, let that threatening in the Psalms bring us in fear, that God shall overcome so oft as he is judged of any mortal man. Psal. li. 6.

The truth hath sufficient to stop mouths, who ask why God should foreordain some unto death, when they, not existing, could not deserve the death whereunto they were appointed.

3. So can God in keeping silence, put his enemies to silence. But that we may not suffer them freely to scorn his holy name, he delivereth to us out of his holy word weapons against them. Wherefore if any man attack us with such words; why hath God from the beginning predestinate some to death, who when they were not, could not yet deserve the sentence of death: we instead of answer may again on our side ask of them, what they think that God oweth to man, if he will judge him by his own nature. In such sort as we are all corrupted with sin, we cannot but be hateful to God; and that not by tyrannous cruelty, but by most upright reason of justice. If all they whom the Lord hath predestinate to death are by the state of nature subject to the judgment of death: of what injustice against themselves, I beseech you, may they complain? Let all the sons of Adam come: let them strive and dispute with their Creator, for that by his eternal providence they were before their generation condemned to everlasting misery. What shall they be able once to mutter against this defence, when God on the other side shall call them to the reacknowleging of themselves? If they be all taken out of a corrupt mass, it is no wonder if they be subject to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of injustice, if by his eternal judgment they are appointed to death, to which they themselves do feel whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their own nature. Whereby it appeareth how wrongfully is the desire of their murmuring, because they do of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are compelled to acknowlege in themselves, that the laying of the blame upon God may acquit them. But though I do a hundred times confess, as it is most true that God is the author of it, yet do they not by and by wipe away the guiltiness which being engraven on their consciences from time to time with frequent recourse

preſenteth itſelf to their eyes.

God not unjuſt though men be condemned for that corruption whereunto they were foreordained.

4. Again they except and ſay; were they not before predeſtinate by the ordinance of God to the ſame corruption which is now alledged for the cauſe of damnation? When therefore they periſh in their corruption, they do nothing but ſuffer the puniſhment of that miſery into which by his predeſtination Adam fell and drew his poſterity headlong with him. Is not he therefore unjuſt, who doth ſo cruelly mock his creatures? I grant indeed that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that ſtate of miſery wherein they are now bound: and this is it that I ſaid at the beginning, that at length we muſt always return to the determination of the will of God, the cauſe whereof is hidden in himſelf. But it followeth not by and by that God is ſubject to this ſlander. For we will with Paul anſwer them in this manner, O man, who art thou that contendeſt with God? doth the thing formed ſay to him that formed it, Why haſt thou made me ſo? Hath not the potter power to make of the ſame lump one veſſel to honour, and another to diſhonour? Rom. ix. 20. They will ſay that the righteouſneſs of God is not ſo truly defended, but that we may ſeek a ſhift, ſuch as they are wont to have that want a juſt excuſe. For what elſe ſeemeth here to be ſaid, than that God hath a power which cannot be hindered from doing any thing whatſoever it be as he pleaſeth himſelf? But it is far otherwiſe. For what ſtronger reaſon can be brought than when we are commanded to think what a one God is? For how ſhould he commit any injuſtice, who is judge of the world? If it properly pertain to the nature of God to do judgment, then he naturally loveth righteouſneſs, and abhorreth unrighteouſneſs. Wherefore the apoſtle did not, as though he were overtaken, look about for holes to hide him: but ſhewed that the reaſon of the righteouſneſs of God is higher than that either it is to be meaſured by the meaſure of man, or may be comprehended by the narrow capacity of the wit of man. The apoſtle indeed confeſſeth that there is ſuch depth in the judgments of God, wherewith the minds of men ſhould be ſwallowed, if they endeavoured to penetrate into it. But he teacheth alſo how hainous a wrong it is, to bind the works of God to ſuch a law, that ſo ſoon as we underſtand not the reaſon of them, we may be bold to diſallow them. It is a known ſaying of Solomon (which yet few do rightly underſtand.) The great Creator of all rendereth reward to the fool, and reward to tranſgreſſors, Prov. xxvi. 10. For he crieth out concerning the greatneſs of God, in whoſe will it is to puniſh fools and tranſgreſſors, although he do not vouchſafe to let them have his ſpirit. And monſtrous is the madneſs of men, when they ſo covet to make that which is unmeaſurable, ſubject to the ſmall meaſure of their reaſon. The angels who ſtood ſtill in their uprightneſs, Paul calleth elect. 2 Tim. v. 22. If their ſtedfaſtneſs was grounded upon the good pleaſure of God, the falling away of the other proveth they were forſaken: of which thing there can no other cauſe be alledged than reprobation, which is hidden in the ſecret counſel of God.

A reaſon of the will of God in rejection of the wicked, we neither can find neither ſhould ſearch.

5. Go to; let there now be preſent ſome Manichee, or Celeſtine, a ſlanderer of the providence of God: I ſay with Paul that there ought no reaſon to be rendered thereof: becauſe with the greatneſs of it, it far ſurmounteth our underſtanding. What wonder? or what abſurdity is it? Would he have the power of God ſo limited, that it might be able to work no more, than his mind is able to conceive? I ſay with Auguſtine, that they are created of the Lord, whom he without doubting foreknew that they ſhould go into deſtruction: and that it was ſo done becauſe he ſo willed: but why he willed, it is not our part to aſk a reaſon of it who cannot comprehend it: neither is it meet that the will of God ſhould come down into controverſy among us, of which ſo oft as mention is made, under the name of it is named the higheſt rule of righteouſneſs. Why therefore is any queſtion moved of unrighteouſneſs where righteouſneſs clearly appeareth? Neither let us be aſhamed, after the example of Paul, ſo to ſtop the mouths of the wicked, and from time to time ſo oft as they ſhall be bold to bark againſt it, to repeat this, Who be ye miſerable men, that lay an accuſation to God's charge, and do therefore lay it to his charge, becauſe he doth not temper the greatneſs of his works to your dulneſs? As though they were therefore wrongful, becauſe they are hidden from fleſh. The unmeaſurableneſs of the judgments of God is by clear experiences known unto you. Ye know that they are called the deep bottomleſs depth. Pſal. xxxvi. Now aſk of the narrow capacities of your wit, whether they comprehend that which God hath decreed with himſelf. What good doth it you therefore with mad ſearching to plunge yourſelves into the bottomleſs depth, which reaſon itſelf teacheth you that it ſhall be to your deſtruction? Why are ye not reſtrained with ſuch fear of the which both that hiſtory of Job and the books of the prophet do report of the incomprehenſible wiſdom, and terrible power of God? If thy mind be diſquieted, let it not grieve thee to embrace the counſel of Auguſtine. (Aug. de verb. apo. ſerm. 20.) Thou being a man lookeſt for an anſwer at my hand; and I alſo am a man. Therefore let us both hear him that ſaith; O man, who art thou? Better is a faithful ignorance than raſh knowlege. Seek merits; thou ſhalt find nothing but pain. O depth, Peter denieth: the thief believeth. O depth: ſeekeſt thou a reaſon? I will tremble at the depth. Reaſon thou, I will wonder, diſpute thou, I will believe: I ſee a depth, but I reach not the bottom. Paul reſted, becauſe he found wondering. He calleth the judgments of God unſearchable: and art thou come to ſearch them? He ſaith that his ways are impoſſible to be traced out: and doſt thou trace them? we will not profit by proceeding further: for neither ſhall we ſatisfy their froward wanton curiouſneſs, nor doth the Lord need any other defence, than that which he hath uſed by his ſpirit, who ſpake by the mouth of Paul; and we forget to ſpeak well, when we ceaſe to ſpeak with God.

Neceſſity of ſinning neither excuſeth the ſinner, nor chargeth God juſtly with injuſtice for condemning them that ſo ſin.

6. Their other objection alſo ariſeth out of ungodlineſs, which yet tendeth not ſo directly to the accuſing of God as to the excuſing of the ſinner. Howbeit the ſinner who is condemned of God cannot be juſtified without the diſhonour of the judge. Thus therefore prophane tongues do bark againſt God, ſaying: why ſhould God impute thoſe things for ſins to men, of which he hath by his predeſtination laid neceſſity upon them? For what ſhould they do? Should they wreſtle with his decrees? This would be a vain attempt, ſince they cannot do it at all. Therefore they are not rightly puniſhed for thoſe things, whereof the chief cauſe is God's predeſtination. Here I will abſtain from that defence, whereunto the eccleſiaſtical writers do commonly flee, namely, that the foreknowlege of God withſtandeth not but that man may be accounted the ſinner: becauſe God foreſeeth the evils of man, not his own. For ſo the cavil will not ſtay here, but will rather preſs us further with ſaying, that God, if he had choſen, might have provided a remedy for thoſe evils which he foreſaw; and that ſince he hath not done ſo, he hath of determined purpoſe created men to that end that he ſhould ſo behave himſelf on earth: and if by the providence of God, man was created to this condition, that he ſhould do all thoſe things that he doth: then he is not to be blamed for that which he cannot avoid, and which he enterpriſed by the will of God. Therefore let us ſee how this knot ought to be well looſed. Firſt of all, this ought to be holden certain among all men which Soloman ſaith, that God hath created all things for himſelf, and the wicked man to an evil day. Prov. xvi. 4. Behold, when the diſpoſing of all things is in the hand of God, when in his power remaineth the rule of ſafety and death, he ſo ordereth them by his counſel and beck, that among men there are born ſome adjudged even from their mother's womb to death, who with their deſtruction may glorify his name. If any man anſwer, that there is no neceſſity laid upon them by the providence of God, but rather that he created them in ſuch eſtate, becauſe he foreſaw their perverſeneſs to come: he neither ſaith nothing at all, nor altogether. The old writers are wont indeed ſometimes to uſe this ſolution: but as it were doubtingly. But the ſchoolmen reſt upon it, as though nothing could be objected againſt it. Indeed I willingly grant, that foreknowlege alone bringeth no neceſſity to creatures, although all men are not of that opinion; for there are ſome that will have it alſo to be the cauſe of things. But it ſeemeth to me that Valla, a man not otherwiſe practiſed in holy writings, ſaw both more deeply and more wiſely, who ſhewed that this contention is ſuperfluous; becauſe both life and death are rather the doings of God's will than of his foreknowlege. If God did but foreſee the ſucceſſes of men, and did not alſo diſpoſe and order them by his will, then this queſtion ſhould not without cauſe be moved, whether his foreſeeing any thing availed to the neceſſity of them. But ſince he doth no otherwiſe foreſee the things that ſhall come to paſs, than becauſe he hath decreed that they ſhould ſo come to paſs: it is vain to move a controverſy about foreknowlege, where it is certain that all things do happen rather by ordinance and commandment.

God did not only foreſee, but diſpoſe the fall of man, and in him the ruin of his poſterity.

7. They ſay that this is not written in expreſs words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam ſhould periſh by his falling away. As though the ſame God whom the ſcripture reporteth to do whatſoever whatſoever he will, created the nobleſt of all his creatures to an uncertain end. They ſay he had free-will, that he might ſhape to himſelf his own fortune; and that God decreed nothing but to handle him according to his deſerving. If ſo cold a device be received, where ſhall be that almightineſs of God, whereby he governeth all things according to his ſecret councel, which dependeth on no other thing than itſelf? But predeſtination, whether they will or no, ſheweth itſelf in Adam's poſterity. For it came to paſs naturally that all men ſhould loſe ſalvation by the fault of one parent. What hindereth them to confeſs of one man that which againſt their wills they confeſs of all mankind? For why ſhould they loſe their labour with dallying ſhifts? The ſcripture cryeth out that all men were in the perſon of one man made bound to eternal death. Since this cannot be imputed to nature, it is plain that it proceeded from the wondrous counſel of God. But it is too much abſurdity that theſe good patrons of the righteouſneſs of God do ſo ſtumble at a ſtraw, and leap over great beams. Again I aſk, how came it to paſs, that the fall of Adam did wrap up in eternal death ſo many nations with their children being infants without remedy, but becauſe it ſo pleaſed God? Here their tongues which are otherwiſe ſo pratling, muſt of neceſſity be dumb. It is a terrible decree, I own; yet no man ſhall be able to deny, but that God foreknew what end man ſhould have, ere he created him, and therefore foreknew it becauſe he had ſo ordained by his decree. If any man here inveigh againſt the foreknowlege of God, he raſhly and indiſcreetly ſtumbleth For what matter is there, I beſeech you, why the heavenly Judge ſhould be accuſed for that he was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be any either juſt or colourable complaint, it toucheth predeſtination. Neither ought it to ſeem an abſurdity which I ſay, that God not only foreſaw the fall of the firſt man, and in him the ruin of his poſterity, but alſo diſpoſed it after his own will. For as it belongeth to his wiſdom, to foreknow all things that ſhall be: ſo it belongeth to his power, to rule and govern all things with his hand. And this queſtion Auguſtine very well diſcuſſeth, as he doth others, ſaying, (Enchir. ad Laurent.) We moſt wholſomely confeſs that which we moſt rightly believe, that the God and Lord of all things, who created all things very good, and foreknew that evil things ſhould ſpring out of good, and knew that it pertained more to his almighty goodneſs even of evil things to do well than to ſuffer them to be evil: that he ſo ordered the life of angels and men, that in it he might firſt ſhew what free-will could do, and then what the benefit of his grace and judgment of juſtice could do.

The wicked do ſin and periſh not by God's permiſſion only, but by his will and appointment.

8. Here they run to the diſtinction of will and permiſſion, by which they will have it granted that the wicked do periſh, God only permitting but not willing it. But why ſhould we ſay that he permitted it, but becauſe he ſo willeth? However it is not likely that man by himſelf, only by the permiſſion of God, without any of his ordinance, brought deſtruction to himſelf: as though God appointed not, of what condition he would have the chief of his creatures to be. I therefore will not doubt to confeſs ſimply with Auguſtine, that the will of God is the neceſſity of things, and that what he willeth, it muſt of neceſſity come to paſs: as thoſe things ſhall truly come to paſs which he hath foreſeen. (De Gen. ad lite. li. 6. c. 15.) Now if for excuſe of themſelves and of the ungodly, either the Pelagians or Manichees, or Anabaptiſts, or Epicureans (for with theſe four ſects we have to do in this queſtion) ſhall object againſt the neceſſity wherewith they are bound by the predeſtination of God: they bring nothing fit to the purpoſe. For if predeſtination be nothing elſe but a diſpenſation of the righteouſneſs of God, which is hidden indeed, but yet without fault: foraſmuch as it is certain that they were not unworthy to be predeſtinate to that eſtate, it is alſo as certain that the deſtruction is moſt righteous which they enter into predeſtination. Moreover their deſtruction ſo dependeth upon the predeſtination of God, that both cauſe and matter thereof is found in themſelves. For the firſt man fell, becauſe the Lord ſo judged it to be expedient; why he ſo judged is unknown to us; yet it is certain that he ſo judged for no other reaſon, but becauſe he ſaw that thereby the glory of his name ſhould be worthily ſet forth. When thou heareſt mention of the glory of God, there think of his righteouſneſs: for it muſt be righteous that deſerveth praiſe. Man therefore falleth, the providence of God ſo ordaining it: but he falleth by his own fault. The Lord had a little before pronounced, that all the things which he had made were very good. Whence therefore cometh that perverſeneſs to man, to fall away from his God? Leſt it ſhould be thought to be of creation, the Lord with his commendation allowed that which came from himſelf. Therefore by his own wickedneſs he corrupted the nature which he had received pure of the Lord, and by his fall he drew his whole posterity with him into destruction. Wherefore let us rather behold an evident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankind, which is nearer to us, than search for a hidden and utterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of God. Neither let it grieve us so far to submit our wit to the unmeasurable wisdom of God, that it may yield in many secrets of his. For, of those things which it is neither granted nor lawful to know, the ignorance is well learned: the coveting of knowlege is a point of madness.

The judgment of God in punishing men for that whereof he hath laid a necessity upon them is righteous, but the reason how it is righteous is unknown to us: who should rather bewail iniquity in ourselves, than seek the cause thereof in God.

9. Such men perhaps will say, that I have not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse. But I verily confess that it can never be brought to pass, but that ungodliness will always grudge and murmur against it; yet I think that I have spoken so much as might suffice to take away not only all reason but also all colour of gainsaying. The reprobate would be thought excusable in sinning, because they cannot escape the necessity of sinning: especially since such necessity is cast upon them by the ordination of God. But we deny that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complain that they are destined to destruction, hath his righteousness, unknown indeed to us, but yet most certain. Whereupon we conclude, that they bear no evil which is not laid upon them by the most righteous judgment of God. Then, we teach that they do preposterously, which to seek out the beginning of their damnation, do bend their eyes to the secret closets of the counsel of God, and wink at the corruption of nature, from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they cannot impute it to God, for that he witnesseth of his own creation. For although man is created by the eternal providence of God to that calamity, whereunto he is subject; yet the matter thereof he took of himself, not of God, forasmuch as he is by no other mean so lost, but because he went out of kind from the pure creation of God into a corrupt and impure perverseness.

God not to be charged as a partial accepter of persons.

10 Now the adversaries of God's predestination do slander it also with a third absurdity. For when we impute it to nothing else but to the choice of the will of God, that they are made free from the universal destruction, whom he maketh heirs of his kingdom, thereby they gather that there is with him respect of persons, which the scripture every where denieth; and therefore, that either the scripture disagreeth with itself, or that in the election of God there is a respect of merits. First, the scripture in another sense denieth, that God is a respecter of persons, than as they judge it. For by the name of person it signifieth not a man, but those things which being seen with eyes in man are wont to procure either favour, grace, and dignity, or hatred, contempt and shame; as riches, wealth, power, nobility, office, country, excellency of beauty, and such like; on the other side, poverty, need baseness, vileness, contempt, and the like. So Peter and Paul do teach that the Lord is not an accepter of persons, because he putteth no difference between the Jew and the Greek, to refuse the one and embrace the other only for respect of nation. Acts x. 14. Rom. ii. 10. Gal. iii. 28. So James useth the same words when he mindeth to affirm, that God in his judgment does not regard riches. Jam. ii. 5. But Paul in another place speaketh thus of God, that in judging he hath no consideration of freedom or bondage. Col. iii. 25. Eph. vi. 9. Wherefore there is no contradiction in saying, that God according to the will of his good pleasure, without any deserving chuseth for his sons whom he will, rejecting and refusing others. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may be more fully satisfied. They ask how it cometh to pass, that of two between whom no deserving putteth any difference, God in his electing passeth over the one and taketh the other. I on the other side do ask them, whether they think that in him that is taken there is any thing that may make the mind of God to incline toward him. If they confess (as they needs must) that there is nothing, it shall follow that God looketh not upon man, but from his own goodness fetcheth a cause why to do good to him. Whereas therefore God chuseth one man and refuseth another, this cometh not of respect of man, but of his mercy alone, which ought to have liberty to shew forth and utter itself when and where it pleaseth him. For we have in another place also shewed, that there were not from the beginning many noble, or wise, or honourable called, that God might humble the pride of flesh: 1 Cor. i. 26. so far is it off, that his favour was bound to persons.

11. Where-

God finding all guilty, is not partial in condemning any, but in saving some merciful.

11. Wherefore many do falſely accuſe God of partial righteouſneſs, for that he doth not in his predeſtination keep the ſame courſe toward all men. If (ſay they) he find all guilty, let him equally puniſh all: if he find them not guilty, let him withold the rigor of his judgment from all. But ſo they deal with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or when he would have mercy he be compelled altogether to give over his judgment. What is it that they require? If all be guilty, that all may together ſuffer all one pain. We grant the guiltineſs to be common, but we ſay that the mercy of God helpeth ſome. Let it help all, ſay they. But we anſwer, that it is rightful that he ſhould alſo in puniſhing ſhew himſelf a rightful Judge. When they ſuffer not this; what do they elſe, but either go about to diveſt God of his power to have mercy, or at leaſt to grant him upon this condition, that he utterly give over his judgment. Wherefore theſe ſayings of Auguſtine do very well agree together. (Epi. 106. de prædeſt. & grat. De bon. perſev. cap, 12.) Since in the firſt man the whole maſs of mankind fell into condemnation, theſe veſſels that are made of it to honour, are not the veſſels of their own righteouſneſs, but of the mercy of God: and whereas others are made to diſhonour, the ſame is not to be imputed to unrighteouſneſs, but to judgment, &c. That to thoſe whom he refuſeth, God rendereth due puniſhment: to thoſe whom he calleth he giveth undeſerved grace; that they are delivered from all accuſation, after the manner of a creditor, in whoſe power it is to forgive to the one, and demand of the other. Therefore the Lord alſo may give grace to whom he will, becauſe he is merciful: and give it not to all, becauſe he is a juſt Judge. He may by giving to ſome that which they do not deſerve, ſhew his free grace, and by not giving to all, declare what all deſerve. For whereas Paul writeth, Rom. xi. 31. that God encloſed all under ſin, that he might have mercy upon all, it is therewithal to be added that he is debtor to no man: becauſe no man firſt gave to him, that he may require like of him.

Predeſtination taketh not away the care of well-doing.

12. This alſo they often ſay, to overthrow predeſtination, that while it ſtandeth, all carefulneſs and endeavour of well-doing falleth away. For who (ſay they) ſhall hear that either life or death is certainly appointed for him by the eternal decree of God, but that it will by and by come into his mind that it maketh no matter how he behave himſelf, ſince the predeſtination of God can by his work be neither hindered nor furthered? So ſhall all men diſſolutely throw forth themſelves, and after a deſperate manner run headlong whither their luſt ſhall carry them. And verily they ſay not altogether falſely, for there be many ſwine, which with filthy blaſphmies defile the doctrine of predeſtination: and by this pretence alſo do mock out all admoniſhments and rebuking, ſaying, God knoweth what he hath once determined to do with us: if he hath decreed our ſalvation, he will bring us to it at the time appointed: if he hath predeſtinate our death, we ſhould labour in vain to the contrary. But the ſcripture when it teacheth with how much greater reverence and religiouſneſs we ought to think of ſo great a myſtery, doth both inſtruct the godly to far other ſenſe, and well confute theſe mens outrage. For it doth not ſpeak of predeſtination to this end, that we ſhould be encouraged to boldneſs, and with unlawful raſhneſs attempt to ſearch the untainted ſecrets of God: but rather that being humbled and abaſed we ſhould learn to tremble at his judgment, and reverently to look up to his mercy. To this mark the faithful will level themſelves. As for that filthy grunting of ſwine, it is well confuted of Paul. They ſay that they go careleſly forward in vices; becauſe if they be of the number of the elect, their vices ſhall nothing hinder them, but that they ſhall at length be brought to life. But Paul telleth that we are to this end, that we ſhould lead a holy and faultleſs life. Eph. i. 4. If the mark that election is directed unto be holineſs of life, it ought more to awake and ſtir us up chearfully to practiſe that holineſs, than to ſerve for a cloak of ſlothfulneſs. For how greatly do theſe things differ the one from the other? to ceaſe from well-doing, becauſe election is ſufficient for ſalvation; and that the appointed end of election is that we ſhould diligently apply ourſelves to good works. Away therefore with ſuch ſacrileges which do wrongfully invert the whole order of election. Where they ſtretch their blaſphemies further, when they ſay, that he who is reprobated of God, ſhall loſe his labour if he go about to make himſelf acceptable to him with innocency and honeſty of life; therein they are taken with a moſt ſhameleſs ly. For whence could ſuch endeavour come but of election? For whoſoever be of the number of the reprobate, as they are veſſels made to diſhonour, ſo they ceaſe not with continual wicked works to provoke the wrath of God againſt themſelves, and by evident tokens to confirm firm the judgment of God which is already pronounced upon them: ſo far are they from ſtriving with him in vain.

It doth not overthrow exhortations unto virtue and godlineſs.

13. But others do maliciouſly and ſhamefully ſlander this doctrine, as though it did overthrow all exhortations to godly living. For which matter in old time Auguſtine was load with a great calumny; which he wiped away with his book of corruption and grace written to Valentine, the reading whereof will appeaſe all godly and tractable men: yet I will touch a few things, which, as I truſt, ſhall ſatisfy them that are honeſt and not contentious. We have already ſeen how open and loud a preacher of the free election Paul was: was he therefore cold in admoniſhing and exhorting? Let theſe good zealous men compare their earneſtneſs with his, and it ſhall be found in them as ice in compariſon of his incredible heat. And truly this principle taketh away all doubts, that we are not called to uncleanneſs, but that every man ſhould poſſeſs his own veſſel in honour, &c. 1 Theſſ. iv. 7. Again, that we are the workmanſhip of God created to good works, which he hath foreordained that we ſhould walk in them. Eph. ii. 10. Briefly, they that are even but meanly exerciſed in Paul, ſhall without long declaration eaſily perceive how fitly he maketh theſe things to agree, which they feign to diſagree. Chriſt commandeth that men believe in him; yet is his definitive ſentence neither falſe nor contrary to his commandment, where he ſaith: No man can come to me, but he to whom it is given of my Father. John vi. 61. Let preaching therefore have its courſe, which may bring men to faith, and with continual profiting hold them in perſeverance. Neither yet let the doctrine of predeſtination be hindred, that they who obey may not be proud as of their own, but may glory in the Lord. Chriſt not for nothing ſaith: Whoſo hath ears to hear, let him hear. Matth. xiii. 9. Therefore when we exhort and preach, they that have ears do willingly obey: but whoſo lacketh ears, in them is fulfilled that which is written, That hearing they hear not. Iſa. vi. 9. But why (ſaith Auguſtine) ſhould ſome have, and other ſome not have? Who hath known the mind of the Lord? Muſt that therefore be denied which is open, becauſe that cannot be comprehended which is hidden. (Lib. de bono perſeve. c. 14.) Theſe ſayings I have faithfully reported out of Auguſtine: but becauſe peradventure his words ſhall have more authority than mine, go to, let us bring forth the very words that are read in himſelf. If when this is heard, many are turned into dulneſs and ſluggiſhneſs, and being inclined from labour to luſt do go down after their deſires: ought that therefore to be accounted falſe which is ſpoken of the foreknowlege of God? If God hath foreknown that they ſhall be good, ſhall they not be good in how great wickedneſs ſoever they now live? and if he hath foreknown that they will be evil, ſhall they not be evil in how great goodneſs ſoever they be now ſeen? Shall therefore theſe things which are truly ſpoken of the foreknowlege of God, be for ſuch cauſes either denied or left unſpoken of? namely then, when if they be not ſpoken of, men go into errors? The rule (ſaith he) to keep truth unſpoken of, is one thing, and the neceſſity to ſpeak truth is another. As for the cauſes of leaving truth unſpoken, it were long to ſearch them out all: of which yet this is one, that they be not made worſe that underſtand it not, while we mean to make them more learned that underſtand it, who when we ſpeak any ſuch thing are indeed not made more learned, nor yet are made worſe. But when a truth is of ſuch a nature, that when we ſpeak it, he is made worſe that cannot conceive it: what ought then to be done? Is not the truth rather to be ſpoken that he may conceive it; than to keep it unſpoken, that not only neither of them may conceive it, but alſo he that more underſtandeth may be the worſe? whereas if he did hear and conceive it, by him alſo many ſhould learn. And we will not ſay that which, as the ſcripture witneſſeth, we lawfully might have ſpoken. For we fear forſooth leſt when we ſpeak, he be offended that cannot conceive it: but we fear not leſt while we hold our peace, he that can conceive truth be deceived with falſhood. (Cap. 20.) Which ſentence he at the laſt ſhortly winding up, more plainly alſo confirmed. Wherefore if the apoſtle, and they who followed them, the doctors of the church did both, namely both godlily preach of the eternal election of God, and hold the faithful in awe under the diſcipline of godly life: why do theſe our adverſaries being confuted with the invincible violence of truth, think that they ſay well in ſaying, that that which is ſpoken of predeſtination is not to be preached to the people although it be true? Yea it muſt in any wiſe be preached, that he who hath ears to hear may hear. But who hath ears if he hath not received them from him that promiſeth that he will give them? Truly let him that receiveth not, refuſe it; ſo that yet he who receiveth it, do take and drink, do drink and live. For as godlineſs is to be preached, that God may be rightly worſhipped:

ed: ſo it is alſo predeſtination, that he who hath ears to hear of the grace of God, may glory in God and not in himſelf.

Indiſcreet delivevering of the doctrine which concerneth predeſtination.

14. And yet that holy man, as he had a ſingular deſire to edify, ſo tempereth the manner of teaching the truth, that offence be wiſely avoided ſo far as it lawfully may be. For he ſheweth that thoſe things which are truly ſaid, may alſo be conveniently ſaid. If any man do thus preach to the people. If ye believe not, the cauſe is for that ye are already predeſtinate of God to deſtruction: for ſuch a man doth not only cheriſh ſlothfulneſs but alſo maintain wickedneſs. If any man alſo ſtretch this ſaying to the time to come, and ſay that they that hear ſhall not believe, becauſe they are reprobated; this would rather be a curſing than a teaching. Such therefore Auguſtine not unworthily biddeth to depart from the church, as fooliſh teachers, and unlucky and ill prophecying prophets. In another place he truly affirmeth that it is to be holden that a man then profiteth with rebuking. But why ſome thus and ſome otherwiſe? God forbid that we ſhould ſay the power of judging belongeth rather to the clay than to the potter. Again afterward. When men by rebuking either come or return into the way of righteouſneſs, who worketh ſalvation in their hearts, but he, who when any whoſoever he be planted and watereth, giveth the increaſe, whom when he will ſave, no freewill of man reſiſteth? It is therefore not to be doubted that the wills of men cannot reſiſt the will of God (who both in heaven and earth hath done whatſoever he would, and who hath alſo done thoſe things that are to come) but that he may do what he will, foraſmuch as even of the very wills of men he doth what he will. Again, when he will lead men to him, doth he bind them with corporal bonds? He inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth hearts, inwardly moveth hearts, and draweth them with their wills which he himſelf hath made in them. But, that which he by and by addeth ought in no wiſe to be omitted: that becauſe we know not who belongeth or does not belong to the number of the predeſtinate, we ought ſo to be affectioned that we would have all men to be ſaved. So ſhall it come to paſs, that whomſoever we find, we ſhall labour to make him partaker of peace. But our peace ſhall reſt upon the children of peace. Therefore for our part, we muſt apply wholſome and ſharp rebuking to all men like a medicine, that they periſh not, nor deſtroy other, but it ſhall be the work of God to make it profitable to them whom he hath foreknown and predeſtinate.

CHAP. XXIV.

That election is eſtabliſhed by the calling of God, but the reprobate do bring upon themſelves the juſt deſtruction whereunto they are appointed.

God's effectual and inward calling of ſome whoſe election is thereby ſealed.

BUT, that the matter may more plainly appear, we muſt treat both of the calling of the elect, and of the binding and hardening of the wicked. Of the firſt of theſe I have already ſpoken ſomewhat, when I confuted their error, who think that the generalneſs of the promiſes extendeth equally to all mankind. But this election which otherwiſe God hath hidden with himſelf he doth not without choice at length diſcloſe by his calling, which a man may therefore call the manifeſtation of it. For, whom he hath foreknown, them he hath alſo predeſtinated to be conformed to the image of his Son: whom he hath predeſtinated them, he alſo called: whom he hath called, them he alſo juſtified, that in time to come he may glorify them. Rom. viii. 29. When the Lord hath by electing already adopted his into the number of his children: yet we ſee how they enter not into poſſeſſion of ſo great a benefit, but when they are called: on the other ſide, how being called they do now enjoy a certain communication of his election. For which reaſon Paul calleth the ſpirit which they receive both the ſpirit of adoption, and the ſeal and earneſt of the inheritance to come: Rom. viii. 25. Eph. i. 13. namely becauſe it doth with the teſtimony thereof ſtabliſh and ſeal to their hearts the aſſuredneſs of the adoption to come. For though the preaching of the goſpel ſpring out of the fountain of election: yet becauſe it is alſo common to the rebrobate, there it could not by itſelf be a ſure proof thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that he may bring them to faith: as we have before alleged out of the words of Chriſt; Not that any man hath ſeen the Father, ſave he who is of God, he hath ſeen the Father, John vi. 46. Again, I have ſhewed thy name to the men whom thou haſt given me: John xvii. 6. Whereas he ſaith in another place, no man can come to me, unleſs my Father draw him. Which place Auguſtine wiſely weigheth, whoſe words are theſe. If (as truth ſaith) every one that hath learned, cometh; whoſoever cometh not, certainly neither hath he learned. It doth not therefore follow that he who can come, alſo cometh, unleſs he hath both willed and done it. But every one that hath learned of the Father, not only can come, but alſo cometh, when now there is preſent both the profit of coming and the affection of willing, and the effect of doing. Alſo in another place more plainly. What is this elſe, Every one who hath heard of the Father, and hath learned, cometh to me, but there is none that heareth and learneth of the Father and cometh not to me? For if every one who hath heard of the Father and learned, cometh: truly every one that cometh not hath not heard of the Father, nor learned: for if he had heard and learned, he would come. This ſchool is far from the ſenſes of the fleſh, in which ſchool the Father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the Son. And a little after. This grace which is ſecretly given to the hearts of men, is received of no hard heart: for it is therefore given, that the hardneſs of the heart may firſt be taken away. When therefore the Father is heard within, he taketh away the ſtony heart, and giveth a heart of fleſh. For ſo he maketh the children of promiſe and veſſels of mercy, which he hath prepared to glory. Why therefore doth he not teach all that they may come to Chriſt, but becauſe all whom he teacheth, by mercy he teacheth: whom he doth not teach, by judgment he doth not teach? Becauſe he hath mercy upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. Therefore God aſſigneth them for children to himſelf, and appointeth himſelf father to them, whom he hath choſen. Now by calling he bringeth them into the houſhold, and uniteth himſelf to them, that they may be one together. But, when calling is joined to election, in that manner the ſcripture ſufficiently ſignifieth that in it nothing is to be required but the mercy of God. For if we aſk whom he calleth, and for what reaſon: he anſwereth, whom he hath elected. But when we come once to election, there the mercy of God alone appeareth on every ſide. And here that ſaying of Paul truly hath place, It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that ſheweth mercy. Rom. ix. 16. Neither yet that ſame, ſo as they commonly take it, who divide it between the grace of God, and the willing and running of man. For they expound it, that the deſire and endeavour of man have indeed no power of themſelves, unleſs they be proſpered by the grace of God: but when they are aſſiſted by his bleſſing, then they affirm that they have alſo their parts in obtaining ſalvation. Whoſe cavils I had rather confute with Auguſtines words than mine own: (Enchir. ad Laur. cap. 31.) If the apoſtle meant nothing elſe but that it is not of him only that willeth or runneth, unleſs the Lord be there preſent merciful: we may contrariwiſe turn it againſt them and ſay that it is not of mercy only, unleſs there be preſent willing and running. But if this be openly wicked, let us not doubt that the apoſtle giveth all to the mercy of the Lord, and leaveth nothing to our wills or endeavours. To this effect ſpeaketh that holy man. And I ſet not a ſtraw by that nice ſubtilty, that they ſay that Paul would not have ſo ſaid unleſs there had been ſome endeavour and will in us. For he did not conſider what was in man; but when he ſaw that ſome did aſſign part of ſalvation to the endeavour of men, he ſimply condemned their error in the firſt part of the ſentence, and in the ſecond he challenged the whole ſum of ſalvation to the mercy of God. And what other things do the prophets labour about but continually to preach the free calling of God?

It is of God's moſt free and undeſerved favour, that we are effectually called to ſalvation.

2. Moreover the very nature alſo and diſpenſation of calling doth clearly ſhew it, which conſiſteth not only in the preaching of the word, but alſo in the enlightening of the ſpirit. To whom God offereth his word, is ſhewed us in the prophet: Iſa. lxv. 1. I am found of them that ſought me not: I have openly appeared to them that did not aſk for me. To a people who hath not called upon my name, I have ſaid, Lo I am preſent. And leſt the Jews ſhould think that this kindneſs belonged only to the Gentiles, he doth alſo put them in remembrance from whence he took their father Abraham, when he vouchſafed to join him to himſelf, namely from mere idolatry, in which he was drowned with all his. When he firſt ſhineth with the light of his word to men not deſerving it, he therein ſheweth an example plain enough of his free goodneſs. Here therefore the unmeaſurable goodneſs of God ſheweth forth itſelf, but not unto ſalvation to all: becauſe for the reprobate there abideth a more grievous judgment, for that they refuſe the teſtimony of the will of God. And God alſo, to ſet forth his glory, withdraweth from them the effectual tual efficacy of his Spirit. Therefore this inward calling is a pledge of salvation, which cannot deceive us. To which purpose is that saying of John, (1 John v. 24.) Thereby we know that we are his children, by the spirit which he hath given us. And lest flesh should glory, that it did at the least answer to him when he called and of his own will offered himself, he affirmeth that it hath no ears to hear, no eyes to see but what he hath made: and that he maketh them, not according to every man's thankfulness. but according to his own election. Of which thing you have a notable example in Luke, where both Jews and Gentiles in common together, heard the preaching of Paul and Barnabas. Whereas they were at that time all taught by that selfsame word, it is said that they believed who were ordained to everlasting life. Acts xiii. 4. With what face may we deny that the calling is free, in which even to the very last part election reigneth alone?

We are not workers with God of our own election neither doth it hang in suspense upon our faith.

3. But here we must beware of two errors, because many make man a worker together with God, that he by his consent may make the election to be of force: so by their opinion, the will of man is above the counsel of God. As though the scripture did teach, that it is only given us that we may believe, and not rather faith itself. Other some, although they do not so weaken the grace of the Holy Ghost: yet being led by I wot not what reason, hang election upon faith as though it were doubtful, yea and ineffectual until it be confirmed by faith. It is indeed certain that it is confirmed, as toward us; and we have already shewed that the secret counsel of God beginneth to shine out, which was before hidden: so that by this word you understand nothing else, than that it is manifested which was unknown, and is as it were sealed with a seal. But it is falsely said, that election is then and not till then effectual, when we have embraced the gospel, and that thereof it taketh lively strength. We must indeed from thence fetch the certainty of it: because if we attempt to reach, unto the eternal ordinance of God, that deep bottomless depth will swallow us up. But when God hath opened it unto us, we must climb up higher, least the effect should drown the cause. For what greater absurdity or shameful injustice is there, than that the scripture teacheth that we are enlightened as God hath chosen us, our eyes should be so dazled with this light, that they should refuse to look upon election? Yet in the mean time I deny not, that to the end we may be certain of our salvation, we must begin at the word, and that our affiance ought therewith to be contented, that we may call upon God by the name of Father. For some quite contrary to right order, that they may be certified of the counsel of God (which is near unto us, in our mouth and in our heart) do covet to fly above the clouds. Deut. xxx, 14. Therefore that rashness is to be restrained with sobriety of faith, that it may suffice us that God in his outward word is a witness of his hidden grace: so that the conduit pipe out of which there floweth water largely for us to drink, do not hinder but that the spring head may have his due honour.

The certainty of our election to be searched not in the bosom of God but in ourselves, according to that light which he hath given us in his word.

4. Therefore they do wrongfully, which hang the strength of election upon the faith of the gospel, by which faith we feel that election pertaineth to us: so we shall keep the best order, if in seeking the certainty of our election, we stick fast in these latter signs, which are sure witnessings of it: satan doth with no temptation either more grievously, or more dangerously astonish the faithful, than when disquieting them with doubts of their election, he doth also move them with a perverse desire to seek it out of the way. I call it seeking out of the way, when a wretched man enterpriseth to break into the hidden secrets of the wisdom of God, and to penetrate even to the highest eternity to understand what is determined of himself at the judgment seat of God. For then he throweth himself headlong to be swallowed up into the depth of the unmeasurable devouring pit: then he wrappeth himself with innumerable snares and such as he cannot wind out of: then he overwhelmeth himself with the bottomless depth of blind darkness. For so it is rightful that the foolishness of the wit of man be punished with so horrible ruin, when he attempteth of his own power to rise up to the height of the wisdom of God. And so much more deadly is this temptation, as there is none to which we are commonly all more bent. For there is most rarely any man to be found, whose mind is not sometime stricken with this thought. Whence hast thou salvation, but of the election of God? And of election what revelelation hast thou? which thought, if it has once taken place in any man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible torments, or utterly dismayeth him. Truly I would have no surer argument than this experience to prove, how false ſuch mens notions of predeſtination are. For the mind can be infected with no error more peſtilent, than that which plucketh down, and thruſteth the conſcience from her peace and quietneſs toward God. Therefore if we fear ſhipwreck, we muſt diligently beware of this rock, which is never ſtruck upon without deſtruction. And though the diſputing of predeſtination be eſteemed like a dangerous ſea, yet in paſſing through it there is found a ſafe and quiet, yea and pleaſant ſailing, unleſs a man do wilfully deſire to be in danger. For as they do drown themſelves in the deadly bottomleſs depth, who to be certified of their election do enquire of the ſecret counſel of God without his word; ſo they who do rightly and orderly ſearch it in ſuch ſort as it is contained in the word, receive thereof a ſingular fruit of comfort. Let this therefore be our way to ſearch it, that we begin at the calling of God, and end in the ſame. However this withſtandeth not, but that believers may think that the benefits which they daily receive at the hand of God, do deſcend from that ſecret adoption; as they ſay in Iſaiah xxv. Thou haſt done wonders, thy thoughts are old, true, and faithful: foraſmuch as by that adoption as by a token, the Lord's will is to confirm ſo much as is lawful to be known of his counſel. But leſt any man ſhould think this a weak teſtimony, let us conſider how much both of clearneſs and certainty it bringeth us. Of which thing Bernard ſpeaketh fitly. For after that he had ſpoken of the reprobate he ſaith; The purpoſe of God ſtandeth, the ſentence of peace ſtandeth upon them that fear him, both covering their evils, and rewarding their good things; ſo that not only good but evil things work together in a marvellous manner for their good. Who ſhall accuſe the elect of God? It ſufficeth me to all righteouſneſs, to have him alone merciful, againſt whom alone I have ſinned. All that he hath decreed not to impute to me, is ſo as if it never had been. And a little after: O place of true reſt, and to which not unworthily I may give the name of a bed-chamber, in which God is ſeen not as troubled with wrath, not as withholden with care: but his will is proved in him, and well pleaſing, and perfect. This ſight doth not make afraid, but calmeth: doth not ſtir up unquiet curiouſneſs, but appeaſeth it; doth not weary the ſenſes, but quieteth them: here is quiet truly taken, God being appeaſed, appeaſeth all things: and to behold him quiet is to be quiet.

Being choſen in Chriſt in whom we muſt behold our election aſcertained.

5. Firſt, if we ſeek a fatherly kindneſs, and favourable mind of God, we muſt turn our eyes to Chriſt, in whom alone the ſoul of the Father reſteth. If we ſeek ſalvation, life, and the immortality of the heavenly kingdom, we muſt then alſo flee to no other: foraſmuch as he alone is both the fountain of life, and author of ſalvation, and heir of the kingdom of heaven. Now whereto ſerveth election, but that being adopted of the heavenly Father into the degree of children, we may by his favour obtain ſalvation and immortality? Mat. iii. 17. Howſoever in ſeeking thou toſs it and ſhake it, yet thou ſhalt find that the uttermoſt mark of it extendeth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to be his children, it is not ſaid that he hath choſen them in themſelves, but in his Chriſt: becauſe he could not love them but inhim, nor give them the honour of the inheritance of his kingdom, unleſs they had firſt been made partakers of him. Eph. i. 4. If we be choſen in him, we ſhall not find in ourſelves the certainty of our election; no, nor yet in God the Father, conſidered abſtract from the Son. Chriſt therefore is the mirror, in whom we both muſt, and without deceit may behold our election. For ſince it is he into whoſe body the Father hath appointed to graft all them whom from eternity he hath willed to be his, that he may take for his children ſo many as he accounteth among his members: we have a witneſs plain and ſure enough, that we are written in the book of life, if we communicate with Chriſt. And that ſure communion of himſelf he gave us, when by preaching of the goſpel he teſtified that he was given to us of the Father, that he with all his good things ſhould be ours. Rom. viii. 31. We are ſaid to put on him, and to grow together into him, that we may live, becauſe he liveth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father ſpared not his only begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him, may not periſh. John iii. 15. But he that believeth in him, is ſaid to have paſſed from death unto life. John v. 24. In which ſenſe he calleth himſelf the bread of life, whom whoſo eateth, he ſhall not die for ever. John vi. 35. He, I ſay, hath been a witneſs to us, that they ſhall be received of the heavenly Father in place of his children, of whom he hath been received by faith. If we covet any more than to be accounted among the children and heirs of God, then we may climb above Chriſt. If this be our uttermoſt mark: how mad are we in ſeeking without him that which we have already obtained in him, and which may be found in him alone? Moreover, ſince he is the eternal wiſdom, the unchangeable truth, and faſt ſettled counſel of the Father: it is not to be feared leſt that which he declareth to us in his word, ſhould vary any thing, be it never ſo little, from that will of the Father which we ſeek; but rather he faithfully openeth it unto us, ſuch as it was from the beginning, and ever ſhall be. The practice of this doctrine ought alſo to be in uſe in prayers. For though the faith of election doth encourage us to call upon God: yet when we make our prayers, it were unorderly done to thruſt it into the preſence of God, or to covenant with this condition. Lord if I be elected, hear me: foraſmuch as he willeth us to be content with his promiſes, and no where elſe to ſeek whether he will be exorable to us or no. This wiſdom ſhall deliver us from many ſnares, if we have ſkill to apply that, to a right uſe which hath been rightly written: but let us not indiſcreetly draw hither and thither that which ought to have been reſtrained.

Our election being found eſtabliſhed in Chriſt, our hearts muſt needs be thereby confirmed with ſtedfaſt truſt and aſſiance of perſiſting in the ſtate of grace and ſalvation to the end.

6. There is alſo for ſtabliſhing of our affiance another ſtay of election, which we have ſaid to be joined with our calling. For, whom Chriſt taketh being enlightened with the knowlege of his name into the boſom of his church, them he is ſaid to receive into his faith and protection. And whoſoever he receiveth, they are ſaid to be committed to him of the Father, and delivered to his truſt, that they may be kept unto eternal life. What mean we? Chriſt crieth out with a loud voice, that ſo many as the Father willeth to be ſaved, he hath delivered them into his protection. Therefore if we would know whether God hath care of us, let us ſee if he hath committed us to Chriſt, who is made the only Saviour of all his. Now if we doubt whether we be received of Chriſt into his faith and keeping, he preventeth our doubting, when he voluntarily offereth himſelf to be our ſhepherd, and pronounceth that we ſhall be in the number of his ſheep if we hear his voice. Let us therefore embrace Chriſt, being liberally ſet open for us, and coming to meet us, he ſhall number us in his flock, and ſhall keep us encloſed within his fold. John x. 3. But there entereth into us a careleſſneſs of our ſtate to come. For as Paul teacheth that they are called, who were before choſen: Rom. viii. 30 ſo Chriſt ſheweth that many are called, but few are choſen: Matth. xxii. 14. Yea and alſo Paul himſelf in another place dehorteth us from careleſneſs; Let him that ſtandeth (ſaith he) take heed leſt he fall. 1. Cor. x. 12. Again, art thou graffed into the people of God? Be not proud, but fear: for God is able to cut thee off again that he may graff others. Finally, we are ſufficiently taught by experience it ſelf, that calling and faith are of ſmall value, unleſs there be adjoined continuance which happeneth not to all men. But Chriſt hath delivered us from this care: for verily theſe promiſes have reſpect to the time to come. All that the father giveth me, ſhall come to me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wiſe caſt out. Again, this is the will of him that ſent me, the father, that I looſe nothing of all things that he hath given me, but may raiſe them up again in the laſt day. John vi. 37. and 40. Again, my ſheep hear my voice, and they follow me: I know them, and I give them, eternal life, and they ſhall not periſh for ever, neither ſhall any man take them out of my hand. John. x. 17. The father which gave them to me, is greater than all: and no man can take them out of the hand of my father. Now when he pronounceth, every tree which my father hath not planted, ſhall be plucked up by the root: Matth. xv. 13. he ſignifieth on the contrary ſide, that they can never be plucked from ſalvation, which have root in God. Wherewith agreeth that ſaying of John (1 John ii. 19.) If they had been of us, they had not at all gone out from us. Hereupon alſo cometh that noble glorying of Paul againſt life and death, preſent things and things to come: which glorying muſt needs be grounded upon the gift of continuance. Neither is it any doubt that he directeth this ſaying to all the faithful. In another place the ſame Paul ſaith, He that hath begun in you a good work, ſhall perfect it even until the day of Chriſt. Phil. i. 6. As alſo David, when his faith fainted, leaned upon this ſtay. Thou ſhalt not forſake the work of thy hands. Pſal. cxxxviii. 8. And now neither is this doubtful, that Chriſt when he prayeth for all the faithful, aſketh the ſame thing for them which he aſked for Peter, that their faith may never fail. Luke xxii. 32. Whereby we gather, that they are out of danger of falling away, becauſe the Son of God, aſking ſtedfaſt continuance for their godlineſs, admitted of no denial. What would Chriſt have us to learn hereby, but that we ſhould truſt that we ſhall perpetually be ſafe becauſe we are once made his?

They which fall from Chriſt were in truth never Chriſtians, in whom a modeſt

7. But it daily happpeneth, that they which ſeemed to be Chriſt's, do again revolt from him and fall. Yea and in the very ſame place where he affirmeth humble, and religious fear of falling doth not take away assuredness of continuing his,

that none had perished of them who were given him of the Father, yet he excepteth the son of perdition. That is true indeed: but this is also as certain, that such did never cleave to Christ with that affiance of heart with which I say the assuredness of our election is established. They went out from us (saith John) but they were not of us. For if they had been of us, they had still tarried with us. 1 John ii. 19. Neither do I deny that they have signs of calling similar to those of the elect; but I do not grant that they have that sure establishment of election which I bid the faithful to fetch out of the word of the gospel. Wherefore let not such examples move us, but that we quietly rest upon the promise of the Lord, where he pronounceth, that all they are given to him of the Father, who receive him with true faith, of whom, since he is their keeper and pastor, none shall perish. Of Judas we shall speak hereafter. Paul doth not counsel Christians from assuredness altogether, but from careless and loose assuredness of the flesh, which draweth with it pride, presumption, and disdain of others, and extinguisheth humility and the reverence of God, and bringeth forgetfulness of grace received. For he speaketh to the Gentiles whom he teacheth, that they ought not proudly and ungently to reproach the Jews for this, that the Jews being disinherited, they were set in their stead. Fear also he requireth not wherewith they should be dismaid and stagger, but with framing us to the receiving of the grace of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof, as we have said in another place. Beside that he doth not there speak to every man particularly, but to the sects themselves generally. For when the church was divided into two parts, and envy bred dissention, Paul putteth the Gentiles in mind that they supplying the place of the peculiar and holy people ought to be to them a cause of fear and modesty. And among them there were many puffed up with glory, whose vain boasting it was expedient to beat down. But we have in another place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come even beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to doubt what shall become of us.

Calling general and special.

8. That saying of Christ, of many being called but few chosen, is very ill taken after that manner. There shall be nothing doubtful if we hold fast that which ought to be cleared by the things above spoken, that there are two sorts of calling, distinguished as follows: First there is an universal calling whereby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, even them also to whom he setteth it forth unto the savour of death, and unto matter of more grievous condemnation. The other is a special calling, which for the most part he vouchsafeth to give only to the faithful, when by the inward enlightening of his Spirit he maketh the word preached to be settled in their hearts. Yet sometimes he maketh them also partakers of it whom he enlighteneth but for a time, and afterward by the deserving of their unthankfulness forsaketh them, and striketh them with greater blindness. Now when the Lord saw the gospel to be published far and wide, and to be despised of many, but to be had in due esteem of few: he describeth to us God under the person of a king, who preparing a solemn feast sendeth his messengers round about to bid a great multitude to be his guests, and yet can get but a few, because every one allegeth hinderances for his excuse, so that at length he is compelled upon their refusal, to call out of the high ways every one that he meeteth. Matth. xxii. Hitherto every man seeth that the parable must be understood of the outward calling. He addeth afterward that God doth like a good maker of a feast, who goeth about the tables, to chear his guests. If he find any not clothed with a wedding garment, he will not suffer him with his uncleanness to dishonour the solemnity of the feast. This part of the parable, I grant, is to be understood of them who enter into the church by the profession of faith, but are not clothed with the sanctification of Christ. Such dishonours and as it were botches of his church, the Lord will not suffer for ever: but, as their filthiness deserveth he will cast them out. Therefore few are chosen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that calling by which we say that the faithful ought to judge their election. For, that general calling is also common to the wicked: but this special calling bringeth with it the spirit of regeneration, which is the earnest and seal of the inheritance to come, wherewith our hearts are sealed up against the day of the Lord. Eph. i. 13. In sum, since hypocrites boast of godliness as well as the true worshippers of God, Christ pronounceth that at length they shall be cast out of the place which they wrongfully possess: as it is said in the Psalm, Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in hands, and a man of a pure heart. Psal. xv. 1. Again, in another nother place. This is the generation of them that ſeek God, of them that ſeek the face of the God of Jacob. Pſal. xxiv. 2. And ſo doth the Spirit exhort the faithful to ſufferance, that they take it not grievouſly that the Iſraelites be mingled with them in the church: for at length their vizor ſhall be plucked from them and they ſhall be caſt out with ſhame.

The fall of Judas, and the error of Gregory about the certainty of election.

9. The ſame reaſon is the exception even now alledged, where Chriſt ſaith that none periſhed but the ſon of perdition. It is indeed an improper ſpeech, but yet not dark. For he was not accounted among the ſheep of Chriſt, for that he was one indeed, but becauſe he kept the place of one. And where in another place the Lord affirme thhat he was choſen with the apoſtles, John iv. 73. that is ſpoken only in reſpect of the miniſtry. Twelve (ſaith he) have I choſen, and one of them is a devil: that is, he had choſen him to the office of an apoſtle. But when he ſpeaketh of chuſing to ſalvation, he driveth them far away from the number of the choſen, ſaying: I ſpeak not of all: I know whom I have choſen. John xiii. 18. If a man do in both places confound the word chuſing, he ſhall miſerably entangle himſelf: if he make difference, nothing is more plain. Therefore Gregory teacheth very ill and peſtilently when he ſaith, that we know only our calling, but are uncertain of our election: Hom. 38. Whereby he moveth all men to fear and trembling: uſing alſo this reaſon, but becauſe we know what we are to day, but what we ſhall be we know not. But in that place he ſufficiently declareth, how he ſtumbled at this block. For, becauſe he founded election upon the merits of works, he had matter enough, and more to diſcourage the minds of men: but he could not ſtrengthen them, who did not remove them from themſelves to the affiance of the goodneſs of God. Hereof the faithful have ſome taſte of that which we have determined at the beginning that predeſtination if it be rightly thought upon, bringeth not a ſhaking of faith, but rather the beſt ſtrengthening of it. And yet I deny not, that the Holy Ghoſt framed his words to the weakneſs of our capacity. As when he ſaith, Ezek. xiii. 9. In the ſecret of my people they ſhall not be, and in the roll of my ſervants they ſhall not be written. As though God did begin to write in the book of life, them whom he reckoneth in the number of his: whereas yet we know, even by the witneſſes of Chriſt, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the book of life. Phil. iv. 3. But in theſe words is only expreſſed the caſting away of them which ſeemed the chief among the elect: as it is ſaid in the Pſalms; Let them be blotted out of the book of life, and let them not be written with the righteous. Pſal. lxix. 29.

No difference before vocation, between the elect of God and others.

10. But the elect are neither immediately from the womb, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together in the flock of Chriſt, but as it pleaſeth God to diſtribute his grace to them. But ere they be gathered together to that chief ſhepherd, they are ſcattered abroad and ſtray in the common deſert, and differ nothing from others, ſaving that they be defended by the ſingular mercy of God, from falling into the extreme headlong downfal of death. Therefore if you look upon themſelves, you ſhall ſee the offspring of Adam, which ſavoureth of the whole maſs. That they be not carried into extreme and deſperate ungodlineſs, this cometh not to paſs by any goodneſs naturally planted in them, but becauſe the eye of God watcheth, and his hand is ſtretched out to their ſalvation. For they that dream that from their very nativity there is planted in their hearts I wot not what ſeed of election, by the virtue whereof they are always inclined to godlineſs and to the fear of God, they both are not aſſiſted to prove it by the authority of ſcripture, and alſo are confuted by experience itſelf. They do indeed bring forth a few examples to prove, that the elect even before their enlightening, were not utterly ſtrangers from religion: that Paul in his being a Phariſee lived unreprovable, Acts iii. 5. that Cornelius was by alms and prayers accepted of God: Acts x. 2. and ſuch other, Of Paul we grant to them: of Cornelius we ſay, that they are deceived. For it appeareth that he was then already enlightened and regenerate, ſo that he wanted nothing but the clear revealing of the goſpel. But what will they wring out by theſe few examples? that all the elect are alway endowed with the ſpirit of godlineſs? No more than if a man by ſhewing the uprightneſs of Ariſtides, Socrates, Zenocrates, Scipio, Curius Camillus, and other, ſhould thereof gather, that all they that are left in blindneſs of idolatry, were deſirous followers of holineſs and honeſty. Yea and the ſcripture in more places than one, openly crieth out againſt them. Nor the ſtate which Paul deſcribeth ſcribeth of the Epheſians before their regeneration, ſheweth not one grain of this ſeed. Eph. ii. 2. Ye were (ſaith he) dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, wherein ye walked according to the courſe of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the ſpirit which now worketh in the children of diſobedience: among whom we all had our converſation in time paſt, in the luſts of our fleſh, fulfilling the deſires of the fleſh and of the mind. And were by nature children of wrath even as others. Again, remember, that ye were ſometime without hope, and without God in the world. Again, Ye were ſometimes darkneſs, but now are ye light in the Lord, walk as the children of light. Eph. v. 8. But peradventure they will have theſe things to be referred to the ignorance of the true God, wherewith they deny not that the elect are holden, before that they be called. Albeit this were a ſhameleſs cavilling, ſince he thereof concludeth, that they ought now no more either to lie or to ſteal: Eph. iv. 23. yet what will they anſwer to other places? as is that place to the Corinthians, where when he had pronounced that neither whoremongers, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abuſers of themſelves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous men, ſhall inherit the kingdom of God: he by and by addeth, that they were wrapped in the ſame hainous offences before that they knew Chriſt: but now that they are both waſhed by his blood and made free by his ſpirit. 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10. Again, in another place to the Romans: As ye have given your members ſervants to uncleanneſs, and to iniquity to commit iniquity, now yield them ſervants to righteouſneſs. For what fruit had you of theſe things, whereof ye are now aſhamed, &c. Rom. vi. 19.

In men before God call them, there is no bud of righteouſneſs, termed by ſome the ſeed of election.

11. What manner of ſeed of election, I pray you, did then bud in them, who being manifoldly defiled in all their life, as it were with deſperate wickedneſs, wallowed in the abominable and accurſed ſin of all? If he would have ſpoken after their opinion, he ſhould have ſhewed how much they were bound to the bountifulneſs of God, by which they had been preſerved from ſliding into ſo great filthineſs. So Peter alſo ſhould have exhorted his to thankfulneſs for the perpetual ſeed of election. But he contrariwiſe putteth them in mind that the time paſt ſufficed to fulfil the luſts of the Gentiles. 1 Pet ix. 3. What if we come to examples? what bud of righteouſneſs was there in Rahab the harlot before faith? Joſh. ii. 1. in Manaſſes, when Jeruſalem was dipped, and in a manner drowned, in the blood of the prophets? 2 Kings xii. 17. In the thief, who among his laſt gaſpings began to think of repentance? Luke xxii. 16. Away therefore with theſe arguments, which ſilly curious men do raſhly deviſe to themſelves without the ſcripture. But let that abide certain with us which the ſcripture hath, that all have gone aſtray like loſt ſheep, every one into his own way, (Iſa. liii. 6.) that is perdition. Out of this gulf of perdition; whom the Lord hath determined once to pluck forth, them he deferreth till his fit time: only he preſerveth them, that they fall not unto unpardonable blaſphemy.

The means whereby reprobates comes to their ends: ſome debarred of the power of hearing the word ſome by the light thereof blinded.

12. As the Lord by the effectualneſs of his calling toward the elect maketh perfect the ſalvation, whereunto he had by eternal counſel appointed them: ſo he hath his judgments againſt the reprobate, whereby he executeth his counſel of them. Whom therefore he hath created unto the ſhame of life, and deſtruction of death, that they ſhould be inſtruments of his wrath, and examples of his ſeverity: from them, that they may come to their end, ſometime he taketh away the power to hear his word, and ſometime by the preaching of it he more blindeth and amazeth them. Of the firſt manner, whereas there are innumerable examples, let us chuſe out one more clear and notable than all the reſt. There paſſed away about four thouſand years before Chriſt, in which he hid from all the Gentiles the light of his health-bringing doctrine. If any man anſwer that he therefore made them not to enjoy ſo great a benefit becauſe he judged him unworthy, they who come after ſhall not be proved any more worthy. Of which thing beſide the experience, Malachy is a ſubſtantial witneſs, who reproving infidelity mingled with groſs blaſphemies, yet declareth that there ſhall come a redeemer. Mal. iv. 1. Why rather is he given to theſe than to thoſe? He ſhall trouble himſelf in vain that ſhall here ſearch for a cauſe higher than the ſecret and unſearchable counſel of God. Neither is it to be feared, leſt any ſcholar of Porphyry ſhould freely gnaw at the righteouſneſs of God while we anſwer nothing in defence of it. For when we ſay that none periſh undeſerving, and that it is of the free bountifulneſs of God that ſome are delivered, there is largely enough ſaid for the ſet-

ting forth of his glory, ſo that it needeth not our ſhifting. The ſovereign judge therefore maketh a way for his predeſtination, when whom he hath once rejected, them being deprived of the communicating of his light he leaveth in blindneſs. Of the other manner there are both daily examples, and alſo many contained in the ſcripture. One ſelf ſame preaching is commonly made to a hundred, twenty receive it with ready obedience of faith: the reſt do either ſet naught by it, or ſcorn it, or hiſs it out, or abhor it. If any man anſwer that this diverſity proceedeth of their malice and perverſeneſs, he ſhall not yet ſatisfy us: becauſe the others wit alſo ſhould be poſſeſſed with the ſame malice, unleſs God did amend it with his goodneſs. Therefore we ſhall ſtill be encumbred, unleſs we call to mind that which Paul ſaith, who maketh thee to differ? Whereby he ſignifieth that ſome excel other ſome, not by their own vertue, but by the only grace of God.

The difference betweene one ſort and another dependeth upon the ſecret counſel and will of God, wherefore there is no higher cauſe than his will.

13. Why therefore doth he in granting grace to thoſe, paſs over theſe? Of thoſe Luke ſheweth a cauſe, becauſe they are ordained to life. Act. xiii. 48. Of theſe, what ſhall we think, but becauſe they are the veſſels of wrath unto diſhonour? Wherefore let it not grieve us to ſay with Auguſtine. God (ſaith he) might turn the will of the evil into good becauſe he is almighty. He might indeed. Why therefore doth he not? becauſe he would not. Why he would not, is in himſelf. For we ought to be no more wiſe than we ought to be. (De Gen. ad lite. li. 2. c. 10. And that is much better, than to ſhift with Chryſoſtom, and ſay that he draweth him that is willing and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not ſeem to ſtand in the judgment of God, but in the will of men only. Ho. de converſ. Paul.) Truly it ſo ſtandeth not in proper motion of man, that even the godly and they that fear God have need of a ſingular inſtruction of the ſpirit. Lydia the purple ſeller feared God, and yet it behoved that her heart ſhould be opened, that ſhe might hearken to the doctrine of Paul, Act. xvi. 14. and profit in it. This is not ſpoken of one woman alone, but that we ſhould know that the profiting of every man in godlineſs is the ſecret work of the ſpirit. This verily cannot be brought in queſtion, that the Lord ſendeth his word to many, whoſe blindneſs he will have to be more confirmed. For, to what purpoſe doth he bid ſo many commandments be carried to Pharaoh, was it becauſe he hoped that with often repeated meſſages he would be appeaſed? No, but before he began, he foreknew and foretold the end. Go (ſaid he to Moſes) and declare to him my will: but I will harden his heart, that he obey not. Exod. ii. So when he ſtirreth up Ezekiel: he warneth him aforehand that he ſendeth him to a rebellious and ſtubborn people: to the end that he ſhould not be afraid if he perceive himſelf to ſing to deaf men. Ezek. ii. 3. and xii. 2. So he foretelleth to Jeremiah, that his doctrine ſhould become a fire, to deſtroy and waſte the people like ſtubble. Jere. i. 10. but the prophecy of Iſaiah Iſa. vi. 9. yet more enforceth it. For he is thus ſent of the Lord: Go and ſay to the children of Iſrael: with hearing, hear ye, and underſtand not: with ſeeing ſee yee, and know not. Make obſtinate the heart of this people, and make heavy their ears, and ſhut their eyes, leſt peradventure they may ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and underſtand with their heart, that being converted they may be healed. Behold he directeth his voice to them, but that they wax more deaf: he lighteth a light, but that they may be made more blind: he ſheweth forth doctrine, but that they may be made more dull: he layeth to them a remedy, but not that they may be healed. And John allegeing this prophecy, affirmeth that the Jews could not believe the doctrine of Chriſt, becauſe this curſe of God lay upon them. John xii. 39. Neither can this alſo be in controverſy, that thoſe whom God will not have to be enlightened, to them he delivered his doctrine wrapped up in dark ſpeeches, that they may not profit thereby but be thruſt into greater dulneſs. Chriſt alſo teſtifieth, that he doth therefore expound only to the apoſtles the parables in which he had ſpoken to the multitude, becauſe to them it was given to know the myſteries of the kingdom of God, but to the common people not ſo. Matth. xiii. 11. What meaneth the Lord (wilt thou ſay, in teaching them, of whom he provideth that he may not be underſtood? Conſider whence is the fault, and thou wilt ceaſe to aſk. For in the word how great darkneſs ſoever there be, yet there is always light enough to convince the conſcience of the wicked.

The unchangeable decree of God concerning the deſtruction of the wicked is the

14. Now remaineth for us to ſee, why the Lord doth that, which it is plain that he doth. If it be anſwered that it is ſo done becauſe men have ſo deſerved by their ungodlineſs, wickedneſs, ground of their untoward diſpoſition to the means whereby men are ſaved.

and unthankfulneſs: the ſame ſhall indeed be well and truly ſaid: but becauſe there appeareth not yet the reaſon of this diverſity, why then ſome are inclined to obedience, other ſome continue hardened, in ſearching it, we muſt needs go to that which Paul hath noted out of Moſes, namely that God hath raiſed them up from the beginning, that he might ſhew his name in the whole earth. Rom. ix. 17. Whereas therefore the reprobate do not obey the word of God opened unto them, that ſhall be well imputed to the malice and perverſeneſs of their heart, ſo that this be therewithal added, that they are therefore given into this perverſeneſs, becauſe by the righteous, but yet unſearchable judgment of God they are raiſed up to ſet forth his glory with their damnation. Likewiſe when it is ſaid of the ſons of Eli that they hearkned not to uſe wholſom warnings, becauſe the Lord willed to kill them: 1 Sam. ii. 25. it is not denied that their ſtubbornneſs proceeded of their own naughtineſs: but it is therewithal touched why they were left in ſtubborneſs, when the Lord might have ſoftened their hearts, namely becauſe his unchangeable decree had once appointed them to deſtruction. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth that ſaying of John, Joh. xii. 38. when he had done ſo great ſigns, no man believed in him: that the word of Iſaiah might be fulfilled, Lord, who hath believed our report? For though he do not excuſe the ſtiff necked from blame, yet he is content with that reaſon, that the grace of God is unſavoury to men, till the holy Ghoſt bring taſte. And Chriſt allegeing the prophecy of Iſaiah: they ſhall all be taught of God, John. vi. 45. tendeth to no other end but to prove that the Jews are reprobate and ſtrangers from the Church, becauſe they are unapt to learn: and he bringeth no other cauſe thereof, but for that the promiſe of God doth not pertain to them. Which thing this ſaying of Paul confirmeth, that Chriſt which to the Jews is an offence, and to the Gentiles fooliſhneſs, is to the called the power and wiſdom of God. 1 Cor. i. 23. For when he hath told what commonly happeneth ſo oft as the goſpel is preached, namely that ſome it maketh more obſtinate, and of ſome it is deſpiſed, he ſaith that it is had in eſteem of them only which are called. He had indeed a little before named them believers, but he meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather he addeth this ſecond ſaying by way of correction, that they which had embraced the goſpel ſhould give the praiſe of their faith to the calling of God: as alſo a little after he teacheth that they are choſen of God. When the ungodly hear theſe things, they cry out, that God with tyrannical power abuſeth his poor creatures for a ſport to his cruelty. But we who know that all men are ſo many ways liable to the righteous judgment of God, that being aſked of a thouſand things they can not ſatisfy in one, do confeſs that the reprobate ſuffer nothing which agreeth not with the moſt juſt judgment of God. Whereas we do not clearly attain the reaſon thereof, let us not be diſcontent to be iguorant of ſomewhat, where the wiſdom of God lifteth up it ſelf into ſo great height.

Places of ſcripture opened, wherein the deſtruction of the wicked, ſeemeth denied to be by the will and ordinance of God.

15. But foraſmuch as there are a few places of ſcripture wont to be objected, in which God ſeemeth to deny that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked do periſh, but by this that, he crying out againſt it, they wilfully bring death upon themſelves: let us briefly declaring theſe places, ſhew that they make nothing againſt the ſentence above ſet. There is brought forth a place of Ezekiel, that God willeth not the death of a ſinner, but rather that he may be turned and live, Ezek. xxxiv. 11. If they will extend this to all mankind: why doth he not move many to repentance, whoſe minds are more pliable to obedience, than theirs who at his daily allurements wax harder and harder? With the Sodomites (as Chriſt witneſſeth) the preaching of the goſpel and miracles would have brought forth more fruite than in Jewry, Matth. xiii. 23. How cometh it to paſs therefore, if God willeth all to be ſaved, that he openeth not the gate of repentance to thoſe miſerable men that would have been more ready to receive grace? Hereby we ſee that the place is violently wreſted, if the will of God, whereof the prophet maketh mention, be ſet againſt his eternal counſel, whereby he hath ſevered the eleſt from the reprobate. Now if we ſeek for the true natural meaning of the prophet: his purpoſe is to bring hope of pardon to the penitent. And this is the ſum, that it is not to be doubted but that God is ready to forgive ſo ſoon as the ſinner turneth. Therefore he willeth not his death, in ſo much as he willeth his repentance. But experience teacheth that he ſo willeth them to repent whom he generally calleth to him, that yet he toucheth not all their hearts. Yet is it not therefore to be ſaid that he dealeth decitfully, becauſe although the outward voice do but make them inexcuſable who hear and do not obey it, yet it is truly accounted the teſtimony timony of the grace of God, by which teſtimony he reconcileth men to himſelf. Therefore let us hold this for the meaning of the prophet, that the death of a ſinner pleaſeth not God: that the godly may have affiance, that ſo ſoon as they ſhall be touched with repentance, there is pardon ready for them with God, and the wicked may feel that their fault is doubled, becauſe they anſwer not to ſo great merciful kindneſs and gentleneſs of God. The mercy of God therefore will alway meet repentance, but to whom repentance is given, both all the prophets, and apoſtles, and Ezekiel himſelf doth plainly teach. Secondly, there is alleged a place in Paul, where he ſaith, That God willeth all men to be ſaved, (1 Tim. ii. 4.) which although it have a diverſe meaning from the other, yet in ſome thing they agree together. I anſwer, firſt, that by the reſt of the text it is made plain how he willeth. For Paul joineth together, that he willeth them to be ſaved, and to come to the knowlege of the truth. If they will have this to be determined, by the eternal counſel of God that they receive the doctrine of ſalvation, what meaneth that ſaying of Moſes, What nation is ſo noble, that God cometh near to it as he doth to thee? Deut. iv. 7. How came it to paſs that God reſtrained from many peopels the light of the goſpel, which others enjoyed? How came it to paſs that the pure knowlege of godlineſs never came to ſome, and ſome ſcarcely taſted ſo much as any dark principles of it? Hereof it ſhall now be eaſy to gather, whereto Paul tendeth. He had commanded Timothy to make ſolemn prayers in the church for kings and princes. But when it ſeemed ſomewhat abſurd that prayers ſhould be made to God for a kind of men in a manner deſperate (becauſe they were not only ſtrangers from the body of Chriſt, but alſo endeavoured with all their forces to oppreſs his kingdom) he added, that the ſame is acceptable to God, who willeth all men to be ſaved. Whereby verily he ſignifieth nothing elſe but that he hath ſtopped up the way to ſalvation to no degree of men: but rather that he hath ſo poured out his mercy that he willeth no man to be void of it. The other ſentences do not declare what God hath by his ſecret judgment determined of all men: but do ſhew that there is pardon ready for all ſinners which do only turn themſelves to require it. For if they more ſtiffly ſtand upon this that it is ſaid that he will have mercy upon all, I will on the contrary ſide anſwer them with that which is written in another place. That our God is in heaven where he doth whatſoever he will, Pſal. cxv. 3. This word therefore muſt ſo be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy, and I will ſhew mercy to whom I will ſhew mercy, Exod. xxxiii. 19. He that chooſeth out them whom he will have mercy on, doth not give it to all. But ſince it clearly appeareth that in that place it is ſpoken not of all particular men, but of degrees of men, we will make no longer diſputing about it. However it is alſo to be noted, that Paul doth not affirm what God doth alway and every where and in all men: but leaveth it to him at his liberty at length to make kings and magiſtrates partakers of the heavenly doctrine, although by reaſon of their blindneſs they do now rage againſt it. They ſeem to preſs us more ſtrongly with objecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to periſh, but receiveth all to repentance. But the undoing of this knot doth by and by offer itſelf in the ſecond word, becauſe the will to receive cannot be underſtanded to be any other than that which is every where taught. Truly the turning is in the hand of God: whether he will turn all or no, let himſelf be aſked, when he promiſeth that he will give to a certain few men a fleſhly heart, leaving to other ſome a ſtony heart, Ezek. xxxvi. 26. It is true indeed, that unleſs he were ready to receive them which call upon his mercy, this ſaying ſhould be falſe. Turn to me, and I will turn to you, Zech. i. 3. But I ſay that none of all mortal men doth come to God but he that is prevented of God: and if repentance were in the will of man, Paul would not ſay, If peradventure he give them repentance, 2 Tim. ii. 15. Yea unleſs the ſame God which with word exhorteth all men to repentance, did with ſecret moving of his ſpirit bring the choſen to it: Jeremiah would not ſay, Turn me, Lord, and I ſhall be turned: for when thou haſt turned me, I have repented, Jer. xxxi. 18.

No repugnancy between the promiſes of ſalvation offered univerſally unto all and the purpoſe of God concerning the condemnation of ſome.

16. But (thou wilt ſay) if it be ſo, there ſhall be ſmall truth in the promiſes of the goſpel, which when they teſtify of the will of God, affirm that he willeth that which is againſt his inviloable decree. Not ſo. For howſoever the promiſes of ſalvation be univerſal, yet they nothing diſagree with the reprobation of the reprobate, ſo that we direct our minds to the effect of them. We know that then and not till then the promiſes are effectual to us, when we receive them by faith, on the other ſide when faith is made void the promiſe is therewithal aboliſhed. If this be the nature of them, let us then ſee whether theſe things diſagree together: that it is ſaid that God hath from eternity ordained whom he will embrace with love, and upon whom he will exercise wrath: and that he promiseth salvation to all without difference. Truly I say that they agree very well. For in so promising he meaneth nothing else than that his mercy is set open for all which do desire and crave it: which thing none do but they whom he hath enlightened. And them he enilghtneth, whom he hath predestinate to salvation. They (I say) have the truth of the promises sure and unshaken, so as it cannot be said that there is any disagreement between the eternal election of God, and the testimony of his grace which he offereth to the faithful. But why nameth he all? verily that the consciences of the godly may the more safely rest, when they understand that there is no difference of sinners, so that faith be present: and that they want a sanctuary whereunto they may that the wicked may not cavil for their excuse, withdraw themselves from the bondage of sin, when with their own unthankfulness they refuse it being offered them. Therefore when the mercy of God is by the gospel offered to both sorts, it is faith, it is faith, that it is to say, the enlightning of God, which maketh difference between the godly and ungodly, so as the one sort feeleth the effectualness of the gospel, and the other sort obtain no fruit thereof. The enlightening itself also hath the eternal election of God for the rule thereof. The complaint of Christ, which they alleged, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft have I willed to gather together thy chickens, (Matth. xxiii. 37.) but thou wouldest not? maketh nothing for them. I grant that Christ there speaketh not only in the person of man, but also reproacheth them that in all ages they have refused his grace. But we must define that will of God which is treated of. For neither is it unknown, how diligently God endeavoured to keep still that people, and with how great stiffness they even from the first to the last being given to their wandering desires refused to be gathered together: but it followeth not thereof that the counsel of God was made void by the malice of men. They answer and say that nothing less agreeth with the nature of God than to have a double will in him. Which I grant to them, so that they fitly expound it. But why do they not consider so many testimonies, where God putting upon him the affections of man descendeth beneath his own majesty? He saith that he hath with stretched out arms called the rebellious people, (Isaiah lxv. 2.) that he hath early and late laboured to bring them back to him. If they will apply all these things to God, and not consider the figure, there shall arise many superfluous contentions which this one solution bringeth to agreement, that the property of man is figuratively applied to God. Howbeit the solution which we have brought in another place largely sufficeth, that although the will of God be, as to our sense manifold: yet he doth not in himself diversly will this and that, but according to this wisedom, which is diversly manifold (as Paul calleth it, Eph. iii. 10.) he amazeth our senses, till it shall be given us to know that he marvellously willeth that which now seemeth to be against his will. They also mock with cavils that since God is the Father of all, it is unrighteous that he should disinherit any that hath not before with his own fault deserved this punishment. As though the liberality of God extendeth not even to hogs and dogs. But if they speak only of mankind, let them answer why God bound himself to one people, to be the Father thereof: and why also out of the same people he picked a small number as it were a flower. But their own lust of evil speaking hindereth these railers that they consider not that God so bringeth forth his sun to shine upon the good and evil, (Matth. v. 45.) that the inheritance is laid up for a few, to whom it shall one day be said, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom, &c. Matth. xxv. 34. They object also that God hateth none of these things that he hath made. Which although I grant them, yet this remaineth safe which I teach, that the reprobate are hateful to God, and that very justly, because they being destitute of his Spirit can bring forth nothing but cause of curse. They say further, that there is no difference of the Jew and the Gentile, and therefore that the grace of God is without difference set before all men: namely, if they grant (as Paul determineth) that God calleth as well out of the Jews as out of the Gentiles, according to his good pleasure, so that he is bound to no man, Rom. ix. 24. After this manner also is that wiped away which they object in another place, that God hath concluded all under sin, that he may have mercy upon all, (Rom. xi. 22.) namely because he willeth that the salvation of all them that are saved be ascribed to his mercy, although this benefit be not common to all. Now when many things are alleged on both parts, let this be our conclusion, to tremble with Paul at so great depth, and if wanton tongues should be busy, that we be not ashamed of this his crying out, O man, what art thou that strivest with God? Rom. ix. 20. For

Of the laſt reſurrection.

The uſe and neceſſity of meditating continually upon the reſurrection of the dead.

ALTHOUGH Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs, having overcome death, ſhining by the goſpel, giveth us the light of life (as Paul witneſſeth, 2 Tim. i. 20.) whereby alſo it is ſaid, that by believing we have paſſed from death into life, (John v. 24.) being now not foreigners and ſtrangers, but citizens with the ſaints, and of the houſhold of God, Eph. ii. 19. who hath made us to ſit with the only begotten Son himſelf in heavenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicity: yet leaſt it ſhould be grievous unto us to be exerciſed under this hard warfare, as though we had no fruit of the victory which Chriſt hath gotten, we muſt hold faſt that which is in another place taught of the nature of hope. For, becauſe we hope for thoſe things which appear not, (Rom. viii. 28.) and (as it is ſaid in another place) faith is a demonſtration of things inviſible, (Heb. xi. 1.) ſo long as we are incloſed in the priſon of the fleſh, we are abſent from the Lord, 2 Cor. v. 6. For which reaſon the ſame Paul ſaith in another place that we are dead, and that our life is hidden with Chriſt in God, and that when he which is our life, ſhall appear, then ſhall we alſo appear with him in glory. (Col. iii. 3.) This therefore is our condition, that with living ſoberly and juſtly and godly in this world, we look for the bleſſed hope, and the coming of the glory of the great God, and of our ſaviour Jeſus Chriſt. (Tit. ii. 12.) Here we need a ſingular patience, that we be not wearied and either turn back our courſe or forſake our ſtanding. Therefore whatſoever hath been hitherto ſet out concerning our ſalvation, requireth minds lifted up to heaven, that we may love Chriſt whom we have not ſeen and believing in him may rejoice with unſpeakable and glorious joyfulneſs till we receive the end of our faith, as Peter telleth us, 1 Pet. i. 8. After which manner, Paul ſaith that the faith and charity of the godly hath reſpect to the hope which is laid up in heaven, Col. i. 5. When we thus with our eyes faſtened upon Chriſt do hang of heaven, and nothing withhold them in earth from carrying us to the promiſed bleſſedneſs: then is that truly fulfilled, Our heart is where our treaſure is, Matth. vii. 21. Hereupon cometh that faith is ſo rare in the world, becauſe nothing is more hard to our dulneſs than through innumerable ſteps to climb up above them with preſſing forward to the prize of our heavenly calling. To the great heap of miſeries wherewith we are almoſt overwhelmed, are added the mockings of ungodly men, wherewith our ſimplicity is railed at, when voluntarily forſaking the allurements of preſent good things, we ſeem to follow the bleſſedneſs hidden from us, as it were a dying ſhadow. Finally above and beneath us, before and behind us, violent tentations beſiege us, to the ſuſtaining of the fear whereof our courage ſhould be far too weak unleſs being uncumbered of earthly things they were faſt bound to the heavenly life, which in appearance is far from us. Wherefore only he hath ſoundly profited in the goſpel, who is inured to a continual meditation of the bleſſed reſurrection.

The felicity or ſovereign good of man, and the chearful labour which he ſhould undertake for the attaining thereunto.

2. Of the ſovereign end of good things, the philoſophers have in old time curiouſly diſputed, and alſo ſtrived among themſelves: yet none except Plato acknowleged the ſovereign good of man to be his union with God. But what manner of union that was, he could not perceive ſo much as with any ſmall taſte, and no marvel, ſince he had never learned the holy bond thereof. To us the only and perfect felicity is known even in this earthly wayfaring: but, ſuch as daily more and more enkindleth our hearts with deſire of it, till the full enjoying may ſatisfy us. Therefore I ſaid that none receive fruit of the benefits of Chriſt, but they that lift up their minds to the reſurrection. For, Paul ſetteth up this mark to the faithful, toward which he ſaith that he preſſeth, and forgetteth all things till he come to it, Phil. iii. 8. And ſo much the more chearfully ought we to travel toward it, leaſt if this world withold us, we ſuffer grievous puniſhment for our ſlothfulneſs. Wherefore in another place he marketh the faithful with this mark, that their converſation is in heaven, from whence alſo they look for their Saviour. And that their courages ſhould not faint in this race, he joineth all creatures companions with them. For, becauſe every where are ſeen deformed ruins, he ſaith that all things in heaven and earth do endeavour to the renewing. For ſince Adam by his fall diſſolved the perfect order of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painful and grievous, whereunto they are ſubject by reaſon of the ſin of man, not for that they are indued with any feeling, but for that they naturally covet the perfect eſtate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul ſaith that they groan, and are travelling in pain, (Rom. viii. 19.) that we to whom are given the firſt fruits of the Spirit, may be aſhamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the leaſt to follow the dead elements, which bear pain of another's ſin. And the more to prick us forward, he calleth the laſt coming of Chriſt our redemption. It is true indeed that all the the parts of our redemption are already fulfilled: but becauſe Chriſt hath once been offered for ſins, he ſhall be ſeen again without ſin unto ſalvation, Heb. x. With what miſeries ſoever we be preſſed, let this redemption ſuſtain us even until the performance of it.

The doctrine of the reſurrection of the fleſh weighty and hard: the weight a motive to make us careful to retain the faith thereof: Chriſt a mean to take away the hardneſs of believing.

3. The very weight of the thing it ſelf ſhall whet our endeavour. For neither doth Paul without cauſe affirm that the holy goſpel is void and deceitful, unleſs the dead do riſe again: becauſe our ſtate ſhould be more miſerable than the ſtate of all men, namely ſince we lying open to the hatreds and reproaches of many: are every hour in danger, yea and are as ſheep appointed to the ſlaughter: and therefore the authority thereof ſhould fall away not only in one part, but alſo in the whole ſum which both our adoption and the effect of our ſalvation containeth. And ſo let us be heedfully bent to the moſt earneſt thing of all, that no continuance of time may make us weary. For which purpoſe I have deferred to this place that which I had briefly to treat of it, that the readers may learn, when they have received Chriſt the author of their ſalvation, to riſe up higher, and may know that he is clothed with heavenly immortality and glory, that the whole body may be made like faſhioned to the head, as alſo the holy Ghoſt oftentimes ſetteth forth in his perſon an example of he reſurrection. 1 Cor. xv. 14. It is a thing hard to be believed, that bodies when they have been conſumed with rottenneſs, ſhall at their appointed time riſe up again. Therefore where many of the philoſophers have affirmed ſouls to be immortal, the reſurrection of the fleſh hath been allowed of few: wherein although there was no excuſe, yet we are thereby put in mind, that it is too hard a thing to draw mans ſenſes to believe it. That faith may overcome ſo great a ſtop, the ſcripture miniſtreth two helps: the oue is in the likeneſs of Chriſt, the other is the almightineſs of God. Now ſo oft as the reſurrection is thought of, let the image of Chriſt come into our minds: which in the nature that he took of us, ſo ran out the race of mortal life, that now having obtained immortality, he is to us a pledge of the reſurrection to come. For in the miſeries wherewith we are beſieged, we carry about his mortifying in our fleſh, that his life may be openly ſhewed in us. 2 Cor. iv. 10. And we may not ſever him from us, neither can we poſſibly, but that he muſt be torn in ſunder. Whereupon cometh that argument of Paul, if the dead do not riſe again, then neither is Chriſt riſen again, 1 Cor. xv. 13. becauſe verily he taketh that principle for confeſſed, that Chriſt was not made ſubject to death, nor obtained victory of death by riſing again, privately for himſelf: but, that that was begun in the head which muſt needs be fulfilled in all the members, according to the degree and order of every one. For it were not right that they ſhould in all points be made equal with him. It is ſaid in the pſalm, Thou ſhalt not ſuffer thy holy one to ſee corruption: Pſal. xvi. 10. although a portion of this truſt pertain to us according to the meaſure of gift, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Chriſt, which being free from all rotting, hath received again his body whole. Now leſt the fellowſhip of bleſſed reſurrection with Chriſt ſhould be doubtful to us, that we may be contented with this pledge, Paul expreſly affirmeth that he therefore ſitteth in heaven, and ſhall come at the laſt day a judge, that he may make our baſe and vile body like faſhioned to the glorious body. Phil. iii. 21. In another place alſo he teacheth, that God raiſed not up his ſon from death to the intent to ſhew a token of his power: but to ſtretch out the ſame effectual force of the ſpirit toward us which are faithful: whom he therefore calleth life while he liveth in us, becauſe he was given to this end that he ſhould make alive that which is mortal in us. I ſum up in a brief abridgement thoſe things which might both be more largely handled, and are worthy to be more gorgeouſly ſet out: and yet I truſt

that the godly readers ſhall in few words find matter enough which may ſuffice to edify their faith. Chriſt therefore is riſen again, that he might have us companions of the life to come. He was raiſed up of the father, in ſo much as he was the head of the church, from which he doth in no wiſe ſuffer himſelf to be plucked away. He was raiſed up by the power of the ſpirit, which is common to us unto the office of quickening. Finally he was raiſed up, that he ſhould be reſurrection and life. But as we have ſaid that in this mirror, there is to be ſeen of us a lively image of the reſurrection, ſo let it be to us a ſure foundation to ſtay our mind, ſo that yet we be not lothful or weary of long tarrying: becauſe it is not our part to meaſure the ſeaſons of times by our will, but patiently to reſt, till God at his own fit time repair his kingdom. To which purpoſe ſeemeth that exhortation of Paul: 1 Cor. xv. the firſt fruits is Chriſt: and then they that are Chriſt's, every one in his order. But that no queſtion ſhould be moved of the reſurrection of Chriſt, upon which the reſurrection of us all is founded, we ſee by how many and how diverſe means he hath made it approved by witneſs to us. Fine noſed men will laugh at the hiſtory which the evangeliſts rehearſe, as at a childiſh mockery. For of what importance ſhall the meſſage be which fearful ſilly women bring, and afterward the diſciples confirm, being in a manner aſtoniſhed? Why did not Chriſt rather ſet up the triumphing enſigns of his victory in the midſt of the temple and the market place? Why came he not forth terrible into the ſight of Pilate? Why doth he not alſo prove himſelf to the prieſts, and to the whole of Jeruſalem that he is riſen up alive again? As for the witneſſes which he choſe, prophane men will ſcarcely grant them to be ſufficient I anſwer, that although in theſe beginnings the weakneſs thereof was contemptible, yet all this was governed by the wonderful providence of God: that partly the love of Chriſt and zeal of godlineſs, and partly their own hardneſs of belief ſhould carry them in haſte to the ſepulchre which had lately been diſmayed for fear, that they might not only be ſeeing witneſſes of the thing, but alſo ſhould hear of the angels that which they ſaw with their eyes. How ſhall we ſuſpect their credit, who thought it to be a fable which they had heard of the women, till they were brought to the preſent ſight of the thing it ſelf? As for all the people and the ruler himſelf, after that they had been largely convinced, it is no marvel if as well the ſight of Chriſt, as other ſigns was not granted them. The ſepulchre was ſealed up, the watchmen watched it, the third day the body was not found. The ſoldiers corrupted with money ſcattered a rumour that his diſciples had ſtolen him away. Matth. xxvii. 66. and xxxiii. 11. As though they had power to gather a band together, or had armour, or were practiſed men to enterpriſe any ſuch feat. If the ſoldiers had not courage enough to drive them away, why did they not purſue them, that with the help of the people they might have taken ſome of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truly ſealed the reſurrection of Chriſt: and the watchmen which were ſet at the ſepulchre both in their holding their peace and in their lying, were made publiſhers of the ſame reſurrection. In the mean time the voice of angels ſounded, he is riſen, he is not here. Luk. xxiv. 6. The heavenly gliſtering plainly ſhewed that they were not men but angels. Afterward, if there remained any doubting, Chriſt himſelf took it away. The diſciples ſaw him oftener than once, and alſo felt his feet and his hands, that their hardneſs of believing not a little profited to the ſtrengthning of our faith. He diſputeth among them of the myſteries of the kingdom of God, and at the laſt in their ſights beholding him, he aſcended into heaven. Act. i. 3. And not only this ſight was ſhewed to the xi. Apoſtles, but alſo he was ſeen at once of more than five hundred brethren. 1 Cor. xv. 6. Now when he ſent the holy Ghoſt, he ſhewed a ſure proof not only of life, but alſo of the ſovereign power: as he had ſaid before, it is profitable for you that I go: otherwiſe the holy Ghoſt ſhall not come. John. xvi. But now Paul was overthrown by the way, not by the ſtrength of a dead man, but he felt him whom he perſecuted to have moſt high power. Act. ix. 4. To Stephen he appeared for another end, namely, that with aſſuredneſs of life he might overcome the fear of death. Act. vii. 55. To diſcredit ſo many authentic witneſſes, is not only a part of diſtruſtfulneſs, but alſo of froward and furious ſtubborneſs.

The infinity of the power of God confirmeth in the aſſured certainty of the reſurrection.

4. This which we have ſaid, that in proving the reſurrection our ſenſes muſt be directed to the infinite power of God, Paul briefly teacheth, that he may make (ſaith he) our vile body faſhioned like to his glorious body according to the working of his power, by which he may ſubdue all things to himſelf. Phil. iii. 20. Wherefore nothing is more unmeet, than here to have reſpect to what may naturally be done, where an ineſtimable miracle is ſet before us, which with the greatneſs thereof ſwalloweth up our ſenſes. Yea, Paul by ſetting forth an example example of nature, reproveth their dulneſs who deny the reſurrection. Thou fool (ſaith he) that which thou ſoweſt is not quickened unleſs it firſt die, &c. He ſaith that in ſeed is ſeen a form of the reſurrection, becauſe out of rottenneſs groweth corn. Neither were it ſo hard a thing to believe, if we were as heedful as we ought to be to the miracles which throughout all the coaſts of the world do offer themſelves to our eyes. But let us remember that none is truly perſuaded of the reſurrection to come, but he which being raviſhed into admiration, giveth to the power of God his glory. Iſaiah lifted up with this affiance, crieth out, thy dead ſhall live, my carcaſe ſhall riſe again. Awake ye, and praiſe, ye dwellers of the duſt. Iſa. xxvi. 19. In deſperate caſe he lifteth up himſelf to God the author of life, in whoſe hand are the iſſues of death, as it is ſaid in the Pſalm. Pſal. lxviii. Job alſo being liker to a carrion than to a man, Job. xix 25. truſting upon the power of God, ſticketh not as though he were whole and ſound to lift up himſelf to that day, ſaying, I know that my redeemer liveth: and in the laſt day he ſhall riſe upon the duſt (namely to ſhew forth his power therein) and I ſhall again be compaſſed with my ſkin, and in my fleſh I ſhall ſee God, I ſhall ſee him, and none other. For albeit that ſome do ſubtilly wreſt theſe places, as though they ought not to be underſtood of the reſurrection, yet they ſtrengthen that which they deſire to overthrow: becauſe the holy men in their evils ſeek comfort from no where elſe than from the likeneſs of the reſurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezekiel. Ezek. xxxvii. 8. For when the Jews believed not the promiſe of their return, and objected that is was no more likely that a way ſhould be made open for them, than that dead men ſhould come out of their graves: there was a viſion ſhewed to the prophet, a field full of dry bones: thoſe the Lord commanded to take again fleſh and ſinews. Although under that figure he raiſeth up the people to hope of return: yet the matter of hoping he gathereth of the reſurrection: as it is to us an exemplar of the deliverances which the faithful do experience in this world. So Chriſt when he had taught that the voice of the goſpel giveth life: becauſe the Jews received not this, he by and by ſaid further: marvel not at this, becauſe the hour cometh in which all that are in the graves ſhall hear the voice of the ſon of God, and ſhall come forth. John. v. 27. Therefore after this example of Paul, let us already chearfully triumph in the midſt of battles, becauſe he who hath promiſed life to come, is mighty to keep that which is committed to him: 2 Tim. iv. 3. and ſo let us glory that a crown of righteouſneſs is laid up for us, which the juſt judge ſhall deliver us. So ſhall it come to paſs, that whatſoever griefs we ſuffer, they ſhall be to us a ſhewing of the life to come, becauſe it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which afflict us: but to us which are unjuſtly afflicted, reſt at the appearing of Chriſt with the angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to be holden which he addeth by and by afterward, that he ſhall come that he may be glorified in his ſaints, and admired in all them that have believed, becauſe the goſpel hath been believed.

The Sadducees and others denying the reſurrection of the dead refuted.

5. But although the minds of men ought to have been continually occupied in this ſtudy: yet as though they would of ſet purpoſe deſtroy all remembrance of the reſurrection, they have called death the uttermoſt bond of all things and the deſtruction of man. For verily Solomon ſpeaketh of the common and received opinion, when he ſaith that a living dog is better than a dead lion. Eccl. ix. 4. And in another place: who knoweth whether the ſoul of a man go upward, and the ſoul of a beaſt downward? Eccl. iii. 21. But in all ages this brutiſh ſenſeleſs error hath been common in the world, yea and hath broken into the church it ſelf: for the Sadducees have preſumed to profeſs openly that there is no reſurrection, yea and that ſouls are mortal. Mar. xii. 18. Luk. xx. 27. Act. ii. 8. But that this groſs ignorance ſhould not help to excuſe any man, the infidels even by very inſtinct of nature have always had an image of the reſurrection before their eyes. For to what purpoſe ſerved that holy and inviolable manner of burying, but to be an earneſt of new life? Neither may it be anſwered that this ſprings of error: becauſe the religiouſneſs of burial was always in uſe among the holy fathers, and God willed the ſame manner to remain among the Gentiles, that an image of the reſurrection ſet before them might awake their drowſineſs. But although that ceremony wanted his uſe of profiting, yet it is profitable for us if we wiſely mark the end of it, becauſe it is no ſlender confutation of unbelief, that altogether profeſſed that which no man believed. But Satan hath not only aſtoniſhed the ſenſes of men, ſo that they have buried with the bodies the remembrance of the reſurrection, but alſo hath endeavoured to corrupt this part of doctrine with divers feigned inventions, that at length it might utterly terly die. I paſs over how in Paul's time Satan began to pinch at it: but in a little after there followed the millenaries, which limited the reign of Chriſt to a thouſand years. Rev. xx. 4. This error is ſo childiſh, that it needeth not or is not worthy of any confutation. Neither doth the revelation make on their ſide, by which it is certain that they coloured their error: for as much as in the place where he mentioneth the number of a thouſand, he treateth not of the eternal bleſſedneſs of the church, but only of the divers troubles which were to come upon the church while it yet travelled in earth. But the whole ſcripture crieth out that there ſhall be no end of the bleſſedneſs of the elect, nor of the puniſhment of the reprobate. Now of all things which both are hidden from our ſight and do far ſurpaſs the capacity of our mind, either we muſt fetch the credit out of the certain oracles of God, or we muſt utterly caſt it away. They which aſſign to the children of God a thouſand years to enjoy the inheritance of the life to come, do not mark how great a diſhonour they do both to Chriſt and his kingdom. For if they ſhall not be clothed with immortality: then neither is Chriſt himſelf, to whoſe glory they ſhall be newly faſhioned, received into the immortal glory. If their bleſſedneſs ſhall have any end: then the kingdom of Chriſt, upon the ſtedfaſtneſs whereof it ſtandeth, endureth but for a time. Finally, either they are moſt unſkilful of all matter concerning God, or they go about with perverſe maliciouſneſs to overthrow the whole grace of God, and power of Chriſt the fulfilling whereof is no otherwiſe perfect, but when ſin being blotted out and death ſwallowed up, eternal life is fully reſtored. But very blind men may ſee how fooliſhly they play the fools: which fear that they ſhould aſcribe to God too great cruelty if the reprobate be condemned to everlaſting pains. The Lord forſooth ſhall do wrong, if he deny his kingdom to them which have by their unthankfulneſs made themſelves unworthy of it. But (ſay they) their ſins endure but for a time. I grant: but the majeſty, yea and the righteouſneſs of God which they have offended by ſinning, is eternal. Worthily therefore the remembrance of iniquity dieth not: but ſo the pain exceedeth the meaſure of the fault. This is a blaſphemy not to be ſuffered, when the majeſty of God is ſo little ſet by, when the deſpiſing thereof is eſteemed at no greater value than the deſtruction of one ſoul. But let us leave theſe trifles, leaſt contrary to that which we have before ſaid, we may ſeem to judge their dotages worthy of confutation.

Their error who have thought that man is utterly extinguiſhed by death and that the ſouls ſhall as well be raiſed again as the bodies.

6. Beſide theſe, there have been two other doting errors brought in by men perverſly curious. The one ſort thought, as though the whole man died, that the ſouls ſhall riſe again with the bodies. The other foraſmuch as they grant that the ſouls are immortal ſpirits, ſay that they ſhall be clothed with new bodies: whereby they deny the reſurrection of the fleſh. Of the firſt ſort, becauſe I have touched ſomewhat in ſpeaking of the creation of man, it ſhall be enough for me to warn the readers again, how beaſtly an error it is to make of a ſpirit faſhioned after the image of God, a vaniſhing blaſt which doth nothing but quicken the body in this frail life, and to bring the temple of the holy Ghoſt to nothing. Finally, to ſpoil that part of us wherein divineneſs chiefly ſhineth and marks of immortality appear, to ſpoil it (I ſay) of this gift: ſo that the eſtate of the body ſhould be better and more excellent than the eſtate of the ſoul. The ſcripture teacheth far otherwiſe, which compareth the body to a cottage, out of which it ſaith that we remove when we die, becauſe it eſteemeth us by that part which maketh us differing from brutes beaſts. So Peter being nigh to death, ſaith that the time is come, when he muſt lay away his tabernacle. 1 Pet. i. 14. And Paul ſpeaking of the faithful, after that he hath ſaid: that when our earthly houſe ſhall be diſſolved, there is a building for us in heaven, adjoineth that we are abſent from the Lord ſo long as we abide in the body, but do deſire the preſence of God in the abſence of the body 2 Cor. v. 1. If the ſouls do not outlive the bodies, what is it that hath God preſent when it is ſevered from the body? but the apoſtle taketh away all doubting, when he teacheth that we are joined in fellowſhip to the ſpirits of the righteous. Heb. xii. 23. By which words he ſheweth, that we are joined in fellowſhip to the holy fathers, which even being dead do keep the ſame godlineſs with us, ſo that we cannot be the members of Chriſt unleſs we grow together with them. Unleſs alſo the ſouls being uncloathed of the bodies, did keep ſtill their ſubſtance and were able to receive bleſſed glory, Chriſt would not have ſaid to the thief: This day thou ſhalt be with me in paradiſe. Luk. xxiii. 43. Having ſo clear teſtimonies, let us not doubt after the example of Chriſt when we are dying, to commend our ſouls to God, or after the example of Stephen to commit them to Chriſt to keep, Act. vii. 59.

vii. 59. which not unworthily is called a faithful ſhepherd and biſhop of them. 1 Pet. ii. 25. To enquire of their mean ſtate, is neither lawful nor expedient. Many do much cumber themſelves with diſputing what place they keep, and whether they do now enjoy the heavenly glory or no. But it is folly and raſhneſs, to ſearch deeper of unknown things, than God doth give us leave to know. When the ſcripture hath ſaid that Chriſt is preſent with them, and receiveth them into paradiſe that they may enjoy comfort, Matth. v. 8. and 26. on the other ſide that the ſouls of the reprobate do ſuffer ſuch pains as they have deſerved: John. xii. 32. it goeth no further. What teacher or maſter ſhall now open to us that which God hath hidden? Of the place, the queſtion is no leſs fooliſh and vain: foraſmuch as we know that there is not the ſame dimenſion of the ſoul which is of the body. Whereas the bleſſed gathering together of holy ſpirits is called the boſom of Abraham, it is enough for us after this way faring to be received of the common father of the faithful, that he may communicate with us the fruit of his faith. In the mean time ſince the ſcripture every where biddeth us to depend upon the expectation of Chriſt's coming, and deferreth the crown of glory till then: let us be content with theſe bounds appointed us of God: namely, that the ſouls of the godly having ended the labour of their warfare do go into a bleſſed reſt, where with happy joyfulneſs they look for the enjoying of the promiſed glory: and that ſo all things are holden in ſuſpenſe till Chriſt the redeemer appear. As for the reprobate, it is no doubt that they have the ſame eſtate which Jude aſſigneth to the devils, to be holden bound with chains, till they be drawn to the puniſhment whereunto they are condemned. Jude. 6.

Their error which have imagined that we ſhall in the day of the reſurrection receive not the ſame bodies which die but others for them.

7. No leſs monſtrous is their error which imagine that ſouls ſhall not receive again the ſame bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but ſhall have new and other bodies. And the reaſon of the Manichees was very trifling, that is, that it is not meet that fleſh which is unclean ſhould riſe again. As though there were no uncleanneſs of ſouls, which yet they debarred not from the hope of everlaſting life. It was therefore all one as if they ſhould ſay that that which is infected with the filth of ſin cannot be cleanſed by God. For I now paſs over that dotage, that fleſh was naturally unclean, becauſe it was create of the devil: only I ſhew that whatſoever is now in us unworthy of heaven, it hindereth not the reſurrection. And firſt whereas Paul biddeth the faithful to cleanſe themſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and of the ſpirit, 2 Cor. vii. 1. thereupon followeth the judgment which he in another place pronounceth, that every man ſhall receive by his body either good or evil. 2 Cor. v. 10. Wherewith agreeth that which he writeth to the Corinthians, that the life of Jeſus Chriſt may be openly ſhewed in our mortal fleſh. 2 Cor. iv. 10. For which reaſon in another place he doth no leſs pray that God preſerve the bodies whole unto the day of Chriſt, than the ſouls and ſpirits. 1 Theſ. v. 23. And no marvel, becauſe it were a moſt great abſurdity that the bodies which God hath dedicate to be temples to himſelf, ſhould fall away into rottenneſs without hope of riſing again. What ſay we to this, that they are alſo the members of Chriſt? that God commandeth all the parts of them to be ſanctified to himſelf? 1 Cor vi. 15. that he willeth his name to be praiſed with tongues, pure hands to be lifted up to him, ſacrifices to be offered? 2 Tim. ii. 8. What madneſs is it therefore that that part to which the heavenly judge hath vouchſafed to grant ſo great honour, ſhould be brought from a mortal man into duſt without any hope of reſtoring? Likewiſe when Paul exhorteth us to ſerve the Lord as well in body as in ſoul, becauſe both belong to God, 1 Cor vi. 20. verily he ſuffereth not that which he challengeth to God as holy, to be adjudged to eternal rottenneſs. Neither is there a plainer determination of the ſcripture for any thing, than for the riſing again of this fleſh which we bear. This corruptible (ſaith Paul 1 Cor. xv. 53.) muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put no immortality. If God did make new bodies, where is this changing of quality? If it had been ſaid that we muſt be renewed, the doubtful ſpeech peradventure might have given occaſion to their cavil. But now when pointing with his finger to the bodies wherewith we are clothed, he promiſeth to them incorruption, he plainly enough denieth any new bodies to be made. Yea he could not (ſaith Tertullian) ſpeak more plainly, unleſs he had holden his own ſkin in his hand. And they can by no cavil eſcape from this, that where in another place he ſaith that Chriſt ſhall be the judge of the world, he allegeth this teſtimony of Iſaiah, I live (ſaith the Lord) every knee ſhall bow to me: Iſa. xlix. 18. for as much as he plainly pronounceth that they to whom he ſpeaketh ſhall be ſubject to yield yield an account of their life, which could not agree, if new bodies should be brought before the judgment seat. Now in the words of Daniel there is no doubtfulness. Dan. xii. And many of them that sleep in the earth of dust, shall awake, some to eternal life, and some to reproaches and to everlasting contempt: since he fetched not new matter out of the four elements to make men, but called dead men out of their graves. And this very plain reason teacheth. For if mortality which took beginning at the fall of man, be accidental: then the repairing which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same body which began to be mortal. And truly, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paul affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what manner of resurrection he preached: and that same laughing not smally availeth to strengthen our faith. The saying of Christ also is worthy to be noted. Fear them not which kill the body, and cannot kill the soul: but fear him which can throw both the soul and the body into hell fire, Matt. x. 28. For there is no cause to fear, unless the body which we now bear be subject to punishment. And no less plain is another saying of the same Christ, The hour cometh, when all they that are in their graves, shall hear the voice of the son of God, and shall come forth: they that have done good, into the resurrection of life: but they that have done evil, into the resurrection of condemnation. John. v. 28. Shall we say that souls rest in the graves, that they lying there may hear Christ? and not rather that at his commandment the bodies shall return into the livelineſs which they had lost? Moreover, if we shall have new bodies given us, where is the like fashioning of the head and the members? Christ rose again: was it with forging to himself a new body? No, but as he had said before, destroy this temple, and in three days I will build it up: John. ii. 19. he took again the same body which he had before born mortal. For he had not much profited us, if a new body being put in place, the old body had been destroyed which was offered up for a sacrifice of satisfactory cleansing. We must also hold fast that fellowship which the apostle preacheth. That we rise again, because Christ hath risen again. 1 Cor. xv. 12. for nothing is less probable than that our flesh in which we bear about the mortifying of Christ, should be deprived of the resurrection of Christ. Which verily appeared by a notable example, when at the rising again of Christ many bodies of the saints came out of the graves. Matth. xxvii. 52. For it cannot be denied that this was a foreshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which we hope for: such as was before in Enoch and Elias, whom Tertullian calleth new possessors of the resurrection: because they being in body and soul delivered from corruption, were received into the keeping of God.

The scripture teacheth every where the resurrection of the same flesh which perisheth, and not the creation of new.

8. I am ashamed in so clear a matter to spend so many words: but the readers shall contentedly bear this trouble with me, that no hole may be open for froward and bold wits to deceive the simple. The fleeing spirits with whom I now dispute, bring forth a feigned invention of their own brain that at the resurrection there shall be a creation of new bodies. What reason moveth them to think so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a carrion consumed with so long rottenness should return into his ancient state? Therefore only unbelief is the mother of this opinion. But us on the other side the Spirit of God every where in the scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of the flesh. For this reason baptism (as Paul witnesseth) is to us a seal of the resurrection to come: Col. ii. 12. and likewise the holy supper allureth us to the trust thereof, when we receive with our mouth the signs of spiritual grace. 2 Cor. vi. 4. and 7. And truly the whole exhortation of Paul, that we give our members to be weapons unto the obedience of righteousness, should be cold unless that were joined which he addeth afterward. He that hath raised up Christ from the dead, shall quicken also your mortal bodies. Rom. viii. For, what should it profit to apply our feet, hands, eyes, and tongues, unto the service of God, unless they were partakers of the fruit and reward? Which thing Paul plainly confirmeth with his own words, saying: The body is not for fornication, but for the Lord: and the Lord for the body. And he that hath raised up Christ, shall also raise us up by his power. More plain are those words which follow: that our bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost and the members of Christ, 1 Cor. vi. 12. and xv. 19. In the mean time we see how he joineth the resurrection with chastity and holiness, as a little after he saith that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Now it were not reasonable that the body of Paul, in which he hath born the prints of Christ, Gal. vi. 17. and in which he honourably glorified Christ, should lose the reward of the crown. Whereupon alſo came that glorying. We look for the redeemer from heaven, which ſhall make our vile bodies like faſhioned to his glorious body. Phil. iii. 21 And if this be true, that we muſt by many afflictions enter into the kingdom of God, Act. xiv. 22. no reaſon ſuffereth to debar the bodies from this entry which God both exerciſeth under the ſtandard of the croſs, and honoureth with the praiſe of victory. Therefore of this matter there aroſe among the ſaints no doubting, but that they hoped to be companions of Chriſt, which removeth into his own perſon all the afflictions wherewith we are proved, to teach that they bring life. Yea and under the law he exerciſed the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremony. For to what purpoſe ſerved the uſage of burying, as we have already ſhewed, but that they ſhould know that there is new life prepared for the bodies that are laid up? Hereunto alſo tended the ſpices and other ſigns of immortality, wherewith under the law the darkneſs of faith was aſſiſted even as it was by the ſacrifices. Neither was that manner bred by ſuperſtition, foraſmuch as we ſee that the ſpirit doth no leſs diligently rehearſe burials than the chief myſteries of faith. And Chriſt commendeth that work as a ſpecial work, Matth xxvi. 10. truly for none other reaſon but becauſe it lifteth up our eyes from beholding of the grave which corrupteth and deſtroyeth all, to the ſight of the renewing. Moreover the ſo diligent obſerving of the ceremony which is praiſed in the fathers, ſufficiently proveth that it was to them a rare and precious help of faith. For neither would Abraham have ſo carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, Gen. xxiii. 4. and 19. unleſs there had been ſet before his eyes a religion and a profit higher than the world, namely that garniſhing the dead body of his wife with the ſigns of the reſurrection he might confirm both his own faith and the faith of his houſhold. But a clearer proof of this thing appeareth in the example of Jacob, which to teſtify to his poſterity that the hope of the promiſed land was not even by death fallen out of his mind, commanded his bones to be carried thither. Gen. xlvii. 30. I beſeech you, if he was not to be clothed with a new body, ſhould he not have given a fooliſh commandment concerning duſt that ſhould be brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authority of the ſcripture be of any force with us, there can be required of no doctrine either a more clear or more certain proof. For this even children underſtand by the words of reſurrection, and raiſing up again. For neither can we call it the reſurrection that which is now firſt created, neither ſhould that ſaying of Chriſt ſtand faſt, whatſoever the father hath given me, it ſhall not periſh but I will raiſe it up in the laſt day. John vi. 33. To the ſame purpoſe ſerveth the word of ſleeping, which pertaineth only to the bodies. Whereupon alſo burying places were called Cœmeteria, ſleeping places. Now it remaineth that I ſpeak ſomewhat of the manner of the reſurrection. I uſe this word, becauſe Paul calling it a myſtery 1 Cor. xv. 51. exhorteth us to ſobriety, and bridleth the liberty to diſpute like philoſophers freely and ſubtilly of it. Firſt we muſt hold, as we have ſaid, that we ſhall riſe again in the ſame fleſh which we bear, as touching the ſubſtance, but the quality ſhall be other. As when the ſame fleſh of Chriſt which had been offered for ſacrifice, was raiſed up again, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had been altogeher another fleſh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one ſubſtance of the fleſh of a man, and of a beaſt, but not all one quality: as all ſtars have like matter, but not like brightneſs: ſo he teacheth that though we ſhall keep ſtill the ſubſtance of our body, yet there ſhall be a change, that the ſtate of it may be much more excellent. The body therefore, that we may be raiſed up again, ſhall not periſh nor vaniſh away: but putting off corruption, it ſhall put on incorruption. But for as much as God hath all the elements ready at his beck, no difficulty ſhall hinder him, but that he may command both the earth and waters and fire, to render that which ſeemeth to be conſumed by them. Which alſo Iſaiah teſtifieth though not without a figure, where he ſaith, Behold, the Lord ſhall go forth of his place, that he may viſit the iniquity of the earth: and the earth ſhall diſcover her blood, and ſhall no more hide her dead. Iſa. xxvi. 21. But there is to be noted a difference between them that have been dead long before, and thoſe whom that day ſhall find alive. For we ſhall not all ſleep (as Paul ſaith) but we ſhall all be changed, 1 Cor. xv. 51. that is to ſay, it ſhall not be of neceſſity that there be a diſtance of time between death and the beginning of the ſecond life: becauſe in a moment of time, and in the twinkling of an eye the ſound of the trumpet ſhall pierce, to raiſe up the dead incorruptible, and with a ſudden change to faſhion again the living into the ſame glory. So in another place he comforteth the faithful which muſt die; becauſe they which ſhall then remain alive ſhall not go before the dead, but rather they ſhall firſtriſe again which have ſlept in Chriſt. 1 Theſ. iv. 15. If any object that ſaying of the apoſtle, that it is appointed to all mortal men once to die, it is eaſy to anſwer it, with ſaying that when the ſtate of nature is changed, it is a kind of death, and is fitly ſo called. And therefore theſe things agree well together, that all ſhall be renewed by death when they ſhall put off their mortal body: and yet that it is not neceſſary that there be a ſevering of the body and the ſoul where there ſhall be a ſudden changing.

How it cometh to paſs that the wicked are to be raiſed from the dead as well as the juſt and righteous.

9. But here riſeth a harder queſtion; by what right the reſurrection which is the ſingular benefit of Chriſt is common alſo to the wicked and the accurſed of God. We know that all were in Adam condemned to the death. Chriſt came the reſurrection and life. Came he to give life to all mankind univerſally without choice? But what is more againſt reaſon than that, they ſhould by their oſtinate blindneſs obtain that which the godly worſhippers of God do obtain only by faith? Yet this remaineth certain, that there ſhall be one reſurrection unto condemnation, and another reſurrection unto life, and that Chriſt ſhall come to ſevere the lambs from the goats, John xi. 25. Matth. xxv. 31. I anſwer, that this ought not to ſeem ſtrange, the likeneſs whereof we ſee in daily experience. We ſee that in Adam we were deprived of the inheritance of the whole world, and that we are by no leſs juſt reaſon debarred from common food, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whence then cometh it to paſs, that God doth not only make his ſun to riſe upon the good and evil, (Mat. v. 45.) but as touching the uſes of this preſent life, his ineſtimable liberality continually floweth forth to them with large plentiouſneſs? Hereby verily we know that thoſe things which properly belong to Chriſt and his members, do alſo overflow to the wicked, not that it is their rightful poſſeſſion, but that they may be made the more inexcuſable. So the wicked do often times find God beneficial, by more than mean proofs, yea, ſuch as ſometimes do darken all the bleſſings of the godly, but yet do turn to their greater damnation. If any man object, that the reſurrection is not fitly compared to fading and earthly benefit: here alſo I anſwer that ſo ſoon as they were eſtranged from God the fountain of life, they deſerved the death of the devil, whereby they ſhould be utterly deſtroyed. Yet by the marvellous counſel of God there was found a middle ſtate that out of life they might live in death. No more abſurd ought it to ſeem, if the reſurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them againſt their wills to the judgment ſeat of of Chriſt, whom now they refuſe to hear for their maſter and teacher. For it were a ſmall pain to be conſumed away with death, if they were not to ſuffer puniſhment for their obſtinacy, brought before the judge, whoſe vengeance they have without end and meaſure provoked againſt themſelves. But although we muſt hold that which we have ſaid, and which that notable confeſſion of Paul before Fœlix containeth, that he looketh for the reſurrection of the righteous, and wicked, Acts xxiv. 15. Yet the ſcripture oftentimes ſetteth forth election together with the heavenly glory to the children of God only: becauſe Chriſt properly came not to the deſtruction, but to the ſalvation of the world. Therefore in the creed there is made mention of the bleſſed life only.

The incomprehenſible excellency of that eternal bleſſedneſs whereof we have herein taſte given us, and look for the perfect fruition hereafter in the world to come.

10. But foraſmuch as the prophecy of death ſwallowed up by victory, (Hoſea xiii. 14.) ſhall then and not till then be fulfilled: let us alway have in mind the eternal felicity, the end of the reſurrection: of the excellency whereof, if all things were ſpoken which the tongues of men were able to ſpeak, yet ſcarcely the ſmalleſt parcel thereof ſhould be expreſſed. For howſoever we truly hear that the kingdom of God ſhall be filled full with brightneſs, joy, felicity, and glory: yet thoſe things that are ſpoken of are moſt far removed from our ſenſe, and remain as it were wrapped in dark ſpeeches, until that day come when he himſelf ſhall give to us his glory to be ſeen face to face. We know (ſaith John) that we are the children of God, but it doth not yet appear what we ſhall be. But when we ſhall be like to him, then we ſhall ſee him ſuch as he is, 1 John iii. 2. Wherefore the prophets, becauſe they could by no words expreſs the ſpiritual bleſſedneſs in it ſelf, did in a manner groſly pourtray it out under bodily things. But foraſmuch as the ferventneſs of deſire muſt with ſome taſte of that ſweetneſs be kindled in us, let us chiefly continue in this thought, that if God do as a certain fountain which cannot be drawn dry, contain in him the fulneſs of all good things, nothing is beyond him to be deſired of them that tend toward the ſovereign good and the full perfection of felici ty: as we are taught in many places. Abraham, I am thy exceeding great reward, Gen. xv. 2. With which saying accordeth David. The Lord is my portion, the lot hath very well fallen to me, Psal. xvi. 6. Again in another place, I shall be satisfied with thy countenance, Psal. xvii. 15. But Peter pronounceth that the faithful are called to this end, that they may be made partakers of the divine nature.. How so? because he shall be glorified in all his saints, and shall be admired in them that have believed. If the Lord will impart his glory, power and righteousness to his elect, yea and will give himself to them to be enjoyed, and (which is better) will after a certain manner become one with them: let us remember that under this benefit is contained all kind of felicity. And when we have much profited in this meditation, let us confess that we yet stay beneath at the bottom of the roots, if the conceiving of our mind be compared with the highness of this mystery. Wherefore in this behalf we must keep sobriety, lest with how much greater boldness we shall fly up on high being unmindful of our own small measure, so much more the brightness of the heavenly glory overwhelm us. We feel also how the insatiable greediness to know more than is lawful, tickleth us: from whence both trifling and hurtful questions do spring from time to time: trifling I call those of which there can no profit be gathered. But this second kind is worse, because they which give themselves to them, do entangle themselves with pernicious speculations, and therefore I call them hurtful. That which the scriptures do teach, ought to be out of all doubt with us: namely that as God diversly distributing his gifts to the saints in this world, doth unequally enlighten them, so the measure of glory shall not be equal in heaven where God shall crown his gifts. For neither doth this belong indifferently to all which Paul saith: ye are my glory and crown in the day of Christ, 1 Thess. ii. 19. Nor also that saying of Christ to the apostles: ye shall sit judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matth. xix. 28. But Paul (which knew that as God enricheth the saints with spiritual gifts on earth, so he beautifieth them with glory in heaven) doubteth not that there is a peculiar crown laid up for him according to the rate of his labours. And Christ to set forth to the apostles the dignity of the office which they did bear, telleth them that the fruit thereof is laid up for them in heaven. So Daniel also saith, But the wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever, Dan. xii. 3. And if a man heedfully consider the scriptures, they do not only promise eternal life to the faithful, but also special reward to every one. Whereupon cometh that saying of Paul, The Lord render to him in that day, 2 Tim. iv. 14. Which the promise of Christ confirmeth, Ye shall receive a hundred fold in the eternal life, Matth. xii. 29. Finally, as Christ beginneth in this world the glory of his body with manifold diversity of gift, and increaseth it by degrees: so he shall also make it perfect in heaven.

Curious questions concerning the different degrees of blessedness.

11. But as all the godly will receive this with one consent, because it is sufficiently testified by the word of God: so on the other side leaving difficult questions, which they shall know to be a hindrance to them, they will not pass their appointed bounds. As for my part, I do not only privately forbear superfluous searching of unprofitable things, but I also think that I ought to beware that I do not with answering nourish the lightness of other. Men desirous of vain knowlege do ask how great shall be the distance between the prophets and the apostles, and again between the apostles, and the martyrs: how many degrees virgins differ from married folks: finally, they leave no corner of heaven unsearched. Then it cometh to their minds to enquire to what purpose serveth the repairing of the world, since the children of God shall need nothing of all this so great and incomparable plenty: but shall be like to the angels, whose not eating is a sign of the eternal blessedness. But I answer that in the very sight there shall be so great pleasantness, so great sweetness in the knowlege only without any use, that this felicity shall far pass all the helps wherewith we be now assisted. Let us imagine our selves to be set in the most wealthy coast of the world, and where we shall want no pleasure: yet who is there whom his sickness do not sometime hinder and not suffer to use the benefits of God? who is there whose course his own intemperance doth not oft break in sunder? Whereupon followeth that a clear enjoying and pure from all fault, although there be no use of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicity. Some go further and ask whether dross and other corruptions in metals, be not far from restoring and are contrary to it. Which though in some respects I grant, yet I look with Paul for the repairing of these faults which took their beginning at sin, toward which repairing ing they groan and are in travel, Rom. viii. 22. Yet they proceed further, and aſk what better eſtate is prepared for man, ſince the bleſſing of iſſue ſhall then be at an end. This knot is alſo eaſy to be looſed. Whereas the ſcripture ſo honourably ſetteth out that kind of bleſſing, that is referred to the increaſes wherewith God continually draweth forward the order of nature to her mark: but in the perfection it is known that there is another manner. But ſince the unwary are eaſily taken with allurements, and then the maze draweth them in deeper, and at length when every man's devices pleaſe himſelf there is no end of ſtriving: therefore let this be a ſhort way for us, to be contented with the glaſs and dark ſpeech until we ſhall ſee face to face. For few of a great multitude care which way they may go to heaven: but all do before their time covet to know what is done there. All being commonly ſluggiſh and ſlow to enter into battles, do already paint out to themſelves imagined triumphs.

The grievous torments which God hath prepared for the wicked.

12. Now becauſe no deſcription can match the grievouſneſs of the vengeance of God upon the reprobate, their torments and pains are figured to us by bodily things, namely, by darkneſs, weeping, gnaſhing of teeth, unquenchable fire, and a worm endleſly gnawing the heart, Matth. viii. 12. and xxii. 13. Mark ix. 43. For by ſuch manners of ſpeech it is certain that the holy Ghoſt meant to trouble all our ſenſes with horror: as when it is ſaid that there is prepared from eternity a deep hell, that the fuel thereof are fire and much wood: that the blaſt of the Lord, as a ſtream of brimſtone doth kindle it, Iſa. lxvi. 24. Iſa. xxx. 33. As by ſuch things we muſt be aſſiſted after a certain manner to conceive the miſerable ſtate of the wicked, ſo we ought chiefly to faſten our thought upon this, how wretched a thing it is to be eſtranged from the fellowſhip of God: and not that only, but alſo to feel the majeſty of God ſo bent againſt thee, that thou canſt not eſcape but be ſore cruſhed of it. For firſt his diſpleaſure is like a moſt violent fire, with touching whereof all things are devoured and ſwallowed up. Then, all creatures ſo ſerve him to execute his judgment, that they to whom the Lord ſhall ſo ſhew his wrath, ſhall feel the heaven, earth, ſea, and beaſts, as it were with cruel indignation inflamed againſt them, and armed to their deſtruction. Whereof it is no ſmall thing that apoſtle pronounceth, when he ſaith, that the unbelieving ſhall ſuffer eternal puniſhment by dying from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, 1 Theſſ. i. 9. And ſo oft as the prophets do caſt us in fear with bodily figures, although they ſpeak nothing exceſſively for our dulneſs, yet they add foreſhewings of the judgment to come, in the ſun and the moon and the whole frame of the world. Wherefore the unhappy conſciences do find no reſt, from being vexed and toſſed with a terrible whirlwind, from feeling themſelves to be torn in pieces by God being angrily bent againſt them, for being pierced and lanced with deadly ſtings, from trembling at the lightning of God, and being bruiſed with the weight of his hand; ſo that it is much more eaſy to enter into all bottomleſs depths and devouring pits, than to ſtand one moment in thoſe terrors. What and how great then is this, to be preſſed with everlaſting and never ceaſing ſiege of him? Of which thing the xc. Pſalm containeth a notable ſentence: that although with a ſight only he ſcatter abroad all mortal men and bringeth them to nought, yet his worſhippers, how much more fearful they are in the world, ſo much more he enforceth them and pricketh them forward loaden with the croſs, until he be all in all.

THE END OF THE THIRD BOOK.

THE INSTITUTION OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

BOOK FOURTH

Which treateth of the OUTWARD MEANS or HELPS, whereby God allureth us into the fellowship of Christ, and holdeth us therein.

CHAP. I.

Of the true church with which we ought to keep unity, because it is the mother of all the godly.

The sum of the former book, and the drift of this which concerneth the Church.

THAT by faith of the gospel, Christ is become ours, and we are made partakers of the salvation brought by him, and of eternal blessedness, is already declared in the last book. But because our rudeness and slothfulness, yea and vanity of wit, do need outward helps whereby faith in us may both be ingendred, and grow and increase in proceeding toward the mark whereunto it tendeth: God hath also added them thereby to provide for our weakness. And that the preaching of the gospel might flourish, he hath left this treasure with the church. He hath appointed pastors and teachers, by whose mouth he might teach them that are his: Eph. iv. 11. he hath furnished them with authority, finally, he hath left nothing undone that might avail to the holy consent of faith, and right order. First of all he hath ordained sacraments, which we feel by experience to be more than profitable helps to nourish and confirm faith. For being inclosed in the prison of our flesh, we do not yet attain to the degree of angels, God suiting himself to our capacity according to his wonderful providence, hath appointed a mean whereby we being far distant from him might come unto him, Wherefore the order of teaching requireth that now we treat of the church, and of the government, orders and power of it, and then of the sacraments, ſacraments, and laſtly of the civil order: and therewithal that we call away the godly readers from thoſe corruptions wherewith Satan and the papacy hath depraved all things that God hath appointed for our ſalvation. I will begin at the church, into whoſe boſom God will have his children to be gathered together, not only that they ſhould by her help and miniſtry be nouriſhed while they are infants and young children, but alſo be ruled by her motherly care till they grow to riper age, and at length come to the mark of faith. For it is not lawful that thoſe things be ſevered which God hath conjoined, Matth. x. 9. that to whom he is a father, the church be alſo their mother: and that not only under the law, but alſo ſince the coming of Chriſt, as Paul witneſſeth, who teacheth, that we are the children of the new and heavenly Jeruſalem. Gal. iv. 26.

The church inviſible which in the creed we profeſs that we believe.

2. In the Creed, where we profeſs that we believe the church, that is not ſpoken only of the viſible church whereof we now treat, but of all the elect of God in whoſe number they are alſo comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word believe is there ſet, becauſe oftentimes there can no other difference be noted between the children of God, and the ungodly, between his peculiar flock, and ſavage beaſts. For whereas many do interlace this word, In, that is without probable reaſon. I grant indeed that it is the more commonly uſed, and alſo wanteth not the conſenting teſtimony of antiquity, foraſmuch as even the Nicene creed, as it is reported in the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, addeth the propoſition, In. But therewithal we may mark by the writings of the ancient fathers, that it was received without controverſy to ſay, that they believed the church and not in the church. For Auguſtine, and that ancient writer whatſoever he was, whoſe work remaineth under the name of Cyprian concerning the expoſition of the creed, do not only ſo ſpeak themſelves, but alſo do expreſly note that it would be an unproper manner of ſpeaking if the prepoſition were adjoined, and they confirm their opinion with no trifling reaſon. For we therefore teſtify that we believe in God, becauſe upon him as a true ſpeaker our mind repoſeth it ſelf, and in him our confidence reſteth, which could not ſo conveniently be ſpoken to ſay in the church no more than it could be ſaid, I believe in the forgiveneſs of ſins, or in the reſurrection of the fleſh. Therefore although I would not ſtrive about words, yet I had rather follow the propriety of ſpeaking that ſhould be fitteſt to expreſs the matter, than curiouſly to ſeek for forms of ſpeech whereby the matter may without cauſe be darkened. But the end is, that that we ſhould know that although the devil attempt all means to overthrow the grace of Chriſt, and though the enemies of God be carried with violent rage to the ſame intent: yet it cannot be extinguiſhed, nor the blood of Chriſt be made barren but that it will bring forth ſome fruit. And ſo is both the ſecret election of God and his inward calling to be conſidered: becauſe he alone knoweth who be his, and holdeth them incloſed under a ſeal as Paul termeth it: ſaying that they bear his tokens whereby they may be ſeverally known from the reprobate. Ephe. i. 13. But becauſe a ſmall and contemptible number lieth hid under a huge multitude, and a few grains of wheat are covered with a heap of chaff, to God only is to be left the the knowlege of his church, the foundation whereof is his ſecret election. But it is not ſufficient to conceive in thought and mind the multitude of the elect, unleſs we think upon ſuch an unity of the church into which we be truly perſuaded that we our ſelves be ingraffed. For unleſs we be under our head Chriſt united together with all the reſt of his members, there abideth for us no hope of the inheritance to come. It is therefore called catholic or univerſal, becauſe we cannot find two or three churches but that Chriſt muſt be torn in ſunder, which cannot be done. But all the elect of God are ſo knit together in Chriſt, that as they depend upon one head, ſo they may grow together as it were into one body, cleaving together with ſuch a compacting of joints as the members of one ſelf body: being truly made one, which with one hope, faith, charity, with one ſelf ſame ſpirit of God do live together, being called not only into one inheritance of eternal life, but alſo into one partaking of one God and Chriſt. Wherefore although the ſorrowful deſolation that on each ſide preſenteth it ſelf in ſight, crieth out that there is nothing left of the church,, yet let us know that Chriſt's death is fruitful, and that God marvellouſly as it were in ſecret corners preſerveth his church. As it was ſaid to Elias, I have kept to my ſelf ſeven thouſand men that have not bowed their knee before Baal. 1 Kings xix. 18.

The article of the creed touching the church, concerneth, af-

3. Altho' this article of the creed doth in ſome reſpect belong to the outward church, that every one of us ſhould hold himſelf in brotherly conſent with all ter a ſort the viſible church, whereunto the communion of ſaints being added containeth four ſpecial ſtays of faith.

the children of God, ſhould yield unto the church that authority which it deſerveth, finally ſhould ſo behave himſelf as a ſheep of the flock. And therefore is adjoined the communion of ſaints. Which parcel, although commonly the old writers do leave it out, yet is not to be neglected: becauſe it very well expreſſeth the quality of the church: as if it had been ſaid that the ſaints are gathered together into the fellowſhip of Chriſt with this condition, that whatſoever benefits God beſtoweth upon them, they ſhould continually communicate them one to another. Whereby yet the diverſity of graces is not taken away. As we know that the gifts of the holy Ghoſt are diverſly diſtributed: neither is the order of civil government diſturbed, by which it is lawful for every man privately to enjoy his own poſſeſſions, as it is neceſſary, that for preſervation of peace among men, they ſhould have among themſelves peculiar and divided properties of things. But there is a community affirmed, ſuch as Luke deſcribeth, that of the multitude of the believers there was one heart and one ſoul. Act. iv. 31. and Paul, when he exhorteth the Epheſians to be one body, one ſpirit as they be called in one hope. Eph. iv. 4. For it is not poſſible, if they be truly perſuaded that God is the common father, and the common head to them all, but that being united among themſelves with brotherly love, they ſhould continually communicate thoſe things that they have. Now it much behoveth us to know what profit thereupon returneth unto us. For we believe the church to this end, that we may be certainly perſuaded that we are the members of it. For by this means, our ſalvation reſteth upon ſure found ſtays, that it, although the whole frame of the world be ſhaken, cannot come to ruin and fall down. Firſt it ſtandeth with God's election, neither can it vary or fail but together with his eternal providence. Then, it is after a certain manner joined with the ſtedfaſtneſs of Chriſt, which will no more ſuffer his faithful to be plucked from him, than his own members to be rent and torn in pieces. Beſide that, we are aſſured that truth ſhall alway abide with us, ſo long as we are holden in the boſom of the church. Laſt of all, that we feel that theſe promiſes belong to us, there ſhall be ſalvation in Sion, Joel. ii. 32. God ſhall for ever abide in Jeruſalem, that it may not at any time be moved. Pſal. xlvi. 6. So much can the partaking of the church do, that it holdeth us in the fellowſhip of God. Alſo in the very word communion is much comfort: becauſe while it remaineth certain, that whatſoever the Lord giveth to his and our members, belongeth to us, our hope is by all their good things confirmed. But in ſuch ſort to embrace the unity of the church, it is not needful (as we have already ſaid) to ſee the church it ſelf with our eyes, or feel it with our hands: but rather by this that it conſiſteth in faith, we are admoniſhed that we ought no leſs to think it to be, when it paſſeth our underſtanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our faith therefore the worſe, becauſeth it conceiveth it unknown: foraſmuch as we are not herein commanded to diſcern the reprobate from the elect (which is the office of God only, and not ours) but to determine aſſuredly in our minds, that all they that by the merciful kindneſs of God the father through the effectual working of the holy Ghoſt, are come into the peculiar right and proper poſſeſſion of Chriſt: and that, foraſmuch as we be in the number of thoſe, we are partakers of ſo great a grace.

The church the mother of the faithful.

4. But ſince it is now our purpoſe to treat of the viſible church, let us learn even by this one title of mother, how much the knowlege thereof is profitable, yea neceſſary for us: foraſmuch as there is no other entry into life, unleſs ſhe conceive us in her womb, unleſs ſhe bring us forth, unleſs ſhe feed us with her breaſts, finally, unleſs ſhe keep us under her cuſtody and government until ſuch time as being unclothed of mortal fleſh we ſhall be like unto angels. Matth. xxii. 30. For our weakneſs ſuffereth us not to be diſmiſſed from ſchool, till we have been ſcholars throughout the whole courſe of our life Beſide that out of her boſom there is no forgiveneſs of ſins, and no ſalvation to be hoped for, as witneſſeth Iſaiah and Joel, with whom agreeth Ezekiel when he declareth that they ſhall not be in the number of God's people whom he putteth away from the heavenly life. Iſa. xxxvii. 31. Joel. ii. 32. Ezek. xiii. 9. As on the contrary ſide, they are ſaid to write their names among the citizens of Jeruſalem, that turn themſelves to the following of true godlineſs, After which manner it is alſo ſaid in another Pſalm: Pſal. cvi. 4. Remember me, Lord, in the good will of thy people: viſit me in thy ſalvation that I may ſee the benefits of thy elect, that I may be merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may rejoice with thy inheritance. In which words the fatherly favour of God, and the peculiar teſtimony of the ſpiritual life is reſtrained to his flock, ſo that the departing from the church is always damnable.

The miniſtry of the church together with the neceſſity and uſe thereof.

5. But let us proceed to proſecute that which properly belongeth to this place. Paul writeth that Chriſt, that he might fulfil all things, gave ſome apoſtles, ſome prophets, ſome evangeliſts, and ſome paſtors and teachers, for the perfecting of the ſaints, into the work of the miniſtry, unto the edification of the body of Chriſt, until we all come into the unity of faith and of the knowlege of the ſon of God, unto a perfect man, and to the meaſure of the full grown age of Chriſt. Eph. iv. 11. We ſee how God, who was able to make them that be his perfect in a moment, yet will not have them grow into manly age but by the bringing up of the church. We ſee the mean expreſſed, for that unto the paſtors is enjoined the preaching of the heavenly doctrine. We ſee how all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they ſhould with mild ſpirit and willing to learn, yield themſelves to the teachers appointed for that uſe. And by this mark Iſaiah had long before ſet out the kingdom of Chriſt, where he ſaith: Iſa. lix. 21. my ſpirit which is in thee, and the words that I have put in thy mouth ſhall never depart, neither out of thy mouth nor out of the mouth of thy ſeed and thy childrens children. Whereupon followeth that they are worthy to periſh with famine and pining hunger, whoſoever they be that refuſe the ſpiritual meat of the ſoul reached unto them of God by the hands of the church. GOD doth breathe faith into us, but by the inſtrument of his goſpel, as Paul ſaith that faith is by hearing. Rom. x. 17. As alſo with God remaineth his power to ſave, but (as the ſame Paul witneſſeth) he uttereth and diſplayeth the ſame in the preaching of the goſpel. For this reaſon in old time he willed that there ſhould be made holy aſſemblies to the ſanctuary, that doctrine uttered by the mouth of the prieſt ſhoud nouriſh the conſent of faith. And to no other end thoſe glorious titles have reſpect, where the temple is called the reſt of God, and the ſanctuary his houſe, where he is ſaid to ſit between the cherubims: Pſal. cxxxii. 14. Pſal. lxxx. 2. but to bring eſtimation, love, reverence and dignity to the miniſtry of the heavenly doctrine, which otherwiſe the ſight of a mortal and deſpiſed man would not a little diminiſh. Therefore that we ſhould know, that out of earthen veſſels is brought forth unto us ineſtimable treaſure, 1 Cor. iv. 7. God himſelf cometh forth, and in as much as he is the author of this degree, ſo he will have himſelf to be acknowleged preſent in his inſtitution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to give themſelves to judgment by flying of birds, to ſoothſayings, magical arts, necromancy and other ſuperſtitions, he immediately addeth that he will give them that which ought to ſuffice inſtead of all, that is to ſay, that they ſhall never be deſtitute of prophets. Levit. xix. 31. But like as he ſent not the old people to angels, but raiſed up teachers out of the earth, which might truly perform the office of angels: ſo at this day alſo his will is to teach us by men. And as in the old time he was not content with the law only, but added prieſts for expoſitors, at whoſe lips the people ſhould enquire for the true meaning thereof: ſo at this day he not only willeth us to be heedfully bent to reading, but alſo appointeth maſters over us, by whoſe labour we may be aſſiſted: whereof cometh double profit. For on the one part by a very good trial it proveth our obedience, when we hear his miniſters ſpeaking even as it were himſelf. On the other ſide it alſo provideth for our weakneſs, while after the manner of men, he had rather ſpeak unto us by interpreters to allure us unto him, than with thundering drive us away from him. And truly how expedient this familiar manner of teaching is for us, all the godly do feel by the fear wherewith the majeſty of God doth worthily aſtoniſh them. But they that think that the authority of the doctrine is abaſed by the contempt of the men that are called to teach, do bewray their unthankfulneſs, becauſe among ſo many excellent gifts wherewith God hath garniſhed mankind: this is a ſingular prerogative, that he vouchſafeth to conſecrate the mouths and tongues of men to himſelf, that his own voice ſhould ſound in them. Wherefore on our behalfs let us not be grieved obediently to embrace the doctrine of ſalvation ſet forth by his commandment and by his own mouth: becauſe although the power of God is not bound to outward means, yet he hath bound us to the ordinary manner of teaching: which while frantic men refuſe to keep, they wrap themſelves in many deadly ſnares. Either pride, or diſdainfulneſs, or envy moveth many to perſuade themſelves that they can ſufficiently profit by their own private reading and ſtudy, and ſo to deſpiſe public aſſemblies, and to account preaching ſuperfluous. But ſince they do as much as in them to looſe or break in ſunder the holy bond of unity, no man eſcapeth the due puniſhment of this divorce, but he bewitcheth himſelf with peſtilent errors and moſt wicked dotages. Wherefore, that the pure ſimplicity of faith may flouriſh among us, let us not be grieved to uſe this exerciſe of godlineſs, which God by his inſtitution hath ſhewed to be neceſſary for us and ſo earneſtly commendeth. But there was never yet found any even of the moſt wanton dogs which would ſay that we ought to ſtop our ears againſt God: but in all ages the prophets and godly teachers have had a hard ſtrife againſt the wicked, whoſe ſtubborneſs can never come under this yoke, to be taught by the mouth of the miniſtry of men. Which is as much as to blot out the face of GOD which ſhineth to us in doctrine. For in old time the faithful were commanded to ſeek the face of God in the ſanctuary, Pſal. cxv. 4. and the ſame is ſo oft repeated in the law for no other cauſe, but for that the doctrine of the law and the exhortations of the prophets were to them a lively image of God: as Paul affirmeth that in his preaching ſhineth the glory of God in the face of Chriſt. 1 Cor. iii. 6. How much the more deteſtable are the apoſtates, which greedily ſeek to divide churches, as though they did drive ſheep from their folds and caſt them into the mouths of wolves. But we muſt hold that which he hath alleged out of Paul, that the church is no otherwiſe builded but by outward preaching, and that the holy ones are holden together with no other bond but when with learning and profiting with one conſent they keep the order appointed by God to the church. To this end principally, as I have ſaid, the faithful in old time under the law were commanded to reſort to the ſanctuary. Becauſe when Moſes ſpeaketh of the dwelling place of God, he doth therewithal call it the place of name, where God hath ſet the memory of his name. Exod. xx. 24. Whereby he plainly teacheth that without the doctrine of godlineſs there is no uſe thereof. And it is not doubtful but that for the ſame reaſon David with great bitterneſs of ſpirit complaineth that he is by the tyrannous cruelty of his enemies kept from entring into the tabernacle. It ſeemeth commonly to many a childiſh lamentation, becauſe it ſhould be but a very ſmall loſs, and alſo no great pleaſure ſhould be foregone thereby, to want the entry of the temple, ſo that there were enough of other delightful things. But he bewaileth that with this one grief, anguiſh and ſorrow, he is fretted and vexed and in a manner waſted. For nothing is of greater eſtimation with the faithful, than this help whereby God by degrees lifteth up his on high. For this is alſo to be noted, that God in the mirror of his doctrine always ſo ſhewed himſelf to the holy fathers, that the knowlege was ſpiritual. Wherefore the temple is called not only his face, but alſo (to take away all ſuperſtition) his footſtool. And this is that happy meeting into unity of faith, while from the higheſt even to the loweſt all do aſpire to the head. All the temples that ever the gentiles upon any other purpoſe builded to God, were but a mere prophaning of his worſhip: whereunto though not with like groſſneſs, yet in ſome degree the Jews fell. Pſal. cxxxii. 7. Pſal. xcix. 5. 1 Pet. ii. 8 Whereof Stephen out of the mouth of Iſaiah reproacheth them where he ſaith, that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, &c. Act. vii. 48. Becauſe only God doth by his word ſanctify to himſelf temples to the lawful uſe. And if we raſhly attempt any thing without his commandment, by and by to an evil beginning do cleave new devices by which the evil is ſpread abroad without meaſure. Yet Xerxes, when by the counſel of the magicians he burned up or plucked down all the temples of Greece, indiſcreetly ſaid, that the gods to whom all things ought to be freely open were incloſed within walls and tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the intent he might be near us, after a certain manner to deſcend unto us, and yet neither to change place, nor to faſten us to earthly means: but rather by certain chariots to carry us up to his heavenly glory, which with the immeaſurable greatneſs thereof filleth all things, yea and in height ſurmounteth the heavens.

The force of eccleſiaſtical miniſters.

6. Now foraſmuch as at this time there hath been great ſtrife about the effectualneſs of the miniſtry, while ſome exceſſively amplify the dignity thereof: and ſome others affirm that that which is properly belonging to the holy Ghoſt is wrongfully given away to mortal man, if we think that miniſters and teachers do pierce to the minds and hearts, to amend as well the blindneſs of the minds as the hardneſs of hearts: it is meet that we give a right determination of this controverſy. All that they contend on both parts ſhall eaſily be accorded by expreſly noting the places where God the author of preaching joining his Spirit with it promiſeth fruit thereof: or again, when ſerving himſelf from outward helps he challengeth to himſelf alone as well the beginnings of faith as the whole courſe thereof. It was the office of the ſecond Elias (as Malachi witneſſeth, Mal. iv. 6.) to enlighten the minds and to turn the hearts of fathers to the children, and unbelievers believers to the wisdom of the righteous. Christ pronounceth that he sendeth the apostles, that they should bring fruit of their labour, John xv. 16. But what that fruit is Peter shortly defineth, saying that we are regenerate with incorruptible seed, 1 Pet. i. 23. And therefore Paul glorieth that he by the gospel begat the Corinthians, and that they were the seal of his apostleship, 1 Cor. iv. 15. Yea that he was not a literal minister, 1 Cor. ix. 2. such as did only beat the ears with sound of voice, but that there was given him an effectualness of spirit, that his doctrine should not be unprofitable, 2 Cor. iii. 6. In which meaning also in another place he saith, that his gospel was not in word only, but in power, 1 Cor. ii. 4. He affirmeth also that the Galatians by hearing received the spirit of faith, Gal iii. 2. Finally in many places he maketh himself not only a worker together with God, but also assigneth himself the office of giving salvation. 1 Cor. iii 9. Truly he never brought forth all these things to this intent to give unto himself any thing were it never so little separately from God: as in another place he briefly declareth, saying, our labour was not unprofitable in the Lord, according to his power mightily working in me, 1 Thess. iii. 5. Again in another place he that was mighty in Peter toward the circumcision, was also mighty in me toward the gentiles, Gal. ii. 8. But how he leaveth nothing severally to the ministers, appeareth by other places, as, he that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but God that giveth the increase, 1 Cor. iii. 7. Again, I have laboured more than all: yet not I, but the grace of God that is with me. And truly we must hold fast those sayings, where God ascribing to himself the enlightning of the mind, and the renewing of the heart teacheth that it is a robbery of God if man take upon himself any part of either of them. In the mean time if any man offer himself to the ministers whom God ordaineth, willing to learn, he shall know by the fruit, that this manner of teaching not in vain pleased God, and that this yoke of modesty was not in vain laid upon the faithful.

The scripture speaketh both of a visible church, and of a church which is invisible.

7. But as for the church visible and which is within the compass of our knowlege, what judgment is meet to be given thereof, I think it already appeareth evidently by that which we have before said. For we have said, that the holy scripture speaketh of the church after two sorts. Sometimes, when it nameth the church, it meaneth that church which is indeed before God, into which none are received but they that are both by grace of adoption the children of God, and by sanctification of the Spirit the true members of Christ. And then truly it comprehendeth not only the saints that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that have been since the beginning of the world. But oftentimes under the name of the church it signifieth the universal multitude of men scattered abroad in the world, which profess that they worship one God, and Christ, by baptism enter into his faith, by partaking of the supper testify their unity in true doctrine and charity, have an agreement in the word of the Lord, and for the preaching thereof do keep the ministry ordained by Christ, but the name and outward shew: there be many ambitious, covetous, envious, evil speakers, some of unclean life which be suffered for a time, either because they cannot by lawful order of judgment be convinced or because there is not always in use that severity of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as we must needs believe that the church which is invisible to us, is to be seen with the eyes of God only so are we commanded to regard this church which is called a church in respect of men, and to keep the communion of it, 2 Tim. ii. 19.

Properly, truly and infallibly God alone knoweth who are his.

8. Therefore so much as behooved us to know it, the Lord hath set it out by certain marks and as it were signs unto us. This is indeed the singular prerogative of God himself, to know who are his, as we have already alleged out of Paul. And truly that the rashness of men should not creep so far, it is provided by the very success of things daily putting us in mind, how far his secret judgments do surmount our understanding. For even they that seemed most desperate, and accounted utterly past hope, are by his goodness called back into the way: and they that seemed to stand fast in comparison of others, do oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine saith, Hom. in Joan. 45.) there are many sheep without, and many wolves within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that know neither him nor themselves. But of those that openly bear his badge, his eyes only do see who are both holy without feigning, and who will continue even to the end, which is the very chief point of salvation. Yet on the other side, forasmuch as he foresaw it to be somewhat expedient, that we should know who were to be accounted his children, he hath in this part applied himself to our capacity. And because the certainty of faith was not neceſſary, he hath put in place thereof a certain judgment of charity: whereby we ſhould acknowlege for members of the church thoſe that both with confeſſion of faith, and with example of life, and with partaking of ſacraments, do profeſs the ſame God and Chriſt with us. But as for the knowlege of the body thereof, how much more that he knew it to be neceſſary for our ſalvation, with ſo much the more certain marks he hath ſet it out.

One way to know what church is true and another who are the true members of the church.

9. Lo hereupon groweth and ariſeth unto us, a face of the church viſible to our eyes. For whereſoever we ſee the word of God to be purely preached and heard, and the ſacraments to be adminiſtred according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, there it is in no wiſe to be doubted that there is ſome church of God: foraſmuch as his promiſe cannot deceive, Whereſoever two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the midſt of them, Mat. xviii. 20. But that we may evidently underſtand the ſum of this matter, we muſt proceed by theſe as it were by degrees: that is to ſay, that the univerſal church is a multitude gathered together out of all nations whatſoever they be, which being ſundered and ſeverally ſcattered by diſtances of places yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, and is bound together with the bond of the ſelf ſame religion. And that ſo under this are comprehended all particular churches, which are in all towns and ſtreets according to the order of men's neceſſity, ſo that every one of them may rightfully have the the name and authority of a church: and that all particular men which by profeſſion of godlineſs are reckoned among ſuch churches, although they be indeed ſtrangers from the church, yet do after a certain manner belong unto it, till by public judgment they may be baniſhed out of it. Howbeit there is ſomewhat a diverſe manner in judging of private men and of churches. For it may fall in experience, that ſuch men as we ſhall think not to be altogether worthy of the company of the godly, yet we muſt uſe like brethren and account them among the faithful, for the common conſent of the church, whereby they are ſuffered and born withal in the body of Chriſt. We do not by our teſtimony allow ſuch to be members o the church: but we leave them the place that they have among the people of God, till it be by orderly right of law taken away from them. But of the multitude itſelf we muſt otherwiſe think: which if it hath and honoureth the miniſtry of the word, and the adminiſtration of ſacraments, it deſerveth without doubt to be eſteemed and judged a church: becauſe it is certain that thoſe things are not without fruit So we do alſo preſerve to the univerſal church her unity, which deviliſh ſpirits have always travelled to cut in ſunder: neither do we defraud of their authority thoſe lawful aſſemblies which are diſpoſed according to the fitneſs of places.

The face, communion, and reverence of the church, and how it is termed the pillar of truth.

10. We have ſet for ſigns to diſcern the church by, the preaching of the word and the obſerving of the ſacraments. For thoſe can be no where but they muſt bring forth fruit, and be proſpered with the bleſſing of God. I do not ſay, that whereſoever the word is preached, there by and by ſpringeth up fruit: but I ſay that no where it is received and hath a ſtayed ſeat, but that it bringeth forth the effectualneſs thereof. Where the preaching of the goſpel is reverently heard, and the ſacraments are not neglected, howſoever it be, therefore that time appeareth, not a deceitful and doubtful face of the church, whereof no man may unpuniſhed either deſpiſe the authority, or refuſe the admonitions, or reſiſt the counſels, or mock at the corrections: much leſs to depart from it, and to break in ſunder the unity of it. For the Lord ſo highly eſteemeth the communion of his church, that he counteth him for a traiterous run-away and forſaker of religion, whoſoever ſhall ſtubbornly eſtrange himſelf from any chriſtian fellowſhip, ſo that it be ſuch a one as hath the true miniſtry of the word and ſacraments. He ſo commendeth the church's authority, that when it is violate, he judgeth his own diminiſhed. Neither is it of ſmall importance that the church is called the pillar and ſtrong ſtay of truth and the houſe of God. 1 Tim. iii. 15. By which words Paul ſignifieth, that to the end the truth of God ſhould not decay in the world, the church is a faithful keeper thereof: becauſe God's will was to have the preaching of his word kept pure, and to ſhew himſelf unto us a father of houſhold by her miniſtry and labour, while ſhe feedeth us with ſpiritual nouriſhments, and procureth all things that make for our ſalvation. It is alſo no ſlender praiſe, that it is ſaid, that ſhe is choſen and ſevered by Chriſt to be his ſpouſe, that ſhould be without wrinkle and ſpot, the body and fulneſs of him. Eph. i. 23. Whereupon followeth, that departing from the church is a denying of God and of Chriſt. Therefore ſo much the more we muſt beware ware of so wicked disagreement. For while we go about, so much as in us lieth, to procure the ruin of God's truth, we are worthy that he should send down his lightning with the whole violent force of his wrath to destroy us. Neither can there be imagined any fault more hainous, than with wicked breach of faith to defile the marriage that the only begotten son of God hath vouchsafed to contract with us.

Satan laboureth either to abolish, or to bring in contempt the marks of the true church, whereupon a double mischief groweth, that either the true church is despised, or the false reverenced.

11. Wherefore let us diligently keep these marks imprinted in our minds, and let us esteem them according to the Lord's will. For there is nothing that Satan more endeavoureth than to take away, and abolish the one of these, or both sometimes, that when these marks are rased and blotted out, he may take away the true and natural distinction of the church: sometimes that when they are brought in contempt, he may with open apostacy pluck us from the church. By this craft it is brought about, that in certain ages past, the pure preaching of the word hath vanished away: and now he doth with as great importunity labour to overthrow the ministry which yet Christ hath so established in the church, that when it is taken away, the edification of the church perisheth. But now, how dangerous, yea how deadly a temptation is it when it doth but come in our mind to depart from that congregation wherein are seen the signs and tokens by which the Lord thought his church sufficiently described? We see how great heed is to be taken on both sides. For, that we should not be deceived under the title of the church, every congregation that pretendeth the name of the church must be examined by that manner of trial, as by a touchstone. If it have in the word and sacraments the order appointed by the Lord, it will not deceive us: let us boldly yield unto it the honour due to churches. But contrariwise if it boast it self without the word and sacraments, we must no less with fearful conscience beware of such deceits, than one the other side we must flee rashness and pride.

Where the signs of a true church are, from that society we may not separate our selves, and cease to have communion, though in doctrine and administration of sacraments, there be some fault.

12. Whereas we say that the pure ministry of the word and the pure usage in celebrating the sacraments, is a sufficient pledge and earnest, so that we may safely embrace as the church any fellowship wherein both these shall be: this extendeth so far, that it is never to be cast off so long as it shall continue in those although it swarm full of many other faults. Yea and there may some faultiness creep into it, in the administration either of doctrine, or of the sacraments, which ought not to estrange us from the communion of it. For all the articles of true doctrine are not of one sort. Some are so necessary to be known, that they ought to be certain and undoubted to all men, as the proper principles of religion: of which sort are, that there is one God, that Christ is God, and the son of God. That our salvation consisteth in the mercy of God: and such like. There be others that being in controversy between churches, yet do not break the unity of faith. For those churches that disagree about this one point, if without desire of contention, without stubborness of affirming, the one think that souls when they depart from the bodies do flee up into heaven, and the other church dare determine nothing of the place, but yet certainly holdeth that they live to the Lord: the words of the apostle are: let all us that be perfect think all one thing: but if ye think any thing otherwise, this the Lord shall also reveal unto you. Phil. iii. 19. Doth he not sufficiently shew that diversity of opinion about these matters, that are not so necessary, ought to be no ground of disagreement among Christians: it is indeed a principal point, that we agree in all things. But forasmuch as there is no man that is not warped with some little cloud of ignorance, either we must be in no church at all, or we must pardon a being deceived in such things as may be unknown without violating the sum of religion, and without loss of salvation. But I mean not here to defend any errors be they never so little, so as I would think that they should be cherished with flattering and winking at them: but I say that we ought nor rashly for every light offension forsake the church, in which at least that doctrine is retained safe and uncorrupted, wherein standeth the safety of godliness, and the use of sacraments is kept as it was institute by the Lord. In the mean time if we endeavour to amend that which displeaseth us, we do therein according to our duty. And hereunto belongeth that saying of Paul: if any thing better be revealed to him that sitteth, let the first hold his peace, 1 Cor. xiv. 30. Whereby it is evident, that all the members of the church are every one charged with endeavour to public edification, according to the meaſure of his grace, ſo that it be done comely and according to order: that is, that we neither do forſake the communion of the church, nor abiding in it, do trouble the peace and well ordered diſcipline thereof.

Imperfection in the lives and corruption in the manners of ſome men, muſt not cauſe us to leave the fellowſhip of the church.

13. But in bearing with the imperfection of life, our gentle tenderneſs ought to go much further. For herein is a very ſlippery eaſineſs to fall: and herein with no ſmall devices doth ſatan lay wait for us. For there have been always ſome, who filled with falſe perſuaſion of perfect holineſs as though they were already made certain airy ſpirits, deſpiſed the company of all men, in whom they ſaw remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in old time were the Cathary, and they that were as mad as they, the Donatiſts. Such at this day are ſome of the Anabaptiſts, who would ſeem to have profited above the reſt. Some there be that offend more by an undiſcreet zeal of righteouſneſs, than by that mad pride. For when they ſee among them to whom the goſpel is preached, the fruit of life not agreeably anſwering to the doctrine thereof, they by and by judge that there is no church. It is indeed a moſt juſt diſpleaſure, and ſuch a one whereunto in this moſt miſerable age of the world, we give too much occaſion. Neither may we excuſe our accurſed ſlothfulneſs, which the Lord will not ſuffer unpuniſhed: as even already he beginneth with grievous ſcourges to chaſtiſe it. Wo therefore to us, who with ſo diſſolute licentiouſneſs of wicked doings, make that weak conſciences be wounded by reaſon of us. But in this again they offend whom I have ſpoken of, becauſe they cannot meaſure their being diſpleaſed. For where the Lord requireth clemency, they leaving it, do give themſelves wholly to immeaſurable rigorouſneſs. For, becauſe they think that there is no church where is no ſound pureneſs and uprightneſs of life, for hatred of ſins they depart from the lawful church, while they think that they ſwerve from a company of wicked men. They allege that the church of Chriſt is holy. But that they may alſo underſtand that it is mingled of good and evil men, let them hear this parable out of the mouth of Chriſt, wherein it is compared to a net, in which fiſhes of all kinds are gathered together: and are not choſen out till they be laid abroad upon the ſhore. Matth. xiii. 47. Let them hear that it is like unto a corn field, which being ſown with good grain, is by the enemy's fraud ſcattered with tares, of which it is not cleanſed until the crop be brought into the barn floor. Matth. iii. 12. Finally, let them hear that it is like unto a floor, wherein the wheat is ſo gathered together, that it lieth hidden under the chaff, till being cleanſed with fan and ſieve, it be at length laid up in the garner. Matth. xiii. 23. If the Lord pronounce that the church ſhall even to the day of judgment be troubled with this evil, to be burdened with mingling of evil men: they do in vain ſeek for a church ſprinkled with no ſpot.

The ſtate of the church of Corinth in the Apoſtle's own times.

14. For they cry out that it is an intolerable thing, that the peſtilence of vices ſo rangeth abroad. What if the ſaying of the apoſtle do here alſo anſwer them? Among the Corinthians not only a few had gone out of the way, but the inſtinction had in a manner poſſeſſed the whole body: there was not only one kind of ſin, but many: neither were they light offences, but certain horrible outrageous doings: it was not only corruption of manners, but alſo of doctrine. What in this caſe ſaith the holy apoſtle, that is to ſay, the inſtrument of the holy Ghoſt, by whoſe teſtimony the church ſtandeth and falleth? Doth he require a diviſion from them? Doth he baniſh them out of the kingdom of Chriſt? Doth he ſtrike them with the extremeſt thunderbolt of curſe? He not only doth none of all theſe things: but he both acknowlegeth and reporteth it a church of Chriſt and fellowſhip of ſaints. If there remain a church among the Corinthians, where contentions, ſects, and envious partakings do broil: where quarrels and brawlings be in uſe, with a greedineſs of having, where that wicked doing is openly allowed, which were abominable among the very Gentiles: where Paul's name is unjuſtly railed at, whom they ought to have honoured as their father: where ſome ſcorn at the reſurrection of the dead, with ruin whereof the whole goſpel falleth: 1 Cor. i. 11. and iii. 3. and v. 1. and vi. 7. and ix. 1. and xv. 12. where the gracious gifts of God ſerve to ambition and not to charity: where many things are uncomely and unorderly done: and if therefore there ſtill remain a church, becauſe the miniſtry of the word and of the ſacraments is there not refuſed, who dare take away the name of the church from them that cannot be charged with the tenth part of theſe faults? They that with ſo great preciſeneſs deal ſo cruelly againſt the churches of this preſent time: what (I pray you) would they have done done to the Galatians, which were almoſt utter forſakers of the goſpel, among whom yet the ſame apoſtle found churches? Gal. i.

One thing to ſhun the private company of a wicked man, and another for hatred thereof to forſake the fellowſhip of the church.

15. They object alſo, how that Paul grievouſly rebuketh the Corinthians for ſufferiug in their company a man that was a hainous ſinner, 1 Cor. v. 2. and then he ſetteth a general ſentence wherein he pronounceth, that it is unlawful even to eat bread with a man of reproachful life. Here they cry out: if it be not lawful to eat common bread, how may it be lawful to eat with them the bread of the Lord? I confeſs indeed that it is a great diſhonour, if hogs and dogs have place among the children of God: it is alſo a much more diſhonour if the holy body of Chriſt be given forth to them. And truly if they be well ordered churches, they will not ſuffer wicked men in their boſom, and will not without choice admit both worthy and unworthy together to that holy banquet. But foraſmuch as the paſtors do not always ſo diligently watch, yea and ſometimes are more tender in bearing with men than they ought to be, or are hindered ſo that they cannot uſe that ſeverity that they would: it cometh to paſs that even they that are openly evil, are not always thruſt out of the company of the ſaints. This I grant to be a fanlt: neither will I diminiſh it, ſince Paul doth ſo ſharply rebuke it in the Corinthians. But although the church be ſlack in her duty, it ſhall not be therefore immediately in the power of every private man, to take upon himſelf the judgment to ſeparate him. I do indeed not deny that it is the doing of a godly man, to withdraw himſelf from all private company of evil men, to intangle himſelf in no willing familiarity with them. But it is one thing to flee the company of evil men, and another thing for hatred of them to forſake the communion of the church, But whereas they think it ſacrilege to be partakers of the Lord's bread with them; they are therein much more rigorous than Paul is. For where he exhorteth us to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one ſhould examine another, or every man the whole church, but that they ſhould each one prove himſelf. 1 Cor. xi. 18. If it were unlawful to communicate with an unworthy man, then truly Paul would bid us to look circumſpectly, whether there were any in the multitude by whoſe uncleanneſs we might be defiled. Now when he requireth only of every man the proof of he mſelves, he ſheweth that it nothing hurteth us if any unworthy do thruſt themſelves in among us. And nothing elſe is meant by this which he ſaith afterward. He that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himſelf. 1 Cor. xi. 29. He doth not ſay, to other, but to himſelf. And rightfully, For it ought not to ſtand in the choice of every particular man, who be to be received, and who to be rejected. The knowlege hereof belongeth to the whole church, which knowlege cannot be had without lawful order, as hereafter ſhall be ſaid more at large. Therefore it ſhould be unrighteous, that any private man ſhould be defiled with the unworthineſs of another, whom he neither can, nor ought to keep back from coming to it.

The ſurlineſs of ſome by reaſon of pride, and a vain opinion of their own holineſs, which by five eſpecial conſiderations may be abated.

16. But although by this undiſcreet zeal of righteouſneſs this temptation doth ſometimes alſo enter into good men: yet this we ſhall find that too much preciſeneſs, groweth rather of pride, diſdainfulneſs, and falſe opinion of holineſs, than of true holineſs and true zeal thereof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were ſtandard bearers to make any departing from the church, for the moſt part do it upon no other cauſe, but in deſpiſing of all men to boaſt themſelves to be better than others. Therefore Auguſtine ſaith well and wiſely: [Contra. Par. lib. iii. cap. i.] when godly order and manner of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline ought principally to have regard unto the unity of ſpirit in the bond of peace: which the apoſtle commanded to be kept by bearing one with another: and which being not kept, the medicine of revenge is proved to be not only ſuperfluous, but alſo pernicious, and therefore now to be no medicine at all: thoſe evil children which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affection of their own contentions do greedily labour either wholly to draw or at leaſt to divide the weak common people intangled with the boaſting of their name, ſwelling with pride, mad with ſtubornneſs, treacherous with ſtanders, trouble ſome with ſeditions, leaſt they ſhould ſeem to want the light of truth, do pretend a ſhadow of rigorous ſeverity: and thoſe things that are in the holy ſcriptures commanded to be done with a gentler kind of healing, ſaving the ſincerity of love, and keeping the unity of peace, to correct the faults of brethren, they abuſe it to ſacrilege of ſchiſme, and to occaſion of cutting of. But to godly and quiet men he giveth this counſel, that they mercifully correct that which they can, and that which they cannot, patiently bear, and groan and mourn with love, until God either amend and, correct them, or at the harveſt root up the tares and fan out the chaff. Let the godly travel to fortify themſelves with theſe armours, leſt while they ſeem to themſelves ſtrong and courageous revengers of righteouſneſs, they depart from the kingdom of heaven, which is the only kingdom of righteouſneſs. For ſince it is God's will to have the communion of his church to be kept in this outward fellowſhip: he that for hatred of evil men doth break the token of that fellowſhip, entereth into a way whereby is a ſlippery falling from the communion of ſaints. Let them think that in a great multitude there be many truly holy and innocent before the eyes of the Lord, whom they ſee not. Let them think that even of them that be diſeaſed there be many that do not pleaſe or flatter themſelves in their faults, but being now and then awaked with earneſt fear of God do aſpire to a greater uprightneſs. Let them think that judgment ought not to be given of a man by one deed: foraſmuch as the holieſt do ſometimes fall away with a moſt grievous fall. Let them think that to gather a church there leaveth more weight both in the miniſtry of the word and in the partaking of the holy myſteries, than that all that force ſhould vaniſh away by the fault of ſome wicked men. Laſt of all let them conſider, that in judging the church, the judgment of God is of greater value than the judgment of man.

The church in ſuch ſort holy that neither it can be at any time altogether pure and faultleſs, nor being faulty ceaſeth thereby to be a church.

17. Where alſo they pretend that the church is not without cauſe called holy, it is meet to weigh with what holineſs it excelleth: leſt if we will admit no church, but ſuch a one as is in all points perfect, we leave no church at all: it is true indeed which Paul ſaith, that Chriſt gave himſelf for the church to ſanctify it: that he cleanſed it with the laver of water with the word of life, to make her unto himſelf a glorious ſpouſe having no ſpot, or wrinkle, &c. Eph. v. 15. Yet this is alſo nothing leſs true, that the Lord daily worketh in ſmoothing her wrinkles and wiping away her ſpots. Whereupon followeth that her holineſs is not yet fully finiſhed. Therefore the church is ſo holy, that it daily profiteth and is not yet perfect: daily proceedeth, and is not yet come to the mark of holineſs: as alſo in another place ſhall be more largely declared. Whereas therefore the prophets prophecy that there ſhall be a holy Jeruſalem, through which ſtrangers ſhall not paſs: and a holy temple whereinto unclean men ſhall not enter: Joel iii. 17. Iſa. xxxv. 8. let us not ſo take it, as if there were no ſpot in the members of the church: but for that with their whole endeavour to aſpire to holineſs and ſound pureneſs, by the goodneſs of God cleanneſs is aſcribed unto them, which they have not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of ſuch ſanctification among men: yet we muſt determine that there hath been no time ſince the creation of the world wherein the Lord hath not had his church, and that there ſhall alſo be no time to the very end of the world, wherein he ſhall not have it. For altho' immediately from the beginning, the whole kind of men is corrupted and defiled by the ſin of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted maſs, God always ſanctifieth ſome veſſels unto honour, that there ſhould be no age without feeling of his mercy. Which he hath teſtified by certain promiſes, as theſe: I have ordained a teſtament to my elect: I have ſworn to David my ſervant, I will for ever continue thy ſeed: I will build thy ſeat in generation. Pſal. lxxxix. 4. Again, the Lord hath choſen Sion, he hath choſen it for a dwelling to himſelf: this is my reſt for ever, &c. Pſal. cxxxii. 13. Again theſe things ſaith the Lord which giveth the ſun for the light of the day, the moon and ſtars for the light of the night. If theſe laws ſhall fail before me, then the ſeed of Iſrael ſhall alſo fail. Jer. xxxi. 35.

The corruption of the church in the prophets times.

18. Hereof Chriſt himſelf, the apoſtles, and in a manner all the prophets have given us example. Horrible are thoſe deſcriptions wherein Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Habbakuk, and others do lament the ſickneſſes of the church of Jeruſalem. In the common people, in the magiſtrate, in the prieſts all things were ſo corrupt, that Iſaiah doubteth not to match Jeruſalem with Sodom and Gomorrah. Religion was partly deſpiſed, partly defiled: in their manners, are commonly reported thefts, extortions, breaches of faith, murders and like miſchiefs. But therefore the prophets did neither erect to themſelves new churches, nor build up new altars on which they might have ſeveral ſacrifices: but of whatſoever manner of men they were, yet becauſe they conſidered, that God had left his word word with them, and ordained ceremonies whereby he was there worshipped, in the midst of the assembly of the wicked they held up pure hands unto him. Truly if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they would rather have died a hundred times than have suffered themselves to be drawn thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them from departing, but desire to the keeping of unity. But if the prophets thought it against conscience, to estrange themselves from the church for many and great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in a manner of the whole people: then we take too much upon us, if we dare by and by depart from the cummunion of that church, where not all mens manners do satisfy either our judgment, yea or the christian profession.

The church of Jerusalem in the days of Christ and his apostles.

19. Now what manner of world was there in the time of Christ and the apostles? And yet that desperate ungodliness of the Pharisees, and the dissolute licentiousness of living, which then each where reigned, could not hinder, but that they used the same ceremonies with the people, and assembled with the rest into one temple to the public exercises of religion. Whereof came that, but because they knew that the fellowship of evil men did not defile them, which with a pure conscience did communicate at the same ceremonies? If any man be little moved with the prophets and apostles, let him yet obey the authority of Christ. Therefore Cyprian well saith, [Lib. 3. epi. 5.] though there be seen tares or unclean vessels in the church, yet there is no cause why we should depart from the church: we must only labour that we may be wheat; we must use diligence and endeavour as much as we may that we may be a golden or silver vessel. But to break the earthen vessels, is the only work of the Lord, to whom also is given an iron rod. And let no man challenge to himself that which is properly belonging to the Son only, to be able alone to fan the floor, and cleanse the chaff, and severe all the tares by man's judgment, This is a proud obstinacy, and presumption full of sacrilege, which a perverse fury taketh to it self, &c. Therefore let both these things remain certainly fixed. First he that hath no excuse, that of his own will forsaketh the outward communion of the church. Where the word of God is preached and the sacraments ministred: then that the faults of a few or of many are no hinderance, but that we may therein rightly profess our faith by the ceremonies institute by God: because a godly conscience is not hurt by the unworthiness of any other either pastor or private man, and the mysteries are to a holy and upright man nevertheless pure and wholsome tho they are altogether handled of unclean men.

Anabaptistical affectation of purity.

20. Their preciseness and disdainfulness proceedeth yet further: because they acknowlege no church but such a one as is pure from all spots be they never so small; yea they are angry with good teachers, for that in exhorting the faithful to go forward, they teach them all their life long to grone under the burden of vices, and to flee unto pardon. For they prate that by this mean men are led from perfection. I grant indeed that in earnest calling upon perfection we ought not slowly or coldly to labour, much less to be idle, but to fill our minds with confidence thereof while we be yet in our course, I say, it is a devilish invention. Therefore in the creed the forgiveness of sins is aptly adjoined next after the church. For none do attain it, but only they that are citizens and of the household of the church as it is read in the prophet. Isa xxxiii. 24. Therefore the building of the heavenly Jerusalem ought to go before, wherein afterward this mercifulness of God may have place, that whatsoever come into it, their iniquity may be taken away. I say that it ought first to be builded, not for that there can be any church without the forgiveness of sins, but because the Lord hath not promised his mercy but in the communion of saints. Therefore the first entry for us into the church and kingdom of God, is the forgiveness of sins, without which we have no covenant or union with God. For thus he saith by the prophet, In that day I will strike you a covenant with the beast of the field, with the fowl of the air, and with the vermin of the earth. I will break the sword of war from out of the earth, and I will make men to sleep without fear. I will espouse you unto me for ever I will espouse you (I say) in righteousness, in judgment, in mercy, and in compassions. Hos. ii. 18. We see how by his mercy the Lord reconcileth us to himself. And so in another place, when he foresaith that the people shall be gathered together again, whom he had scattered abroad in his wrath, he saith, I will cleanse them from all wickedness wherewith they have sinned against me. Jer. xxxiii. 8. Wherefore by the sign of washing we enter into the fellowship of the church, whereby we may be taught tha there is no entry open for us into the houſhold of God, unleſs our filthineſs be firſt wiped away with his goodneſs.

By remiſſion of ſins men not only received into, but alſo kept and continued in the church of Chriſt.

21. But by the forgiveneſs of ſins the Lord doth not only receive and adopt us once into the church, but by the ſame he alſo preſerveth and maintaineth us ſtill in it. For to what purpoſe were it, to have ſuch a pardon granted us, as ſhould ſerve for no uſe? But every one of the godly is a witneſs to himſelf that the mercy of God ſhould be vain and mocking, if it ſhould be granted only but once: becauſe there is none that is not in his own conſcience privy throughout his whole life of many weakneſſes, which need the mercy of God. And truly not in vain God promiſeth this grace peculiarly to them of his own houſhold: and not in vain he commandeth the ſame meſſage of reconciliation to be daily offered unto them. Therefore as throughout all our life we carry about us the remnants of ſin, unleſs we be ſuſtained with the continual grace of the Lord in forgiving our ſins, we ſhall ſcarcely abide one moment in the church. But the Lord hath called his unto eternal ſalvation. Therefore they ought to think that there is pardon always ready for their ſins. Wherefore we ought to hold aſſuredly, that by the liberality of God by mean of Chriſt's deſerving through the ſanctification of the Spirit, ſins have been and are daily pardoned to us who are called and graffed into the body of the church.

The keys committed to the church not for remiſſion of ſins to be warranted as well unto faithful men when they ſin, as unto ſinners when they firſt become faithful.

22. To deal this benefit unto us, the keys were gived to the church. Matth. xvi. 19. and xviii. 18. For when Chriſt gave the apoſtles commandment, and delivered them power to forgive ſins, John. xx. 23. he meant not this only, that they ſhould looſe them from ſins that were from ungodlineſs converted to the faith of Chriſt: but rather that they ſhould continually execute this office among the faithful. Which thing Paul teacheth, when he writeth that the miniſtry of reconciliation was left with the miniſters of the church, whereby they ſhould oftentimes in Chriſt's name exhort the people to reconcile themſelves to God. 1 Cor. v. 20. Therefore in the communion of ſaints, by the miniſtry of the church it ſelf, ſins are continually forgiven us, when the prieſts or biſhops, to whom that office is committed, do with the promiſes of the goſpel confirm godly conſciences in hope of pardon and forgiveneſs: and that as well publicly as privately, according as neceſſity requireth. For there be very many, who for their weakneſs do need a ſingular atonement. And Paul reporteth that not only in common preaching, but alſo in houſes he had teſtified the faith in Chriſt, and ſeverally admoniſhed every one of the doctrine of ſalvation. Act. xx. 20. Therefore we have here three things to be noted. Firſt, that with how great holineſs ſoever the children of God do excel, yet they are always in this eſtate, ſo long as they dwell in a mortal body, that without forgiveneſs of ſins they cannot ſtand before God. Secondly, that this benefit is ſo proper to the church, that we cannot otherwiſe enjoy it, but if we abide in the communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is diſtributed unto us by the miniſters and paſtors, either by preaching of the goſpel, or by miniſtring of the ſacraments: and that in this behalf principally appeareth the power of the keys, which the Lord hath given to the fellowſhip of the faithful. Wherefore let every one of us think this to be his duty, no where elſe to ſeek forgiveneſs of ſins, than where the Lord hath ſet it. Of public reconciliation which belongeth to diſcipline we ſhall ſpeak in place fit for it.

The error of Novations and Anabaptiſts, who, as if baptiſm did make men Angels, deny pardon unto ſinners that are baptiſed.

23. But for as much as thoſe frantic ſpirits that I have ſpoken of, do go about to pluck away from the church this only anchor of ſalvation, conſciences are the more ſtrongly to be confirmed againſt ſo peſtilent an opinion. The Novatians in old time troubled the church with this doctrine: but not much unlike to the Novatians our age alſo hath many of the Anabaptiſts which fall to the ſame dotages. For they feign that the people of God are in baptiſm regenerate into a pure and angelic life, that is corrupted with no filthineſs of the fleſh. But if any man offend after baptiſm, they leave unto him nothing but the unappeaſeable judgment of God. Briefly they grant no hope of pardon to a ſinner fallen after grace received: becauſe they acknowlege no other forgiveneſs of ſins but that whereby we are firſt regenerate. But although there be no lie more clearly confuted by the ſcriptures: yet becauſe theſe men find ſome whom they may deceive (as alſo in old time Novatus had many followers) let us ſhortly ſhew how mad they are to their own and others deſtruction. Firſt, whereas by the commandment of the Lord, the ſaints do daily repeat this prayer, Forgive us our debts, Matth. vi. 12.: truly they do confeſs themſelves ſelves debtors. Neither do they crave it in vain becauſe the Lord hath always appointed no other thing to be aſked, than that which he himſelf would give. Yea, whereas he hath teſtified that the whole prayer ſhould be heard of his Father, yet he hath alſo ſealed this abſolution with a peculiar promiſe. What will we more? The Lord requireth of the ſaints all their life long a confeſſion of ſins, yea, and that continual, and promiſeth pardon. What boldneſs is it, either to exempt them from ſin, or if they have ſtumbled, utterly to exclude them from grace? Now whom doth he will us to forgive ſeventy times ſeven times? not to our brethren? To what end did he command it, but that we ſhould follow his clemency? He forgiveth therefore not once or twice; but as often as being ſtricken down with the acknowleging of ſins they ſigh unto him.

Pardon granted to the patriarchs which ſold their brother, to Simeon and Levi, to Reuben, to David, to the people of Iſrael after circumciſion.

24. But (that we may begin in a manner at the very ſwadling cloaths of the church) the patriarchs were circumciſed, being allured into partaking of the covenant having undoubtedly by their fathers diligence been taught righteouſneſs and innocency, when they conſpired to murder their brother, Gen. xxxvii. 18.: this was a miſchievous act, to be abhorred even of the moſt deſperate thieves. At the laſt being meekned with the admonitions of Judah, they ſold him: this was alſo an intollerable hainouſneſs. Simeon and Levi with wicked revenge, and ſuch as was alſo condemned by their own fathers judgment, uſed cruelty againſt the Sichemites, Gen. xxxiv. 25. Reuben with moſt unclean luſt defiled his father's bed, Gen. xxxv. 22. Judah when he would give himſelf to fornication againſt the law of nature, went to his ſon's wife, Gen. xxxviii. 16. And yet ſo far are they from being wiped out of the choſen people, that they are rather raiſed up to be heads of it. But what did David? when he was a governor of juſtice, with how great wickedneſs did he by ſhedding of innocent blood open the way to his blind luſt, 2 Sam. xi. 4. and xv. He was already regenerate and among the regenerate garniſhed with notable praiſes of the Lord: nevertheleſs he committed that hainous offence, which is ſo horrible even among the Gentiles: and yet he obtained pardon. And (that we may not tarry upon ſingle examples) how many promiſes there are in the law and the prophets of God's mercy toward the Iſraelites, ſo oft it is proved that the Lord ſheweth himſelf propitious to the offences of his people. For what doth Moſes promiſe to come to paſs, when the people being fallen into apoſtacy ſhall return unto the Lord? He ſhall bring thee back out of captivity, and ſhall have mercy on thee, and ſhall gather thee together out of the peoples to whom thou haſt been diſperſed. If thou be ſcattered even to the borders of the heaven, I will from thence again gather thee together, Deut. xxx. 3.

Pardon offered by the prophets to the people covered with infinite ſins.

25. But I will not begin a recital that ſhould never be ended. For the prophets are full of ſuch promiſes, which do yet offer mercy to the people covered with infinite wicked doings. What offence is there more hainous than rebellion? for it is called a dvorce between God and the church. But this is overcome by the goodneſs of God. What man is there (ſaith he by Jeremiah) that if his wife give forth her body in common to the adulterers, can abide to return into favour with her? but with thy fornication all thy ways are polluted, O Judah, the earth hath been filled with thy filthy loves. But return unto me, and I will receive thee. Return thou, turn away, I will not turn away my face from thee: becauſe I am holy, and am not angry for ever, Jer. xxxi. and xii. And truly he can be no otherwiſe minded, which affirmeth that he willeth not the death of a ſinner, but rather that he ſhould be converted and live, Ezek. xviii. 23. and xxxii. Therefore when Solomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it alſo to this uſe, that the prayers made for obtaining pardon of ſins ſhould be heard from thence. If (ſaid he) thy ſons ſhall ſin (for there is no man that ſinneth not) and thou being angry ſhalt deliver them to their enemies, and they ſhall repent in their heart, and being turned ſhall intreat thee in their captivity, ſaying, we have ſinned, we have done wickedly, and ſhall pray toward the land which thou haſt given to their fathers, and toward this holy temple: thou ſhalt hear their prayers in heaven, and ſhalt be made merciful to thy people that hath ſinned againſt thee, and to all their wickedneſſes wherewith they have offended thee, 1 Kings viii. 46. And not vainly the Lord ordaineth in the law daily ſacrifices for ſins, Numb. xxviii. 2. For if the Lord had not foreſeen that his people ſhould be troubled with continual diſeaſes of ſins, he would never have appointed theſe remedies for them.

The grace of pardoning ſins not diminiſhed by Chriſt's coming.

26. Was this benefit taken away from the faithful, by the coming of Chriſt, wherein the fulneſs of grace was ſhewed forth, ſo that they dare not now pray for pardon of ſins? that if they offend the Lord they may not obtain any mercy? What ſhall this be elſe, but to ſay that Chriſt came to the deſtruction of them that are his, and not to their ſalvation, if that mercifulneſs of God in pardoning ſins which in the Old Teſtament was continually ready for the ſaints, be now ſaid to be utterly taken away? But if we believe the ſcriptures which expreſly cry out, that in Chriſt only the grace and kindneſs of the Lord fully appeared, Tit. i. 9. and iii. 4. that the plentifulneſs of mercy was poured out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let us not doubt that there floweth unto us a more bountiful mercifulneſs of the heavenly Father, than that it is cut off or ſhortned, 2 Tim. i. 9. And hereof there want not examples. Peter who had heard that he ſhould be denied before the angels of God that confeſſed not the name of Chriſt before men, (Matth. x. 33. Mark vi. 38.) denied him thrice in one night, and that not without execration: yet he was not put away from pardon, Matth. xxvi. 39. They that lived ordinately among the Theſſalonians are ſo chaſtiſed, that yet they are gently called to repentance, 2 Theſ. iii. 6. Even Simon the magician himſelf is not caſt in deſperation, but he is rather commanded to hope well, when Peter counſelleth him to flee to prayer, Acts viii. 22.

Whole churches wrapped in ſin and not yet excluded from pardon.

27. Yea moſt hainous ſins have ſometimes poſſeſſed whole churches, out of which Paul rather gently unwrapped them, than pronounced them accurſed. The falling away of the Galatians was no mean offence, Gal. i. 6. and iii. 1. and iv. 9. The Corinthians were ſo much leſs excuſable than they, as they abounded in more, and thoſe nothing lighter ſins: yet neither of them are excluded from the mercy of God. Yea, even they that had ſinned above the reſt in uncleanneſs, fornication and unchaſtity, are eſpecially called to repentance, 2 Cor. xii. 21. For the covenant of the Lord remaineth, and ſhall remain for ever inviolable, which he ſolemnly made with Chriſt the true Solomon and his members, in theſe words, (Pſal. lxxxix. 32.) If his ſons ſhall forſake my law, and ſhall not walk in my judgments, if they ſhall defile my righteouſneſſes, and not keep my commandments, I will viſit their iniquities with a rod, and their ſins with ſtripes: but my mercy I will not take away from him. Finally by the very order of the creed we be taught, that there remaineth in the church of Chriſt continual pardon of ſins: For that when the church is as it were eſtabliſhed, yet forgiveneſs of ſins is adjoined.

Sin after baptiſm not only through ignorance but willingly committed, yet pardonable.

28. Some that be ſomewhat wiſer, when they ſee the doctrine of Novatus to be confuted with ſo great plainneſs of ſcripture, make not every ſin unpardonable, but wilful tranſgreſſing of the law, into which a man wittingly and willingly falleth. Now they that ſay ſo, do vouchſafe to grant pardon to no ſin, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lord in the law commanded one ſort of ſacrifices to be offered for cleanſing of the wilful ſins of the faithful, and others to redeem their ignorances, Levit. iv.: how great lewdneſs ſhall it be to grant no cleanſing to wilful ſin? I ſay that there is nothing plainer than that the ſacrifice of Chriſt only availeth to forgive the wilful ſins of the ſaints: foraſmuch as the Lord hath teſtified the ſame by carnal ſacrifices as by ſigns. Again, who can excuſe David by ignorance, whom it is evident to have been ſo well inſtructed in the law? Did David not know how great was the fault of adultery and manſlaughter, who daily puniſhed the ſame in others? Did brother ſlaughter ſeem to the patriarchs a lawful thing? Had the Corinthians ſo ill profited that they thought that wantonneſs, uncleanneſs, whoredom, hatred and contentions pleaſed God? Did Peter being ſo diligently admoniſhed not know how great a matter it was to forſwear his maſter? Therefore let us not with our own enviouſneſs ſtop up the way againſt the mercy of God that ſo gently uttereth itſelf.

In what ſenſe the fathers do ſometimes teach that repentance is no more iterable than baptiſm.

29. Truly I am not ignorant that the old writers expound thoſe ſins that are daily forgiven to the faithful, to be the light offences that creep in by weakneſs of the fleſh: and that they thought that the ſolemn repentance which was then required for hainous miſdeeds might no more be reiterate than baptiſm. Which ſaying is not ſo to be taken, as though they would either throw them down headlong into deſperation that after their firſt repentance had fallen fallen again, or extenuate thoſe other ſins as though they were ſmall in the ſight of God. For they knew that the ſaints do oftentimes ſtagger by infidelity, that ſuperfluous oaths do ſometimes fall from them, they now and then are chaffed unto anger, yea, that they break out even into manifeſt railings, and beſide theſe are troubled with other evils which the Lord not ſlenderly abhorreth: but they ſo called them, to put a difference between them and public crimes that with great offence came to the knowlege of the church. But whereas they did ſo hardly pardon them that had committed any thing worthy of eccleſiaſtical correction, th y did not this therefore, becauſe they thought that ſuch ſhould hardly have pardon with the Lord: but by this ſeverity they meant to make others afraid that they ſhould not raſhly run into wicked doings, by the deſerving whereof they might be eſtranged from the communion of the church: howbeit truly the word of the Lord which herein ought to be the only rule unto us, appointeth a great moderation. For it teacheth that the rigour of diſcipline is ſo far to be extended, that he that ought chiefly to be provided for be not ſwallowed up with heavineſs: as we have before declared more at large.

CHAP. II.

A compariſon of the falſe church with the true church.

Some faults do corrupt and deſtroy the church.

OF how great value the miniſtry of the word and ſacraments ought to be with us, and how far the reverence of it ought to proceed, that it be unto us a perpetual token whereby to diſcern the church, it hath been already declared. That is to ſay, whereſoever the miniſtry abideth whole and uncorrupted, there the faults or diſeaſes of manners are no impediment but that it may bear the name of a church. Then, that the very miniſtry it ſelf is by ſmall errors not ſo corrupted, but that it may be eſteemed lawful. Moreover we have ſhewed that the errors that ought ſo to be pardoned are thoſe whereby the principal doctrine of religion is not hurt, whereby thoſe chief points of religion that ought to be agreeably holden among the faithful are not deſtroyed, and in the ſacrament, thoſe that do not aboliſh nor impair the lawful inſtitution of him that ordained them. But ſo ſoon as lying is broken into the chief tower of religion, ſo ſoon as the ſum of neceſſary doctrine is perverted, and the uſe of the ſacraments faileth: truly the deſtruction of the church foloweth: like as a man's life is at an end, when his throat is thruſt through or his heart deadly wounded. And this is clearly proved by the words of Paul, when he teacheth, that the foundation of the church is laid upon the doctrine of the apoſtles and prophets, Chriſt himſelf being the head corner ſtone. Eph. ii. 20. If the foundation of the church be the doctrine of the prophets and apoſtles, by which the faithful are commanded to repoſe their ſalvation only in Chriſt: then take away that doctrine, and how ſhall the building ſtand any longer? Therefore the church muſt needs fall down where that ſum of religion falleth which is only able to uphold it. Again, if the true church be the pillar and ground of the truth, 2 Tim. iii. 15. it is certain, that there is no church, where lying and falſhood have uſurped the dominion.

What manner of church under the papacy.

2. Since it is in ſuch caſe under the papiſtry, we may underſtand how much of the church is there remaining. Inſtead of the miniſtry of the word, there reigneth a perverſe government and made of lies mingled together, which partly quencheth and partly choaketh the pure light: in the place of the Lord's ſupper is entred a moſt filthy ſacrilege: the form of worſhipping God is deformed with a manifold and intolerable hea p of ſuperſtitions: the doctrine, without which Chriſtianity cannot ſtand is altogether buried and driven out: the public aſſemblies are the ſchools of idolatry and ungodlineſs. Therefore there is no peril leſt in departing from a damnable partaking of ſo many miſchiefs we be plucked from the church of Chriſt. The communion of the church was not ordained to this end that it ſhould be a bond whereby we ſhould be intangled with idolatry, ungodlineſs, ignorance of God, and other kinds of evils: but rather whereby we ſhould be faſt holden in the fear of God, and obedience of truth. They do indeed gloriouſly ſet out their church unto us, that there ſhould ſeem to be no other church in the world: and afterward, as though the victory were gotten, they decree that all are ſchiſmatics that dare withdraw themſelves from the obedience of that church that they paint out: and that all are heretics that dare once mutter againſt the doctrine thereof. But by what proofs do they confirm that they have the true church? They allege out of the ancient chronicles, what in old time was in Italy, in France, in Spain. They say that they fetch their beginning from those holy men that with sound doctrine founded and raised up churches, and stablished the same doctrine and edifying of the church with their blood. And that so the church hath been among them so consecrate both with spiritual gifts, and with the blood of Martyrs, and preserved with continual succession of bishops, that it might not fall away. They rehearse how much Ireneus, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, and other esteemed this succession. But how trifling these things are, and how they are but mere mockeries, I will make them very easy to understand that will be content a little to weigh them with me. Truly I would also exhort themselves earnestly to take heed hereunto, if I did trust that I might any thing prevail with them by teaching. But forasmuch as they, leaving all regard of truth, do bend themselves to this purpose only, by all the ways that they can, to defend their own cause, I will only speak a few things whereby good men and those that love the truth, may wind themselves out of their subtile cavils. First I ask of them, why they do not allege Africa, and Ægypt, and all Asia? Even because in all those countries this holy succession of bishops hath ceased, by mean whereof they boast that they have preserved churches. They come therefore to this point to say, that they therefore have a true church, because since it first began to be, it hath not been destitute of bishops: for in perpetual course they have succeeded one another. But what if I cast Greece in their way? Therefore I ask again of them, why they say that the church is lost among the Grecians, among whom that succession of bishops was never interrupted, which in their opinion is the only keeper and preserver of the church. They make the Grecians schismatics, and by what right? because in departing from the apostolic see, they have lost their privilege. What? Do not they much more deserve to lose it that depart from Christ himself? It followeth therefore, that the pretence of succession is but vain, unless the posterity do keep fast and abide in the truth of Christ, which they have received of their fathers from hand to hand.

The church amongst the Jews vainly measured by outward things, as the glory of the temple, the pomp of ceremonies, the succession of Priests.

3. Therefore the Romanists at this day do allege nothing else but that which it appeareth that the Jews in old time alleged when they were by the prophets, of the Lord reproved of blindness, ungodliness, and idolatry. For they gloriously boasted of the temple, ceremonies and priesthoods, by which things, by great reason as they think they measured the church. So instead of the church, they shew certain outward vziors, that oftentimes are far from the church, and without which the church may very well stand. Therefore we need to confute them with no other argument, than that wherewith Jeremiah fought against the foolish presumptuousness of the Jews, that is, that they should not boast in lying words: saying: the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lord. Jer. vii. 4. For as much as the Lord doth now here acknowlege any thing for his, but where his word is heard, and reverently observed. So when the glory of God did sit between the cherubims in the sanctuary, and he had promised them that that should be his stedfast seat: yet when the priests once corrupted the worshipping of him with perverse superstitions, he removed else where, and left the place without any holiness. Ezek. x. 4. If the same temple which seemed to be consecrated to the perpetual dwelling of God, might be forsaken of God and become unholy: there is no cause why these men should feign to us that God is so bound to persons or places, and so fast tied to outward observtations, that he must needs abide with them that have only the the title and shew of the church. And this is it about which Paul contendeth in the epistle to the Romans, from the ninth chapter to the twelfth. For this did sore trouble weak consciences, that the Jews when they seemed to be the people of God, did not only refuse the doctrine of the gospel, but also persecuted it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, he removeth this doubt, and denieth that those Jews being enemies of the truth are the church, howsoever they wanted nothing that otherwise might be required to the outward form of the church. And therefore he denieth it, because they embrace not Christ. But somewhat more expresly in the epistle to the Galations: wherein comparing Ishmael with Isaac, he saith that many hold place in the church, to whom the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free mother. From whence also he descendeth to the comparison of two Jerusalems. Gal. iv. 22. Because as the law was given in the mount Sinai, but the gospel came out of Jerusalem:

ſo many being ſervilely born and brought up do without doubting boaſt themſelves to be the children of God and of the church, yea they proudly deſpiſe the natural children of God, when themſelves be but baſtards. On the other ſide alſo, when we hear that is was once pronounced from heaven: caſt out the bondwoman and her ſon, Gen. xxi. 10. let us, ſtanding upon this inviolable decree, boldly deſpiſe their unſavory boaſtings. For if they be proud by reaſon of outward profeſſion, Iſhmael was alſo circumciſed: if they contend by antiquity, he was the firſt begotten, and yet we ſee that he is put away. If the cauſe be demanded, Paul aſſigneth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure lawful ſeed of doctrine Rom. ix. 6. According to this reaſon God denieth that he is bound to wicked prieſts by this that he covenanteth with their father Levi that he ſhould be his angel or interpreter: yea, he turneth againſt themſelves their falſe boaſting, wherewith they were wont to riſe up againſt the prophets, that the dignity of prieſthood was to be had in ſingular eſtimation. This he willingly admitteth, and with the ſame condition he debateth with them, becauſe he is ready to keep his covenant, but when they do not mutually perform their part to him, they deſerve to be rejected. Lo what ſucceſſion availeth, unleſs therewithal be alſo joined an imitation and evenly continuing courſe: even to this effect, that the ſucceſſors, ſo ſoon as they are proved to have ſwerved from their original, be deprived of all honour. Unleſs perhaps becauſe Caiaphas ſucceeded many godly biſhops (yea there was even from Aaron to him a continualy unbroken courſe of ſucceſſion) therefore that ſame miſchievous aſſembly was worthy the name of the church. But this were not tolerable even in earthly dominions, that the tyranny of Caligula, Nero, Heliogabalus and ſuch others, ſhould be called a true ſtate of common weal, for that they ſucceeded the Brutus's, Scipios, and Camillus's. But ſpecially in the government of the church there is nothing more fooliſh, than leaving the doctrine to ſet the ſucceſſion in the perſons only. But neither did the holy doctors whom they falſely thruſt in unto us, mean any thing leſs, than to prove that preciſely as it were by right of inheritance churches are there, where biſhops are ſucceſſively placed one after another. But whereas it was then out of controverſy, that from the very beginning to that age nothing was changed in doctrine, they alleged that which might ſuffice to make an end of all new errors, that is, that by thoſe was that doctrine oppugned, which had been even from the apoſtles conſtantly and with one agreeing conſent retained. There is therefore no cauſe, why they ſhould any longer go forward to deceive by pretending a falſe colour under the name of the church, which we do reverently eſteem as becometh us: but when they come to the definition of it, not only water (as the common ſaying is) cleaveth unto them, but they ſtick faſt in their own mire becauſe they put a ſtinking harlot in place of the holy ſpouſe of Chriſt. That this putting in of a changeling ſhoud not deceive us, beſide other admonitions, let us remember this alſo of Auguſtine. For ſpeaking of the church, he ſaith: it is it that is ſomewhat darkened and covered with multitude of offences as with a cloud: ſometimes in calmneſs of time appeareth quiet and free: ſometimes is hidden and troubled with waves of tribulations and temptations. [Ad Vincent. epiſt. 48.] He bringeth forth examples, that oftentimes the ſtrongeſt pillars either valiantly ſuffered baniſhment for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world.

Like pretences uſed by Romaniſts to dazle the eyes of the ſimple, and to uphold the eſtimation of their Church.

4. In like manner the Romaniſts do vex us, and make afraid the ignorant with the name of the church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Chriſt. Therefore although they pretend the temple, the prieſthood, and other ſuch outward ſhews, this vain gliſtering wherewith the eyes of the ſimple be dazzled ought nothing to move us to grant that there is a church where the word of God doth not appear. For this is the perpetual mark wherewith God hath marked them that be his. He that is of the truth (ſaith he) heareth my voice. Again, I am that good ſhepherd, and I know my ſheep, and am known of them. John. x. 14. My ſheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. And a little before he had ſaid, that the ſheep follow their ſhepherd, becauſe they knew his voice: but they follow not a ſtranger, but run away from him becauſe they knew not the voice of ſtrangers. Why are we therefore wilfully mad in judging the church, whereas Chriſt hath marked it with an undoubtful ſign, which whereſoever it is ſeen cannot deceive, but that it certainly ſheweth the church to be there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing that can give a true ſignification of the church. For Paul rehearſeth that the church was builded, not upon the judgments of men, nor upon prieſthoods, but upon the doctrine of the apoſtles and prophets. Eph. ii. 20 But rather Jeruſalem is to be ſeverally known from Babylon, and the church of Christ from the conspiracy of Satan, by that difference wherewith Christ hath made them different one from the other. He that is of God (saith he) heareth the words of God: ye therefore hear not, because ye are not of God. John. viii. 47. In a sum, forasmuch as the church is the kingdom of Christ, and he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doubtful to any man, but that those be the words of lying, by which Christs kingdom is feigned to be without his sceptre, that is to say without his holy word?

Our churches by Romanists without just cause accused of heresy and of schism.

5. But now whereas they accuse us of schism and heresy, because we both preach a contrary doctrine to them, and obey not their laws, and have our assemblies to prayers, to baptism, to the ministration of the supper and other holy doings, severally from them: it is indeed a very sore accusation, but such as needeth not a long or labourſome defence. They are called heretics and schismatics, which making a division do break in sunder the communion of the church. And this communion is holden together with true bonds, that is to say, the agreement of true doctrine, and brotherly charity. Whereupon Augustine putteth this difference between heretics and schismatics, that heretics indeed do with false doctrine corrupt the pureness of faith, but the schismatics sometimes even where there is like faith, do break the bond of fellowship. [Lib. quæsti. Evang. sec. Matth.] But this is also to be noted, that this enjoining of charity so hangeth upon the unity of faith, that faith ought to be the beginning thereof, the end, and finally the only rule; let us therefore remember that so oft as the unity of the church is commended unto us, this is required, that while our minds agree in Christ, our wills also may be joined together with mutual well willing in Christ. Therefore Paul when he exhorteth us to that well willing, taketh for his foundation that there is one God, one faith, and one baptism. Eph. iv. 5. Yea wheresoever he teacheth us to be of one mind, and of one will, Phil. ii. 2. and 5. he by and by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning, that it is a factious company of the wicked, and not agreement of the faithful which is without the word of the Lord.

The undividable unity of the church: the ground and bond thereof is truth.

6. Cyprian also following Paul deriveth the whole fountain of the agreement of the church, from the only bishoprick of Christ. He afterward addeth the church is but one, which spreadeth abroad more largely into a multitude with increase of fruitfulness: like as there be many sun beams, but one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded upon a fast root: and when many streams do flow from one fountain, although the number seem to be scattered abroad by largeness of overflowing plenty, yet the unity abideth in the original. [De simpl. prælat.] Take away a beam of the sun from the body, the unity can suffer no division. Break a branch from the tree, the broken branch cannot spring. Cut off the stream from the spring head, being cut off it drieth up. So also the church being overspread with the light of the Lord, is extended over the whole world: yet there is but one light that is spread every where. Nothing could be said more fitly to express that undividual knitting together, which all the members of Christ have one with another. We see how he continually calleth us back to the very head. Whereupon he pronounceth that heresies and schisms do arise hereof, that men do not return to the original of truth, nor do seek that head, nor keep the doctrine of the heavenly master. Now let them go and cry that we be heretics that have departed from their church: since there hath been no cause of our estranging from them but this one, that they can in no wise abide the pure profession of the truth: but I tell not how they have driven us out with cursings and cruel execrations. Which very self doing doth abundantly enough acquit us, unless they will also condemn the apostles for schismatics, with whom we have all one cause. Christ (I say) did foretel to his apostles, that the time should come when they should be cast out of the synagogues for his name's sake. John. xvi. 2. And those synagogues of which he speaketh, were then accounted lawful churches. Since therefore it is evident that we be cast out, and we be ready to shew that the same is done for the name's sake of Christ, truly the cause ought first to be inquired of, before that any thing be determined upon us, either one way or other. Howbeit, if they will, I am content to discharge them of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoved that we should depart from them, that we might come to Christ.

The church and the defection of the church of Is-

7. But it shall appear yet more certainly in what estimation we ought to have all the churches, whom the tyrranny of that Ro-miſh idol hath poſſeſſed, if it be compared with the old church of the Iſraelites, as it is deſcribed in the prophets. There was then a true church among the Jews and Iſraelites, when they continued in the laws of the covenant, for they obtained thoſe things by the benefit of God, whereupon the church conſiſteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the law: the miniſtry thereof was among the prieſts and prophets: with the ſign of circumciſion they entered into religion: by other ſacraments they were exerciſed to the confirmation of faith. It is no doubt that thoſe titles wherewith the Lord hath honoured his church, fitly pertained to their fellowſhip. After that, forſaking the law of the Lord they went out of kind to idolatry and ſuperſtition, they partly loſt that prerogative. For who dare take away the name of the church from them, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and obſervation of his myſteries? Again, who dare call that the church without ony exception, where the word of the Lord is openly and freely troden under foot? where the miniſtry thereof, the chief ſinew yea the very ſoul of the church is deſtroyed.

What was remaining of the church in Juda and Iſrael when they were fallen to idoltary.

8. What then? will ſome man ſay: was there therefore no parcel of a church remaining among the Jews after that they fell away to idolatry? The anſwer is eaſy. Firſt I ſay that in the very falling away there were certain degrees. For we will not ſay that there was all one fall of Juda, and Iſrael, at ſuch time as they both firſt ſwerved from the pure worſhipping of God. When Jeroboam firſt made calves, againſt the open prohibition of God, and did dedicate an unlawful place for worſhipping, he did utterly corrupt religion. The Jews did firſt defile themſelves with wicked and ſuperſtitious manners, before that they wrongfully changed the order in the outward form of religion. For although under Rehoboam they had already gotten them many perverſe ceremonies: yet becauſe there tarried at Jeruſalem both the doctrine of the law, and the prieſthood, and the ceremonious uſages in ſuch ſort as God had ordained them, the godly had there a tolerable ſtate of church. Among the Iſraelites unto the reign of Ahab, there was no amendment of things, and from thence forth they fell from worſe to worſe. They that ſucceeded afterward, to the very deſtruction of the kingdom, partly were like unto him, and partly (when they minded to be ſomewhat better than he; they followed the example of Jeroboam: but they all every one were wicked and idolaters. In Judæa there were now and then diverſe changes, while ſome kings perverted the worſhipping of God with falſe and forged ſuperſtition, ſome others reſtored religion that was decayed: until the very prieſts themſelves defiled the temple of God with prophane and abominable uſages.

The church of Rome more corrupt than the church of Iſrael under Jeroboam.

9. Now let the Papiſts if they can how much ſoever they extenuate their own faults, deny that among them the ſtate of religion is as corrupt and defiled as it was in the kingdom of Iſrael under Jeroboam. But they have a groſſer idolatry: and in doctrine they are not one drop purer: unleſs peradventure even in it alſo they be more impure. God, yea all men that are endued but with a mean judgment, ſhall be witneſſes with me, and the thing it ſelf alſo declareth, how herein I tell nothing more than truth. Now when they will drive us to the communion of the church, they require two things of us: firſt, that we ſhould communicate with all their prayers, ſacraments, and ceremonies: then that whatſoever honour, power and juriſdiction Chriſt giveth to his church we ſhould give the ſame to their church. As to the firſt point, I grant that all the prophets that were at Jeruſalem, when things were there very much corrupted, did neither ſeparately ſacrifice, nor had aſſemblies to pray ſeparate from other men. For they had a commandment of God, whereby they were commanded to come together into Solomon's temple: they knew that the levitical prieſts, howſoever they were unworthy of that honour, yet becauſe they were ordained by the Lord miniſters of the holy ceremonies, and were not as then depoſed, did yet ſtill rightfully poſſeſs that place. Exod. xxix. 9. But (which is the chief point of this queſtion) they were compelled to no ſuperſtitious worſhipping, yea they took in hand to do nothing but that which was ordained by God. But among theſe men, I mean the papiſts, what like thing is there? For we can ſcarcely have any meeting together with them, wherein we ſhall not defile our ſelves with open idolatry. Truly the principal bond of their communion is in the maſs, which we abhor as the greateſt ſacrilege. And whether we do this rightfully or wrongfully, ſhall be ſeen in another place. At this preſent it is enough to ſhew that in this behalf we are in other caſe than the prophets were, which although they were preſent at the ceremonies of the wicked, were not compelled to behold or uſe any ceremonies but ſuch as were inſtituted by God. And, if they will needs have an example altogether like, let us take it out of the kingdom of Iſrael. After the ordinance of Jeroboam circumciſion remained,, the ſacrifices were offered, the law was accounted holy, the ſame God was called upon whom they had received of their fathers: but for the forged and forbidden forms of worſhipping, God diſallowed and condemned all that was there done. 1 King. xii. 31. Shew me one prophet, or any one godly man that once worſhipped or ſacrificed in Bethel. For they knew they could not do it, but that they ſhould defile themſelves with ſome ſacrilege. We have then thus much, that the communion of the church ought not ſo far to be of force with the godly, that if it ſhould degenerate to prophane and filthy uſages, they ſhould forthwith of neceſſity follow it.

A church degenerated and made prophane is no ſuch church as we ought of neceſſity to have communion and fellowſhip with.

10. But about the other point we contend yet more earneſtly. For if the church be ſo conſidered to be ſuch, whoſe judgment we ought to reverence, whoſe authority to regard, whoſe admonitions to obey, with whoſe chaſtiſements to be moved, whoſe communion in all things we ought religiouſly to obſerve: then we cannot grant them a church, but that we muſt of neceſſity be bound to ſubjection and obedience unto it. Yet we will willingly grant them that which the prophets granted to the Jews and Iſraelites of their time: when things were there in as good, yea or better ſtate. But we ſee how each where they cry out, that their aſſemblies are unholy, to which it is no more lawful to conſent than it is to deny God. And truly if thoſe were churches, it followeth therefore that in Iſrael Helias, Micheas, and ſuch other: in Jewry, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Hoſea, and ſuch other of that ſort, whom the prophets, prieſts, and people of that time hated and deteſted worſe than any uncircumciſed men, were ſtrangers from the church of God. If thoſe were churches, then the church was not the pillar of truth, 1 Tim. iii. 15. but the ſtay of lying: not the tabernacle of the living God, but the receptacle of idols. Therefore it was needful for them to depart from the conſent of thoſe aſſemblies, which was nothing elſe but a wicked conſpiracy againſt God. In like manner if any man acknowlege the aſſemblies at theſe days being defiled with idolatry, ſuperſtition, and wicked doctrine, to be ſuch in whoſe full communion a chriſtian man ought to continue even to the conſent of doctrine, he ſhall greatly err. For if they be churches, then they have the power of the keys. But the keys are unſeparably knit with the word, which is from thence quite driven away. Again, if they be churches, then the promiſe of Chriſt is of force among them, whatſoever ye bind, &c. But they contrariwiſe do baniſh from their communion all ſuch as do profeſs themſelves unfeignedly the ſervants of Chriſt. Therefore either the promiſe of Chriſt is vain, Matth. xvi. 19. and xviii. 18. John. xx. 23. or at leaſt in this reſpect they are not churches. Finally, inſtead of the miniſtry of the word they have ſchools of ungodlineſs, and a ſink of all kinds of errors. Therefore either in this reſpect they are not churches, or there ſhall remain no token whereby the lawful aſſemblies of the faithful may be ſeverally known from the meeting of Turks.

The ſteps of a church remainning as of old in the corrupt ſtate of Iſrael, ſo at this day amongſt thi Romaniſts.

11. But as in the old time there yet remained among the Jews certain peculiar prerogatives of the church, ſo at this day alſo we take not from the papiſts ſuch ſteps as it pleaſed the Lord to have remaining among them after the diſſipation of the church. The Lord had once made his covenant with the Jews. That ſame rather being upholden by the ſtedfaſtneſs of it ſelf did continue with ſtriving againſt their ungodlineſs, than was preſerved by them. Therefore (ſuch was the aſſuredneſs and conſtancy of Gods goodneſs) there remained the covenant of the Lord, neither could his faithfulneſs be blotted out by their unfaithfulneſs: neither could circumciſion be ſo prophaned with their unclean hands, but that it ſtill was the ſign and ſacrament of that covenant. Whereupon the children that were born of them, the Lord called his own, which unleſs it were by ſpecial bleſſing, belonged nothing to him. So when he hath left his covenant in France, Italy, Germany, Spain, England: ſince thoſe provinces have been oppreſſed with the tyranny of Antichriſt, yet that his covenant might remain inviolable, firſt he there preſerved baptiſm, the teſtimony of his covenant, which being conſecrate by his own mouth retaineth her own force notwithſtanding the ungodlineſs of man: then, with his providence he hath wrought that there

there ſhould remain other remnants, leſt the Church ſhould be utterly deſtroyed. And as oftentimes buildings are ſo pulled down, that the foundations and ruins remain: ſo he hath not ſuffered his church either to be overthrown by Antichriſt from the very foundation, or to be laid even with the ground (howſoever to puniſh the unthankfulneſs of men that had deſpiſed his word, he ſuffereth horrible ſhaking and diſſipation to happen) but even after the very waſting he willed that the building half pulled down ſhould yet remain.

The church of Rome not ſimply a church, nor utterly no church, but a church prophaned and unlawfully ordered.

12. Whereas therefore we will not ſimply grant to the Papiſts the title of the church, we do not therefore deny that there be churches among them: but only we contend for the true and lawful ordering of the church: which is required in the communion both of the ſacraments which are the ſigns of profeſſion, and alſo ſpecially of doctrine. Daniel and Paul foretold that Antichriſt ſhould ſin in the temple of God. Dan. ix. 27. 2 Theſ. ii. 4. With us we account the biſhop of Rome the captain and ſtandard bearer of that wicked and abominable kingdom. Whereas his ſeat is placed in the temple of God, thereby is meant that his kingdom ſhall be ſuch as cannot aboliſh the name of Chriſt nor of his church. Hereby therefore appeareth that we do not deny but that even under his tyranny remain churches, but ſuch as he hath prophaned with ungodlineſs full of ſacrilege, ſuch as he hath corrupted and in a manner killed with evil and damnable doctrines, as with poiſoned drinks: ſuch wherein Chriſt lieth half buried, the goſpel overwhelmed, godlineſs baniſhed, the worſhipping of God in a manner aboliſhed: ſuch finally wherein all things are ſo troubled, that therein rather appeareth the face of Babylon than of the holy city of God. In a ſum, I ſay that they are churches, in reſpect that the Lord there marvellouſly preſerveth the remnants of his people howſoever they were diſperſed and ſcattered abroad, in reſpect that there remain ſome tokens of the church, eſpecially theſe tokens, the effectualneſs whereof neither the craft of the devil, nor the maliciouſneſs of man can deſtroy. But on the other ſide becauſe theſe marks are blotted out, which in this diſcourſe we ought principally to have reſpect unto, I ſay, that every one of their aſſemblies and the whole body wanteth the lawful form of a church.

CHAP. III.

Of the teachers and miniſters of the church, and of their election and office.

The reaſon why God would have his church to be governed by men.

NOW it is meet that we ſpeak of the order, by which it was the Lord's will to have this church governed. For although in his church he only muſt rule and reign yea and bear preheminence or excel in it, and this government to be uſed or executed by his word only: yet becauſe he dwelleth not among us in viſible preſence, ſo that he can preſently with his own mouth declare his will unto us, we have ſaid that in this, he uſeth the miniſtry of men, and as it were the travel of deputies not in transferring his right and honour unto them, but only that by their mouth he might do his own work, like as a workman to do his work uſeth his inſtrument. I am compelled to repeat again thoſe things that I have already declared. He might indeed do it either by himſelf without any other help or inſtrument, or alſo by mean of angels: but there are many cauſes why he had rather do it by men. For by this mean firſt he declareth his good will toward us, when he taketh out of men them that ſhall do his meſſage in the world, that ſhall be the interpreters of his ſecret will, finally that ſhall repreſent his own perſon. And ſo by experience he proveth that it is not vain that commonly he calleth us his temples, when out of the mouths of men, as out of his ſanctuary, he giveth anſwers to men. Secondly, this is the beſt and moſt profitable exerciſe to humility, when he accuſtometh us to obey his word, howſoever it be preached by men like unto us, yea ſometime our inferiors in dignity. If he himſelf ſpeak from heaven, it were no wonder if his holy oracles were without delay reverently received with the ears and minds of all men. For who would not dread his power being in preſence? Who would not be thrown down at the firſt ſight of ſo great majeſty? Who would not be confounded with that infinite brightneſs? But when ſome ſilly man riſen out of the duſt ſpeaketh in the name of God, here with very good teſtimony we declare our godlineſs and reverent obedience toward God himſelf, if to his miniſtry we yield our ſelves willing to learn, which yet in nothing excelleth us. Therefore for this cauſe alſo he hath hidden the treaſure of his heavenly wiſdom in brittle and earthen veſſels, 1 Cor. iv. 7. that he might have the certain proof how much he is eſteemed of us. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cheriſhing of mutual charity, than that men ſhould be bound together one to another with this bond, when one is made a paſtor to teach the reſt, and they that are commanded to be ſcholars receive all one doctrine at one mouth. For if every man were able enough to ſerve himſelf, and needed not the help of another, ſuch is the pride of man's nature, that every one would deſpiſe other, and ſhould again be deſpiſed of them. Therefore the Lord hath bound his church with that knot, which he foreſaw to be the ſtrongeſt knot to hold unity together, when he hath left with men the doctrine of ſalvation, and of eternal life, that by their hands he might communicate it to the reſt. Hereunto Paul had reſpect when he wrote to the Epheſians, Eph. iv. 4. One body, one ſpirit, as alſo ye be called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one baptiſm: One God, and the father of all, which is above all, and by all, and in us all. But unto every one of us grace is given according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt. Wherefore he ſaith: when he was gone up on high, he led captivity captive, he gave gifts to men. He that went down, is the ſelf ſame he that went up, that he might fulfil all things. And the ſame hath given ſome to be apoſtles, and ſome prophets, and ſome evangeliſts, and other ſome paſtors and teachers, unto the perfecting of the ſaints, to the work of miniſtration, to the edifying of the body of Chriſt, until we come all into the unity of faith, and of the knowlege of the ſon of God into a perfect man, into the meaſure of full grown age: that we be no more children that may be carried about with every wind of doctrine: but following truth in charity, let us in all things grow into him that is the head, even Chriſt, in whom the whole body conjoined and compacted together by all the joint of ſubminiſtration, according to the working in the meaſure of every part, maketh increaſe of the body, unto the edifying of it ſelf by charity.

They overthrow the church that impair the authority of man's miniſtry in the church.

2. By theſe words he ſheweth, that that miniſtry of men, which God uſeth in governing his church is the chief ſinew, whereby the faithful cleave together in one body: and alſo he ſheweth that the church cannot otherwiſe be preſerved ſafe, but if it be upholden by theſe ſtays, in which it pleaſed the Lord to repoſe the ſalvation of it. Chriſt (ſaith he) is gone up on high, that he might fulfil all things. This is the manner of fulfilling, that by his miniſters, to whom he hath committed that office, and hath given the grace to execute that work, he diſpoſeth and diſtributeth his gifts to the church, yea and after a certain manner giveth himſelf preſent, with extending the power of his Spirit in this inſtitution, that it ſhould not be vain or idle. So is the perfecting of the ſaints performed: ſo is the body of Chriſt edified, ſo do we by all things grow into him that is the head, and do grow together among our ſelves: Eph. iv. 12. ſo are we all brought into the unity of Chriſt, if prophecy flouriſh among us, if we receive the apoſtles, if we refuſe not the doctrine miniſtred unto us. Therefore he goeth about the diſſipation, or rather the ruin and deſtruction of the church, whoſoever he be, that either endeavoureth to aboliſh this order of whom we ſpeak, and this kind of government, or miniſheth the eſtimation of it as a thing not ſo neceſſary. For neither the light and heat of the ſun, nor meat and drink are ſo neceſſary to nouriſh and ſuſtain this preſent life, as the office of the apoſtles and paſtors is neceſſary to preſerve the church on earth.

The honour and neceſſity of church miniſtry.

3. Therefore I have above admoniſhed, that God hath oftentimes with ſuch titles as he could, commended the dignity thereof unto us, that we ſhould have it in moſt high honour and price, as the moſt excellent thing of all. He teſtifieth that he giveth to to men a ſingular benefit, in raiſing them up teachers where he commandeth the prophet to cry out, that beautiful are the feet, and bleſſed is the coming of them that bring tidings of peace, Iſa. lii. 7. And when he calleth the apoſtles the light of the world, and ſalt of the earth, Matth. v. 15. and xiv. Neither could this office be more honourably advanced, than it was when he ſaid: He that heareth you, heareth me: he that deſpiſeth you, diſpiſeth me, Luke x. 16. But there is no place more plain, than in Paul in his ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians, where he as it were of purpoſe treateth of this matter. He affirmeth therefore, that there is nothing in the church more excellent or glorious than the miniſtry of the goſpel, foraſmuch as it is the miniſtration of the Spirit, and of righteouſneſs, and of eternal life, 2 Cor. iv. 6. and iii. 9. Theſe and ſuch like ſayings, ſerve to this purpoſe, that that order of governing and preſerving the church by miniſters, which the Lord hath eſtabliſhed for ever, ſhould not grow out of eſtimation among us, and ſo at length by mere contempt grow out of uſe. And how great is the neceſſity thereof, he hath declared not only by words, but alſo by examples. When his will was to ſhine more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, he ſent an angel from heaven to ſend Peter unto him, Acts x. 3. When his will was to call Paul to the knowlege of himſelf, and to engraff him into the church, he ſpake not to him with his own voice, but ſent him to a man, of whom he ſhould receive both the doctrine of ſalvation, and the ſanctification of baptiſm, Acts ix. 6. If it be done without cauſe, that an angel which is the interpreter of God do himſelf abſtain from declaring the will of God, but commandeth that a man be ſent for, to declare it: and not without cauſe that Chriſt the only ſchoolmaſter of the faithful committeth Paul to the ſchooling of a man, yea even that ſame Paul whom he had determined to take up into the third heaven, and to vouchſafe to grant him miraculous revelation of things unſpeakable, 2 Cor. xii. 2: who is there now that dare deſpiſe that miniſtry, or paſs it over as a thing ſuperfluous, the uſe whereof it hath pleaſed God to make approved by ſuch examples?

Apoſtles, prophets, evangeliſts, appointed to have extraordinary, paſtors and teachers to have ordinary government of the church.

4. They that have rule of the government of the church according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, are named of Paul firſt apoſtles, then prophets, third evangeliſts, fourthly paſtors, laſt of all teachers, Eph. iv. 12. Of which the two laſt alone have ordinary office in the church: the other three the Lord raiſed up at the beginning of his kingdom, and ſometimes yet alſo raiſeth up, as the neceſſity of times requireth. What the apoſtle's office is appeareth by that commandment: Go, preach the goſpel to every creature, Mark xvi. 15. There are not certain bounds appointed unto them: but the whole world is aſſigned them, to be brought into the obedience of Chriſt: that in ſpreading the goſpel among all nations whereſoever they ſhall be able, they may every where raiſe up his kingdom. Therefore Paul, when he went about to prove his apoſtleſhip, rhearſeth that he hath gotten to Chriſt not ſome one city, but hath far and wide ſpread abroad the goſpel: and that he hath not laid his hands to another man's foundation, but planted churches where the name of the Lord had never been heard of, Rom. xv. 19. and 20. Therefore the apoſtles were ſent to bring back the world from falling away unto true obedience of God, and each where to eſtabliſh his kingdom by preaching of the goſpel: or (if you like that better) as the firſt builders of the church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the world, Eph. iv. 11. Prophets he calleth, not all expoſitors of God's will whatſoever they be, but thoſe that by ſingular revelation excelled, ſuch as at this time either be none, or are leſs notable. By evangeliſts I underſtand thoſe thoſe which when in dignity they were leſs than the apoſtles, yet in office were next unto them, yea and occupied their rooms. Such were Luke, Timothy, Titus, and others ſuch: and perhaps alſo the ſeventy diſciples whom Chriſt appointed in the ſecond place after the apoſtles, Luke x. 1. and xi. According to this expoſition (which ſeemeth to me agreeable both with the words and meaning of Paul) thoſe three offices were not ordained in the church to this end that they ſhould be perpetual, but only to ſerve for that time wherein churches were to be erected, where were none before or at leaſt to be removed from Moſes to Chriſt. Albeit I deny not, but that afterward alſo the Lord hath ſometimes raiſed up apoſtles, or at leaſt in their places evangeliſts, as it hath been done in our time. For it was needful to have ſuch, to bring back the church from the falling away of antichriſt. Yet the office itſelf I do nevertheleſs call extraordinary, becauſe it hath no place in the churches already well ſet in order. Next after theſe are paſtors and teachers, whom the church may never lack: between whom I think that there is this difference, that the teachers are not appointed to bear rule of diſcipline, nor for the miniſtration of ſacraments, nor admoniſhments or exhortations, but only to expound the ſcripture, that pure and ſound doctrine may be kept among the faithful. But the office of paſtor containeth all theſe things within it.

The ſame charge of apoſtles and paſtors, ſaving that theſe have each of them ſeveral churches to govern.

5. Now we have, which were thoſe miniſtrys in the church that continued but for a time, and which were thoſe that were ordained to endure perpetually. If we join the evangeliſts with the apoſtles, we ſhall have remaining two couples after a certain manner anſwering the one to the other. For as our teachers are like to the old prophets, phets, in ſuch ſort are our paſtors like to the apoſtles. The office of prophets was more excellent by reaſon of the ſingular gift that they had of revelation: but the office of teachers hath in a manner like order, and altogether the ſame end. So thoſe twelve whom the Lord did chooſe, that they ſhould publiſh abroad to the world the new preaching of the goſpel, Luk. vi. 13. Gal. i. 1. in degree and dignity went before the reſt. For although by the meaning and property of the word, all the miniſters of the church may be rightly called apoſtles, becauſe they are ſent of the Lord, and are his meſſengers: yet becauſe it was very needful, that there ſhould be a certain knowlege had of the ſending of them that ſhould bring a thing new and unheard of, it was neceſſary that thoſe twelve (to whoſe number Paul was afterward added) ſhould be garniſhed with ſome peculiar title above the reſt. Paul himſelf indeed in one place giveth this name to Andronicus and Junias, whom he ſaith to have been notable among the apoſtles: Rom. xvi 7. but when he meaneth to ſpeak properly he referreth it to none other but to that principal degree. And this is the common uſe of the ſcripture. Yet the paſtors (ſaving that each of them do govern ſeveral churches appointed to them) have all one charge with the apoſtles Matth. x. 1. Now what manner of thing this is, let us hear it more plainly.

The office which the apoſtles did perform to the whole world, and which paſtors ought to perform to their ſeveral flocks, conſiſteth in preaching the word, and miniſtring the ſacraments.

6. The Lord when he ſent the apoſtles, gave them commandment (as we ſaid even now) to preach the goſpel, and to baptiſe them that believe unto forgiveneſs of ſins. Matth xxviii. 9. He had before commanded, that they ſhould diſtribute the holy ſigns of his body and blood, as he had done. Lo here is a holy, inviolable, and perpetual law laid upon them that ſucceed in the apoſtles place, whereby they receive commandment to preach the goſpel, and miniſter the ſacraments. Whereupon we gather, that they which neglect both theſe things, do falſely ſay that they bear the perſon of the apoſtles. But what of the paſtors? Paul ſpeaking not of himſelf only, but of them all, when he ſaith: let a man ſo eſteem us as the miniſters of Chriſt, and diſtributers of the myſteries of God. 1 Cor. iv. 1. Again in another place, a biſhop muſt be a faſt holder of that faithful word which is according to doctrine: that he may be able to exhort by ſound doctrine, and to convince the gainſayers. Tit. i. 9. Out of thoſe and like places, which are each where to be found, we may gather, that alſo in the office of the apoſtles theſe be the two principal parts, to preach the goſpel, and to miniſter the ſacraments. As for the order of teaching, it conſiſteth not only in public ſermons, but belongeth alſo to private admonitions. So Paul calleth the Epheſians to witneſs that he hath not fled from doing of any of thoſe things that were for their profit, but that he preached and taught them both openly and in every houſe, teſtifying both to the Jews and Grecians, repentance and faith in Chriſt. Act. xx. 20. Again a little after: that he hath not ceaſed with tears to admoniſh every one of them. Act. xx. 31. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpoſe at this preſent to expreſs all the qualities of a good paſtor, but only to point out what they profeſs that call themſelves paſtors: that is, that they are ſo made rulers of the church, not that they ſhould have an idle dignity, but that they ſhould with the doctrine of Chriſt inſtruct the people to true godlineſs, miniſter the holy myſteries, and preſerve and exerciſe upright diſcipline. For whoſoever be ſet to be watchmen in the church, the Lord declareth unto them, that if any by their negligence periſh through ignorance, he will require the blood at their hands. Ezek. xiii. 17. That alſo pertaineth to them all, which Paul ſaith of himſelf: wo to me unleſs I preach the goſpel, foraſmuch as the diſtributing thereof is committed to me. 1 Cor. ix. 16 Finally, what the apoſtles performed to the whole world, the ſame ought every paſtor to perform to his flock, to which he is appointed.

How far forth men are tied unto ſeveral charges.

7. Albeit when we aſſign to every one their ſeveral churches, yet in the mean while we do not deny but that he which is bound to one church may help other churches if any troubleſome thing do happen that requireth his preſence, or if he be aſked counſel of any dark matter. But foraſmuch as for the keeping of the peace of the church, this policy is neceſſary, that there be ſet forth to every man what he ſhould do, leſt all be confuſedly diſordered, run about without calling, or raſhly run altogether into one place, and leſt ſuch as are more careful for their private intereſt than for the edification of the church, ſhould at their own will leave their churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to be kept ſo near as may be, that every man contented with his own bounds, ſhould not not break into another man's charge. And this is no invention of man, but the ordinance of God himself. For we read that Paul and Barnabas ordained elders in all the several churches of Lystra, Antioch, Iconium: Act. xiv. 22. and Paul himself commandeth Titus that he should ordain elders in every city. Tit. i. 5. So in one place he speaketh of the bishops of Philippes, Phil. i. 1. and in another place of Archippus bishop of the Colossians. Col. iv. 17. And there remaineth a notable sermon of his in Luke, to the elders of the church of Ephesus. Act. xx. 18. Whosoever therefore shall take upon him the government and charge of the church, let him know that he is bound to this law of God's calling: not that as bound to the soil (as the lawyers term it) that is, made bound and fastened unto it, he may not once move his foot from thence, if the common profit do so require, so that it be done well and orderly: but he that is called into one place ought not himself to think of removing, nor seek to be delivered as he shall think to be good for his interest. Then if it be expedient that any be removed to another place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his own private advisement, but to tarry for public authority.

With officers appointed for teaching, elders joined to govern the church.

8. But whereas I have without difference called them bishops, and elders, and pastors, and ministers, that rule churches: I did that according to the usage of the scripture, which indifferently useth these words. For whosoever do execute the ministry of the word, to them he giveth the title of bishops. So by Paul, where Titus is commanded to ordain elders in every city, it is immediately added, For a bishop must be unreproveable, &c. Tit. i. 5. So in another place he saluteth many bishops in one church. Phil. i. 1. And in the Acts it is rehearsed, that he called together the elders of Ephesus, whom he himself in his own sermon calleth bishops. Act. xx. 7. Here now it is to be noted, that hitherto we have recited none but those offices that stand in the ministry of the word: neither doth Paul make mention of any other in that fourth chapter which we have alleged. But in the epistle to the Romans, Rom. xii 7. and in the first epistle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xii. 28. he reckoneth up other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, government, caring for the poor. Of the which I omitted those that endured but for a time, because it is to no profitable purpose to tarry upon them. But there are two that do perpetually abide, that is to say, government and care of the poor. Governors I think were the elders chosen out of the people, that should together with the bishops have rule of the judgment of manners, and the using of discipline. For a man cannot otherwise expound that which he saith: let him that ruleth do it with carefulness. Rom. xii. 8. Therefore at the beginning every church had their senate, gathered of godly, grave, and holy men: which had that same jurisdiction in correcting of vices, whereof we shall speak hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience it self declareth. Therefore this office of government is also necessary for all ages.

Deacons and widows chosen to care for the poor and sick.

9. The care of the poor was committed to the Deacons. Howbeit to the Romans there are set two kinds. Let him that giveth (saith Paul in that place) do it in simplicity: let him that hath mercy, do it in chearfulness. Rom. xii. 9. For as much as it is certain that he speaketh of the public offices of the church, it must needs be that there were two several degrees. Unless my judgment deceive me, in the first point he meaneth deacons, that distributed the alms: in the other he speaketh of them that had given themselves to looking to the poor and sick: of which sort were the widows of whom he maketh mention to Timothy. 1 Tim. v. 10. For women could execute no other public office, but to give themselves to the service of the poor. If we grant this, (as we must needs grant it) then there shall be two sorts of deacons: of which, one sort shall serve in distributing the things of the poor, the other in looking to the poor of the church themselves. But although the very word Diaconia, deaconry extendeth further: 1 Tim. v. 10. yet the scripture specially calleth them deacons, to whom the church hath given the charge to distribute the alms, and to take care of the poor, and hath appointed them as it were stewards of the common treasury of the poor: whose beginning, institution, and office, is described of Luke in the Acts. Act. vi. 3 For when a murmuring was raised by the Grecians: for that in the ministry of the poor their widows were neglected, the apostles excusing themselves with saying that they could not serve both offices, both the preaching of the word and the ministring at tables, required of the multitude, that there might be chosen seven honest men, to whom they might commit that doing. Lo what manner of deacons the apoſtolic church had, and what deacons it were meet for us to have according to their example.

Order and ſeemlineſs eſpecially required in church government

10. Now whereas in the holy aſſembly all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing wherein that ought to be more diligently obſerved, than in ſtabliſhing the order of government: becauſe there is no where greater peril if any thing be done diſorderly. Therefore to the end that unquiet and troubleſome men (which otherwiſe would happen) ſhould raſhly thruſt in themſelves to teach or to rule, it is expreſly provided, that no man ſhould without calling take upon him a public office in the church. Therefore that a man may be judged a true miniſter of the church, firſt he muſt be orderly called, then he muſt anſwer his vocation, that is to ſay, take upon him and execute the duties enjoined him. This we may oftentimes mark in Paul: which when he meaneth to approve his apoſtleſhip, in a manner always with his faithfulneſs in executing his office he allegeth his calling. If ſo great a miniſter of Chriſt dare not take upon himſelf the authority that he ſhould be heard in the church, but becauſe he both is appointed thereunto by the commandment of the Lord, and alſo faithfully performeth that which is committed unto him: how great ſhamefulneſs ſhall it be, if any man wanting both or either of theſe, ſhall challenge ſuch honour to himſelf? But becauſe we have above touched the neceſſity of executitg the office, now let us treat only of the calling.

Inward and outward calling of men to execute the miniſtry of the church.

11. The diſcourſe thereof ſtandeth in four parts: that we ſhould know, what manner of miniſters, how, and by whom, miniſters ought to be inſtitute, and with what uſage or what ceremony they are to be admitted. I ſpeak of the outward and ſolemn calling, which belongeth to public order of the church: as for that ſecret calling whereof every miniſter is privy in his own conſcience before God, and hath not the church witneſs of it, I omit it. It is a good witneſs of our heart, that not by any ambition, nor covetouſneſs, nor any other greedy deſire, but with pure fear of God and zeal to edity the church, we receive the office offered unto us. That indeed is (as I have ſaid) neceſſary for every one of us, if we will approve our miniſtry allowable before God. Nevertheleſs he is rightly called in preſence of the church, that cometh unto it with an evil conſcience, ſo that his wickedneſs be not open. They are wont alſo to ſay that even private men are called to the miniſtry, whom they ſee to be meet and able to execute it: becauſe verily learning joined with godlineſs and with the other qualities of a good paſtor, is a certain preparation to the very office. For whom the Lord hath appointed to ſo great an office, he firſt furniſheth them with thoſe armours that are required to fulfill it, that they ſhould not come empty and unprepared unto it. Whereupon Paul alſo to the Corinthians, when he meant to diſpute of the very offices, firſt rehearſed the gifts which they ought to have that execute the offices. 1 Cor. xii. 7 But becauſe this is the firſt ſort of thoſe four points that I have propounded, let us now go forward unto it.

Of what quality and with what reverence miniſters ſhould be choſen.

12. What manner of biſhops it is meet to chuſe, Paul doth largely declare in two places, Tit. i. 9. 2 Tim. iii. 1. but the ſum cometh to this effect, that none are to be choſen, but they that are of ſound doctrine, and of holy life, and not notable in any vice, which might both take away credit from them, and procure ſlander to the miniſtry. Of deacons and elders there is altogether like conſideration. It is always to be looked unto, that they be not unable or unfit to bear the burden that is laid upon them, that is to ſay, that they may be furniſhed with thoſe powers that are neceſſary to the fulfilling of their office. So when Chriſt was about to ſend his apoſtles, he garniſhed them with thoſe weapons and inſtruments which they could not want. Luk. xxi. 15. and xxiv. 49. Matth. xvi. 15. And Paul when he had painted out the image of a good and true biſhop, warneth Timothy, that he would not defile himſelf with chooſing any man that differeth from it. 1 Tim. v. 22. I refer this word How not to the ceremony of chooſing, but to the reverent fear that is to be kept in the chooſing. Hereupon come the faſtings and prayers, which Luke reciteth that the faithful uſed when they made prieſts. Act. i. 8. For whereas they underſtood that they medled with a moſt earneſt matter, they durſt attempt nothing, but with great reverence and carefulneſs. But they chiefly applied themſelves to prayers, whereby they might crave of God the ſpirit of counſel and diſcretion.

Apoſtles elected

13. The third thing that we have ſet in our diviſion was, by whom of God himself.

whom ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certain rule can be gathered out of the institution of apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For because it was an extraordinary ministry, that it might be made discernable by some more notable mark, it behoved that they which should execute it, should be called and appointed by the Lord's own mouth. They therefore took in hand their doing, being furnished by no man's election, but only by the commandment of God and of Christ. Hereupon cometh that when the apostles would put another in the place of Judas, they durst not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lord should declare by lot, whether of them he would have to succeed. Act. i. 13. After this manner also it is meet to take this, that Paul denieth that he was create apostle of men or by man, but by Christ and God the father. Gal. i. 12. That first point, that is to say of men, he had common with all the godly ministers of the word. For no man could rightly take upon him that execution, but he that were called of God. But the other point was proper and singular to himself. Therefore when he glorieth of this, he doth not only boast that he hath that which belongeth to a true and lawful pastor, but also bringeth forth the signs of his apostleship. For when there were some among the Galatians, who labouring to diminish his authority, made him some mean disciple, put in office under them by the principal apostles: he, to defend in safety the dignity of his preaching, which he knew to be shot at by those subtile devices, needed to shew himself in all points nothing inferior to the other apostles. Therefore he affirmeth that he was chosen, not by the judgment of men, like some common bishop, but by the mouth and manifest oracle of the Lord himself.

Bishops lawfully called by men.

14. But no man that is sober will deny, that it is according to the order of lawful calling, that bishops should be appointed by men: forasmuch as there are so many testimonies of the scripture for proof thereof. Neither doth that saying of Paul make to the contrary, as it is said, that he was not sent of men, nor by men: Gal. i. 1. forasmuch as he speaketh not there of the ordinary choosing of ministers, but challengeth to himself that which was special to the apostles. Howbeit God also appointed Paul by himself by singular prerogative, that in the mean time he used the discipline of ecclesiastical calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the apostles were fasting and praying, the holy Ghost said: separate unto me Paul and Barnabas to the work to which I have severally chosen them. Act xiii. 2. To what purpose served that separation and putting on of hands, since the holy Ghost hath testified his own election, but that the discipline of the church in appointing ministers by men, might be preserved? Therefore the Lord could by no plainer example approve such order, than he did when having first declared that he had ordained Paul an apostle for the gentiles, yet he willeth him to be appointed by the church. Which thing we may see in the choosing of Matthias. Act. i. 23. For because the office of apostleship was of so great importance, that they durst not by their own judgment chuse any one man into that degree, they did set two men in the midst, upon the one of whom the lot should fall: that so both the election might have an open testimony from heaven, and yet the policy of the church should not be passed over.

Whether a minister of the church may be made by the authority of one man or no.

15. Now it is demanded whether the minister ought to be chosen of the whole church, or only of the other of the same office, and of the elders that have the rule of discipline, or whether he may be made by the authority of one man. They that give this authority to one man, allege that which Paul saith to Titus: Therefore I have left thee in Creta, that thou shouldest ordain elders in every city. Tit. i. 15. Again to Timothy: lay not hands quickly upon any man. 1 Tim. v. 22. But they are deceived if they think that either Timothy at Ephesus, or Titus in Creta, used a kingly power, that either of them should dispose all things at his own will. For they were above the rest, only to go before the people with good and wholsome counsels: not that they only, excluding all others, should do what they listed. And that I may not seem to feign any thing, I will make it plain by a like example. For Luke rehearseth that Paul and Barnabas ordained elders in every church-Act xiv. 23. but he also expresseth the order or manner how, when he saith that it was done by voices, ordaining elders (saith he) by lifting up of hands in every church. Therefore they two did create them: but the whole multitude, as the Grecian manner was in elections, did by holding up their hands, declare whom they would have. Even in like manner the Roman hiſtories do oftentimes ſay that the counſel which kept the aſſemblies, created new officers, for none other cauſe but for that he received the voices and governed the people in the election. Truly it is not likely that Paul granted more to Timothy and Titus than he took to himſelf. But we ſee that he was wont to create biſhops by voices of the people. Therefore the places above are ſo to be underſtood, that they diminiſh nothing of the common right and liberty of the church. Therefore Cyprian ſaith well, when he affirmeth that it cometh from the authority of God, that the prieſt ſhould be choſen in preſence of the people before the eyes of all men, and ſhould by public judgment and teſtimony be allowed for worthy and meet. For we ſee that this was by the commandment of the Lord obſerved in the levitical prieſts, that before their conſecration they ſhould be brought into the ſight of the people. Levit. viii. 6. Num. xx. 26. And no otherwiſe is Matthias added to the fellowſhip of the apoſtles: Act. i. 15. and no otherwiſe the ſeven deacons were created: Acts. vi. 2. but the people ſeeing and allowing of it. Theſe examples (ſaith Cyprian) do ſhew, that the ordering of a prieſt ought not to be done, but in the knowlege of the people ſtanding by: that the ordering may be juſt and lawful, which hath been examined by the witneſs of all. We are therefore come thus far, that this by the word of God a lawful calling of a miniſter, when they that ſeem meet are created by the conſent and allowance of the people and that other paſtors ought to bear rule of the election, that nothing be done amiſs of the multitude, either by lightneſs, or by evil affections, or by diſorder.

The form of ordaining miniſters in the church by laying on of hands.

16. Now remaineth the form of ordering, to which we aſſigned the laſt place in the calling. It is evident that the apoſtles uſed no other ceremony when they admitted any man to the miniſtry, but the laying on of hands. And I think that this uſage came from the manner of the Hebrews, which did as it were preſent unto God by laying on of hands that which they would have bleſſed and hallowed. So when Jacob was about to bleſs Ephraim and Manaſſeh, he laid his hands upon their heads. Gen. xlviii. 14. Which thing our Lord followed, when he prayed over the infants. Matth. xix. 15. In the ſame meaning (as I think) the Jews by the ordinance of the law, laid hands upon the ſacrifices. Wherefore the apoſtles by laying on of hands did ſignify that they offered him to God, whom they admitted into the miniſtry. Act xix. 6. Albeit they uſed it alſo upon them to whom they applied the viſible graces of the Spirit. Howſoever it be, this was the ſolemn uſage, ſo oft as they called any man to the miniſtry of the church. So they conſecrated paſtors and teachers, and ſo alſo deacons. But although there be no certain commandment concerning the laying on of hands, yet becauſe we ſee that it was continually uſed among the apoſtles, their ſo diligent obſerving of it ought to be to us inſtead of a commandment. And truly it is profitable, that by ſuch a ſign, both the dignity of the miniſtry ſhould be commended to the people, and alſo that he which is ordained ſhould be admoniſhed, that he is not now at his own liberty, but made bound to God and that church. Moreover it ſhall not be a vain ſign, if it be reſtored to the natural beginning of it. For if the Spirit of God, hath ordained nothing in the church in vain, we muſt think that this ceremony, ſince it proceeded from him, is not unprofitable, ſo that it be not turned into a ſuperſtitious abuſe. Laſt of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did lay their hands upon the miniſters, but the paſtors only. Howbeit it was uncertain whether many did always lay on their hands or no. But it is evident that that was done in the deacons, in Paul and Barnabas, and a few others. Act. vi. 6. and xiii. 3. But Paul himſelf in another place reporteth, that he, and not many others, did lay his hands upon Timothy. I admoniſh thee (ſaith he) that thou raiſe up the grace which is in thee by laying on of my hands. 2 Tim. i. 6. 1 Tim. iv. 14. For, as for that which in the other epiſtle is ſpoken of the laying on of the hands of the preſbytery, I do not ſo take it, as though Paul did ſpeak of the company of the elders, but I underſtand by that word the very ordinance it ſelf: as if he had ſaid: ſee that the grace, which thou had received by laying on of hands when I did create thee a prieſt, may not be in vain.

CHAP. IV.

Of the ſtate of the old church, and of the manner of governing that was in uſe before the Papacy.

The miniſters of the ancient church of Chriſt preſbyters or prieſts and deacons out of the order of preſbyters paſtors and teachers choſen.

HITHERTO we have treated of the order of governing the church, as it hath been delivered us out of the pure word of God, and of the miniſtries, as they were inſtituted by Chriſt. Now that all theſe things may be more clearly and familiarly opened, and alſo be better faſtened in our minds: it ſhall be profitable in theſe things to conſider the form of the old church, which ſhall repreſent to our eyes a certain image of God's inſtitution. For although the biſhops of thoſe times did ſet forth many canons, wherein they ſeemed to expreſs more than was expreſſed in the holy ſcripture: yet they with ſuch heedfulneſs framed all their order after the only rule of God's word, that a man may eaſily ſee that in this behalf they had in a manner nothing diſagreeing from the word of God. But although there might be ſomewhat wanting in their ordinances, yet becauſe they with ſincere zeal endeavoured to preſerve God's inſtitution, and ſwerved not much from it, it ſhall be very profitable here ſhortly to gather what manner of obſervation they had. As we have declared that there are three ſorts of miniſters commended unto us in the ſcripture: So all the miniſters that the old church had, it divided into three orders. For out of the order of elders were partly choſen paſtors and teachers: the reſt of them had the rule of the judgment and correction of manners: to the deacons was committed the care of the poor, and the diſtributing of the alms. As for the readers and acoluthes, they were not names of certain offices: but thoſe whom they called clerks, they trained from their youth upward in certain exerciſes to ſerve the church, that they might the better underſtand to what purpoſe they were appointed, and might in time come the better be prepared to their office: as I ſhall by and by ſhew more at large. Therefore Jerom, [In Iſa. c. 6.] when he had appointed five orders of the church, reckoneth up biſhops, prieſts, deacons, believers, and cethecumeni, to the reſt of the clergy and monks he giveth no proper place.

2. Therefore to whom the office of teaching was injoined all theſe they named prieſts. In every city they choſe out of their own number one man, to whom they ſpecially gave the title of biſhop: that diſſenſions ſhould not grow of equality, as it is wont to come paſs. Yet the biſhop was not ſo above the reſt in honour and dignity, that he had a dominion over his fellows. But what office the conſul had in the ſenate, to propound of matters, to aſk opinions, to go before the other with counſelling, admoniſhing, and exhorting, to govern the whole action with his authority, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counſel, the ſame office had the biſhop in the aſſembly of the prieſts. And the old writers themſelves confeſs, that the ſame was by mens conſent brought in for the neceſſity of the times. Therefore Jerom upon the epiſtle to Titus ſaith, (Epi. ad Eva.) The ſame was a elder which was an biſhop. And before that bythe inſtinction of the devil, there were diſſenſions in religion, and it was ſaid among the people, I am of Paul, I am of Cephas: churches were governed by common counſel of Elders. Afterward, that the ſeeds of diſſentions might be plucked up, all the care was committed to one man. As therefore the prieſts do know, that by cuſtom of the church they are ſubject to him that is ſet over them: ſo let the biſhops know, that they are above the prieſts, rather by cuſtom, than by the truth of the Lord's diſpoſing, and that they ought to govern the church in common together. But in another place he teacheth how ancient an inſtitution it was. For he ſaith that at Alexandria, from Mark the evangeliſt even to Heraclas and Dionyſius, the prieſts did always chooſe out one of themſelves, and ſet him in a higher degree, whom they named a biſhop. Therefore every city had a company of prieſts which were paſtors, and teach-

A college or company of prieſts in every city, to teach, exhort, and correct the people: out of that company for avoiding of diſſenſion choſen to be a biſhop, the honour and dignity which a biſhop ſo choſen had above the reſt, the country furniſhed with prieſts from the city, thoſe prieſts under the biſhops authority, the compaſs of ground committed to the care of one biſhop, tearmed his biſhoprick, in the primitive church.

ers. For they all did execute among the people that office of teaching, exhorting and correcting, which Paul appointeth to the biſhops: Tit. i. 9. and that they might leave ſeed after them, they laboured in teaching the younger men, that had profeſſed themſelves ſoldiers in the holy warfare. To every city there was appointed a certain country, that ſhould take their prieſts from thence, and be accounted as it were into the body of that church. Every company (as I have before ſaid) only for preſervation of policy and peace were under one biſhop: which was ſo above the reſt in dignity, that he was ſubject to the aſſembly of his brethren. If the compaſs of ground that was under his biſhopric was ſo great, that he could not ſuffice to ſerve all the offices of a biſhop in every place of it, in the country itſelf there were in certain places appointed prieſts which in ſmall matters ſhould execute his authority. Them they called country biſhops, becauſe in the country they repreſented the biſhop.

The office of biſhops and prieſts to diſtribute the word and ſacraments.

3. But, ſo much as belongeth to the office, whereof we now ſpeak, as well the biſhops as the prieſts were bound to apply the diſtributing of the word and ſacraments. For it was ordained only at Alexandria, (becauſe Arius had there troubled the church) that the prieſt ſhould not preach to the people, as Socrates ſaith in the 9. book of the tripartite hiſtory. Which yet Jerom confeſſeth that he miſliketh not. Truly it ſhould be counted monſtrous, if any man had given out himſelf for a biſhop, that had not alſo in very deed ſhewed himſelf a true biſhop. Therefore ſuch was the ſeverity of thoſe times, that all miniſters were driven to the fulfilling of ſuch office, as the Lord requireth of them. Neither do I rehearſe the manner of one age alone. For even in Gregory's time, when the church was now almoſt decayed (certainly it was much degenerate from the ancient pureneſs) it had not been tolerable that any biſhop ſhould abſtain from preaching. The prieſt (ſaith he in one place) dieth if there be no ſound heard of him: becauſe he aſketh againſt himſelf the wrath of the ſecret judge, if he go without ſound of preaching. (Epi. 4. Hom. in. Ezec.) And in another place: when Paul teſtifieth that he is clean from the blood of all: Act. xx. 16. in this ſaying we be convinced, we be bound, we be ſhewed to be guilty, who are called prieſts, who beſide the evils that we have of our own, add alſo the deaths of others: becauſe we kill ſo many as we being luke warm and ſilent do daily ſee to go to death. He calleth himſelf and others ſilent becauſe they were leſs diligent in their work than they ought to be. When he ſpareth not them, that did half perform their duty: what think you he would have done, if a man had altogether ſat idle? Therefore this was a great while holden in the church, that the chief duty of the biſhop was to feed God's people with the word, or both publicly and privately to edify the church with ſound doctrine.

For preſerving of diſcipline archbiſhops and patriarchs: ordained by them who never meant to forge another form of ruling the church, than God hath appointed in his word.

4. But whereas every province had among their biſhops one archbiſhop: alſo where in the Nicene ſynod there were ordained patriarchs, which ſhould in degree and dignity be above the archbiſhops, that pertained to the preſerving of diſcipline. Howbeit in this diſcourſe, that which was moſt rarely uſed may not be omitted. For this cauſe therefore chiefly theſe degrees were ordained, that if any thing happened in any church, that could not well be ended by a few, might be referred to a provincial ſynod. If the greatneſs or difficulty of the matter required a greater diſcuſſing, the patriarchs were alſo called to it with the ſynods, from whom there might be no appeal but to a general council. The government ſo ordered many called a Hierarchy, by a name (as I think) unproper, and truly unuſed in the ſcriptures. For the holy Ghoſt willed to provide, that no man ſhould dream of a principality or dominion when the government of the church is ſpoken of. But, if leaving the word we look upon the thing, we ſhall find that the old biſhops meant to forge no form of ruling the church, differing from that which the Lord appointed by his word.

The office of deacons, the ſame under the apoſtles, and in the primitive church: the occaſion of making ſubdeacons and archdeacons.

5. Neither was the order of the deacons at that time any other than it was under the apoſtles. For they received the daily offerings of the faithful, and the yearly revenues of the church, to beſtow them upon true uſes, that is to ſay, to diſtribute them to feed partly the miniſters, and partly the poor: but by the appointment of the biſhop, to whom alſo they yearly rendered accounts of their diſtribution.

diſtribution. For whereas the canons do every where make the biſhop diſtributer of all the goods of the church, it is not ſo to be underſtood, as though he did by himſelf diſcharge that care: but becauſe it was his part to appoint to the deacon, who ſhould be received into the common alms of the church, and of that which remained to whom it ſhould be given, and how much to every one: becauſe he had an overſeeing whether the deacon did faithfully execute that which belonged to his office. For thus it is read in the canons which they aſcribe to the apoſtles: we command that the biſhop have the goods of the church in his own power. For if he be put in truſt with the ſouls of men, which are more precious, much more it is meet that he have charge of money: ſo that by his power all things may be diſtributed to the poor by the elders and deacons: that they may be all miniſtred with fear and carefulneſs. And in the council of Antioch it is decreed, that the biſhops ſhould be reſtrained that meddle with the goods of the church, without the knowlege of the elders and deacons. But of that point we need to make no longer diſputation, ſince it is evident by many epiſtles of Gregory, that even at that time, when otherwiſe the ordinances of the church were much corrupted, yet this obſervation continued, that the deacons ſhould under the biſhop be the ſtewards of the poor. As for ſubdeacons, it is likely that at the begining they were joined to the deacons, that they ſhould uſe their ſervice about the poor: but that difference was by little and little confounded. But archdeacons began then to be created, when the plenty of the goods, required a new and more exact manner of diſpoſing them: altho' Jerom doth ſay, that it was even in his age. In their charge was the ſum of their revenues, poſſeſſions, and ſtore, and the collection of the daily offerings. (Epi. ad Nep. Epi. x. li. 1.) Whereupon Gregory declareth to the archdeacon of Salon, that he ſhould be holden guilty if any of the goods of the church, periſhed either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was given to them to read the goſpel to the people, and to exhort them to pray: and whereas they were admitted to deliver the cup in the holy ſupper, that was rather done to garniſh their office, that they ſhould execute it with the more reverence, when by ſuch ſigns they were admoniſhed that it was no prophane bayliwike that they exerciſed, but a ſpiritual function, and dedicate to God.

6. Hereby alſo we may judge what uſe there was, and what manner of diſtribution of the church goods. Each where both in the decrees of Synods, and among the old writers it is to be found, that whatſoever the church poſſeſſeth either in lands or in money, is the patrimony of the poor. Therefore oftentimes there, this ſong is ſung to the biſhops and deacons, that they ſhould remember, that they meddle not with their own goods, but the goods appointed to the neceſſity of the poor: which if they unfaithfully ſuppreſs or waſte, they ſhall be guilty of blood. Whereby they are admoniſhed, with great fear and reverence, as in the ſight of God, without reſpect of perſons, to diſtribute them to whom they are due. Hereupon alſo come thoſe grave proteſtations in Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, and other like biſhops, whereby they affirm their own uprightneſs to the people. But ſince it is equity, and eſtabliſhed by the law of the Lord, that they which employ their ſervice to the church, ſhould be fed with the common charges of the church, and alſo many prieſts in that age, conſecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poor: the diſtributing was ſuch, that neither the miniſters wanted ſuſtenance, nor the poor were neglected. But yet in the meantime it was provided that the miniſters themſelves, which ought to give example of honeſt ſparing to others ſhould not have ſo much, whereby they might abuſe it to riotous exceſs or luxury, but only wherewith to ſuſtain their own need. For thoſe of the clergy (ſaith Jerom) which are able to live of their parents, if they take that which is the poor's, do commit ſacrilege, and by ſuch abuſe they eat and drink to themſelves damnation.

The beſtowing of church goods.

7. Firſt the miniſtration was free and voluntary, whereas the biſhops and deacons were of their own will faithful, and uprightneſs of conſcience and innocency of life were to them inſtead of the laws. Afterward when evil examples grew of the greedineſs or perverſe affections of ſome, to correct thoſe faults, the canons were made, which divided the revenues of the church into four parts: of which they aſſigned one part to them of the clergy, the ſecond to the poor, the third to the maintainance and reparation of the churhes, and other holy buildings; the fourth to the poor, as -

Church goods divided into four parts: one aſſigned to the maintainance of the clergy the reſt to other uſes.

as well ſtrangers as of their own country. For whereas the other cannons, give this laſt part to the biſhop, that varieth nothing from my above-ſaid diviſion. For they mean not that that part ſhould be his own, that either he himſelf alone ſhould devour it, or pour it out, upon whom or what he liſt, but that it ſhould ſuffice to maintain the hoſpitality which Paul requireth of that order, 2 Tim. iii. 2. And ſo do Gelaſius and Gregory expound it. For Gelaſius bringeth no other reſon why the biſhop ſhould challenge any thing to himſelf but that he might give it priſoners and ſtrangers. And Gregory ſpeaketh yet more plainly. It is the manner (ſaith he) of the ſee apoſtolic, to give commandment to the biſhop when he is ordered, that of all the revenue that ariſeth, that there be made four portions: that is to ſay the one to the biſhop and his family for hoſpitality, and entertainment: the ſecond to the clergy: the third to the poor: the fourth to the repairing of churches. Therefore it was lawful for the biſhop to take nothing to his own uſe, but ſo much as were enough for moderate and mean food and clothing. If any began to exceed either in riotous expence, or in oſtentation and pomp he was by and by repreſſed by by his fellows, and if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignity.

The treaſures and implements of the church made a way to help the neceſſities of the poor which could not otherwiſe be provided for.

8. As for that which they beſtowed upon garniſhing of holy things, at the firſt it was very little. Afterward when the church became ſomewhat richer yet in that behalf they ſtill kept a mean. And yet all the money that was beſtowed thereupon remained ſafe for the poor, if any great neceſſity happened. So when famine poſſeſſed the province of Jeruſalem, and the need could not otherwiſe be relieved, Cyrillus ſold the veſſels and garments and ſpent them upon ſuſtenance of the poor. Likewiſe Acatius biſhop of of Amida, when a great multitude of the Perſians, in a manner ſtarved for hunger, called together the clergy, and when he had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither diſhes nor cups, becauſe he neither eateth nor drinketh, he molt the veſſels to make thereof both meat and ranſom for men in miſery, (Tripar. hiſt. lib. 5.) Jerom alſo, when he inveigheth againſt the too much gorgeouſneſs of temples, doth with honour make mention of Exuperius biſhop of Theloſa in his time, which carried the Lord's body in a wicker baſket, and his blood in glaſs, but ſuffered no poor man to be hungry, (Lib. 11. cap. 16.) That which I even now have ſaid of Acatius, Ambroſe rehearſeth of himſelf, (Ad Nepot. Lib. de. offic. c. 28.) For when the Arians charged him for that he had broken the holy veſſels to ranſom priſoners, he uſed this moſt godly excuſe: He that ſent the apoſtles without gold, gathered churches together without gold. The church hath gold, not to keep but to beſtow it, and to give relief in neceſſities. What need is it to keep that which helpeth not? Do we not know, how much gold and ſilver the Aſſyrians took out of the temple of the Lord? Doth not the prieſt better to melt them for the ſuſtenance of the poor, if other reliefs do fail, than an enemy, a robber of God to bear them away? Will not the Lord ſay, Why haſt thou ſuffered ſo many needy to die for hunger? and verily thou hadſt gold whereof thou mighteſt have miniſtred them ſuſtenance. Why were ſo many led captive, and not ranſomed? why were ſo many ſlain by the enemies? It had been better that thou ſhouldeſt ſave the veſſels of living men, than of metals. To theſe things thou ſhalt not be able to anſwer. For what wouldeſt thou ſay? I feared leſt God's temple ſhould want garniſhing. He would anſwer: ſacraments require not gold: neither do theſe things pleaſe with gold that are not bought with gold. The ranſoming of priſoners is a garniſhing of ſacraments. In ſum, we ſee that it is moſt true which the ſame man ſaith in another place, that whatſoever the church then poſſeſſed was the ſtore of the needy. Again: that a biſhop hath nothing that is not the poor's, (Lib. 5. epiſt. 31. and 33.)

The inſtitution of young clergymen, and clerks in lower functions, to be trained up for the higher ſervices of the church.

9. Theſe that we have rehearſed were the miniſters of the old church. For the other of which the eccleſiaſtical writers make mention, were rather certain exerciſes and preparations, than appointed offices. For thoſe holy men, that they might leave a ſtore for the church after them, received into their charge, government and diſcipline, young men which with the conſent and authority of their parents, profeſſed themſelves ſoldiers of the ſpiritual warfare: and they ſo framed them from their tender age, that they ſhould not come unſkilful and raw to the executing of their office. But all they that were inſtructed with ſuch beginnings, were called clerks, I would indeed that ſome other more proper name had rather been given them. For this name grew in of error, or of corrupt affection: foraſmuch as Peter calleth the whole church the clergy, that is to ſay, the Lord's inheritance, 1 Pet. v. 3. But the inſtitution itſelf was very holy and profitable, that they which would consecrate themselves and their service to the church, should be so brought up under the keeping of the bishop, that none should minister to the church, but he that was well informed beforehand, and that had from his very youth both sucked holy doctrine, and by severe discipline put in a certain continuing quality of gravity and holy life, and were estranged from worldly cares, and were accustomed to spiritual cares and studies. But as young soldiers are by certain counterfeit skirmishes instructed to learn true and earnest fight, so there were also certain rudiments, whereby they were exercised while they were clerks, before that they were promoted to the very offices. Therefore first they committed to the clerks the charge to open and shut the church, and they named them Ostiarii, doorkeepers. Afterward they called them Acoluthi, followers, who waited upon the bishop in his household services, and did continually accompany him, first for honour's sake, and then that no suspicion should arise of them. Moreover that by little and little they might become known to the people, and get to themselves commendation: also that they might learn to abide the sight of all men, and to speak before all men: that being made priests, when they come forth to teach, they should not be abashed with shame: therefore place was appointed them to read in the pulpit. After this manner they were promoted by degrees, to shew proof every one of their diligence in all their several exercises, till they were made subdeacons. This only is my meaning, that those were rather gross beginnings, than such offices as were accounted among the true ministers of the church.

The care, which the old church had in making choice of fit men for church offices.

Their order not always one and the same, concerning the parsons by whom church ministers were made.

10. Whereas we said that the first and second point in the calling of ministers, are, what manner of men they ought to choose, and how great a religious carefulness they ought to use in that matter: therein the old church hath followed the prescribed order of Paul, and the examples of the apostles. For they were wont to come together to choose the pastors with most great reverence, and careful calling upon the name of God. Beside this they had a form of examination, whereby they tried the life and doctrine of them that were to be chosen by the rule of Paul. Only they somewhat offended herein with too much severity: because they would require more in a bishop than Paul required, and especially in process of time they required unmarried life. But in the other points their observation was agreeing with Paul's description, 1 Tim. iii. 2. But in this which we made the third point, that is to say, who ought to institute ministers, they kept not always one order. In old time, none was received into the company of clerks without the consent of all the people: insomuch that Cyprian laboureth earnestly to excuse that he appointed one Aurelius to be a reader without asking advice of the church, because that was done beside the custom, though not without reason, (Lib. 2. epist. 5.) For this he saith before: in ordering of clerks, Dear brethren, we are wont first to ask your advice, and by common counsel to weigh the manners and deservings of every one. But because in these lesser exercises, there was not much peril: because they were chosen to a long proof, and not to a great office, therefore the consent of the people therein ceased to be asked. Afterward in the other degrees also, except the bishopric, the people commonly left the judgment and choise of them to the bishop and the priests, that they should examine who were meet and worthy: saving peradventure when new priests were appointed for parishes: for then it behoved that the multitude of that place namely should consent. Neither is it any wonder, that the people in this behalf were little careful in keeping their own right. For no man was made a subdeacon, that had not shewed a long proof of himself in his be- a clerk under that severity of discipline, which then was used. After that he had been tried in that degree he was made a deacon From thence he came to the honour of priesthood if he had had behaved himself faithfully. So no man was promoted of whom there had not been indeed a trial had many years before the eyes of the people. And there were many canons to punish their fault: so that the church could not be troubled with evil priests or deacons, unless it neglected the remedies. Howbeit in the priests also there was always required the consent of them of the same city: which the very first canon testifieth in the sixty seventh distinction, which is fathered upon Anacletus. Finally, all the admissions into orders were therefore done at certain appointed times of the year, that no man should privily creep in without the consent of the faithful or should with too much easiness be promoted without witnesses.

The consent of the people in the making of bishops.

11. In choosing of bishops the people had the liberty long preserved, that none should be thrust in, that were not accepted of all. This therefore was forbidden in the council at Antioch, that none should be thrust into them against their will. Which thing also Leo the first, doth diligently confirm, (Epi. 90. ca. 2.) Hereupon came these sayings: let him be chosen whom the clergy, and the people, or the greater number shall require. Again: let him that shall bear rule over all be chosen of all. For it must needs be, that he that is made a ruler being unknown and not examined, is thrust in by violence. Again, Let him be chosen, that is both chosen by the clerks, and desired by the people: and let him be consecrate by them of that province with the judgment of the metropolitan. The holy fathers took so great heed that this liberty of the people should by no means be diminished, that when the general synod gathered together at Constantinople did order Nectarius, they would not do it without the allowance of the clergy and people, as they testified by their epistle to the synod of Rome. Therefore when any bishop did appoint a successor to himself, it was not otherwise established unless the whole people did confirm it. Whereof you have not only an example, but also the very form in Augustine in the naming of Eradius, (Epistola 10.) And Thedorite, when he rehearseth that Peter was named by Athanasius to be his successor, by and by addeth, that the order of priests confirmed it, and the magistrate, and nobility, and the people approved it with their consenting shout, (Theod. lib. 4. cap. 20.)

The order of the council of Laodicea that the election of bishops should not be left to multitudes, whereby notwithstanding the regard of the multitude is not excluded.

12. I grant indeed that this also was by very good reason established in the counsel at Laodicea, that the election should not be left to multitudes. For it scarcely happeneth at any time, that so many heads should well order any thing with one meaning: and commonly this is true, that the uncertain commonality is divided into contrary affections. But for this peril there was used a very good remedy. For first the clerks only did chuse: whom they had chosen they presented to the magistrate, or to the senate and chief men of the people. They, after consultation had, if they thought the election good, confirmed it: if not, they did choose another, whom they did rather allow. Then the matter was moved to the multitude, which although they were not bound to those fore judgments, yet thereby they could be the less disordered. Or if they began at the multitude: that was done only to learn whom they did chiefly desire. When the desires of the people were heard, then they of the clergy did choose him. So neither was it lawful for the clergy to appoint whom they listed, neither were they bound to obey the foolish desires of the people. Leo appointed this order in another place when he saith, (Epistо. 87.) There are to be looked for, both the desires of the citizens, the peoples testimonies, the judgment of the honourable, and the election of the clerks. Again, Let there be holden the testimony of the honourable, the subscription of the clerks, the consent of the order and commonality. No reason (saith he) suffereth it to be otherwise done. And nothing else meaneth that decree of the Synod at Laodicea, but that the clergy and chief of the people, should not suffer themselves to be carried ed away by the undiscreet multitude: but rather that with their wisdom and gravity they should repress the peoples foolish affections, if at any time need should so require.

How long it continued in use that the clergy, the chief rulers, and the people had all to do in the elections of bishops.

13. This order of choosing was yet in force in the time of Gregory: and it is likely that it endured long after. There remain many epistles of his, that give evident testimony of this matter. For so oft as he hath to do with the creating of any new bishop, he useth to write to the clergy, to the order, and to the people, and sometimes also to the ruler, according as the government of the city is appointed. But if by reason of the disordered state of the church, he commiteth to any bishop adjoining charge of overseeing in the election, yet he always requireth a solemn decree strengthened with the subscriptions of all. Yea and when there was one Constantius created bishop at Millane, and that man of the Millanese were by reason of the invasion of the barbarous nations fled to Genua: he thought that the election could not otherwise be lawful, unless they also were called together and give their assent, (Lib. 3. Epi. 69.) Yea there are not yet five hundred years past, since pope Nicholas decreed thus of the election of the bishop of Rome: that the cardinal bishops should begin, then that they should join to them the rest of the clergy, last of all that the

the election ſhould be confirmed by the conſent of the people. And in the end he reciteth that decree of Leo, which I even now alleged, and commandeth it from thenceforth to be in force. But if the malice of wicked men ſhall ſo prevail, that the clerks to make a true election be compelled to depart out of the city: yet he commandeth that ſome of the people be preſent with them, (Diſtin. 23. cap. in nomine.) As for the emperor's conſent, ſo far as I can perceive, it was required only in two churches, that is, Rome, and Conſtantinople: becauſe there were the two ſeats of the empire. For whereas Ambroſe was ſent to Millane with a power from Valentinian to govern the election of the new biſhop: that was extraordinarily done, by reaſon of grievous factions wherewith the citizens then boiled among themſelves. But at Rome in old time the emperors authority was of ſo great force in creating of the biſhop: that Gregory ſaith, that he was ſet by his commandment in the government of the church, (Epiſt. 5. lib. 1.) when yet by ſolemn uſage he was deſired by the people. This was the manner, that when the clergy and the people had appointed any biſhop, the clergy ſhould forthwith move it to the emperor, that he ſhould either by his allowance confirm the election, or by diſallowance undo it. Neither are the decrees that Gratian gathereth together, repugnant to this cuſtom: wherein is nothing elſe ſaid, but that it is in no wiſe to be ſuffered, that taking away the canonical election, a king ſhould appoint a biſhop after his own luſt: and that the metropolitan ſhould conſecrate none that were ſo promoted by violent powers. For it is one thing to ſpoil the church of her right, that all ſhould be transferred to the luſt of one man: and another thing to grant this honour to a king or an emperor, that by his authority he may confirm a lawful election.

The ancient manner of biſhops aſſembling themſelves to conſecrate biſhops choſen.

14. Now it followeth, that we treat with what form the miniſters of the church were admitted into their office after election: this the Latins called ordination or conſecration: the Greeks have called it Cheirotonia, lifting up of hands, and ſometimes alſo Cheirotheſia, laying on of hands. Howbeit Cheirotonia is properly called that kind of election, where mens conſents are declared by holding up of their hands. There remaineth of the Nicene counſel, that the metropolitan ſhould meet together with all the biſhops of the province to order him who is choſen. But if ſome of them be hindred either by the length of the way, or by ſickneſs, or by any neceſſity, that yet three at the leaſt ſhould meet: and that they that are abſent ſhould by letters teſtify their conſent. And this canon, when with diſcontinuance it grew out of uſe, was afterward renewed with many ſynods. But all, or at leaſt ſo many as had no excuſe, were therefore commanded to be preſent, that they might have the graver trial of the learning and manners of him that was to be ordered: for the matter was not done without trial. And it appeareth by Cyprian's words, that in the old time they were wont not to be called after the election, but to be preſent at the election: and to this end that they ſhould be as it were governors, that nothing ſhould be troubleſomely done in the multitude. For where he ſaid, that the people have power either to chooſe worthy prieſts, or to refuſe unworthy, within a little after he addeth: Wherefore according to the tradition of God and the apoſtles, it is to be diligently kept and holden (which is yet holden with us alſo, and in a manner throughout all provinces) that for the right celebration of orderings, all the biſhops adjoining of the ſame province, ſhould come together to the people for which a governor is ordered, and that the biſhop be choſen in preſence of the people, (Epiſt. 4. lib. 4.) But when they were ſometime ſlowly gathered together, and there was peril leaſt ſome would abuſe that delay to occaſion of ambitious ſueing: it was thought that it ſhould be enough if after the election made, they ſhould meet and after allowance upon law full examination conſecrate him.

The beginning of the cuſtom for biſhops choſen to repair to their metropolitan for conſecration: the corrupt uſe of coming to Rome for it: the rites and ceremonies therein uſed.

15. When this was every where done without exception, by little and little a diverſe manner grew in uſe, that they which were choſen ſhould reſort to the metropolitan city to fetch their ordering. Which came to paſs rather by ambition, and by depravation of the firſt inſtitution, than by any good reaſon. And not long after, when the authority of the ſee of Rome was now increaſed, there came in place yet a worſe cuſtom, that the biſhops almoſt of all Italy ſhould fetch their conſecration from thence. Which we may note out of the epiſtles of Gregory, (Lib. 2. Epiſt. 69. 46.) Only a few cities, which did not ſo eaſily give place, had their ancient right preſerved: as there is an example had of Millane. Peradventure the only metropolitan cities kept their privilege. For all the bishops of the province were wont to come together to the chief city to consecrate the archbishop. But the ceremony was laying on of hands. For I read of no other ceremonies used: saving that in the solemn assembly the bishops had a certain apparel whereby they might be distinctly known from other priests. They ordered all priests and deacons with only laying on of hands. But every bishop with the company of Priests ordained his own priest. But although they did all the same thing: yet because the bishop went before, and it was all done as it were by his guiding, therefore the ordering was called his. Whereupon the old writers have oft this saying: that a priest differeth from a bishop in no other thing, but because he hath not the power of ordering.

CHAP. V.

That the old form of government is utterly overthrown, by the tyranny of the papacy.

The corruption of the church of Rome in chooſing biſhops without regard of manners, learning, or as much as years of diſcretion.

NOW it is good to ſet before mens eyes the order of governing the church, that the ſee of Rome and all the champions thereof do keep at this day and the whole image of that hierarchy which they continually have in their mouth, and to compare it with that order of the firſt and old church which we have deſcribed: that by the compariſon it may appear what manner of church they have, who uſe this only title to charge or rather to overwhelm us. But it is beſt to begin at calling, that we ſee both how, and what manner of men, and by what order they are called to this miniſtry. And then afterward we ſhall conſider how faithfully they execute their office. We will give the firſt place to biſhops: to whom I would to God this might be an honour, to have the firſt place in this diſcourſe. But the matter it ſelf doth not ſuffer me, once to touch this thing be it never ſo lightly, without their great ſhame. And yet I will remember, in what kind of writing I am now occupied: and will not ſuffer my talk, which ought to be framed only to ſimple doctrine, to flow abroad beyond due bounds. But let ſome one of them that have not utterly loſt all ſhame, anſwer me what manner of biſhops are at this day commonly choſen. Truly it is now grown too much out of uſe, to have any examination had of their learning: but if there be had any reſpect of learning, they chuſe ſome lawyer that can rather brawl in a court, than preach in a church. This is certain that, theſe hundred years there hath ſcarcely been every hundredth man choſen that underſtood any thing of holy doctrine. I do not therefore ſpare the former ages, for that they were much better, but becauſe we have now only the preſent church in queſtion. If judgment be had of their manners, we ſhall find that there have been few or almoſt none, whom the old canons would not have judged unworthy. He that was not a drunkard, was a whoremonger: he that was alſo clean from this wickedneſs, was either a dycer, or a hunter, or diſſolute in ſome part of his life. For there be lighter faults, which by the old canons do exclude a man from being a biſhop. But this is a moſt great abſurdity, that mere children ſcarcely ten years old, are by the pope's grant made biſhops. They are grown to ſuch ſhameleſneſs and ſenſeleſs dulneſs, that they dreaded not that extream, yea and monſtrous wicked doing, which is utterly abhorring from the very ſenſe of nature. Hereby appeareth how religious their elections were, where the negligence was ſo careleſs.

Both magiſtrates and people utterly excluded in the church of Rome from medling in the election of biſhops: the pretence under which they are excluded

2 Now in election, all that right of the people is taken away. Their deſirings, their aſſentings, their ſubſcribings, and all ſuch things are vaniſhed: the whole power is transferred to the canons only. They beſtow the biſhopric upon whom they will, and afterward bring him forth into the ſight of the people, but to be worſhipped, not to be examined. But Leo crieth on the otherſide, that no reaſon ſuffereth it, and he pronounceth that it is a violent impoſition. Cyprian, when he teſtifieth that it proceedeth from the law of God that it ſhould not be done but by the conſent of the people, ſheweth that the contrary manner is repugnant to the word of God. The decrees of ſo many ſynods do moſt ſeverely forbid it to be otherwiſe done: and if it be done, they command it to be void. If thoſe things be true, there now remaineth in the papacy no canonical nical election, neither by God's law nor by the eccleſiaſtical law. But although there were no other evil, yet how ſhall they be able to excuſe this that they have ſo ſpoiled the church of her right? But (ſay they) the corruption of times ſo required, that becauſe in appointing of biſhops, hatreds and affections more prevailed with the people and the magiſtrates, than right and ſound judgment, therefore the rule thereof ſhould be given to a few. Admit verily that this were the extreme remedy of a miſchief in a deſperate caſe. But ſince the medicine it ſelf hath appeared more hurtful than the very diſeaſe, why is not this new evil alſo remedied? But (ſay they) it is exactly preſcribed to the canons, what they ought to follow in the election. But do we doubt, but that the people in old time did underſtand that they were bound to moſt holy laws, when they ſaw that they had a rule ſet them by the word of God, when they came together to chooſe a biſhop? For that only voice of God, whereby he deſcribeth the true image of a biſhop, ought worthily to be of more value than infinite thouſands of canons. But nevertheleſs the people, corrupted with a moſt evil affection, had no regard of the law or of equity. So at this day though there be very good laws written, yet they remain buried in papers. Yet for the moſt part it is uſed in mens manners, yea and allowed as though it were done by good reaſon, that drunkards, whoremongers, dicers, are commonly promoted to this honour: (it is but little that I ſay) that biſhoprics are the rewards of adulteries and bawderies. For when they are given but to hunters and faulconers, it is to be thought to be tolerably well beſtowed. Any way to excuſe ſo heinous indignity, it is too much wicked. The people (ſay I) had in old time a very good canon to whom God's word preſcribed, that a biſhop ought to be unreproveable, a teacher, no fighter, &c. 1 Tim. iii. 1. Why therefore is the charge of chuſing removed from the people to theſe men? Becauſe forſooth the word of God was not heard among the tumults and ſeditious partakings of the people. And why ſhould it not at this day be removed again from theſe men, which not only do break all laws, but caſting away all ſhame, do wantonly, covetouſly, ambitiouſly mingle and confound God's and mens matters together?

What occaſion the Roman clergy hath taken to defraud the church of her right in elections, and pains to get into their own hands that which they ſaw ſo groſsly abuſed.

3. But they lye, when they ſay, that this was deviſed for a remedy. We often read that in old times churches were in tumults at the chooſing of biſhops: yet never any man durſt think of taking away the authority from the people. For they had other ways whereby they might either prevent theſe faults, or amend them if they were already committed. But I will tell what it is. When the people began to be negligent in making the elections, and did caſt that care upon the prieſts as little belonging to them, they abuſed this occaſion to uſurp a tyranny to themſelves, which afterward they ſtabliſhed by new canons ſet forth. As for their ordering, it is nothing elſe but a mere mockry. For the ſhew of examination that they there ſet out is ſo vain and hungry, that it wanteth even all colour. Therefore whereas in ſome places princes have by covenant obtained of the biſhops of Rome, that they themſelves might name biſhops, therein the church ſuffereth no new loſs: becauſe the election was taken away, only from the canons, which had by no right violently taken it, or verily ſtoln it. Truly this is a moſt foul example, that out of the court are ſent biſhops to poſſeſs churches: and it ſhould be the work of godly princes to abſtain from ſuch corruption. For it is a wicked ſpoiling of the church, when there is thruſt unto any people a biſhop, whom they have not deſired, or at leaſt with free voice allowed. But that diſorderly manner which hath long ago been in the churches, gave occaſion to princes to take the preſentation of biſhops into their own hands. For they had rather that it ſhould be their gift, than thoſe mens, to whom it nothing more belonged, and which did no leſs wrongfully abuſe it?

The abuſes of the church of Rome in making prieſts and deacons.

4. Lo here is a noble calling, by reaſon whereof the biſhops boaſt themſelves to be the ſucceſſors of the apoſtles. But they ſay that the authority to create prieſts belongeth to them only. But in this they moſt lewdly corrupt the old inſtitution: becauſe they do not by their ordering creat prieſts to rule and feed the people, but ſacrificers to ſacrifice. Likewiſe when they conſecrate deacons, they do nothing of their true and proper office, but they ordain them only to certain ceremonies about the chalice and the paten. But in the ſynod at Chalcedon, it is contrariwiſe decreed, that the orderings ſhould not be abſolutely given, that is to ſay, but that a place ſhould be therewithal aſſigned to them that are ordered, where they ſhall exerciſe their office.

(Dist. 70. ca. 1.) This decree is for two causes very profitable. First, that the church should not be burdened with superfluous charges, nor that that should be spent upon idle men which should be given to the poor: secondly, that they who are ordered, should think that they are not promoted to an honour, but that there is an office committed unto them, to the execution whereof they are bound by solemn protestation. But the Romish masters (which think that there is nothing in religion to be cared for, but their belly) first do expound title to be the revenue that may suffice to sustain them, whether it be by their own livelihood or by benefice. Therefore when they order a deacon or a priest, without taking care where they ought to minister, they give them the order, if they be rich enough to find themselves. But what man can admit this, that the title which the decree of the council requireth, should be the yearly revenue for their sustenance? But now because the latter canons condemned the bishops with penalty to find them whom they had ordered without sufficient title, by this mean to restrain their too much easy admitting: there hath been also a subtility devised to mock out this penalty. For he that is ordered, naming any title whatsoever it be, promiseth that he will be content therewith: by this shift he is driven from his action for his finding. I pass over a thousand frauds that are herein used: that when some do falsly name vain titles of benefices, whereupon they cannot make five shillings by year: other some under secret covenant do borrow benefices, which they promise that they will by and by restore again, but sometime they restore not at all. And such other mysteries.

The disguising ceremonies which the church of Rome useth in making her priests.

5. But although these grosser abuses were taken away, is not this always an absurdity, to appoint a priest to whom you assign no place? Also they order no man but to sacrifice. But the true ordinance of a priest is, to be called to the government of the church: and a deacon to be called to the gathering of the alms: they do indeed with many pomps shadow their doing, that in the very shew it may have a reverence among the simple. But among men that have their sound wit, what can these disguisings avail, if there be no sound stuff or truth underneath them? For they use ceremonies about it, either fetched out of Jewishness, or feigned of themselves, which it were better to forbear. But of true examination, (for I nothing pass upon, that shadow which they retain) of the peoples consent, and of other things necessary, they make no mention. I call a shadow their foolish gesturings meet to be laughed at, framed to a foolish and cold counterfeiting of antiquity. The bishops have their deputies which before the ordering may enquire of their learning. But what? whether they can read their masses, whether they can decline a common noun, that they shall light upon in reading, conjugate a verb, or know the signification of one word, for it is not necessary that they be cunning enough to construe a verse. And yet they are not put back from priesthood which fail even in the childish rudiments, so that they bring any mony or commendation of favour Of like sort it is, that when they are brought to the altar to be ordered, it is asked thrice in a tongue not understood, whether they be worthy of that honour. One answereth which never saw them: (but because nothing should want of the form, he hath part in the play). They are worthy. What may a man blame in these reverend fathers, but that with mocking in so open sacrileges, they do without shame laugh to scorn both God and men? But because they are in long possession. thereof, they think that now it is lawful for them. For whosoever dare once open his mouth against these so evident and so hainous wicked doings, he is forthwith hauled by them to punishment of death, as though it were one that had in old time disclosed abroad the holy mysteries of Ceres. Would they do this if they thought that there were any God?

Corruption in bestowing benefices.

6. Now how much do they behave themselves better in bestwoing of benefices: which thing was once joined with the ordering, but now it is altogether separate? There is among them a diverse manner. For the bishops only do not confer benefices: and in those whereof they are laid to have the conferring, they have not the full right, but others have the presentation, and they retain only the title of collation for honour's sake. There are also nominations out of schools, and resignations, either simple, or made for cause of exchange, commendatory writings, preventions, and whatsoever is of that sort. But they also behave themselves that none of them can reproach another with any thing. So I affirm, that scarcely every hundred benefice is bestowed at this day in the papacy without Simony, as the old writers defined Simony, (Epi. 11. lib. 3.) I do not say, that they all buy them with ready money: but shew ſhew me one of twenty that cometh to a benefice without ſome by commendation, ſome either kindred or alliance promoteth, and ſome the authority of their parents: ſome by doing of pleaſures do get themſelves favour. Finally benefices are given to this end, not to provide for the churches, but for them that receive them. Therefore they call them benefices, by which words they do ſufficiently declare, that they make no other account of them, but as the beneficial gifts of princes, whereby they either get the favour of their ſoldiers or reward their ſervices. I omit how theſe rewards are beſtowed upon barbers, cooks, moile keepers, and ſuch dreggiſh men. And now judicial courts do ring of no matters more, than about benefices: ſo that a man may ſay that they are nothing elſe but a prey caſt before dogs to hunt after. Is this tolerable even to be heard of, that they ſhould be called paſtors, who have broken into the poſſeſſion of a church as into a farm of their enemy? that have gotten it by brawling in the law? that have bought it for money? That have deſerved it by filthy ſervices: which being children yet ſcantly able to ſpeak, have received it, as by inheritance from their uncles and kinſmen and ſome baſtards from their fathers?

Many churches committed to one man's charge unable to order one

7. Would ever the licentiouſneſs of the people, though they had been never ſo corrupt and lawleſs, have gone ſo far? But this is alſo more monſtrous, that one man, (I will not ſay what manner of man, but truly ſuch a one as cannot govern himſelf) is ſet to govern five or ſix churches. A man may ſee in theſe days in princes courts, young men that have three abboties, two biſhoprics, one archbiſhopric. But there are commonly canons with five, ſix or ſeven benefices, whereof they have no care at all, but in receiving the revenues. I will not object, that it is every where cried out againſt by the word of God, which hath long ago ceaſed to be of any eſtimation at all among them. I will not object, that there have been many moſt ſevere penal ordinances in many councils made againſt this wickedneſs: for thoſe alſo they boldly deſpiſe as oft as they liſt. But I ſay that both are monſtrous wicked doings, which are utterly againſt God and nature and the government of the church, that one robber ſhould oppreſs many churches at once, and that he ſhould be called a paſtor, who cannot be preſent with his flock though he would: and yet (ſuch is their ſhameleſſneſs) they cover ſuch abominable filthineſs with the name of the church to deliver themſelves from all blame. But alſo (and God will; in theſe lewdneſſes is contained that holy ſucceſſion, by the merit whereof they boaſt that it is wrought that the church may not periſh.

Monks in the church of Rome made prieſts and ſtill continuing monks contrary both to the ancient cuſtoms and canons, yet when they are made, not diſcharging the duty of prieſts neither.

8. Now (which is the ſecond mark in judging a lawful paſtor) let us ſee how faithfully they exerciſe their office. Of the prieſts that are there created, ſome are monks, ſome are (as they call them) ſecular. The firſt of theſe two companies was unknown to the old church: and it is ſo againſt the profeſſion of monks, to have ſuch a place in the church, that in old time when they were choſen out of monaſteries into the clergy, they ceaſed to be monks. And Gregory, whoſe time had much dregs, yet ſuffered not this confuſion to be made. For he willeth that they be put out of the clergy that are made abbots, for that no man can rightly be at the ſame time both a monk and a clerk: ſince the one is a hinderance to the other. Now if I aſk, how well he fulfilleth his office, whom the canons declare to be unmeet, what I pray you, will they anſwer? they will forſooth allege unto me thoſe untimely born decrees of Innocent and Boniface, whereby monks are ſo received into the honour and power of prieſthood, that they might ſtill abide in their monaſteries. But what reaſon is this, that every unlearned aſs, ſo ſoon as he hath once poſſeſſed the ſee of Rome, may with one word overthrow all antiquity? But of this matter we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Let this ſuffice for this time, that in the purer church it was holden for a great abſurdity, if a monk did execute the office of prieſthood. For Jerom ſaith, that he doth not execute the office of a prieſt, while he is converſant among monks: and maketh himſelf one of the common people to be ruled by the prieſts. But, although we grant them this, what do they of their duty? Of the mendicants ſome do preach, all the other monks either ſing or mumble up maſſes in their dens. As though either Chriſt willed, or the nature of the office ſuffereth prieſts to be made to this purpoſe. Whereas the ſcripture plainly teſtifieth, that it is the prieſt's office to rule his own church, Act. xx. 23. is it not a wicked prophanation, to turn another way, yea utterly to change the holy inſtitution of God? For when they are ordered, they are expreſly forbidden to do the things that God commandeth all prieſts. For this ſong is ſung to them: Let a monk content with his cloister, not presume to minister the sacraments, not to execute any thing belonging to public office. Let them deny, if they can, that it is an open mockery of God, that any priest should be made to this purpose, to abstain from his true and natural office: and that he who hath the name may not have the thing also.

The abuses of the church of Rome in the office of her secular priests.

9. I come to the secular priests: who are partly beneficed men, (as they call them) that is to say, have benefices whereupon to live: and partly do let out their daily labour to hire, in massing, or singing, and live as it were of a stipend gathered thereupon. Benefices have either care of souls, as bishoprics and cure of parishes: or they are the stipends of delicate men, that get their living with singing, as prebends, canonships, parsonages, and dignities, chaplainships and such other. Howbeit, since things are now turned upside down, abbays and priories are given to mere boys, by privilege, that is to say, by common and usual custom. As concerning the hirelings, that get their living from day to day, what should they do otherwise than they do? that is in servile and shameful manner to give out themselves for gain, specially since there is so great a multitude as now the world swarmeth with. Therefore when they dare not beg openly, or for as much as they think they should but little profit that way, they go about like hungry dogs, and with their importunacy, as with barking they extort from men against their wills somewhat to thrust into their belly. Here if I would go about to express in words, how great a dishonour it is to the church, that the honour and office of priesthood is come to this point, I should have no end. Therefore it is not meet that the readers should look for at my hand such a long declaration as may be proportional to so heinous indignity. Briefly I say, if it be the office of priesthood, (as the word of God prescribeth, and the ancient canons require) to feed the church, and to govern the spiritual kingdom of Christ: 1 Cor. iv. 21. all such sacrificers as have no other work or wages, but in making a market of masses, are not only idle in their office, but also have no office at all to exercise For there is no place assigned them to teach: they have no flock to govern: Finally, there is nothing left to them, but the altar, whereupon to sacrifice Christ: which is not to offer to God, but devils, as we shall see in another place.

Other idle sorts of priests neither governing the church, nor distributing at all the word or sacraments.

10. I do not here touch the outward faults, but only the inward evil, which sticheth fast by the root in their institution, I will add a saying, which will sound ill in their ears: but because it is true, I must speak it: that in the same degree are to be accounted canons, deans, chaplains, provosts, and all they that are fed with idle benefices. For what service can they do to the church? For they have put from themselves the preaching of the word, the care of discipline, and ministration of sacraments, as too troublesome burdens. What then have they remaining, whereby they may boast themselves to be true priests? Singing forsooth, and a pomp of ceremonies. But what is that to the purpose? If they allege custom, if use, if prescription of long time: I again on the other side do lay unto them the definition of Christ, whereby he hath expressed unto us both true priests, and what they ought to have that will be accounted such. But if they cannot bear so hard a law, to submit themselves to Christ's rule: at the least let them suffer this matter to be determined by the authority of the primitive church. But their case shall be never the better, if their state be judged by the old canons. They that have degenerate into canons should have been priests, as they were in old time, that should rule the church in common with the bishop, and be as it were his companions in the office of pastor. Those chapter dignities as they call them, do nothing at all belong to the governing of the church: much less chaplainships, and the other dregs of like names. What account then shall we make of them all? Truly both the word of Christ, and the usage of the church excludeth them from the honour of priesthood. Yet they stiffly hold that they are priests: but we must pluck off their visor: so shall we find that their whole profession is most strange and far removed from that office of priests, both which the apostles describe unto us, and which was required in the primitive church. Therefore all such orders, with what titles soever they be notified, since they are new, being verily neither upholden by the institution of God, nor by the ancient usage of the church, ought to have no place in the description of the spiritual government, which the church hath received consecrate with the Lord's own mouth. Or (if they will rather have me to speak more simply and grosly) for as much as chaplains, canons, deacons, provosts, and other idle bellies of the same ſame ſort, do not ſo much as with their little finger touch any ſmall parcel of that office, which is neceſſarily required in prieſts. It is not to be ſuffered, that in wrongfully taking a falſe honour upon themſelves, they ſhould break the holy inſtitution of Chriſt.

Abuſes in the office of biſhops and perſons in pariſhes belonging to the church of Rome.

11. There remain biſhops, and parſons of pariſhes: who I would to God did ſtrive to retain their office. For we would willingly grant unto them, that they have a godly and excellent office, if they did execute it. But when they will be accounted paſtors, while they forſake the churches committed to them, and caſt the care of them upon others, they do, as if it were the paſtor's office to do nothing. If any uſurer that never ſtirred his foot out of the city, would profeſs himſelf a plowman, or a keeper of a vineyard: if a ſoldier that had been continually in the battle and in the camp, and had never ſeen judicial court or books, would boaſt himſelf for a lawyer, who could abide ſuch ſtinking follies? But theſe men do ſomewhat more abſurdly, that will ſeem and be called lawful paſtors of the church, and yet will not be ſo. For how many a one is there, that doth not ſo much, as in ſhew, exerciſe the government of his church? Many do all their life long devour the revenues of churches, to which they never come ſo much as to look upon them. Some others do once in a year either come themſelves, or ſend their ſteward, that nothing ſhould be loſt in the letting to farm. When this corruption firſt crept in, they that would enjoy this kind of vacation, exempted themſelves by privileges: a bare example to have one reſident in his own church. For they eſteem them none otherwiſe than farms over which they ſet their vicars as bailiffs or farmers. But this very natural reaſon rejecteth, that he ſhould be a paſtor of a flock that never ſaw one ſheep thereof.

Negligence of biſhops and paſtors in the office of preaching the word.

12. It appeareth that even in the time of Gregory, there were certain ſeeds to this miſchief that the rulers of churches, began to be negligent in teaching: for he doth in one place grievouſly complain of it. (Hom. 17.) The world (ſaith he) is full of prieſts, but yet in the harveſt there are ſeldom workmen found: becauſe indeed we take upon us the office of prieſt, but we fulfil not the work of the office. Again, becauſe they have not the bowels of charity, they will ſeem lords: they acknowlege not themſelves to be fathers. They change the place of humility into the advancing of lordlineſs. Again, but what do we, O paſtors, who receive the reward, and are no workmen? We are fallen to outward buſineſs, and we take in hand one thing and perform another. We leave the miniſtry of preaching: and to our puniſhment, as I ſee, we are called biſhops, that keep the name of honour and not of virtue. Since he uſeth ſo great ſharpneſs of words againſt them, who were but leſs continuing, and leſs diligent in their office: what I pray you, would he ſay, if he ſaw of the biſhops almoſt none, or truly very few, and of the reſt ſcarcely every hundredth man once in all his life to go up into a pulpit? For men are come to ſuch madneſs, that it is commonly counted a thing too baſe for the dignity of a biſhop, to make a ſermon to the people. In the time of Bernard, things were ſomewhat more decayed: but we ſee alſo with how ſharp chidings he inveigheth againſt the whole order: which yet it is likely to have been then much purer than it is now.

Nothing more abſurd, groſs, and unlike to antiquity, than the government of the church of Rome at this day, in reſpect of her prieſts and biſhops.

13. But if a man do well weigh and examine this outward form of eccleſiaſtical government that is at this day under the papacy, he ſhall find that there is no thieviſh corner wherein robbers do more licentiouſly range without law and meaſure. Truly all things are there ſo unlike the inſtitution of Chriſt, yea ſo contrary to it, they are ſo degenerate from the ancient ordinances and manners of the church, they are ſo repugnant to nature and reaſon, that there can be no greater injury done to Chriſt, than when they pretend his name to the defence of ſo diſordered government. We (ſay they) are the pillars of the church, the chief biſhops of religion, the vicars of Chriſt, the heads of the faithful: becauſe the power of the apoſtles is by ſucceſſion come unto us. They are always bragging of theſe follies, as though they talked unto ſtocks. But ſo oft as they ſhall boaſt of this, I will aſk of them again, what they have common with the apoſtles. For we ſpeak not of any inheritably deſcending honour that may be given to men even while they ly ſleeping: but of the office of preaching, which they ſo much flee from. Likewiſe when we affirm that their kingdom is the tyranny of Antichrist, by and by they answer, that it is that reverend hierarchy, so oft praised of notable and holy men. As though the holy fathers, when they commended the ecclesiastical hierarchy or spiritual government, as it was delivered them from hand to hand from the apostles, did dream of this mishapen and waste disordered heap, where the bishops are for the most part either rude asses, which know not the very first and common principles of faith, or sometime children yet new come from the nurse: and if any be more learned (which yet is a rare example) they think a bishopric to be nothing else but a title of gloriousness and magnificence: where the persons of churches think no more of feeding the flock, than a shoe-maker doth of plowing: where all things are confounded with more than Babylonical dispersing, that there remaineth no more any one step whole of that ordinance of the fathers.

The manners of Roman priests.

14. What if we descend to their manners? where shall be that light of the world, which Christ requireth? where is the salt of the earth Matth. v. 14.? where is that holiness, which may be as a perpetual rule to judge by? There is no degree of men at this day more ill spoken of for riot, wantonness, delicateness, finally all kind of lusts. There are of no degree of men either fitter, or cunninger masters of all deceit, fraud, treason, and breach of faith: there is no where so great cunning or boldness to do hurt. I pass over their disdainfulness, pride, extortion, cruelty. I pass over the dissolute licentiousness in all the parts of their life. In suffering whereof the world is so wearied, that it is not to be feared, that I should seem to enforce any thing too much. This one thing I say, which they themselves shall not be able to deny: that of bishops there is almost none, of the persons of parishes not the hundredth man: but if judgment should be given of his manners according to the old canons, he should be either to be excommunicate: or at least to be put from his office. I seem to say somewhat incredible: so far is that ancient discipline grown out of use, that commanded an exacter trial to be had of the manners of the clergy: but the truth is so. Now let them go, that fight under the standard and guiding of the see of Rome, and let them boast among themselves of the order of priesthood. As for the order that they have, truly it is evident, that it is neither of Christ nor of his apostles, nor of the fathers, nor of the old church.

what deacons do in the church of Rome.

15. Now let the deacons come forth, and that most holy distributing that they have of the goods of the church. Howbeit they do not now create their deacons to that purpose, for they enjoin them nothing else but to minister at the altar, to read and sing the gospel, and do I wote not what trifles. Nothing of the alms, nothing of the care of the poor, nothing of all that function which they in old time executed. I speak of the very institution. For if we have respect what they do, indeed it is not to them an office, but only a step toward priesthood. In one thing, they that keep the deacons place at the mass, do represent a void image of antiquity. For they receive the offerings before the consecration. This was the ancient manner, that before the communion of the supper, the faithful did kiss one another, and offer their alms at the altar: so first by a sign, and afterward by mere liberality they shewed their charity. The deacon, that was the poor mens steward, received that which was given, to distribute it. Now of those alms, there cometh no more to the poor, than if they were thrown into the sea. Therefore they mock the church with this lying deaconry. Truly therein they have nothing like, neither to the institution of the apostles, nor to the ancient usage. But the very distribution of the goods they have conveyed another way: and have so framed it, that nothing can be devised more unorderly. For as thieves, when they have cut mens throats, do divide the prey among them: so these, after the quenching of the light of God's word, as though the church were slain, do think that whatsoever was dedicate to holy uses is laid for prey and spoil. Therefore making a division, every one hath snatched to himself as much as he could.

The spoil they have made of church goods, and the injury they do thereby to the poor.

16. Here all these old orders, that we have declared, are not only troubled, but utterly wiped out and razed. The bishops and priests of cities, who being made rich by this prey, were turned into canons, have made havoc of the chief part among them. But it appeareth that the partition was disorderly, because to this day they strive about the bounds. Whatsoever it be, by this provision it is provided, that not one halfpenny of the goods of the church should come to the poor, whose had been the half part at leaſt. For the canons do give them the fourth part by name: and the other fourth part they do therefore appoint to the biſhops, that they ſhould beſtow it upon hoſpitality, and other duties of charity, I ſpeak not what the clerks ought to do with their portion, and to what uſe they ought to beſtow it. For we have ſufficiently declared, that the reſt which is appointed for temples, buildings and other expences, ought to be open for the poor in neceſſity. I pray you, if they had one ſpark of the fear of God in their heart would they abide this burden of conſcience, that all that they eat, and wherewith they are clothed, cometh of theft, yea of ſacrilege? But ſince they are little moved with the judgment of God, they ſhould at leaſt think, that thoſe be men endued with wit and reaſon, to whom they would perſuade, that they have ſo goodly and well framed orders in their church, as they are wont to boaſt. Let them anſwer me ſhortly, whether deaconry be a licence to ſteal and rob. If they deny this, they ſhall alſo be compelled to confeſs, that they have no deaconry left, foraſmuch as among them all the diſpoſition of the goods of the church is openly turned into a ſpoiling full of ſacrilege.

The pretence which they have, as if the kingdom of Chriſt, were by theſe means made more glorious.

17. But here they uſe a very fair colour. For they ſay, that the dignity of the church is by that magnificence not uncomlily upholden. And they have of their ſect ſome ſo ſhameleſs, that they dare openly boaſt, that ſo only are fulfilled thoſe prophecies, whereby the old prophets deſcribe the gloriouſneſs of the kingdom of Chriſt, when that kingly gorgeouſneſs is ſeen in the prieſtly order. Not in vain (ſay they) God hath promiſed theſe things to his church. Kings ſhall come, they ſhall worſhip in thy ſight, they ſhall bring thee gifts. Pſal. lxxii. 10. Ariſe, ariſe, clothe thee with thy ſtrength, O Sion: clothe thee with the garments of thy glory, O Jeruſalem: all ſhall come from Seba, bringing gold and incenſe, and ſpeaking praiſe to the Lord. All the cattle of Kedar ſhall be gathered together to thee. Iſa. lii 1. and lx. 6. If I ſhould tarry long upon confuting this lewdneſs, I fear leaſt I ſhould ſeem fooliſh. Therefore I will not loſe words in vain. But I aſk: if any Jew would abuſe theſe teſtimonies, what ſolution would they give? Verily they would reprehend his dulneſs, for that he tranſferred thoſe things to the fleſh and the world, that are ſpiritually ſpoken of the ſpiritual kingdom of Chriſt. For we know, that the prophets, under the image of earthly things, did paint out unto us the heavenly glory of God, that ought to ſhine in the church. For the church had never leſs abundance of theſe bleſſings, which their words expreſs, than in the time of the apoſtles: and yet all confeſs, that the force of the kingdom of Chriſt then chiefly floriſhed abroad. What then mean theſe ſayings? Whatſoever is any where precious, high, excellent, it ought to be made ſubject to the Lord. Whereas it is chiefly ſpoken of kings, that they ſhall ſubmit their ſcepters to Chriſt, that they ſhall throw down their crowns before his feet, that they ſhall dedicate their goods to the church: when (will they ſay) was it better and more fully performed, than when Theodoſius, caſting away his purple robe, leaving the ornaments of the empire, as ſome one of the common people: ſubmitted himſelf before God and the church, to ſolemn penance? then when he, and other like godly princes beſtowed their endeavours and their cares to preſerve pure doctrine in the church, and to cheriſh and defend ſound teachers? But how prieſts at that time exceeded not in ſuperfluous riches, that only ſentence of the ſynod at Aquileia, where Ambroſe was chief, ſufficiently declareth: glorious is poverty in the prieſts of the Lord. Truly the biſhops had at that time ſome riches, wherewith they might have ſet out the churches honour, if they had thought thoſe to be the true ornaments of the church. But when they knew that there was nothing more againſt the office of paſtors, than to gliſter and ſhew themſelves proudly with dainineſs of fare, with gorgiouſneſs of garments, with train of ſervants, with ſtately palaces, they followed and kept the humbleneſs and modeſty, yea the very poverty which Chriſt holily appointed among his miniſters.

How far their beſtowing of church goods differeth from that which either the apoſtles, or the ancient fathers uſed.

18. But that we may not be too long in this point, let us again gather into a ſhort ſum, how far that diſpenſation or diſſipation of the goods of the church that is now uſed, differeth from the true deaconry, which both the word of God commendeth unto us, and the ancient church obſerved. As for that which is beſtowed upon the garniſhing of temples, I ſay it is ill beſtowed if that meaſure be not uſed, which both the very nature of holy things appointeth, that the apoſtles and other holy fathers have preſcribed both by doctrine and examples. But what like thing is there ſeen at this day in the temples: whatſoever is framed, I will not ſay after that ancient ſparing, but to any honeſt mean it is rejected. Nothing at all pleaſeth, but that which ſavoureth of riot and the corruption of times. In the mean time they are ſo far from having due care of the lively temples, that they would rather ſuffer many thouſands of the poor to periſh for hunger, than they would break the leaſt chalice or cruit, to relieve their need. And that I may not pronounce of myſelf any thing more grievouſly againſt them, this only I would have the godly readers to think upon: if it ſhould happen that ſame Exuperius biſhop of Tholoſa, whom we even now rehearſed, or Acatius, or Ambroſe, or any ſuch to be raiſed from death, what would they ſay? Truly they would not allow that in ſo great neceſſity of the poor, riches in a manner ſuperfluous ſhould be turned another way. Admit I ſpeak nothing how theſe uſes upon which they are beſtowed, (although there were no poor) are many ways hurtful, but in no behalf profitable. But I leave to ſpeak of men. Theſe goods are dedicate to Chriſt: therefore they are to be diſpoſed after his will. But they ſhall in vain ſay, that this part is beſtowed upon Chriſt, which they have waſted otherwiſe than he commanded. Howbeit, to confeſs the truth, there is not much of the ordinary revenue of the church abated for theſe expences. For there are no biſhoprics ſo wealthy, no abboties ſo fat, finally neither ſo many, nor ſo large benefices that may ſerve to fill the gluttony of prieſts. But while they ſeek to ſpare themſelves, they perſuade the people by ſuperſtition, to turn that which ſhould be beſtowed upon the poor, to build temples, to ſet up images, to buy jewels, to get coſtly garments. So with this gulf are the daily alms conſumed.

The word of God, and the ancient canons, againſt the pride of the Roman clergy.

16. Of the revenue, that they receive of their lands and poſſeſſions, what elſe ſhall I ſay, but that which I have already ſaid, and which is before all mens eyes? We ſee with what faithleſneſs they which are called biſhops and abbots do diſpoſe the greateſt part. What madneſs is it, to ſeek here for an eccleſiaſtical order? Was it meet that they, whoſe life ought to have been a ſingular example of frugality, modeſty, continence, and humility, ſhould contend with the royality of princes in number of goods, in gorgiouſneſs of houſes, in dainteneſs of apparel and fare? And how much was this contrary to their office, that they, whom the eternal and inviolable commandment of God forbiddeth to be deſirous of filthy gain, (Tit. i. 7.) and biddeth to be content with ſimple living, ſhould not only lay hands upon towns and caſtles, but alſo violently enter upon the greateſt lordſhips finally poſſeſs forceably even empires? if they deſpiſe the word of God: what will they anſwer to thoſe ancient decrees of the ſynods: whereby it is decreed that the biſhop ſhould have a ſmall lodging not far from the church, mean fare and houſhold ſtuff? what will they ſay to that praiſe of the ſynod at Aquileia: where poverty is reported glorious in the prieſts of the Lord, (Council Carthage cap. 15. and 15.:) for perhaps they will utterly refuſe as too rigorous, that which Jerom adviſeth Nepotianus, that poor men and ſtrangers: and among them Chriſt as a gueſt may know his table. But that which he by and by addeth, they will be aſhamed to deny that it is the glory of a biſhop to provide for the good of the poor: that it is the ſhame of all prieſts to ſtudy for their own riches, But they cannot receive this, but they muſt all condemn themſelves of ſhame. But it is not needful in this place to ſpeak more ſeverely againſt them ſince my meaning was nothing elſe, but to ſhew, that among them the lawful order of deaconry is long ago taken away: that they may no more glory of this title to the commendation of their church: which I think I have already ſufficiently ſhewed.

CHAP. VI.

Of the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome.

The ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome, neither derived from Chriſt's inſtitution, nor from the uſe of the old church.

HITHERTO we have rehearſed thoſe orders of the church, which were in the government of the old church: but afterward corrupted in times, and from thenceforth more and more abuſed, do now in the popiſh church retain only their name, and indeed are nothing elſe but viſors: that by compariſon the godly reader might judge judge what manner of church the Romaniſts have, for whoſe ſake they make us ſchiſmatics, becauſe we have departed from it. But as for the head and top of the whole order, that is to ſay, the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome, whereby they labour to prove that they only have the catholic church, we have not yet touched it: becauſe it took beginning neither from the inſtitution of Chriſt, nor from the uſe of the old church, as thoſe former parts did: which we have ſhewed to have ſo proceeded from antiquity, that by wickedneſs of times they are utterly degenerate, and have put on altogether a new form. And yet they go about to perſuade the world, that this is the chief and in a manner only bond of the unity of the church, if we cleave to the ſee of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They reſt (I ſay) principally upon this ſtay, when they will take away the church from us, and claim it to themſelves, for that they keep the head, upon which the unity of the church dependeth, and without which the church muſt needs fall aſunder and be broken in pieces. For thus they think that the church is as it were a maimed and headleſs body, unleſs it be ſubject to the ſee of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talk of their hierarcie they always take their beginning at this principle: that the biſhop of Rome (as the vicar of Chriſt, who is the head of the church) is in his ſtead preſident of the univerſal church: and that otherwiſe the church is not well ordered, unleſs that ſee doth hold the ſupremacy above all other. Therefore this alſo is to be examined of what ſort it is: that we may omit nothing that pertaineth to a juſt government of the church.

The high prieſts authority amongſt the Jews, no proof for the ſovereign dignity of Rome.

2. Let this therefore be the principal point of the queſtion: whether it be neceſſary for the true form of hierarchy (as they call it) or eccleſiaſtical order, that one ſee ſhould be above the reſt both in dignity and in power, that it may be the head of the whole body. But we make the church ſubject to too unjuſt laws, if we lay this neceſſity upon it, without the word of God. Therefore if the adverſaries will prove that which they require, they muſt firſt ſhew that this diſpoſition was ordained by Chriſt. For this purpoſe they allege out of the law the high prieſthood, alſo the high judgment, which God did inſtitute at Jeruſalem. But it is eaſy to give a ſolution, and that many ways, if one way do not ſatisfy them. Firſt no reaſon compelleth to extend that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation; yea rather, the order of one nation and of the whole world ſhall be far different. Becauſe the Jews were on each ſide compaſſed with idolaters: that they ſhould not be diverſly drawn with variety of religions, God appointed the place of worſhipping him in the middle part of the land: there he ordained over them one head biſhop, whom they ſhould have all regard unto, that they might be the better kept together in unity. Now when religion is ſpread abroad into the whole world, who doth not ſee that it is altogether an abſurdity, that the government of the Eaſt and Weſt be given to one man? For it is in effect as much as if a man ſhould affirm that the whole world ought to be governed by one ruler, becauſe one piece of land hath no more rulers but one. But there is yet another reaſon, why that ought not to be made an example to be followed. Now man is ignorant that the high biſhop was a figure of Chriſt, Heb. vii. 12. Now, ſince the prieſthood is removed, that right muſt alſo be removed. But to whom is it removed? Truly not to the pope (as he himſelf is ſo bold ſhameleſly to boaſt) when he draweth this title to himſelf: but to Chriſt, which as he alone ſuſtaineth this office, without any vicar or ſucceſſor, ſo he reſigneth the honour to none other. For the prieſthood conſiſteth not in doctrine only, but in the appeaſing of God, which Chriſt hath fully wrought by his death, and in that interceſſion which he now uſeth with his father.

Things in the New Teſtament ſpoken to Peter, prove not the power which the biſhop of Rome challengeth.

3. There is therefore no cauſe why they ſhould bind us by this examples, as by a perpetual rule, which we have ſeen to be enduring but for a time. Out of the new Teſtament they have nothing to bring forth for proof of their opinion, but that it was ſaid to one: Thou art Peter, and upon this ſtone I will build my church, Mat. xvi. 18. Again Peter loveſt thou me? Feed my ſheep. But admitting that theſe be ſtrong proofs, they muſt firſt ſhew that he which is commanded to feed the flock of Chriſt, (John xxi. 15.) hath power committed to him over all churches: and that to bind and to looſe is nothing elſe but to be ruler of all the world. But as Peter had received the commandment of the Lord, ſo he exhorteth all other prieſts to feed the church, 1 Pet. v. 2. Hereby we may gather, that by his ſaying of Chriſt, there was either nothing given to Peter more than to the reſt, or that Peter did equally communicate with with others the power that he had received. But, that we ſtrive not vainly, we have in another place a clear expoſition out of the mouth of Chriſt, what it is to bind and looſe: that is to ſay, to retain and to forgive ſins, John xx. 23. But the manner of binding and looſing, both the whole ſcripture every where ſheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when he ſaith that the miniſters of the goſpel have commandment to reconcile men to God, and alſo have power to puniſh them that refuſe this benefit, 2 Cor. v. 18. and x. 16.

What keys Chriſt gave unto Peter.

4. How ſhamefully they wreſt thoſe places, that make mention of binding and looſing, I both have already ſhortly touched, and a little after I ſhall have occaſion to declare more at large. Now it is good to ſee only, what they gather of that famous anſwer of Chriſt to Peter. He promiſed him the keys of the kingdom of heaven: he ſaid that whatſoever he bound in earth ſhould be bound in heaven. If we agree upon the word keys, and the manner of binding, all contention ſhall by and by ceaſe. For the pope himſelf will gladly give over the charge injoined to the apoſtles, which being full of labour and grief, ſhould ſhake from him his pleaſures, without gain. Foraſmuch as the heavens are opened unto us by the doctrine of the goſpel, it is with a very fit metaphor expreſſed by the name of keys. Now men are bound and looſed in no otherwiſe, but when faith reconcileth ſome to God, and their own unbelief bindeth other ſome. If the pope did take this only upon him: I think there will be no man that would either envy it or ſtrive about it. But becauſe this ſucceſſion be troubleſome and nothing gainful pleaſeth not the pope, hereupon groweth the beginning of the contention, what Chriſt promiſed to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it ſelf, that there is nothing meant, but the dignity of the office of an apoſtle, which cannot be ſevered from the charge. For if that definition which I have rehearſed, be received (which cannot but ſhameleſly be rejected) here is nothing given to Peter, that was not alſo common to his other fellows: becauſe otherwiſe there ſhould not only wrong be done to the perſons, but the very majeſty of doctrine ſhould halt. They cry out on the other ſide: what availeth it, I pray you to run upon this rock? For they ſhall not prove, but as the preaching of one ſame goſpel was enjoined to all the apoſtles, ſo they were alſo all alike furniſhed with power to bind and looſe, Mat. xviii. 20. John xx. 23. Chriſt (ſay they) appointed Peter prince of the whole church, when he promiſed that he would give him the keys. But that which he then promiſed to one, in another place he gave it alſo to all the reſt, and delivered it as it were into their hands. If the ſame power were granted to all, which was promiſed to one wherein ſhall he be above his fellows? Herein (ſay they) he excelleth, becauſe he received it both in common together with them, and ſeverally by himſelf, which was not given to the other, but in common. What if I anſwer with Cyprian and Auguſtine, that Chriſt did it not for this purpoſe, to prefer one man before another, but ſo to ſet out the unity of the church. For this ſaith Cyprian, (De ſim. prael.) that God in the perſon of one gave the keys to all, to ſignify the unity of all: and that the reſt were the ſame thing that Peter was, endued with like partaking both of honour and power: but that the beginning is taken at unity, that the church of Chriſt may be ſhewed to be one. Auguſtine ſaith, (Hom. in John 1.) If there were not in Peter a myſtery of the church, the Lord would not ſay to him, I will give thee the keys. For if this was ſaid to Peter, the church hath them not: but if the church have them, then Peter when he received the keys, betokened the whole church. And in another place. When they were all aſked, only Peter anſwered, thou art Chriſt: and it is ſaid to him, I will give thee the keys, as though he alone, had received the power of binding and looſing: whereas both he being one, ſaid that one for all, and he received the other with all, as bearing the perſon of unity. Therefore one for all, becauſe there is unity in all.

Peter in ſome kind of honour before the reſt but not above the reſt in power, becauſe our Saviour ſaid, thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church.

5. But this, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, (Mat. xvi. 18.) is no where read ſpoken to any other. As though Chriſt ſpake there any thing of Peter, than that which Paul and Peter himſelf ſpeaketh of all Chriſtians. For Paul maketh Chriſt the chief and corner ſtone, upon which they are builded together, that grow into a holy temple to the Lord, Eph. ii. 20. And Peter biddeth us to be lively ſtones which being founded upon that choſen and precious ſtone, (1 Pet. ii. 5.) do by this joint and coupling together with our God, cleave alſo together among our ſelves. He (ſay they) above the reſt: becauſe he hath the name peculiarly. Indeed I do willingly grant this honour to Peter, that in the building of the church he be placed among the first, (or if they will have this also) the first of all the faithful: but I will not suffer them to gather thereupon, that he should have a supremacy over the rest. For what manner of gathering is this? He excelleth other in ferventness of zeal, in learning, and courage: therefore he hath power over them. As though we might not with better colour gather, that Andrew is in a degree before Peter, because he went before him in time, and brought him to Christ, John i. 40. and 42. But I pass over this. Let Peter truly have the first place, yet there is great difference between the honour of degree and power. We see that the apostles commonly granteth this to Peter, that he should speak in assemblies, and after a certain manner go before them with propounding exhorting, and admonishing: but of his power we read nothing at all.

Upon what rock Christ hath builded his church.

9. Howbeit we are not yet come to dispute of that point: only at this present I would prove that they do too foolishly reason, when by the only name of Peter, they would build an empire over the whole church. For those old follies wherewith they went about to deceive at the beginning, are not worthy to be rehearsed, much less to be confuted, that the church was builded upon Peter, because it was said, upon this rock, &c. But some of the fathers have so expounded it. But when the whole scripture crieth out to the contrary, to what purpose is their authority alleged against God? Yea, why do we strive about the meaning of these words, as though it were dark or doubtful, when nothing can be more plainly nor more certainly spoken? Peter had confessed in his own and his bretherens name that Christ is the Son of God, Mat. xvi. 16. Upon this rock Christ builded his church: because it is (as Paul saith) the only foundation, beside which there can be laid none other, 1 Cor. iii. 11. Neither do I here therefore refuse the authority of the fathers, because I want their testimonies, If I listed to allege them: but (as I have said) I will not with contending about so clear a matter trouble the readers in vain, especially since this point hath been long ago diligently enough handled and declared by men of our side.

The whole course of Peter's dealings shew him to have been a fellow with the rest of the apostles and not a lord over them.

7. And yet indeed no man can better assoyl this question, than the scripture itself, if we compare all the places, where it teacheth, what office and power Peter had among the apostles, how he behaved himself, and how he was accepted of them. Run over all that remaineth written, you shall find nothing else, but that he was one of the twelve, equal with the rest their fellow, but not their lord. He doth indeed propound to the council, if any thing be to be done, and giveth warning what is meet to be done: but therewithal he heareth others, and doth not only grant them place to speak their mind, but leaveth the judgment to them: when they had determined, he followed and obeyed. When he writeth to the pastors, he doth not command them by authority, as superior: but he maketh them his companions, and gently exhorteth them, as equals are wont to do, 1 Pet. v. 1. When he was accused for that he had gone into the Gentiles, although it were without cause, yet he answered and purged himself, Acts xi. 2. When he was commanded by his fellows, to go with John into Samaria he refused not, Acts viii. 24. Whereas the apostle did send him, they did thereby declare that they held him not for their superior. Whereas he obeyed and took upon him the embassage committed to him, he did thereby confess that he had a fellowship with them, and not an authority over them. If none of those things were, yet the epistle to the Galatians only my easily take all doubting from us: where almost in two chapters together, Paul laboureth to prove nothing else, but that he himself was equal to Peter in honour of apostleship. Then he rehearseth that he came to Peter, not to profess subjection, but only to make their consent of doctrine approved by testimony to all men: and that Peter himself required no such thing, but gave him his right hand of fellowship, to work in common together in the Lord's vineyard: and that there was no lesser grace given to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Jews: finally, that when Peter dealt not very faithfully he was corrected by him, and obeyed his reproving, Gal. i. 18. and ii. 8. All these things do make plain, either that there was equality between Paul and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power over the rest, than they had over him. And (as I have already said) Paul of purpose laboureth about this, that none should prefer before him in the apostleship either Peter, or John which were fellows, not lords.

8. But

If Peter, were the prince the of apoſtles, it followeth not hereupon that the whole world ſhould be ſubject to the biſhop of Rome.

8. But to grant them that which they require concerning Peter, that is, that he was the prince of the apoſtles, and excelled the reſt in dignity: yet there is no cauſe why they ſhould of a ſingular example make an univerſal rule and draw to perpetuity that which hath been once done: ſince there is a far different reaſon. One was chief among the apoſtles: forſooth, becauſe they were few in number. If one were the chief of twelve men, ſhall it therefore follow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thouſand men? it is no wonder that twelve had one among them that ſhould rule them all. For nature beareth this, and the wit of men requireth this, that in every aſſembly, although they be all equal in power yet there be one as a governor, whom the reſt may have regard unto. There is no court, without a council, no ſeſſion of judges without a pretor, or propounder, no company without a ruler, no fellowſhip without a maſter. So ſhould it be no abſurdity, if we confeſſed that the apoſtles gave to Peter ſuch a ſupremacy. But that which is of force among few, is not by and by to be drawn to the whole world, to the ruling whereof no one man is ſufficient. But (ſay they) this hath place no leſs in the whole univerſality of nature, than in all the parts, that there one ſovereign head of all. And hereof (and God will) they fetch proof from cranes and bees, which always chooſe to themſelves one guide, not many. I allow indeed the examples which they bring forth. but do bees reſort together out of all the world to chooſe them one king: every ſeveral king is content with his own hive. So among cranes, every herd hath their own king. What elſe ſhall they prove hereby, but that every church ought to have their own ſeveral biſhop appointed them? Then they call us to civil examples. They allege that ſaying of Homer. It is not good to have many governors: and ſuch thing as in like ſenſe are read in profane writers to the commendation of monarchy. The anſwer is eaſy. For monarchy is not praiſed of Ulyſſes in Homer, or of any other, in this meaning, as tho' one thought to be emperor of the whole world; but they mean that one kingdom cannot hold two kings: and that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

No head of the whole church but only Chriſt.

9. But let it be as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole world be holden under monarchy, which yet is a very great abſurdity: but let it be ſo: yet I will not therefore grant that the ſame ſhould take place in the government of the church. For the church hath Chriſt her only head, under whoſe dominion we all cleave together, according to that order and that form of policy which he hath preſcribed. Therefore they do a great wrong to Chriſt, when by that pretence they will have no man to be ruler of the univerſal church, becauſe it cannot be without a head. For Chriſt is the head of whom the whole body coupled and knit together in every joint, wherewith one miniſtreth to another, according to the working of every member in the meaſure thereof, maketh increaſe of the body, Eph. iv. 15. See you not, how he ſetteth all men without exception in the body, and leaveth the honour and name of head to Chriſt lone? See you not how he giveth to every member a certain meaſure, and a determined, and limited function: whereby both the perfection of the grace and the ſovereign power of government may remain with Chriſt only? Neither am I ignorant what they are wont to cavil, when this is objected againſt them: they ſay that Chriſt is properly called the only head, becauſe he alone reigneth by his own authority and in his own name: but that is nothing withſtandeth, but that there may be under him another miniſterial head (as they term it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this cavil they prevail nothing, unleſs they firſt ſhew that this miniſtery was ordained by Chriſt. For the apoſtle teacheth, that the whole miniſtration is diſperſed through the members, and that the power floweth from the one heavenly head. Or if they will have any plainer ſpoken, ſince the ſcripture teſtifieth that Chriſt is the head, and claimeth that honour to him alone, it ought not to be transfered to any other, but to whom Chriſt himſelf hath made us vicar. But that is not only no where read, but alſo may be largely confuted by many places, Eph. i. 22. and iv. 17. and v. 13. Col. i. 18. and ii. 10. Eph. iv. 10.

The apoſtles knew no monarchy in the miniſteral government of the church.

10. Paul ſometimes painteth unto us a lively image of the church. Of one head he maketh there no mention. But rather by his deſcription we may gather, that it is diſagreeing from the inſtitution of Chriſt. Chriſt at his aſcending took from us the viſible preſence of of himself: yet he went up to fulfil all things. Now therefore the church hath him yet present, and always shall have. When Paul goeth about to shew the mean whereby he presenteth himself, he calleth us back to the ministeries which he useth. The Lord (saith he) is in us all, according to the measure of grace that he hath given to every member. Therefore he hath appointed some apostles, some pastors, some evangelists, othersome teachers, &c. Eph. iv. 7. and 11. Why doth he not say, that he hath set one over all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no means have been omitted, if it had been true. Christ (saith he) is with us. How? by the ministry of men, whom he hath appointed to govern the church. Why not rather by the ministerial head to whom he hath committed his place? He nameth unity: but in God, and in the faith of Christ. He assigneth to men nothing but common ministry, and to every one a particular measure. In that commendation of unity, after that he had said, that there is but one body, one spirit, one hope of calling, one God, one faith, one baptism, why hath he not also immediately added one chief bishop, that may hold the church together in unity? For nothing could have been more fitly spoken, if it had been true. Let that place be diligently weighed. It is no doubt but that he meant there altogether to represent the holy and spiritual government of the church, which they that came afterward called Hierarchy. As for monarchy among ministers, he not only nameth none but also sheweth that there is none. It is also no doubt but that he meant to express the manner of union, whereby the faithful cleave together with Christ their head. There he not only speaketh of no ministerial head, but appointeth to every one of the members a particular working according to the measure of grace distributed to every one. Neither is there any reason why they should subtily dispute of the comparison of the heavenly and earthly hierarchy. For it is not safe to know beyond measure of it. And in framing this government we must follow no other figure, than the Lord himself hath painted out in his word.

If Peter had a supremacy not only to be confirmed unto him, but also conveyed unto others, the title of the bishop of Rome is not hereby proved.

11. Now although I grant them another thing, which they shall never obtain by proof before sober men, that the supremacy of the church was so established in Peter, that it should always remain by perpetual succession: yet how will they prove, that his seat was so placed at Rome, that whosoever is bishop of that church, should be set over the whole world? By what right do they bind this dignity to the place, which is given without mention of place? Peter (say they) lived and died at Rome. What did Christ himself? Did not he, while he lived, exercise his bishopric, and in dying fulfil the office of priesthood, at Jerusalem? The prince of pastors, the sovereign bishop, the head of the church, could not purchase honour to the place: and could Peter, that was far inferior to him? Are not these follies more than childish? Christ gave the honour of supremacy to Peter: Peter sat at Rome, therefore he there placed the see of supremacy. By this reason, the Israelites in old time might have set the seat of supremacy in the desert, where Moses, the chief teacher and prince of prophets executed his ministry and died. Deut. xxxiv. 5.

A vain surmise that the supremacy of the church belonging sometime to Antioch, was by the Lord's commandment thence translated to Rome.

12. Let us see how trimly they reason. Peter (say they) had the supremacy among the apostles: therefore the church where he sat ought to have that privilege. But where sat he first? At Antioch, say they. Therefore the church of Antioch doth rightly claim to it self the supremacy. They confess that it was in old time the first: but they say, that in removing thence he removed to Rome the honour that he brought with him. For there is an epistle under the name of pope Marcellus to the bishops of Antioch where he saith thus: Peter's seat was at the beginning with you, which afterward by the Lord's commandment was removed hither. So the church of Antioch, which was once the chief, hath given place to the see of Rome. But by what oracle had that good man learned, that the Lord so commanded? For if this cause be to be determined by the law, it is necessary that they answer, whether they will have this privilege to be personal, or real, or mixt. For it must be one of these three. If they say that it is personal, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is real, then when it is once given to the place, it is not taken away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaineth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shall be not simply to be considered, unless the per-ſon do alſo agree. Let them chooſe whomſoever they will, I will by and by infer and eaſily prove, that Rome can by no means take the ſupremacy upon it ſelf.

If the firſt place be granted to the church of Rome, why the ſecond unto Alexandria, before either Antioch, or Epheſus, or Jeruſalem.

13. But be it, that (as they triflingly ſay) the ſupremacy was removed from Antioch to Rome: yet why did not Antioch keep the ſecond place? For if Rome have therefore the firſt place, becauſe Peter ſat there to the end of his life: to whom ſhall the ſecond place rather be granted, than where he had his firſt ſeat? How came it to paſs then, that Alexandria went before Antioch? How agreeth it that the church of one diſciple ſhould be above the ſeat of Peter? If honour be due to every church, according to the worthineſs of the founder, what ſhall we ſay alſo of the other churches? Paul nameth three, that ſeemed to be pillars, James, Peter, and John, Gal. ii. 9. If the firſt place were given to the ſee of Rome in the honour of Peter: do not the ſees of Epheſus and Jeruſalem, where John and James ſat, deſerve the ſecond and third place? But among the patriarchs Jeruſalem had the laſt place: Epheſus could not ſit ſo much as in the uttermoſt corner. And other churches were left out, both all thoſe that Paul founded, and thoſe that the other apoſtles were rulers of. The ſeat of Mark, who was but one of their diſciples, obtained the honour. Therefore they muſt either confeſs that that was a prepoſterous order, or they muſt grant us that this is not a perpetual rule, that there is due to every church the ſame degree of honour which the founder had.

Peter's ſitting at Rome ſcarce worthy of credit.

14. Howbeit, as for that which they report of Peter's ſitting in the church of Rome, I ſee not what credit it ought to have. Truly that which is in Euſebius, that he ruled there five and twenty years, is very eaſily confuted. For it is evident by the firſt and ſecond chapter to the Galatians, that about twenty years after the death of Chriſt, he was at Jeruſalem, and that then he went to Antioch: where how long he was, is uncertain. Gregory reckoneth ſeven years, and Euſebius twenty and five. But from the death of Chriſt, to the end of Nero's empire, (in whoſe time they ſay that he was ſlain) there ſhall be found but thirty and ſeven years. For the Lord ſuffered under Tiberius, the eighteenth year of his empire. If you diſcount twenty years, during the which Paul is witneſs that Peter dwelt at Jeruſalem, Rom. xv 15. there will remain but ſeventeen years at the moſt, which muſt now be divided between two biſhopries. If he tarried long at Antioch he could not ſit at Rome but a very little while. Which things we may yet alſo more plainly prove. Paul wrote to the Romans, when he was in his journey going to Jeruſalem, where he was taken and from thence brought to Rome. It is not likely that this epiſtle was written four years before that he came to Rome. Therein is yet no mention of Peter, which ſhould not have been left out, if Peter had ruled that church. Yea and in the end alſo, when he rehearſeth a great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be ſaluted, where verily he gathereth together all thoſe that he knew, he yet ſaith nothing of Peter. Rom. xvi. 21. Neither is it needful here to make a long or curious demonſtration to men of ſound judgment: for the matter it ſelf, and the whole argument of the epiſtle crieth out, that he ſhould not have overpaſſed Peter, if he had been at Rome.

As Peter's governing the church of Rome is hardly proved, ſo his ſucceſſor in government is not agreed upon: his deeds and death at Rome uncertain: his being biſhop of Rome and that ſo long, moſt improbable.

15. When Paul was brought priſoner to Rome, Luke reporteth that he was received of the brethren, of Peter he ſaith nothing. (Acts ult. 16.) He wrote from thence to many churches: and in ſome places alſo he writeth ſalutations in the names of certain: but he doth not in one word ſhew that Peter was there at that time, who, I pray you ſhall think it likely, that he could have paſſed him over with ſilence, if he had been preſent? Yea to the Philippians, where he ſaid that he had none that ſo faithfully looked unto the work of the Lord, as Timothy, he complained that they did all ſeek their own. Phil. ii. 20. And to the ſame Timothy he maketh a more grievous complaint, that none was with him at his firſt defence, but all forſook him: where therefore was Peter then? For if they ſay that he was then at Rome, how great a ſhame doth Paul charge him with, that he was a forſaker of the goſpel? For he ſpeaketh of the believers: becauſe he addeth, God impute it not unto them. 2 Tim. iv. 16. How long therefore, and in what time did Peter keep that ſeat? But it is a conſtant opinion of writers, that he governed that church even to his death. But among the writers themſelves it is uncertain who was his ſucceſſor, becauſe ſome ſay

Linus

Linus, and other some say Clement. And they tell many foolish fables, of the disputation had between him and Simon the magician. And Augustine sticketh not to confess, when he treateth of superstitions, that by reason of an opinion rashly conceived, there was a custom grown in use at Rome, that they should not fast that day that Peter got the victory of Simon the magician. (August. ad Januar.) Finally the doings of that time are so entangled with diversity of opinions, that we ought not rashly to believe where we find any thing written. And yet by reason of this consent of writers, I strive not against this, that he died there: but yet that he was bishop there, and specially a long time, I cannot be persuaded, neither do I much pass upon that also: forasmuch as Paul testifieth that Peter's apostleship did peculiarly belong to the Jews, and his own to us. Therefore that that fellowship which they covenanted between themselves, may be confirmed with us, or rather that the ordinance of the holy Ghost may stand in force among us, we ought to have respect rather to the apostleship of Paul and Peter. For the holy Ghost so divided the provinces between them that he appointed Peter to the Jews, and Paul to us. Now therefore let the Romanists go and seek their supremacy elsewhere than in the word of God, where it is found not to be grounded.

Three causes why the fathers did attribute so much to the church of Rome.

16. Now Let us come to the old church, that it may also be made to appear plainly that our adversaries do no less causelesly and falsely boast of the consent thereof, than they do of the witness of the word of God. When therefore they bragg of that principle of theirs, that the unity of the church cannot otherwise be kept together unless there be one supreme head on earth, to whom all the members may obey, and that therefore the Lord gave the supremacy to Peter, and from thence forth to the see of Rome by right of succession, that the same should remain in it to the end: they affirm, that this hath been always observed from the beginning. But forasmuch as they wrongfully wrest many testimonies, I will first say this aforehand, that I deny not but that the writers do each where give great honour to the church of Rome, and do speak reverently of it. Which I think to be done specially for three causes. For that same opinion, which I wot not how was grown in force, that it was founded and ordained y the ministry of Peter, much availed to procure estimation unto it. Therefore in the east parts it was for honour's sake called the see apostolic. Secondly, when the head of the empire was there, and that therefore it was likely, that in that place were men more excellent both in learning and wisdom, and skill, and experience of many things, than any where else: there was worthily consideration had thereof, that both the honour of the city, and also the other more excellent gifts of God should not seem to be despised. There was beside these also a third thing that when the churches of the east, and of Grecia, yea and of Africa, were in tumults among themselves with disagreement of opinions, the church of Rome was quieter and less full of troubles than the rest. So came it to pass, that the godly and holy bishops, being driven out of their seats, did oftentimes flee thither as into a sanctuary or certain haven. For as the western men are of less sharpness and quickness of wit, than the Asians or Africans are, so much are they less desirous of alterations. This therefore added much authority to the church of Rome, that in those doubtful times it was not so troubled as the rest, and did hold the doctrine once delivered them faster than all the rest as we shall by and by better declare. For these three causes (I say) it was had in no small honour, and commended with many notable testimonies of the old writers.

The Fathers of the church confessing the church's unity never dreamed that the bishop of Rome's supremacy should be the bond to make it one.

17. But when our adversaries will thereupon gather that it hath a supremacy and sovereign power over other churches, they do too much amiss, as I have already said, and that the same may the better appear, I will first briefly shew what the old fathers thought of this unity which they enforce so earnestly. Jerom writing to Nepotianus, after that he had received many examples of unity, at the last descended to the hierarchy of the church. Each bishop of every several church, each archpriest, each archdeacon, and all the ecclesiastical order, do rest upon their own rulers. Here a Roman priest speaketh, he commendeth union in the ecclesiastical order, why doth he not rehearse that all churches are knit together with one head as with one bond? Nothing could have more fitly served the matter that he had in hand; and it cannot be said that it was through forgetfulness, that he ommitted it: for he would have done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffered him. He ſaw therefore without doubt, that that is the true reaſon of unity which Cyprian excellently well deſcribeth in theſe words: (De ſim prær.) the biſhopric is one, whereof each hath a part wholly: and the church is one, which is with increaſe of fruitfulneſs more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many ſun beams and one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded on a faſt holding root: and like as from one fountain flow many ſtreams, and though the multitude ſeem to be diverſly ſpread abroad with largeneſs of overflowing plenty, yet the unity is kept whole in the original: ſo the church alſo being overſpread with the light of the Lord, extendeth her beams abroad throughout the whole world, yet it is but one that is each where poured forth, and the unity of the body is not ſevered: ſhe ſpreadeth her branches over the whole world, ſhe ſendeth out her overflowing ſtreams: yet is there but one head and one beginning, &c. Afterward: the ſpouſe of Chriſt cannot be an adultereſs: ſhe knoweth one only houſe, ſhe keepeth the holineſs of one only chamber with chaſte ſhamefaſtneſs. You ſee how he maketh the univerſal biſhopric to be Chriſt's only, which comprehendeth the whole church under him: and ſaith that all they that execute the office of biſhop under this head, have their parts thereof wholly. Where is the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome, if the whole biſhopric remain with Chriſt only, and each biſhop hath his part thereof wholly? Theſe things therefore make to this purpoſe, that the reader may underſtand by the way, that the old fathers were utterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romaniſts do take for confeſſed and undoubted, concerning the unity of an earthly head in the hierarchy of the church.

CHAP. VII.

Of the beginning and encreaſing of the Papacy of Rome, until it advanced it ſelf to this height, whereby both the liberty of the church hath been oppreſſed, and all the right government thereof overthrown.

Sundry ancient councils wherein the biſhop of Rome had not the chiefeſt place.

AS concerning the ancientneſs of the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquity to ſtabliſh it, than the decree of the Nycene ſynod, wherein the biſhop of Rome both hath the firſt place among the patriarchs given unto him, and is commanded to look unto the churches adjoining to the city. When the council maketh ſuch diviſion between him and the other patriarchs, that it aſſigneth to every one their bounds: truly, it doth not appoint him the head of all, but maketh him one of the chief. There were preſent Vitus and Vincentius in the name of Julius, who then governed the church of Rome: to them was given the fourth place. I beſeech you, if Julius were acknowleged the head of the church, ſhould his legates be thruſt into the the fourth ſeat? Should Athanaſius be chief in the council, where principally the image of the hierarchial order ought to be ſeen? In the ſynod at Epheſus it appeareth, that Celeſtinus who was then biſhop of Rome, uſed a crooked ſubtil mean to provide for the dignity of his ſeat. For when he ſent his deputies thither, he committed his place to Cyrillus of Alexandria, which ſhould notwithſtanding otherwiſe have been the chief. To what purpoſe was that ſame committing, but that his name might by what means ſoever abide in the firſt place? For his legates ſat in a lower place, and were aſked their opinion among the reſt, and ſubſcribed in their order: in the mean time the patriarch of Alexandria joined Celeſtinus's name with his own. What ſhall I ſay of the ſecond council at Epheſus: where when Leo's legates were preſent, yet Dioſcorus patriarch of Alexandria ſat the chief as by his own right? They will take exception that it was no upright council, by which both the holy man Flavianus was condemned, and Eutyches acquitted, and his ungodlineſs allowed. But when the ſynod was gathered, when the biſhops took their places in order, verily the legates of the biſhop of Rome ſat there among the reſt none otherwiſe than in a holy and lawful council. Yet they ſtrived not for the firſt place, but yielded it to one another: which they would never have done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the biſhops of Rome were never aſhamed to enter into the greateſt contentions for their honours: and for this only cauſe oftentimes to vex and trouble the church with many and hurtful ſtrifes. But becauſe Leo ſaw that it ſhould be a too unreaſonable requeſt, if he ſhould ſeek to get the chief place for his legates, therefore he ſurceaſed it.

2. Then

The chiefest place in the council of Chalcedon granted by the emperor, at request upon special occasion for that time to the bishop of Rome, which place in synods afterwards held other bishops hard as before.

2. Then followed the council of Chalcedon, in which by the grant of the emperor the legates of the church of Rome sat in the chief place. But Leo himself confesseth that this was an extraordinary privilege. For when he made petition for it to the emperor Marcianus, and Pulcheria the empress, he did not affirm that it was due to him, but only pretended, that the eastern bishops, which sat as chief in the council at Ephesus, troubled all things and abused their power. Whereas therefore it was needful to have a grave governor, and it was not likely that they should be meet for it, who had once been so light and disordered: therefore he prayed, that by reason of the default and unfitness of others, the office of governing might be removed to him. Truly that which is gotten by singular privilege and beside order, is not by common law. Where this only is pretended, that there needeth some new governor, because the former governors had behaved themselves ill, it is evident that it neither was so before, nor ought to continue so for ever, but is done only in respect of present danger. The bishop of Rome therefore had the first place in the council of Chalcedon; not because it was due to his see, but because the synod was at that time destitute of a grave and fit governor, while they that ought to have been the chief, did through their own intemperance and corrupt affection, thrust themselves out of place. And this that I say, Leo's successor did indeed prove. For when he sent his legates to the fifth synod at Constantinople, which was holden a long time after, he brawled not for the first seat, but easily suffered Menna the patriarch of Constantinople to sit as chief. So in the council of Carthage, at which Augustine was present, we see that not the legates of the see of Rome, but Aurelius archbishop of that place sat as chief: when yet the contention was about the authority of the bishop of Rome. Yea there was also a general council holden in Italy it self, at which the bishop of Rome was not present. Ambrose was chief there, who was in very great authority with the emperor, there was no mention made of the bishop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to pass by the dignity of Ambrose, that the see of Millane was more noble than the see of Rome. (The Council at Aquileia.)

The title of supremacy not given to the bishop of Rome in the ancient times of the church.

3. As concerning the title of supremacy, and other titles of pride, whereupon it now marvellously boasteth it self, it is not hard to judge, when and in what sort they crept in, Cyprian oftentimes maketh mention of Cornelius. He setteth him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellow bishop, or fellow in office. But when he writeth to Stephen the successor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him equal with himself and the rest, but also speaketh more hardly to him, charging him sometimes with arrogancy, sometimes with ignorance. Since Cyprian we have with all the church of Africa judged of that matter. The council at Carthage did forbid that any should be called prince of priests or chief bishop, but only bishop of the chief see. But if a man turn over the ancienter monuments, he shall find that the bishop of Rome at that time was content with the common name of brother. (Cap. 47.) Certainly so long as the face of the church continued true and pure, all these names of pride, wherewith since that time the see of Rome hath begun to wax outragious, were utterly unheard of: it was not known, who was the highest bishop and the only head of the church on earth. But if the bishop of Rome had been so bold as to have taken such a thing upon him, there were stout and wise men that would have by and by repressed his folly. Jerom forasmuch as he was a priest at Rome, was not unwilling to set out the dignity of his own church, so much as the matter and state of his time suffered: yet we see how he also bringeth it down into fellowship with the rest. If authority (saith he) be sought for, the world is greater than a city. Why dost thou allege to me the custom of one city? Why dost thou defend smallness of number, out of which hath grown pride, against the laws of the church? Wheresoever there is a bishop, either at Rome, or at Eugubium, or at Constantinople, or at Rhegium, he is of the same merit and of the same priesthood. The power of riches, or baseness of poverty maketh not a bishop higher or lower. (Ep. ad Evag.)

The bishop of Constantinople chal-

4. About the title of universal bishop the contention first began in the time of Gregory, which was was occasioned by the ambition of John bishop of Constantinople. For he (which thing never any man before had attempted) would have made himself universal bishop. In that contention Gregory doth not allege that the right is taken away which was due to himself: but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a profane name, yea full of sacrilege, yea the forewarner of Antichrist. The whole church (saith he) falleth down from her state, if he fall which is called universal, (Lib. 4. ep. 46.) In another place: It is very sorrowful, to suffer patiently, that our brother and fellow bishop, despising all others, should only be named bishop. But in this his pride what else is betokened but the times of Antichrist near at hand? because verily he followeth him, that despising the fellowship of angels, went about to climb up to the top of singularity, (Mauri. Aug. lib. 4. epi 78.) In another place he writeth to Eulolius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antioch, (Constantiæ Augustæ lib. 4. epi. 80.) None of my predecessors at any time would use that profane word: for if one be called universal patriarch, the name of patriarchs is abated from all the rest. But far may this be from a Christian mind, that any should have a will to take that upon him, whereby he may in any part, be it never so little, diminish the honour of his brethren. To consent in this wicked word is nothing else but to lose the faith. It is one thing (saith he) that we owe to the preserving of the unity of faith, and another thing that we owe to the keeping down of pride. But I say it boldly, because whosoever calleth himself, or desireth to be called universal bishop, he doth in his proud advancing run before Antichrist, because he doth with shewing himself proud prefer himself above the rest, (Lib. 4. epi. 78. Auiano Diacono.) Again to Anastius bishop of Alexandria: I have said that he cannot have peace with us, unless he amend the advancing of the superstitious and proud word, which the first apostate hath invented. And (to speak nothing of the wrong done to your honour) if one be called universal bishop, the universal church falleth when that universal one falleth, (Lib. 7. ep. 83. Mauri. Aug. lib. 6. ep. 188.) But whereas he writeth, that this honour was offered to Leo in the synod at Chalcedon, it hath no colour of truth. For neither is there any such thing read in the acts of that synod. And Leo himself, who with many epistles impugneth the decree there made in honour of the see of Constantinople, without doubt would not have passed over this argument, which had been most to be liked of all other, if it had been true, that he refused that which was given him: and being a man otherwise too much desirous of honour, he would not have omitted that which made for his praise. Therefore Gregory was deceived in this, that he thought that that title was offered to the see of Rome by the synod of Chalcedon: to speak nothing how foolish it is, that he both testifieth it to have proceeded from the holy synod, and also at the same time called it wicked profane, abominable, proud, and full of sacrilege, yea, devised by the devil, and published by the cryer of Antichrist. And yet he addeth that his predecessor refused it, least all priests should be deprived of their due honour, when any thing were privately given to one, (Lib. 4. epist. 79.) In another place: no man at any time hath willed to be called by that word, (Lib. 7. epist. 79.) No man hath taken to himself that presumptuous name: lest if he should in the degree of bishopric take to himself a glory of singularity, he should seem to have denied the same to all his bretheren.

The ground whereupon the sovereignity of the bishop of Rome did first take root was his intermedling in those causes, and his readiness to aid those persons, which being bad were ready any where to seek maintainance.

5. Now I come to the jurisdiction, which the bishop of Rome affirmeth that he hath over all churches. I know how great contentions have been in old time about this matter: for there hath been no time wherein the see of Rome hath not coveted to get an empire over other churches. And in this place it shall not be out of season, to search by what mans it grew then by little and little to some power. I do not yet speak of that infinite empire, which it hath not so long ago taken by force to itself: for we will defer that to a place convenient. But here it is good to shew briefly, how in old time and by what means it hath advanced itself, to take to itself any power over other churches. When the churches of the East were divided, and troubled with the factions of the Arians under the emperors Constantius, and Constans, the sons of Constantine the Great, and Athanasius the chief defender there of the true faith was driven out of his see: such calamity compelled him to come to Rome, that with the authority of the see of Rome, he might both after a sort repress the rage of his enemies, and confirm the godly that were in distress. He was honourably received of Julius then bishop, and obtained that the bishops of of the West took upon them the defence of his cause. Therefore when the godly stood in great need of foreign aid, and saw that there was very good succour for them in the church of Rome, they willingly gave unto it the most authority that they could. But all that was nothing else, but that the communion thereof should be highly esteemed, and it should be counted a great shame to be excommunicate of it. Afterward evil and wicked men also added much unto it. For, to escape lawful judgments, they fled to this sanctuary. Therefore if any priest were condemned by his bishop, or any bishop by the synod of his province, they by and by appealed to Rome. And the bishops of Rome received such appellations more greedily than was meet: because it seemed to be a farm of extraordinary power, so to intermeddle with matters far and wide about them. So when Eutyches was condemned by Flavianus bishop of Constantinople, he complained to Leo, that he had wrong don to him, Leo without delay, no less undiscreetly than suddenly, took in hand the defence of an evil cause, he grievously inveighed against Flavianus, as though he had, without hearing the cause, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he caused that the ungodliness of Eutyches was for a certain space of time strengthened. In Africa it is evident that this oftentimes happened. For so soon as any lewd man had taken a foyl in ordinary judgment, he by and by flew to Rome, and charged his country men with many slanderous reports: and the see of Rome was always ready to intermeddle. Which arrogance compelled the bishops of Africa to make a law, that none under pain of excommunication should appeal beyond the sea.

In consecrating of bishops, the power of the bishop of Rome no other but the same which in other places others had.

6. But whatsoever it was, let us see what authority or power the see of Rome then had. Ecclesiastical power is contained in these four points, ordering of bishops, summoning of councils, hearing of appeals or jurisdiction, chastising, admonitions, or censures. All the old synods command bishops to be consecrate by their own metropolitans: and they never bid the bishop of Rome to be called unto it, but in his own patriarchy. But by little and little it grew in use, that all the bishops of Italy came to Rome to fetch their consecration, except the metropolitans, who suffered not themselves to be brought into such bondage: but when any metropolitan was to be consecrate, the bishop of Rome sent thither one of his priests, which should only be present, but not president. Of which thing there is an example in Gregory: at the consecration of Constantius bishop of Millane after the death of Laurence. Howbeit I do not think that that was a very ancient institution: but when at the beginning for honour and good will's sake they sent one to another their legates, to be witness of the consecration, and to testify their communion with them, afterward that which was voluntary, began to be holden for necessary. Howsoever it be, it is evident that in old time the bishop of Rome had not the power of consecrating, but in the province of his own patriarchy, that is to say, in the churches adjoining to the city, as the canon of the Nicene synod saith. To the consecration was annexed the sending of a synodical epistle, in which he was nothing above the rest. For the patriarchs were wont immediately after their consecration, by solemn writing to declare their faith, whereby they professed that they subscribed to the holy and catholic councils. So rendring an account of their faith, they did approve themselves one to another. If the bishop of Rome had received of others, and not himself given this confession, he had thereby been acknowleged superior, but when he was no less bound to give it, than to require it of others, and to be subject to the common law: truly that was a token of fellowship, not of dominion. Of this thing there is an example in Gregory's epistle to Anastasius and to Cyriacus of Constantinople, and in other places to all the patriarchs together, (Lib. 1. epist. 25. lib. 6. epist. 169. lib. 1. epist. 24.

The bishop of Rome as well censured by others, as others by him.

7. Then follow admonitions or censures: which as in old time the bishops of Rome used toward others, so they did again suffer them of others. Irenæus grievously reproved Victor, because he undiscreetly for a thing of no value, troubled the church with a pernitious dissention. Victor obeyed, and spurned not against it. Such a liberty was then in use among the holy bishops, that they used a brotherly authority toward the bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastising him if he at any time offended. He again when occasion required did admonish others of their duty: and if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cyprian when he exhorteth Stephen to admonish the bishops of France, fetcheth not his argument from the greater power, but from the common

mon right that priests have among themselves, (Epist. 13. lib. 3.) I beseech you if Stephen had then been ruler over France, would not Cyprian have said: Restrain them, because they are thine? but he saith far otherwise. This (saith he) the brotherly fellowship, wherewith we are bound one to another, requireth that we should admonish one another. And we see also with how great sharpness of words, he being otherwise a man of a mild nature enveigheth against Stephen himself, when he thinketh him to be too insolent, (Ad pomp. Contr. Epist. Stephani) Therefore in this behalf also there appeareth not yet, that the bishop of Rome had any jurisdiction over them that were not of his own province.

General councils summoned only by the emperor: provincial as well by other bishops in their territories as by the bishop of Rome.

8. As concerning the calling together of synods, this was the office of every metropolitan, at certain appointed times to assemble a provincial synod. There the bishop of Rome had no authority. But a general council the emperor only might summon. For if any of the bishops had attempted it, not only they that were out of his province, would not have obeyed his calling, but also there would by and by have risen an uproar. Therefore the emperor indifferently warned them all to be present. Socrates indeed reporteth, that Julius did expostulate with the bishops of the East, because they called him not to the synod of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the canons, that any thing should be decreed without the knowlege of the bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be understood of such decrees as bind the whole universal church? Now it is no wonder, if this much be granted both to the antiquity and honour of the city, and to the dignity of the see, that there should be no general decree made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to the dominion over the whole church? For we deny not that he was one of the chief: but we will not grant, that which the Romanists now affirm, that he had a dominion over all.

The bishop of Rome misliked and withstood for overreaching his bounds and receiving appeals which should not by order have been brought unto him.

9. Now remaineth the fourth kind of power, which standeth in appeals. It is evident that he hath the chief power, to whose judgment last appellation is made. Many oftentimes appealed to the bishop of Rome, and he himself also went about to draw the hearing of causes to himself: but he was always laughed to scorn, when he passed his own bounds. I will speak nothing of the East and of Grecia: but it is certain that the bishops of France stoutly withstood him, when he seemed to take to himself an empire over them. In Africa there was long debate about that matter. For where at the Millevitan council, at which Augustine was present, they were excommunicate that appealed beyond the sea, the bishop of Rome laboured to bring to pass, that that decree might be amended. He sent the legates to shew that that privilege was given to him by the Nicene council. The legates brought forth the acts of the Nicene council, which they had fetched out of the storehouse of their own church. The Africans withstood it, and denied that the bishops of Rome ought to be credited in their own cause: and said that thereof they would send to Constantinople, and into other cities of Greece where copies were to be had that were less suspicious. It was found, that therein was no such thing written, as the Romans had pretended. So was that decree confirmed, which took the chief hearing of causes from the bishop of Rome: in which doing the lewd shamelessness of the bishop of Rome appeared. For when he guilefully did thrust in the synod at Sardos instead of the Nicene synod, he was shamefully taken in a manifest falshood. But yet greater and more shameless was their wickedness, that added a forged epistle to the council, wherein I wot not what bishop of Carthage, condemning the arrogance of Aurelius his predecessor, for that he was so bold as to withdraw himself from the obedience of the see apostolic, and yielding himself and his church, humbly craveth pardon. These are the godly monuments of antiquity, whereupon the majesty of the see of Rome is founded, while they so childishly lie, under the pretence of antiquity that even a blind man may find it out by gropping. Aurelius (saith he) puffed up with devilish boldness and stubbornness, rebelled against Christ, and St. Peter, and therefore to be condemned with curse. What said Austine? But what said so many fathers that were present at the Millevitan council? But what need is it to spend many words in confuting that foolish writing, which the Romanists themselves, if they have any face left, cannot look upon without great shame? So Gratian, (2 quest. c. 4.) I cannot tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearsed that de-decree that they should be excommunicate, who appeal beyond the sea, adding no exception: unless peradventure they appeal to the see of Rome. What may a man do to those heads, which are so void of common reason, that they except that only thing out of the law, for whose cause every man seeth that the law was made? For the council when it condemneth appeals beyond the sea, forbiddeth only this, that none should appeal to Rome. Here the good expositor excepteth Rome out of the common law.

The bishop of Rome appointed and others joined with him by Constantine to hear an appeal made by a bishop of Carthage: and in the same cause the bishop of Orleance appointed by the same emperor to hear an appeal made from the bishop of Rome.

10. But (to determine this question at once) one history shall make plain what manner of jurisdiction the bishop of Rome had in old time. Donate of the black-houses had Cecilian bishop of Carthage. The man accused was condemned, his cause not heard. For when he knew that the bishops had conspired against him, he would not appear. Then the matter came to the emperor Constantine. He forasmuch as he willed to have the matter ended by ecclesiastical judgment, committed the hearing of it to Melciades bishop of Rome. To whom he adjoined fellow commissioners, many bishops of Italy, France and Spain. If that belonged to the ordinary jurisdiction of the see of Rome, to hear an appeal in an ecclesiastical cause: why doth he suffer others to be joined with him at the will of the emperor? Yea, why did he himself take the judgment upon him rather by the emperor's commandment, than by his own office? But let us hear what happened afterward. There Cecilian got the victory. Donate of the black houses was condemned for slander: he appealed: Constantine commited the judgment of the appeal to the bishop of Orleance. He sat as judge, to pronounce what he thought, after the bishop of Rome. If the see of Rome hath the chief power without appellation: why doth Melciades suffer himself to receive so great a shame, that the bishop of Orleance should be preferred above him? And what emperor doth this? even Constantine of whom they boast that he employed not only all his endevour, but in a manner all the riches of the empire to increase the dignity of their see. We see therefore now, how far the bishop of Rome was at that time by all means from the supreme dominion, which he affirmeth to be given unto him by Christ over all the churches, and which he lyingly saith that he hath in all ages possessed by the consent of the whole world.

11. I [illegible] how many falsifies [illegible] have forged [illegible] decrees, wherein the bishops do [illegible] give much, and boldly challenge Regni supremi much unto it. But this also all [illegible] men that have very little wit and [illegible] learning do know, that the most [illegible] part of those are so unsavoury, [illegible] that by the first taste of them a man may soon find out of what shop they came. For what man, challengeth, of sound wit and sober, will think that that goodly interpretation is Anacletus his own, which is in Gratian reported under the name of Anacletus: that is, that Cephas is a head? (Dist. 11. cap. Sacrosancta). The Romanists do at this day abuse for defence of their see, many such trifles, which Gratian hath patched together without judgment: and yet still in so great light they will sell such smokes, wherewith in old time they were wont to mock out the ignorant in darkness. But I will not bestow much labour in confuting those things, which do openly confute themselves by reason of their unsavoury folly. I grant that there remain also true epistles of the old bishops, wherein they set forth the honour of their see with glorious titles, of which sort are some epistles of Leo, (Vide ep. 8. 5. Epist. 8. 3.) For that man, as he was learned and eloquent, so was he also above measure desirous of glory and dominion: but whether the churches then believed his testimony, when he so advanced himself, that indeed is it that is in controversy. But it appeareth that many offended with his ambition, did also withstand his greedy desire. Sometimes he appointed in his stead the bishop of Thessalonica throughout Grecia and other countries adjoining, sometime the appointed the bishop of Orleance, or some other throughout France. So he appointed Hormisdas bishop of Hispalis to be his vicar in Spain: but every where he excepteth, that he giveth out such appointments upon this condition, that the metropolitans may have there ancient privileges remaining safe and whole. But Leo himself declareth, that this is one of their privileges, that if any doubt happen about any matter, the metropolitan should first be asked his advice, (Epist. 88.) Therefore those appointments of vicars in his stead were upon this condition, that neither any bishop should be letted in his ordinary jurisdiction, nor any metropolitan in being judge of appeals, nor any provincial in ordering of their churches. What was this else but to abstain from all jurisdiction: but to intermeddle to the appeasing of discords, only so far as the law and nature of the communion of the church suffereth?

The calamity of other places in Gregory's time exalted the dignity of the church of Rome, but without overthrowing the ordinary jurisdiction which others had.

12. In Gregory's time that ancient order was already much changed. For when the empire was shaken, and torn in pieces, when France and Spain were afflicted with many overthrows received, Salvonia wasted, Italy vexed, and Affrica in a manner destroyed with continual calamities, that in so great a shaking of civil affairs, at least the integrity of faith might remain, or yet not utterly perish, all the bishops from each part did the rather join themselves to the bishops of Rome. Thereby it came to pass, that not only the dignity, but also the power of that see greatly increased. Howbeit I do not so much pass by what means it was brought about. Truly it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from being an unbridled dominion, that one man might bear rule over others after his own will. But the see of Rome had this reverence, that it might with her authority subdue and repress, the lewd and obstinate that could not by the other bishops be kept within their duty. For Gregory doth oftentimes diligently testify this, that he doth no less faithfully preserve to other men their rights, than he requireth his own of them, Lib. 1. epist. 68. Neither do I (saith he) pricked on by ambition, pluck from any man that which is his right: but I desire in all things to honour my brethren. There is no saying in his writings wherein he doth more proudly boast of the largeness of his supremacy, than this: I know not what bishop is not subject to the see apostolic when he is found in fault, Lib. 2. epist ult. But he by and by adjoineth. Where fault requireth, not all according to the order of humility are equal, Lib. 7. epist. 64. He giveth to himself power to correct them that have offended: if all do their duty, he maketh himself equal with the rest. But he giveth himself this power: and they assented to it that: and others that liked it not, might freely gainsay it, which is well known that the most part of them did. Besides that he speaketh there of the primate of Constantinople: which when he was condemned by the principal synod, refused the whole judgment. His fellow bishops informed the emperor of this stubbornes of him. The emperor willed Gregory to be judge of the cause. We see therefore that he both attempteth nothing, whereby he may break the ordinary jurisdiction, and the same thing that he doth for the helping of others, he doth not but by the commandment of the emperor.

Gregory how far unlike the Roman bishops at this day.

13. This therefore was then all the power of the bishop of Rome, to set himself against obstinate and untamed heads, when there needed any extraordinary remedy: and that to help and not to hinder other bishops. Therefore he taketh no more to himself over all others, than in another place he granteth to all others over himself, when he confesseth that he is ready to be corrected of all, to be amended of all. So in another place he doth in deed command the bishop of Aquileia to come to Rome, to plead his cause in a controversy of faith that was risen between him and others: (Lib. 2. Epi. 37. Epist. 16.) but he doth not command him of his own power, but because the emperor had so commanded. Neither doth he give warning that he alone shall be judge, but promised that he will assemble a synod by whom the whole matter may be judged. But although there was yet such moderation that the power of the see of Rome had her certain bounds, which it might not pass, and the bishop of Rome himself was no more above than under others: yet it appeareth how much Gregory misliked such state. For he now and then complaineth, that under colour of bishopric he was brought back to the world: and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than ever he had been while he was a lay man: that he was in that honour oppressed with tumult of worldly affairs. (Lib. 1. Epist. 5.) In another place: so great burdens (saith he) of business do hold me down, that my mind can nothing at all be raised up to things above. I am shaken with many waves of causes: and after those leasures of rest I am tossed with tempests of troublesome life, so that I may rightly say, I am come into the depth of the sea, and the tempest hath drowned me. (Lib. 1. Epist. 7. and 15.) Hereby gather, what he would have said, if he had happened to be in these times. Although he fulfilled not the office of a pastor, yet he was doing it. He abstained from the government of the civil empire, and confessed himself to be subject to the emperor as others were. He did not thrust himself into the cure of other churches, but being compelled by neceſſity. And yet he thinketh himſelf to be in a maze, becauſe he cannot apply himſelf altogether only to the office of a biſhop.

The church of Rome riſen by the empire of Rome.

14. At that time the biſhop of Conſtantinople ſtrived with the biſhop of Rome for the ſupremacy, as it is already ſaid. For after that the ſeat of the empire was ſtabliſhed at Conſtantinople, the majeſty of the empire ſeemed to require that that church alſo ſhould have the ſecond place of honour after the church of Rome. And truly at the beginning, nothing more availed to cauſe the ſupremacy to be given to Rome, but becauſe the head of the empire was there at that time. There is in Gratian a writing under the name of Pope Lucinus, where he ſaith, that cities were no otherwiſe divided, where Metropolitans and Primates ought to ſit, than by reaſon of the civil government that was before. There is alſo another under the name of Pope Clement, where he ſaith, the patriarchs were ordained in thoſe cities that had had the flamins in them. Which, although it be falſe, yet it is taken out of a truth. For it is certain, that to the end there ſhould be made as little change as might be, the provinces were divided according to the ſtate of things that then were: and that primates and metropolitans were ſet in thoſe cities that excelled the other in honours and power. Therefore in the council at Taurinum it was decreed, that thoſe cities which in the civil government were the chief cities of every province, ſhould be the chief ſees of biſhops. And if the honour of the civil government happened to be removed from one city to another, that then the right of the metropolitan city ſhould therewithal be removed thither. But Innocentius biſhop of Rome, when he ſaw the ancient dignity of his city to grow in decay, after that the ſeat of the empire was removed to Conſtantinople, fearing the abaſement of his ſee, made a contrary law: wherein he denieth it to be be neceſſary that the eccleſiaſtical mother cities ſhould be changed as the imperial mother cities change. But the authority of a ſynod ought of right to be preferred above one man's ſentence. Alſo we ought to ſuſpect Innocentius himſelf in his own cauſe. Howſoever it be, yet by his own proviſo he ſheweth, that from the beginning it was ſo ordered, that the Metropolitan cities ſhould be diſpoſed according to the outward order of the empire.

The biſhop of Rome ſtomaching that the biſhop of Conſtantinople ſhould come ſo near as to be, made by a council next him in authority, and honour.

15. According to this ancient ordinance, it was decreed in the firſt council at Conſtantinople, that the biſhop of the city ſhould have the privileges of honour next after the biſhop of Rome, becauſe it was a new Rome. But a long time after, when a like decree was made at Chalcedon, Leo ſtoutly cried out againſt it. And he not only gave himſelf leave to eſteem as nothing that which ſix hundred biſhops or more had decreed: but alſo bitterly taunted them, for that they took from other ſees that honour which they were ſo bold to give to the church of Conſtantinople. I beſeech you, what other thing could move a man to trouble the world for ſo ſmall a matter, but mere ambition? He ſaith that, that ought to be inviolable, which the Nicene ſynod hath once decreed. (Socrat. hiſt. trip. lib. 9. c. 13. Decret. 22. diſt.) As though forſooth the chriſtian faith were endangered, if one church be preferred before another: or as though patriarchies were there divided to any other end, but for policies. But we know that policy receiveth, yea requireth, divers changes, according to the diverſity of times. Therefore it is fooliſh that Leo pretendeth, that the honour, which by the authority of the Nicene ſynod has given to the ſee of Alexandria, ought not to be given to the ſee of Conſtantinople. For common reaſon telleth this, that it was ſuch a decree, as might be taken away according to the reſpect of times. Yea none of the biſhops of the eaſt withſtood it, whom that thing moſt of all concerned. Truly Proterius was preſent, whom they had made biſhop of Alexandria in the place of Dioſcorus. There were preſent other patriarchs, whoſe honour was diminiſhed. It was their part to withſtand it, not Leos which remained ſafe in his own place. But when all they hold their peace, yea aſſent unto it, and only the biſhop of Rome reſiſteth: it is eaſy to judge, what moveth him: that is, he foreſaw that which not long after happened, that it would come to paſs, that, the glory of old Rome decaying, Conſtantinople not contented with the ſecond place, would ſtrive with Rome for the ſupremacy. And yet with his crying out he did not ſo much prevail, but that the decree of the council was confirmed. Therefore his ſucceſſors, when they ſaw themſelves overcome, quietly gave over that ſtiffneſs: for they ſuffered that he ſhould be accounted the ſecond patriarch.

16. But within a little after, John which in Gregory's time ruled the church of Constantinople, brake forth so far that he called himself the universal patriarch. Here Gregory, least he should in a very good cause fail to defend his own see, did constantly set himself against him. And truly both the pride, and madness of John was intollerable, which desired to make the bounds of his bishopric equal with the bounds of the empire. And yet Gregory doth not claim to himself, that which he denieth to another: but abhorreth that name as wicked, and ungodly, and abominable, whosoever take it upon him. Yea and also in one place he is angry with Eulolius bishop of Alexandria, who had honoured him with such a title. Behold (saith he) in the preface of the epistle which ye directed to myself that have forbidden it, ye have cared to imprint the word of proud calling, in naming me universal pope, which I pray that your holiness will no more do, because that is withdrawn from you, which is given to another more than reason requireth. I count it no honour, wherein I see the honour of my brethren to be diminished. For my honour is the honour of the universal church, and the sound strength of my brethren. But if your holiness call me the universal pope, it denieth it self to be that which it confesseth me to be wholly. (Lib. 7. epi. 30.) Truly Gregory stood in a good and honest cause. But John holpen by the favour of Maurice the emperor, could never be removed from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor never suffered himself to be intreated in that behalf.

The headship of the church granted by Phocas to the bishop of Rome, and the churches of France by Pipine made subject to his authority.

17. At the last Phocas, who when Maurice was slain, was set in his place (I wot not for what cause being more friendly to the Romans, but because he was there crowned without strife) granted to Boniface the third, that which Gregory never required, that Rome should be the head of all churches. After is manner was the controversy ended. And yet is benefit of the emperor, could not so much ve profited the see of Rome, unless other things

o had afterward happened. For Grecia and all sia were within a little after cut off from the communion of Rome. France so much reverenced im, that it obeyed no further than it listed. But it was then first brought into bondage when Pipine usurped the kingdom. For when Zachary bishop of Rome had been his helper to the breach of his faith, and to robbery, that thrusting out the lawful king, he might violently enter upon the kingdom as laid open for a prey: he received this reward that the see of Rome should have jurisdiction over the churches of France: as robbers are wonted in parting to divide the common spoil: so these good men ordered the matter between themselves, that Pipine should have the earthly and civil dominion, spoiling the true king: and Zachary should be made head of all bishops and have the spiritual power: which, when at the beginning it was weak: (as it is wont to be in new things) was afterward confirmed by the authority of Charles, in manner for a like cause. For he was also indebted to the bishop of Rome, for that by his endeavour he had attained to the honour of the empire But although it be credible, that churches each where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certain that the old form of the church was then first utterly defaced in France and Germany. There remain yet in the records of the court of Paris, brief notes of these times, which, where they treat of the matters of the church, make mention of the covenant both of Pipine and of Charles with the bishop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then there was an alteration made of the old state.

The state of the church of Rome in Bernard's time.

18. Since that time, when things did each where daily fall from worse to worse, the tyranny of the see of Rome was now and then also stablished and increased, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the slothfulness of the bishops. For when one man took all things upon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to advance himself against law and right: the bishops did not with such zeal as they ought, endeavour themselves to restrain his lust, and though they wanted not courage, yet they were destitute of true learning, and knowlege: so that they were no way fit to attempt so great a matter. Therefore we see what and how monstrous an unholy defiling of all holy things, and a scattering abroad of the whole order of the church, was in Bernard's time. (Li. 1. de consi. ad Evag.) He complaineth that there resort by heaps to Rome out of all the world, ambitious men, covetous, Simonians, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, committers of inceſt, and all ſuch monſters, to obtain, or retain eccleſiaſtical honours by the apoſtolic authority: and that fraud and undermining, and violence were grown in force. He ſaith that that manner of judging which then was uſed, was abominable, and unſeemly, not only for the church, but alſo for a judicial court. He crieth out that the church is full of ambitious men: and that there is that more dreadeth to commit miſchievous acts, than robbers do in their cave, when they divide the ſpoils of wayfaring men. Few (ſaith he) do look unto the mouth of the lawgiver, but unto his hands. But not without cauſe. For thoſe hands do all the pope's buſineſs. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the ſpoils of churches, that ſay to thee, oh well done, well done! The life of the poor is ſown in the ſtreets of the rich: ſilver gliſtereth in the mire: men run to it from all places: not the poor, but the ſtranger taketh it up, or he peradventure that runneth faſteſt before. But this manner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might end in the. Among theſe things thou a paſtor goeſt forward, compaſſed with much and precious array. If I durſt ſay it, theſe are rather the paſtors of devils, than of ſheep. Forſooth Peter did thus, Paul played thus. Thy court is more accuſtomed to receive men good, than to make men good. For the ill do not there profit, but the good do decay. Now as for the abuſes of appeals that he rehearſeth, no godly man can read them without great horror. At the laſt he thus concludeth of that unbridled greedineſs of the ſee of Rome, in the uſurping of juriſdiction: I ſpeak the murmur and common complaint of the churches. They cry out that they be mangled and diſmembered. There are either none or few, that do not either bewail, or fear this plague. Aſkeſt thou what plague? The abbots are plucked from the biſhops, the biſhops from the archbiſhops, &c. It is marvellous if this may be excuſed. In ſo doing, ye prove that you have fullneſs of power, but not of righteouſneſs. Yee do this becauſe ye can do it: but whether ye alſo ought to do it, is a queſtion. Ye are ſet to preſerve, not to envy to every man his honour and his own degree. Theſe few things of many I liſted to rehearſe, partly that the readers may ſee, how ſore the church was then decayed, and partly that they may know in how great ſorrow and mourning this calamity held all the godly.

The uſurped power eccleſiaſtical which the biſhop of Rome holdeth and doth exerciſe at this day.

19. But now, altho' that we grant to the biſhop of Rome at this day the preeminence and largeneſs of juriſdiction, which that ſee had in the mean times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregory: what is that to the preſent ſtate of the papacy? I do not yet ſpeak of the earthly dominion, nor of the civil power thereof, which we will afterward conſider in place fit for it: but the very ſpiritual government that they boaſt of, what hath it like to the ſtate of thoſe times? For they define the pope none otherwiſe than the ſupreme head of the church in earth, and the univerſal biſhop of the whole world. And the biſhops themſelves, when they ſpeak of their own authority, do with great ſtoutneſs of countenance, pronounce that to them belongeth the power to command, and others are bound to the neceſſity to obey, that ſo all their decrees are to be holden as confirmed with the divine voice of Peter, that the provincial ſynods are without force, becauſe they want the preſence of the Pope: that they may order clerks of any church that they will: and may call them to their ſee that have been ordered elſewhere. Innumerable of that ſort are in Gratian's pack, which I do not now rehearſe, leaſt I ſhould be too tedious to the readers. But this is the ſum of them, that only the biſhop of Rome hath the ſupreme hearing and determining of all eccleſiaſtical cauſes, whether it be in judging and defining of doctrines, or in making of laws, or in eſtabliſhing of diſcipline, or executing of judgments: it were alſo long and ſuperfluous to rehearſe the privileges that they take to themſelves in reſervations, as they call them. But (which is moſt intollerable of all other) they leave no judgment in earth to reſtrain and bridle their outragious luſt, if they abuſe ſo immeaſurable power. It is lawful for no man (ſay they) to revoke the judgment of that ſee, becauſe of the ſupremacy of the church of Rome. Again, the judge ſhall be judged neither by the emperor, nor by kings, nor by all the clergy, nor of the people. That is indeed too imperiouſly done that one man maketh himſelf judge of all men, and ſuffereth himſelf to obey the judgment of no man. But what if he uſe tyranny over the people of God? if he ſcatter abroad and waſte the kingdom of Chriſt? if he trouble the whole church? if he turn the office of paſtor into robbery? Yea though he be never ſo miſchievous, he ſaith, that he is not bound to yield account. For theſe be the ſayings of the biſhops: God's will was to determine the cauſes of other men by men, but he hath without queſtion reſerved the biſhop of this see to his own judgment. Again, The doings of subjects are judged of us, but ours of God only.

The forgeries used in the papacy to make the world believe that they claim at this day no more than they have had in ancient times.

20. And that such decrees might have the more weight, they have falsely thrust in the names of the old bishops, as though things had been so ordained from the beginning: whereas it is most certain, that it is new and lately forged whatsoever the bishop of Rome giveth to himself more than we have rehearsed to be given him by the ancient councils. Yea, they are come to so great shamelessness, that they have set forth a writing under the name of Anastasius patriarch of Constantinople, wherein he testifieth that it was decreed by the old rulers, that nothing should be done even in the furthest provinces, that were not first moved to the see of Rome. Beside this, that it is certain that is most vain, what man shall think it likely, that such a commendation of the see of Rome proceeded from the adversary and envyer of honour and dignity thereof? But verily it behoved that these antichrists should be carried on to so great madness and blindness, that their lewdness might be plain for all men to see, at least so many as will open their eyes. But the decretal epistles heaped together by Gregory the ninth, again the Clementines, and extravagants of Martine, do yet more openly and with fuller mouth each where breath forth their outragious fierceness, and as it were the tyranny of barbarous kings. But these are the oracles, by which the Romanists will have their papacy to be weighed. Hereupon arose those notable principles, which at this day have every where in the papacy the force of oracles; that the Pope cannot err: that the Pope is above the councils: that the Pope is the universal bishop of all bishops, and the supreme head of the church on earth: I pass over the much absurder follies, which the fooolish canonists babble in their schools, to which yet the Romish divines do not only assent, but do also clap their hands at them, to flatter their idol.

The Pope's usurpation not only against the judgment of all antiquity, against the mind of Gregory, 21. I will not deal with them by extremity of right. Some other man would against this their so great insolency set the saying of Cyprian, which he used among the bishops, at whose council he sat as chief, None of us calleth himself bishop of bishops, or with tyrannous fear compelleth his fellow bishops of necessity to obey. He would object that, which a little after was decreed at Carthage. That none should be called prince, priest, or chief bishop. He would gather many testimonies out of histories, canons out of synods, and many sentences out of the books of old writers, by which the bishop of Rome should be brought down into the fellowship of the rest. But I pass over all these, least I should seem too precisely to press them. But lest the best patrons of the see of Rome answer me, with what face they dare defend the title of universal bishop, which they see so oft to be condemned with curse by Gregory. If Gregory's testimony ought to be of force, they do thereby declare that antichrist is their bishop, because they make him universal. The name also of head was no more usual. For thus he saith in one place: (Lib. 4. Ep. 92.) Peter is the chief member in the body, John, Andrew, and James the heads of particular peoples: yet they all are members of the church under one head: yea the saints before the law, the saints under the law, and the saints under grace, are set among members, altogether making up the body of the Lord: and no man ever willed to have himself called universal. But whereas the bishop of Rome taketh upon himself the power of commanding, that thing finally agreeth with that which Gregory saith in another place. (Lib. 7. Epi. 28.) For whereas Eulolius bishop of Alexandria, had said that he was commanded by him, he answered in this wise, I pray you, take away this word of commanding from my hearing. For I know what I am, and what you be. In place, you be to me brethren, in manners ye be to me fathers. Therefore I commanded not, but I cared to tell you those things that I thought profitable. Whereas he so extendeth his jurisdiction without end, he doth therein great and hainous wrong, not only to the other bishops, but also to all particular churches, which he so teareth and plucketh in pieces, that he may build his seat of their ruins. But whereas he exempteth himself from all judgments, and will so reign after the manner of tyrants, that he accounteth his own lust only for law, that verily is so hainous, and so far from ecclesiastical order, that it may in no wise be born: for it utterly abhorreth not only from all feeling of godliness, but also from all humanity.

but even repugnant to all humanity.

22. But

The ſtate of Rome an hundred times more corrupt now than in the days of Gregory or Bernard.

22. But that I be not compelled to go through and examine all things particularly, I do again appeal to them, that will at this day be accounted the beſt and moſt faithful patrons of the ſee of Rome, whether they are not aſhamed to defend the preſent ſtate of the papacy: which it is certain to be a hundred times more corrupt, than it was in the time of Gregory and Bernard: which ſtate yet did then ſo much diſpleaſe thoſe holy men. Gregory each where complaineth, that he is too much diverſly drawn away with foreign buſineſs: that he is under the colour of biſhopric brought back to the world: wherein he ſerveth ſo many cares of the world as he never remembered that he ſerved when he was a lay man: that he is preſſed down with tumult of worldly affairs, that his mind is nothing raiſed up to things above, that he is ſhaken with many waves of cauſes, and toſſed with tempeſts of troubleſome life: ſo that he may worthily ſay, I am come into the depth of the ſea. (Lib. 1. epi. 5. 7. and 25. and alibi) Truly among thoſe earthly buſineſſes, he might yet teach the people with ſermons, privately admoniſh and correct ſuch as it behoved, order the church, give counſel to his fellow biſhops and exhort them to their duty: beſide theſe things there remained ſome time to write: and yet he lamenteth his calamity, that he is drowned in the deepeſt ſea. If the government of that time was a ſee: what is to be ſaid of the papacy at this time? For what likeneſs have they together? Here are no preachings, no care of diſcipline, no zeal to the churches, no ſpiritual doing, finally nothing but the world. Yet this maze is praiſed, as though there could nothing be found more orderly and better framed. But what complaints doth Bernard pour out, what groans doth he utter, when he looketh upon the faults of his age: What then would he do if he beheld this our age of iron, and worſe if any be worſe than iron? What obſtinate wickedneſs is this, not only ſtiffly to defend as holy and divine, that which all the holy men have with one mouth condemned: but alſo to abuſe their teſtimony to the defence of the papacy, which it is certain that they never knew of? Howbeit of Bernard's time I confeſs, that then the corruption of all things was ſo great, that it was not much unlike our time. But they are without all ſhame, that fetch any pretence for it, out of that mean age, that is the time of Leo, Gregory, and ſuch other. For they do like as if one, to eſtabliſh the monarchy of emperors, would praiſe the old ſtate of the empire of Rome: that is, would borrow the praiſes of liberty, to ſet forth the honour of tyranny.

The biſhop of Rome no biſhop.

23. Finally, although all theſe things were granted them: yet their ariſeth of freſh a new ſtrife for them, when we deny that there is a church at Rome, in which ſuch benefits may be reſident: when we deny that there is a biſhop, which may bear theſe privileges of dignity. Admit therefore all thoſe things to be true, (which yet we have already wrung from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Chriſt appointed head of the univerſal church: and that he left the honour that was given him in the ſee of Rome: that the ſame was eſtabliſhed by the authority of the ancient church, and confirmed with long continuance: that the ſupreme power hath been always by one conſent given of all men to the biſhop of Rome, that he hath been the judge of all both cauſes and men, and himſelf ſubject to the judgment of none: let them have alſo more, if they will: yet I anſwer in one word, that none of theſe things avail, unleſs there be at Rome a church and a biſhop. This they muſt needs grant me, that it cannot be the mother of churches, which is not itſelf a church: that he cannot be chief of biſhops, who is not himſelf a biſhop. Will they therefore have the ſee apoſtolic at Rome? Then let them ſhew me a biſhop. But what? where will they ſhew us any face of a church? They name one indeed, and have it oft in their mouth. Truly the church is known by her certain marks: and biſhopric is a name of office. I ſpeak not hear of the people: but of the government itſelf, which ought continually to ſhine in the church. Where is the miniſtery in their church, ſuch as Chriſt's inſtitution requireth? Let us call to remembrance that which hath before been ſpoken of the office of prieſts and of a biſhop. If we ſhall bring the office of cardinals to be tried by that rule, we ſhall confeſs that they are nothing leſs than prieſts. As for the chief biſhop himſelf, I would fain know what one thing at all he hath biſhoplike. Firſt it is the principal point in the office of a biſhop, to teach the people with the word of God: another and the next point to that is, to miniſter the ſacraments: the third is to admoniſh and exhort, yea, and to correct them that offend, and to hold the people together in holy diſcipline. What of theſe things doth he? yea, what doth he feign himſelf to do? Let them tell tell therefore, by what means they would have him to be counted a bishop, that doth not with his little finger, no not once so much as in outward shew, touch any part of a bishop's office.

24. It is not so of a bishop as it is of a king. For a king although he do not execute that which belongeth to a king, doth nevertheless retain the honour and title. But in judging of a bishop respect is had to Christ's commandment, which always ought to be of force in the church. Therefore let the Romanists loose me this knot. I deny that their high bishop is the chief of bishops, forasmuch as he is no bishop. They must needs prove this last point to be false, if they will have the victory in the first. But how say they to this, that he not only hath no property of a bishop, but rather all things contrary? But hear, O God, whereat shall I begin? at his learning, or at his manners? What shall I say, or what shall I leave unsaid? where shall I make an end? This I say: that whereas the world is at this day stuffed with so many perverse and wicked doctrines, full of so many kinds of superstitions, blinded with so many errors, drowned in so great idolatry: there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thence: or at least been there confirmed. Neither is their any other cause, why the bishops are carried with so great rage against the doctrine of the gospel newly springing up again, why they bend all their strengths to oppress it, why they kindle up kings and princes to cruelty, but but because they see that their whole kingdom decayeth and falleth down, so soon as the gospel of Christ cometh in place. Leo was cruel: Clement was bloody: Paul is a fierce murderer. But nature hath not so much moved them to fight against the truth, as for this was their only mean to maintain their power. Therefore since they cannot be safe, till they have driven away to Christ, they labour in this cause, as if they did fight for their religion and countries, and for their own lives. What then? Shall that be to us the see apostolic, where we see nothing but horrible apostacy? Shall he be Christ's vicar who by persecuting the gospel with furious enterprises, doth openly profess himself to be Antichrist? Shall he be Peter's successor, that rangeth with sword and fire, to destroy all that ever Peter hath builded? Shall he be head of the church that cutting off, and dismembering the church from Christ the only true head thereof, doth in itself pluck and tear it in pieces. Admit verily that in old time Rome was the mother of all churches: yet since it hath begun to be the seat of Antichrist, it hath ceased to be that which it was.

In the bishop of Rome, all things which should be in a bishop.

25. We seem to be too much evil speakers and railers, when we call the bishop of Rome Antichrist. But they that so think, do not understand that they accuse Paul of immodesty, after whom we so speak, yea out of whose mouth we so speak. And lest any man object, that we do wrongfully wrest against the bishop of Rome these words of Paul that are spoken to another intent, I will briefly shew, that they cannot be otherwise understood, but of the papacy. Paul writeth, that Antichrist shall sit in the temple of God, 2 Thes. ii. 4. In another place also the holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdom shall consist in haughtiness of speech, and blasphemings of God. Hereupon we gather, that it is rather a tyranny over souls, than over bodies, that is raised up against the spiritual kingdom of Christ. Then, that is such, as doth not abolish the name of Christ and the church: but rather should abuse the pretence of Christ, and lurk under the title of the church, as under a disguised visor. But although all the heresies and sects that have been from the biginning, belong to the kingdom of Antichrist: yet whereas Paul prophecyeth, that there shall come a departing, by this description he signifieth, that seat of abomination shall then be raised up, when a certain universal departing shall possess the church: howsoever many members of the church here and there continue in the true unity of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mystery to set up the work of iniquity, which he would afterward shew openly: thereby we understand, that this calamity was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Now whereas he doth set out Antichrist by this mark, that he should pluck away from God his due honour, to take it to himself: this is the chief token that we ought to follow in seeking out of Antichrist, especially where such pride proceedeth even to the public dissipation of the church. Since therefore it is certain that the bishop of Rome had shamelessly conveyed away to himself that which was the chief proper thing to God alone and Christ, it is not to be doubted but that he is the captain and standard-bearer of the wicked and abominable kingdom.

The pope Antichrist.

Nothing left in the papacy, but only the place where the order of a church hath been.

26. Now let the Romaniſts go and object antiquity againſt us: as if in ſo great alteration of all things the honour of the ſee might ſtand where there is no ſee. Euſebius telleth (Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 5.) how God (that there might be place for his vengeance) removed the church that was at Jeruſalem to Pella. That which we hear to have been once done, might be ofter done. Therefore ſo to bind the honour of ſupremacy to a place, that he which is indeed the moſt hateful enemy of Chriſt, the higheſt adverſary of the goſpel, the greateſt waſter and deſtroyer of the church, the moſt cruel ſlaughterman and butcher of the ſaints, ſhould nevertheleſs be accounted the vicar of Chriſt, the ſucceſſor of Peter, the chief biſhop of the church, only becauſe he occupieth the ſee that was once the chiefeſt of all: that verily is too much to be ſcorned and fooliſh. I ſpeak not, how great difference there is between the pope's chancery, and a well framed order of the church. Although this one thing may well take away all doubt of this queſtion. For no man that hath his right wit, will think the biſhopric encloſed in lead and bulls: much leſs in that ſchool of frauds and deceits, in which things the pope's ſpiritual government conſiſteth. Therefore it was very well ſaid by a certain man, that that church of Rome which is boaſted of, is long ago turned into a court, which only is now ſeen at Rome. Neither do I here accuſe the faults of men: but I ſhew that the papacy itſelf is directly contrary to the true order of a church.

The atheiſm of popes.

27. But if we come to the perſons of men, it is well enough known what manner of vicars of Chriſt we ſhall find. Julius forſooth, and Leo, and Clement and Paul, ſhall be pillars of the Chriſtian faith, and the chief expoſitors of religion, which never knew any other thing of Chriſt, than that which they had learned in Lucians ſchool. But why do I reckon up three or four popes? as though it were doubtful, what manner of form of religion the popes with their whole college of cardinals have ſince long ago profeſſed, and at this day do profeſs. For firſt this is the principle article of that ſecret divinity that reigneth among them, That there is no God: the ſecond, That all things that are written and taught concerning Chriſt, are lies and deceits: the third, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the laſt reſurrection are mere fables. They do not all think ſo: and few of them ſpeak ſo. I grant. But this hath long ago begun to be the ordinary religion of popes. Whereas this is very well known to all that know Rome, yet the Romiſh divines ceaſe not to boaſt, that by Chriſt's privilege it is provided, that the pope cannot err, becauſe it was ſaid to Peter: I have prayed for thee, that thy faith ſhould not fail, Luke xxii. 32. What, I pray you, win they by mocking ſo ſhameleſly, but that the whole world may underſtand, that they are come to that extremity of wickedneſs, that they neither fear God, nor ſtand in awe of men.

The fall of John the XXII.

28. But let us imagine, that the ungodlineſs of thoſe popes whom I have ſpoken of, is hidden becauſe they have neither publiſhed it by preaching, nor by writings: but only have bewrayed it at their table, and in their chamber, or at leaſt within walls of houſes. But if they will have this privilege to be of force, which they pretend, they muſt needs wipe John the XXII. out of the number of popes, who openly affirmed that ſouls are mortal, and that they die together with the bodies until the day of reſurrection. And that you may perceive that the whole ſee with her principal ſtays was then wholly fallen: none of all the cardinals withſtood ſo great a madneſs, but the ſchool of Paris moved the king of France to compel him to recant it. The king forbad his ſubjects to communicate with him, unleſs he did out of hand repent: and the ſame, as the manner is, he proclaimed by a herald. The pope compelled by this neceſſity, abjured his error. This example maketh that I need not to diſpute any more with my adverſaries about this that they ſay, that the ſee of Rome and the biſhops thereof, cannot err in the faith, becauſe it was ſaid to Peter, I have prayed for thee, that thy faith may not fail, Luke xxii. 32. Truly he fell with ſo foul a kind of fall from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which ſucceed after Peter in the biſhopric. Howbeit this is alſo of itſelf ſo childiſh, that it needeth no anſwer. For if they will draw to Peter's ſucceſſors whatſoever was ſpoken to Peter, it ſhall follow that they are all Satans, foraſmuch as the Lord ſaid this alſo to Peter: Go behind, thou Satan, becauſe thou art an offence to me, Matth. xvi. 23. For ſhall be as eaſy for us to turn back this latter saying against them, as it shall be for them to object the other against us.

The uncleanmanners of the Roman bishops.

29. But I list not to strive with them in playing the fool. Therefore I return thither from whence I made digression. So to bind the place, and Christ, and the holy Ghost, and the church together, that whosoever sit in that place, although he be the devil, yet he must be judged the vicar of Christ and the head of the church, because it was once the seat of Peter: I say this is not only wicked and slanderous to Christ, but also too great an absurdity, and against common reason. It is already long ago since the bishops of Rome are either without all religion, or the great-est enemies of religion. Therefore they are no more made the vicars of Christ, by reason of the seat which they occupy, than an idol, when it is set in the temple of God, is to be taken for God, 2 Thes. i. 4. Now if their manners be to be judged upon, let the popes themselves answer for themselves: what one thing at all there is in them, wherein they may be known for bishops. First, whereas there is such life at Rome, they not only winking at it, but also as it were with secret countenance allowing it, this is utterly unmeet for bishops, whose duty it is with severity of discipline to restrain the licentiousness of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faults. But whereas they themselves with their own household, with almost the whole college or cardinals, with the whole flock of their clergy, are so given forth to all wickedness, filthiness, uncleanness, to all kinds of lewd mischievous doings, that they resemble rather monsters than men: therein truly they bewray themselves to be nothing less than bishops. And yet they need not fear least I should further disclose their filthiness. For both I am weary to have to do in so stinking a mire, and I must favour chaste ears, and I think that I have already enough and more proved that which I went about: that is, that although Rome had in old time been the head of churches, yet at this day she is not worthy to be judged one of the smallest toes of the church's feet.

The rising of cardinals.

30. As concerning the cardinals, (as they call them) I cannot tell how it is come to pass, that they are so suddenly risen up to so great dignity. This name in Gregory's time belonged to bishops only. For so oft as he maketh mention of cardinals, he meaneth not of them of the church of Rome, but of any other: so that briefly, a cardinal priest is nothing else but a bishop. In the writers before that age I find not this name at all. But I see that they were then less than bishops, whom they are now far above. This saying of Augustine is well known: although according to the names of honour, which the use of the church hath already obtained, bishopric is greater than priesthood, yet in many things Augustine is less than Jerom. Here indeed he maketh difference between a priest of the church of Rome and others: but he indifferently setteth them all behind the bishops. And that was so long observed, that in the council of Carthage, when they were present two legates of the see of Rome, the one a bishop, the other a priest, the priest was thrust back into the last place. But not to follow too old examples, there remaineth a council holden under Gregory at Rome, at which the priests sat in the lowest place, and subscribed severally by themselves: as for the deacons, they had no place at all in subscribing. And truly they had then no office, but to be present and under the bishop at ministring of doctrine and of the sacraments. Now the case is so changed, that they are become the cousins of kings and emperors. And it is no doubt but that they grow up by little and little together with their head, till they were advanced to this high top of dignity. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way that the readers might the better understand, that the see of Rome, such as it this day, doth much differ from that ancient one, under pretence whereof it doth now maintain and defend it self. But of what sort soever they were in old time, forasmuch as they have now nothing of the true and lawful office in the church; they retain only a deceitful colour and vain visor, yea forasmuch as they have all things utterly contrary it was necessary that that should happen to them, which Gregory writeth so oft, (Lib. 4. epist. 25. and 55.) I say it (saith he) weeping: I give warning of it, groaning: that since the order of priesthood is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behoved that this should be fulfilled in them which Malachy saith of such: Ye have gone back out of the way, and have made many to stumble in the law, Mal. ii. 8. Therefore ye have made void the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord. Therefore behold, I have given you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Now I leave it to all the godly to think of what sort is that supreme height of the hierarchy of Rome whereunto the Papists with abomibominable shamelesness stick not to make subject the very word of God, which ought to have been honourable and holy both to heaven and earth, men and angels.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the power of the church as touching the articles of faith: and with how unbridled licentiousness, it hath in the papacy been wrested to corrupt all pureness of doctrine.

A caution touching things spoken of the power of the church.

NOW followeth the third place of the power of the church, which partly consisteth in all the bishops, and partly in the councils, and those either provincial or general. I speak only of the spiritual power, which is proper to the church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in jurisdiction, or in making of laws. Doctrine hath two parts, the authority to teach articles of doctrine, and the expounding of them. Before that we begin to discourse of every one of these in specialty, we will that the godly readers be warned, that whatsoever is taught concerning the power of the church, they must remember to apply it to that end, whereunto (as Paul testifieth) it was given: that is, to edification, and not to destruction: 1 Cor. x. 8. and 13. 10. which who so lawfully use, they think themselves no more than the ministers of Christ, and therewithal the ministers of the people in Christ. Now of the edifying of the church, this is the only way, if the ministers themselves endeavour to preserve to Christ his authority, which cannot otherwise be safe unless that be left unto him, which he received of his father: that is, that he be the only schoolmaster of the church. For it is written, not of any other but of him alone, Hear him. Matt. xvii. 5. The power of the church therefore is not to be sparingly set forth, but yet to be enclosed within certain bounds, that it be not drawn hither and thither after the lust of men. Hereunto it shall be much profitable to note, how it is described of the prophets and apostles. For if we simply grant unto men such power as they list to take upon them, it is plain to all men, what a slippery readiness there is to fall into tyranny, which ought to be far from the church of Christ.

All the priests authority depended wholly upon him whose priests they were.

2. Therefore here it must be remembered, that whatsoever authority or dignity the holy Ghost in the scripture giveth either to the priests or to the prophets, or to the apostles, or to the successors of the apostles, all that same is given, not properly to the men themselves, but to the ministry over which they are appointed, or (to speak it more plainly in one word) whereof the ministry is committed to them. For if we go through them all in order, we shall not find that they had any authority to teach or to answer, but in the name and word of the Lord. For when they are called to the office, it is also enjoined them, that they should bring nothing of themselves, but speak out of the mouth of the Lord. Exod. iii. 4. And he himself doth not bring them forth to be heard of the people, before that he have given them instructions what they ought to speak, to the intent that they should speak nothing beside his word. Moses himself, the prince of all the prophets, was to be heard above the rest: but he was first instructed with his commandments, that he might not declare any thing at all, but from the Lord. Therefore it is said, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, believed in God, and in his servant Moses. Exod. xiv. 31. Also that the authority of the priests should not grow in contempt, it was stablished with most grievous penalties. Deut. xvi. 9. But therewithal the Lord sheweth upon what condition they were to be heard, when he saith, that he hath made his covenant with Levi, that the law of the truth should be in his mouth. And a little after he addeth: the lips of the priest shall keep knowlege, and they shall require the law at his mouth: because he is the angel of the God of hosts. Malu. ii. 4. and 6. Therefore if the priest will be heard, let him shew himself the messenger of God: that is, let him faithfully report the commandments that he received of his author. And where it is specially treated of the hearing of them, this is expressly said, That they may answer according to the law of God, Deut. xvii. 10.

The power of prophets consisted

3. What manner of power the prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezekiel: thou in delivering that which God hath given them in charge son of man (saith the Lord) I have given thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt hear the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. Ezek. iii. 17. He that is commanded to hear out of the mouth of the Lord, is he not forbidden to invent any thing of himself? But what is it to declare from the Lord but so to speak as he may boldly boast, that it is not his own, but the Lord's words that he hath brought? The self same thing is in Jeremiah, in other words. Let the prophet (saith he) with whom is a dream, tell a dream: and let him that hath my word speak my word true. Jer. xxiii. 28. Certainly he appointeth a law to them all. And that is such, that he permitteth not any to teach more than he is commanded. And after he calleth it chaff, all that is not from himself only. Therefore none of the prophets themselves opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the words before. Whereupon these sayings are so oft found among them: the word of the Lord, the burden of the Lord, so saith the Lord, the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. Isa. vi. 5. John. i. 6. And worthily. For Isaiah cried out that he had defiled lips. Isa. vi. 5. Jeremiah confessed that he could not speak, because he was a child: Jer. i. 6. what could proceed from the defiled mouth of the one, and the foolish mouth of the other, but unclean and unwise, if they had spoken their own speech? But their lips were holy and pure, when they began to be the instruments of the holy Ghost. When the prophets are bound with this religion, that they deliver nothing, but that which they have received, then they are garnished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the Lord testifieth, that he hath set them over nations and kingdoms, to pluck up and to root out, to destroy and pluck down, to build and to plant, he by and by adjoineth the cause: because he hath put his words in their mouth. Jer. i. 10.

The apostles authority restrained and limited within the bounds of his commandment which gave them authority.

4. Now if you look to the apostles: they are indeed commended with many and notable titles that they are the light of the world, and the salt of the earth, that they are to be heard instead of Christ, that whatsoever they bind or loose in earth shall be bound or loosed in heaven. But in their very name they shew how much is permitted them in their office; that is, if they be apostles, that they should not prate whatsoever they list, but should faithfully report his commandments from whom they are sent. And the words of Christ are plain enough in, which he hath determined their embassage: when he commanded them to go and teach all nations, all those things that he had commanded. Yea, and he himself also received this law, and laid it upon himself, that it should be lawful for no man to refuse it. My doctrine (saith he) is not mine, but his that sent me, my Father's. He that was alway the only and eternal counsellor of the Father, and he that was appointed by the Father the Lord and school-master of all men, yet because he executed the ministry of teaching prescribed by his own example to all ministers, what rule they ought to follow in teaching. Therefore the power of the church is not infinite but subject to the word of the Lord, and as it were inclosed in it.

The ancient patriarchs and fathers taught by Christ.

5. But since this hath from the beginning been of force in the church, and at this day ought to be in force, that the servants of God should teach nothing which they have not learned of him: yet according to the diversity of times they have diverse orders of learning. But that order which is now, much differeth from those that were before. First if it be true which Christ saith, that none hath seen the Father, but the Son, and he to whom it hath pleased the Son to shew him, Mat. xi. 27. it behoved verily that they should be always directed by the eternal wisdom of the Father, which would come to the knowlege of God. For how should they either have comprehended in mind, or uttered the mysteries of God, but by his teaching to whom alone the secrets of the Father are open? Therefore the holy fathers in old time knew God no otherwise but beholding him in the Son as in a glass. When I say this, I mean that God did never by any other means disclose himself to men but by the Son, that is his only wisdom, light, and truth. Out of this fountain did Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the rest draw all the knowlege that they had of heavenly doctrine. Out of the same fountain have also all the prophets themselves drawn all the heavenly oracles that they uttered, Mal. ii. 7. For verily this wisdom hath always disclosed itself by more ways than one. To the patriarchs he used secret revelations: but therewithal to confirm their minds, he adjoineth such signifies, that it could not be doubtful to them, that it was God that spake. The patriarchs conveyed over from hand to hand to posterity, that which they had received. For the Lord left it with them to this intent, that they should so spread it abroad. But the children and children's children, by God secretly informing them, did that which they heard was from heaven, and not from the earth.

The doctrine which Christ taught the fathers without book, in the law committed unto writing: upon the law the prophets grounded their doctrine.

6. But when it pleased God, to raise a more apparent form of a church, he willed to have his word put in writing and noted, that the priests should fetch from thence what they might deliver to the people, and that all the doctrine that shall be taught should be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publishing of the law, when the priests are commanded to teach out of the mouth of the Lord, the meaning is, that they should teach nothing strange or differing from that kind of learning, which the Lord comprehended in the law: and to add and to diminish was unlawful for them. Then followed the prophets, by whom indeed the Lord published new oracles to be added to the law: but yet not so new, but that they came out of the law, and had respect unto it: for, as touching doctrine, they were only expositors of the law, and added nothing unto it, but prophecies of things to come. Those excepted, they uttered nothing else but a pure exposition of the law. Because it pleased the Lord that there should be a plainer and larger doctrine, that weak consciences might be the better satisfied: he commanded that the prophecies also should be put in writing, and accounted part of his word. And hereunto were added the histories which are also the works of the prophets, but made by the enditing of the holy Ghost. I reckon the psalms among the prophecies, because that which we attribute to the prophecies is also common to the psalms. Therefore that whole body compacted of the law, prophecies, psalms and histories, was the word of the Lord to the old people by the rule whereof the priests and teachers even unto Christ's time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawful for them to swerve either to the right hand or to the left: because all their office was inclosed within these bounds, that they should answer the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachy (Mal. iv. 4.) where he biddeth them to be mindful of the law, and to give head to it, even to the preaching of the gospel. For thereby he forbiddeth them all new found doctrines, and granteth them no leave to swerve never so little out of the way which Moses had faithfully shewed them. And this is the reason why David so honourably setteth out the excellency of the law, and rehearseth so many praises of it: that is that the Jews should covet no foreign thing without it, since within it was all perfection inclosed.

Christ manifested in the flesh hath added the last hand to the revelation of truth.

7. But when at last the wisdom of God was openly shewed in the flesh, that same wisdom with full mouth declared unto us all that ever can with man's wit be comprehended, or ought to be thought concerning the heavenly Father. Now therefore, since Christ the sun of righteousness hath shined, we have a perfect brightness of the truth of God, such as the clearness is wont to be at midday, when the light was before but dim. For verily the prophet meant not to speak of any mean thing, when he wrote that God in old time spake diversly and many ways to the fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he began to speak to us by his beloved Son, Heb. i. 1. For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as he did before, speak sometime by one, and sometime by others, nor will add prophecies to prophecies, or revelations to revelations: but that he hath so fulfilled all the parts of teaching in the Son, that they must have this of him for the last and eternal testimony. After which sort all this time of the New Testament wherein Christ hath appeared to us with the preaching of his gospel even to the day of judgment, is expressed by the last hour, the last times, the last days: to the end verily that contented with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ we should learn neither to feign us any new beside it, or received it feigned of others. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogative ordained the Son to be our teacher, commanding him, and not any man to be heard. He did indeed in few words set out his school-mastership unto us, when he said, Hear him, Matth. xvii. 5. but in which there is more weight and force than men commonly think. For it is as much in effect, as if leading us away from all doctrines of men, he should bring us to him only, and command us to look for all the doctrine of salvation at him alone, to hang upon him alone, to cleave to him alone, finally (as the very words do sound) to hearken to the voice of him alone. And truly what ought there now to be either looked for or desired at the hand of man, when the very word of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himself unto us? Yea, but it is meet that the mouths of all men be shut, after that he, in whom the heavenly Father willed to have all the treasures of knowlege and wisdom to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wisdom of God (which is in no part unperfect) and Messias at whose hand the revelation of all things is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothing afterward for others to be spoken, John iv. 25.

The written word, the only rule of sound teaching.

8. Let this therefore be a stedfast principle: that there is to be had no other word of God, whereunto place should be given in the church, than that which is contained first in the law and the prophets, and then in the writings of the apostles: and that there is no other manner of teaching rightly, but according to the prescription and rule of that word. Hereupon also we gather, that there was no other thing granted to the apostles, but that which the prophets had had in old time: that is, that they should expound the old scripture, and shew that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they should not do the same but of the Lord, that is to say, the spirit of Christ going before them, and after a certain manner enditing words unto them. For Christ limited their embassage, with this condition, when he commanded them to go and teach, Matth. xxviii. 20. not such things as they themselves had rashly forged, but all those things that he had commanded them, and nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he saith in another place: but be not ye called masters, for only one is your master, Christ, Matth. xxiii. 8. Then, to imprint this more deeply in their mind, he repeateth it twice in the same place. And because their rudeness was such, that they could not conceive those things that they had heard and learned of the mouth of their master, therefore the spirit of truth is promised them by whom they should be directed to the true understanding of all things. For that same restraining is to be diligently noted, where this office is assigned to the holy Ghost, to put them in mind of all those things that he before taught them by mouth, John xiv. 26. and xvi. 13.

No other ground but the scripture either for men particularly, or for the whole body of the church to build upon.

9. Therefore Peter who was very well taught how much he might lawfully do, leaveth nothing either to himself or others, but to distribute the doctrine delivered of God. Let him that speaketh (saith he) speak as the words of God, 1 Pet. iv. 21. that is to say, not doubtingly, as they are wont to tremble, whose own conscience misgiveth them, but with sure confidence, which becometh the servant of God furnished with assured instructions. What other thing is this, but to forbid all invention of man's mind, from what head soever they have proceeded, that the pure word of God may be heard and learned in the church of the faithful? to take away the ordinances or rather the feigned devices of all men, of what degree soever they be, that the decrees of God only may remain in force? These are those spiritual armours, mighty through God to cast down holds: by which the faithful servants of God may throw down counsels, and all height that advanceth itself against the knowlege of God, and may lead all knowlege captive to obey Christ, 2 Cor. x. 4. Lo this is the sovereign power, wherewith it behoveth the pastors of the church to be endued, by what name soever they be called, that is, that by the word of God they may with confidence be bold to do all things; may compel all the strength, glory, wisedom and height of the world to yield and obey to his majesty: being upholden by his power, may command, all even from the highest to the lowest: may build up the house of Christ and pull down the house of Satan: may feed the sheep and drive away the wolves: may instruct and exhort the willing to learn: may reprove, rebuke and subdue the rebellious and stubborn: may bind and loose: finally my thunder and lighten, if need be: but all things in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I have said, this difference between the apostles and their successors, that the apostles were the certain and authentic secretaries of the holy Ghost, and therefore their writings are to be esteemed for the oracles of God: but the other have no other office, but to teach that which is set forth and written in the holy scriptures. We determine therefore, that this is not now left faithful ministers, that they may coin any new doctrine, but that they ought simply to cleave to the doctrine, whereunto the Lord hath made all men without exception subject. When I say this, my meaning is not only to shew what is lawful, for all particular men, but also what is lawful for the whole universal church. Now as touching all particular men: Paul verily was ordained by the Lord, apostle to the Corinthians: but he denieth that he hath dominion over their faith, 2 Cor. i. 14. Who now dare take a dominion upon himself, which Paul testifieth that it belonged not to him? If he had acknowleged himself to have this this liberty of teaching, that whatsoever the pastor teacheth he may therein of right require to be believed: he would never have taught the Corinthians this discipline, that while two or three prophets speak, the rest shall judge, and if it were revealed to any that sate, the first should hold his peace. For so he spared none, whose authority he made not subject to the judgment of the word of God, 1 Cor. xiv. 19. But, will some man say, of the universal church the case is otherwise. I answer that in another place Paul meeteth with this doubt also, where he saith, that faith is by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, Rom. x. Truly, if faith depend on the word of God only, if it hath respect unto, and resteth upon it alone, what place is there now left to the word of the whole world? For herein no man may doubt that doth well know what faith is. For faith ought to be stayed upon such assuredness, whereby it may stand invincible against Satan, and all the engines of hell, and against the whole world. This assuredness we shall no where find but in the word of God only. Again, it is a general rule which we here ought to have respect unto: that God doth therefore take from men the power to set forth a new doctrine, that he only may be our school-master in heavenly learning, as he only is true who can neither lie nor deceive. This rule belongeth no less to the whole church than to every one of the faithful.

Their tyranny who bind the world to believe whatsoever pleaseth them to teach.

10. But if this power of the church, which we have spoken of, be compared with that power, whereof the spiritual tyrants, that have falsly called themselves bishops and prelates of religion, have in certain ages past boasted themselves among the people of God, the agreement shall be no better than Christ hath with Belial. Yet it is not in this place my purpose to declare in what sort and with how wicked means they have exercised their tyranny: I will but rehearse the doctrine, which at this day they defend, first their writings, and then with sword and fire. Because they take it for a thing confessed, that a general council is the true image of the church, when they have taken this principle, they do without doubt determine, that such councils are immediately governed of the holy Ghost, and that therefore they cannot err. But whereas they themselves do rule the council, yea and make them, they do indeed challenge to themselves whatsoever they affirm to be due to the councils. Therefore they will have our faith to stand and fall at their will that whatsoever they shall determine on the one side, or the other, may be established and certain to our minds: so that if they allow any thing we must allow the same without doubting: if they condemn any thing we must also hold it for condemned. In the mean time after their own lust, and despising the word of God, they coin doctrines, to which afterward they require by this rule to have faith given For they also say, that he is no christian, that doth not certainly consent to all their doctrine as well affirmative as negative: if not with expressed yet with unexpressed faith: because it is in the power of the church to make new articles of the faith.

Promises made to the church abused to bolster up a most unlawful power in the church.

11. First let us hear, by what arguments they prove that this authority is given to the church: and then we shall see how much that maketh for them which they allege of the church. The church (say they) hath notable promises, that it shall never be forsaken of Christ her spouse, but that it shall be guided by his spirit into all truth, Matth. xxviii. 20. But of the promises which they are wont to allege, many are given no less to every one of the faithful particularly, than to the whole church universally. For though the Lord spake to the twelve apostles, when he said: Behold I am with you even to the end of the world: again: I will ask my Father, and he shall give you another comforter, namely the Spirit of truth, John xiv. 19. yet he made the promise not only to the whole number of the twelve, but also every one of them: yea to the other disciples likewise, either those that he had already received, or those that should afterward be added to them. But when they expounded such promises full of singular comfort, as though they were given to none of the christians, but to the whole church together: what do they else, but take away from all christians that confidence which they all ought to receive thereby to encourage them? Yet I do here deny, but that the whole fellowship of the faithful furnished with manifold diversity of gifts, is endued with much larger and more plentiful treasure of the heavenly wisdom, than each one severally: neither is it my meaning, that this is spoken in common to the faithful, as though they were all alike endued with the spirit of understanding and doctrine: but because it is not to be granted to the adversaries of Christ, that they should for the defence of an evil cause wrest the scripture to a wrong sense. But, omitting this, I simply confess that which is true, that the Lord is perpetually present with his, and ruleth them with his spirit.

And

And that this ſpirit is not the ſpirit of error, ignorance, lying or darkneſs: but of ſure revelation, wiſdom, truth, and light, of whom they not deceitfully may learn thoſe things that are given them, that is to ſay, what is the hope of their calling, and what the riches of the glory of the inheritance of God in the ſaints. Eph. i. 18. But whereas the faithful, even they that are endued with more excellent gifts above the reſt, do in this fleſh receive only the firſt fruits and a certain taſte of that ſpirit: there remaineth nothing better to them than knowing their own weakneſs, to hold themſelves carefully within the bounds of the word of God: leaſt, if they wander far after their own ſenſe, they by and by ſtray out of the right way, inſomuch as they are yet void of that ſpirit, by whoſe teaching only truth is diſcerned from falſhood. For all men do confeſs with Paul, Phil. iii. 11. that they have not yet attained to the mark. Therefore they more endeavour to daily profiting, than glory of perfection.

The church not ſo perfect by virtue of any promiſe made unto it but that ſtill it remaineth in this world ſubject as to other infirmities ſo to error.

12. But they will take exception, and ſay that whatſoever is particularly attributed to every one of the ſaints, the ſame do throughly and fully belong to the church it ſelf. Although this hath ſome ſhew of truth, yet I deny it to be true. God doth indeed ſo diſtribute to every one of the members the gift of his ſpirit by meaſure, that the whole body wanteth nothing neceſſary, when the gifts are given in common. But the riches of the church are always ſuch, that there ever wanteth much of that higheſt perfection, which our adverſaries do boaſt of. Yet the church is not therefore ſo left deſtitute in any behalf, but that ſhe always hath ſo much as is enough. For the Lord knoweth what her neceſſity requireth. But, to hold her under humility and godly modeſty, he giveth her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. I know what here alſo they are wont to object, that is, that the church is cleanſed with the waſhing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinkle and ſpot, Eph. v. 25. and that therefore in another place it is called the pillar and ſtay of truth. 1 Tim. iii. 15. But in the firſt of theſe two places is rather taught, what Chriſt daily worketh in it, than what he hath already done. For if he daily ſanctifieth, purgeth poliſheth, wipeth from ſpots all them that are his: truly it is certain that they are yet beſprinkled with ſome ſpots and wrinkles, and that there wanteth ſomewhat of their ſanctification. But how vain and fabulous is it, to judge the church already in every part holy and ſpotleſs, whereof all the members are ſpoty and very unclean? It is true therefore that the church is ſanctified of Chriſt. But only the beginning of that ſanctifying is here ſeen: but the end and full accompliſhment ſhall be, when Chriſt the holieſt of ſaints ſhall truly and fully fill it with his holineſs. It is true alſo that the ſpots and wrinkles of it are wiped away: but ſo that they are daily in wiping away, until Chriſt with his coming do utterly take away all that remaineth. For unleſs we grant this, we muſt of neceſſity affirm with the Pelagians, that the righteouſneſs of the faithful is perfect in this life: and with the Cathary and Donatiſts we muſt ſuffer no infirmity in the church. The other place, as we have elſewhere ſeen, hath a ſenſe utterly differing from that which they pretend. For when Paul hath inſtructed Timothy, and framed him to the true office of a biſhop, he ſaith that he did it to this purpoſe, that he ſhould know how he ought to behave himſelf in the church. And that he ſhould with the greater religiouſneſs and aſſiduity bend himſelf thereunto, he addeth that the church is the very pillar and ſtay of truth. For what elſe do theſe words mean, but that the truth of God is preſerved in the church, namely by the miniſtry of preaching? As in another place he teacheth, that Chriſt gave apoſtles, paſtors, and teachers, Eph. iv. 11. that we ſhould no more be carried about with every wind of doctrine, or be mocked of men: but that being enlightened with the true knowlege of the Son of God, we ſhould altogether meet in unity of faith. Whereas therefore the truth is not extinguiſhed in the world, but remaineth ſafe, that ſame cometh to paſs becauſe it hath the church a faithful keeper of it, by whoſe help and miniſtry it is ſuſtained. But if this keeping ſtandeth in the miniſtry of the prophets and apoſtles, it followeth that it dependeth wholly hereupon, if the word of the Lord be faithfully preſerved and do keep his purity.

The drift of the church of Rome in maintaining that the church cannot err.

13. But that the readers may better underſtand, upon what point this queſtion chiefly ſtandeth, I will in few words declare what our adverſaries require, and wherein we ſtand againſt them. Where they ſay that the church cannot err, it tendeth hereunto, and thus they expound it, that foraſmuch as it is governed by the ſpirit of God, it may go ſafely without the word: that whitherſoever it goeth, it cannot think nor ſpeak any thing, but truth: that therefore if it determine any thing without or beſide Gods word, the ſame is no otherwiſe to be eſteemed than as a certain oracle of God. If we grant that firſt point, that the church cannot err in things neceſſary to ſalvation, this is our meaning, that this is therefore becauſe forſaking all her own wiſdom, ſhe ſuffereth herſelf to be taught of the holy Ghoſt by the word of God. This therefore is the difference. They ſet the authority of the church without the word of God, but we will that it be annexed to the word, and ſuffer it not to be ſevered from it. And what wonder is it, if the ſpouſe and ſcholar of Chriſt be ſubject to her huſband and ſchoolmaſter, that ſhe continually and earneſtly dependeth on his mouth? For this is the order of a well governed houſe, that the wife ſhould obey the authority of the huſband: and this is the rule of a well ordered ſchool, that the teaching of the ſchoolmaſter alone ſhould there be heard. Wherefore let the church not be wiſe of her ſelf, nor think any thing of her ſelf: but determine the end of her wiſdom where he hath made an end of ſpeaking. After this manner ſhe ſhall alſo diſtruſt all the inventions of her own reaſon: but in thoſe things wherein it ſtandeth upon the word of God, ſhe ſhall waver with no diſtruſtfulneſs or doubting, but ſhall reſt with great aſſuredneſs and ſtedfaſt conſtancy. So alſo truſting upon the largeneſs of thoſe promiſes that ſhe hath, ſhe ſhall have whereupon abundantly to ſuſtain her faith: that ſhe may not doubt that the beſt guide of the right way, the holy ſpirit, is always preſent with her: but therewithal ſhe ſhall keep in memory what uſe the Lord would have us to receive of his holy ſpirit. The ſpirit (ſaith he) which I will ſend from my father ſhall lead you into all truth. But how? becauſe (ſaith he) he ſhall put you in mind of all thoſe things that I have told you. John. xvi. 7. and 13. Therefore he giveth warning that there is nothing more to be looked for of his ſpirit, but that he ſhould enlighten our minds to perceive the truth of his doctrine. Therefore Chryſoſtome ſaith excellently well. Many (ſaith he) do boaſt of the holy ſpirit: but they who ſpeak their own do falſly pretend that they have him. As Chriſt teſtified that he ſpake not of himſelf: becauſe he ſpake out of the law and the prophets: ſo if any thing beſide the goſpel be thruſt in under the title of the ſpirit, let us not believe it, becauſe as Chriſt is the fulfilling of the law and the prophets: ſo is the ſpirit, of the goſpel. (Ser. de ſancto & ador. Spiritu. John. xii. 50. and 14. 20.) Theſe are his words. Now it is eaſy to gather how wrongfully our adverſaries [illegible] who boaſt of the holy Ghoſt to no other end [illegible] to ſet forth under his name ſtrange and [illegible] doctrines from the word of God, whereas he will with unſpeakable knot be conjoined with the word of God, and the ſame doth Chriſt profeſs of him when he promiſeth him to his church. So is it truly. What ſobriety the Lord hath once preſcribed to his church, the ſame he will have to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, that ſhe ſhould not add any thing to his word, nor take any thing from it. This is the inviolable decree of God and of the holy Ghoſt, which our adverſaries go about to abrogate, when they feign that the church is ruled of the ſpirit without the word.

In doctrine nothing to be added by the church unto that which the apoſtles have left in writing.

14. Here again they murmur againſt us, and ſay that it behoved that the church ſhould add ſome things to the writings of the apoſtles, or that they themſelves ſhould afterward with lively voice ſupply many things which they had not clearly enough taught, namely ſince Chriſt ſaid unto them. I have many things to be ſaid to you, which you cannot now bear, and that theſe are the ordinances, which without the ſcripture have been received only in uſe and manner. John. xvi. 2. But what ſhameleſneſs is this? I grant the diſciples were yet rude, and in a manner unapt to learn, when the Lord ſaid this unto them. But were they then alſo holden with ſuch dulneſs, when they did put their doctrine in writing, that they afterward needed to ſupply with lively voice that which they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their writings. But if they were already led by the ſpirit of truth into all truth when they did ſet forth their writings: what hindered that they have not therein contained, and left written a perfect knowlege of the doctrine of the goſpel? But go to; let us grant them that which they require. Only let them point out what are thoſe things that behoved to be revealed without writing. If they dare enterpriſe that, I will aſſail them with Auguſtin's words: that is, when the Lord had ſaid nothing of them, which of us dare ſay, theſe they be, or thoſe they be? or if any dare ſay ſo, whereby doth he prove it? (Hom. in John 96.) But why do I ſtrive about a ſuperfluous matter? For a very child doth know, that in the writings of the apoſtles, which theſe men do make in a manner lame and but half perfect, there is the fruit of that revelation which the Lord did then promise them.

The church not authorised to coin new doctrines, because Christ doth number them with heathens that despise the judgment of the church.

15. What? say they, did not Christ put out of controversy whatsoever the church teacheth and decreeth, when he commandeth him to be taken for a heathen man and a publican that dare say against her? Mat. xviii. 17. First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but only the authority of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that who have been admonished or rebuked should not resist her judgment. But omitting this, it is wonderful, that those sophisters have so little shame, that they dare be proud of that place. For what shall they get thereby, but that the consent of the church is never to be despised, which never consenteth but unto the truth of the word of God? The church is to be heard, say they. Who denieth it? forasmuch as it pronounceth nothing but out of the word of the Lord. If they require any more let them know that these words of Christ do not take their part therein. Neither ought I to be thought too much contentious because I stand so earnestly upon this point, that it is not lawful for the church to make any new doctrine, that is, to teach and deliver for an oracle any more than that which the Lord hath revealed by his word. For men of sound judgment do see how great a danger there is, if so great authority be once granted to men. They see also how wide a window is opened to the mockings and cavils of the wicked, if we say that that which men have judged is to be taken for an oracle among christians. Beside that, Christ speaking according to the consideration of his own time, giveth this name to the synagogue, that his disciples should afterward learn to reverence holy assemblies of the church. So should it come to pass that every city and village should have equal authority in coining of doctrines.

Baptizing of infants and the consubstantiality of Christ with God the father, are not warranted by the sole authority of the church, but have their sufficient grounds in scripture.

16. The examples which they use, do nothing help them. They say that the baptising of infants, proceeded not so much from the express commandment of the scripture as from the decree of the church. But it were a very miserable succour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authority of the church for defence of the baptism of infants: but it shall in another place sufficiently appear that it is far otherwise. Likewise whereas they object that that is no where found in the scripture, which was pronounced in the Nicene synod, that the son is consubstantial with the father: therein they do great wrong to the fathers, as though they had rashly condemned Arius, because he would not swear to their words, when he professed all that doctrine which is comprehended in the writings of the prophets, and apostles, this word, I grant, is not in the scripture: but when therein is so oft affirmed, that there is but one God: again, Christ is so oft called the true and eternal God, one with the father: what other thing do the fathers of the Nicene council when they declare that he is of one substance, but simply set out the natural sense of the scripture? But Theodorit reporteth (Histo. Eccle. lib. 1. cap. 5.) that Constantine used this preface in their assembly, in disputations (saith he) of divine matters, there is a prescribed doctrine of the holy Ghost: the books of the gospels and of the apostles, with the oracles of the prophets do fully shew us the meaning of God. Therefore laying away discord, let us take the discussings of questions out of the words of the spirit. There was at that time no man that spake against these holy monitions. No man took exception, that the church might add somewhat of her own: that the spirit revealed not all things to the apostles, or at least uttered them not to those that came after: or any such thing. If it be true which our adversaries would have: first, Constantine did evil, that took from the church her authority: then, whereas none of the bishops at that time rose up to defend it, this was not without breach of their faith? for so they were betrayers of the right of the church. But since Theodorit rehearseth that they willingly embraced that which the emperor said, it is certain that this new doctrine was then utterly unknown.

CHAP.

CHAP IX.

Of councils and of their authority.

A proteſtation concerning the eſtimation of councils.

NOW, although I grant them all things concerning the church: yet they ſhall thereby not much prevail for their inten'. For whatſoever is ſaid of the church, the ſame they by and by give to the councils, foraſmuch as in their opinion thoſe repreſent the church. Yea, where they ſo ſtiffly contend for the power of the church, they do it of no other purpoſe, but to give all that they can get to the biſhop of Rome and his guard. But ere I begin to diſcuſs this queſtion, I muſt needs here make proteſtation of two things beforehand. Firſt, that where I ſhall in this point be ſomewhat rough, it is not becauſe I leſs eſteem the old councils than I ought to do. For I reverence them from my heart, and wiſh them to be had in their due honour with all men. But herein is ſome mean, that is, that there be nothing withdrawn from Chriſt. Now this is the right of Chriſt, to be the head in all councils, and to have no man fellow with him in this dignity. But I ſay that then only he is the head, when he governeth the whole aſſembly with his word and ſpirit. Secondly, whereas I give leſs to councils than the adverſaries require: I do it not for this cauſe that I am afraid of the councils, as though they did make for their ſide, and were againſt ours. For as we are abundantly furniſhed with the word of the Lord to the full proof of our doctrine, and to the overthrow of the whole papiſtry that we need not much to deſire any other thing beſide it: ſo if the matter require, the old councils do for a great part miniſter unto us ſo much as may ſuffice for both.

Chriſt in the midſt of councils, but not except they be gathered in his name.

2. Now let us ſpeak of the thing it ſelf. If it be ſought of the ſcriptures, what is the authority of councils: there is no plainer promiſe than in this ſaying of Chriſt: Where two or three ſhall be gathered together in my name, there I am in the midſt of them. Mat. xviii. 20. But that doth no leſs belong to every particular aſſembly than to a general council. But the doubt of the queſtion ſtandeth not therein: but becauſe there is a condition added, that God will ſo only be in the midſt of the council, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our adverſaries do a thouſand times name councils of biſhops, they ſhall little prevail: neither ſhall they make us to believe that which they affirm, that is, that they are governed of the holy Ghoſt, until they have proved that they are gathered together in the name of Chriſt. For it is as poſſible that wicked and evil biſhops may conſpire againſt Chriſt, as good and honeſt biſhops may come together in his name. For a very clear proof hereof are many decrees that have proceeded from ſuch councils. But this ſhall be ſeen hereafter. Now I do but anſwer in one word that Chriſt promiſeth nothing, but to them that are gathered together in his name. Let us therefore define what that is. I deny that they be gathered together in the name of Chriſt, which caſting away the commandment of God, wherein he forbiddeth any thing to be added to his word, or taken from it, Deut. iv. 2. Rev. xxii. 18. do decree every thing after their own will: who being not contented with the oracles of the ſcripture, that is to ſay the only rule of perfect wiſdom, do imagine ſome new thing of their own head. Surely, ſince Chriſt hath not promiſed that he will be preſent at all councils, but hath adjoined a peculiar mark, whereby to make true and lawful councils different from other: it is meet that we ſhould not neglect this difference. This is the covenant, which in old time God made with the Levitical prieſts, that they ſhould teach out of his mouth. Mal. ii. 7. This he always required of the prophets: this law alſo we ſee to have been laid upon the apoſtles. Whoſo break this covenant, God doth not vouchſafe, to let them have the honour of prieſthood, nor any authority. Let the adverſaries undo me this knot, if they will make my faith bound to the decrees of men beſide the word of God.

Truth may be in the church, although the paſtors of the church be corrupt as in the times of the prophets they were.

3. For whereas they think not that truth remaineth in the church unleſs it be among the paſtors: and that the church itſelf ſtandeth not, unleſs it appear in general councils: that is far from having been always true, if the prophets have left unto us true teſtimonies of their own times. There was in the time of Iſaiah a church at Jeruſalem, which God had not yet forſaken. But of the paſtors he ſaith thus: The watchmen are blind, neither know they any thing. They are all dumb dogs, neither are they able to bark. They ly along and ſleep, and love ſleeping: and the paſtors themſelves know nothing, nor do underſtand: and they do altogether look back unto their own ways. Iſa. lvi. 10. After the ſame manner Hoſeah ſaith: the watchmen of Ephraim with God, the ſnare of the fowler, hatred in the houſe of God. Hoſeah. ix. 8. Where joining them with God by way of mockry, he teacheth that their pretence of the prieſthood is vain. The church alſo endured unto the time of Jeremiah. Let us hear what he ſaith of the paſtors. From the prophet even to the prieſt, every one followeth lying. Jer. vi. 13. Again: the prophets do prophecy a lie in my name, when I have not ſent them nor commanded them. Jer. xiv. 4. And leaſt we ſhould be too long in reciting his words, let thoſe things be read that he hath written in the whole xxiii and xl. Chapters. At that time on the other ſide Ezekiel did no more gently inveigh againſt the ſame men. The conſpiracy (ſaith he) of the prophets in the midſt of her as a roaring lion, and that violently taketh his prey. Her prieſts have broken my law. and have defiled my holy things, and have made no difference between holy and prophane: Ezek. xxii. 25. and the reſt that he adjoineth to the ſame effect. Like complaints are every where in the prophets, ſo that nothing is ofter found in them.

That which was in the firſt may be alſo in the laſt days of the church, and is.

4. But perhaps it might be that it was ſo among the Jews: but our age is free from ſo great an evil. I would to God indeed it were ſo: but the holy Ghoſt hath given warning that it ſhall be far otherwiſe. The words of Peter are plain. As (ſaith he) there were in the old people falſe prophets, ſo ſhall there alſo be among you falſe teachers ſlily bringing in ſects of perdition, 2 Pet. ii. See you not how he ſaith, that there is danger to come, not by men of the common people, but by them that ſhall boaſt themſelves with the title of teachers and paſtors? Moreover how often hath it been foretold by Chriſt and his apoſtles, that there ſhould very great dangers impend over the church by the paſtors? Mat. xxiv. 11. and 24. Yea, Paul plainly ſheweth, that antichriſt ſhall ſit in no other place than in the temple of God. 2 Theſ. ii. 4. Whereby he ſignifieth, that the horrible calamity of which he there ſpeaketh, ſhall come from no where elſe but from them that ſhall ſit inſtead of paſtors in the church. And in another place he ſheweth, that the beginnings of ſo great a miſchief are even already near at hand. For when he ſpeaketh to the biſhop of Epheſus, I know (ſaith he) that after my departure there ſhall enter into you ravening wolves not ſparing the flock. And they ſhall be of your own ſelves, that ſhall ſpeak perverſe things, to lead away diſciples after them. Act. xx. 19. How much corruption might a long courſe of years bring among paſtors, when they could ſo far go out of kind in ſo ſmall a ſpace of time? And, not to fill much paper with rehearſing them by name: we are admoniſhed by the examples in a manner, of all ages, that neither the truth is always nouriſhed in the boſom of the paſtors, nor doth the ſafety of the church depend upon their ſtate. They ought indeed to have been the governors and keepers of the peace and ſafety of the church, for preſervation whereof, they are ordained: but it is one thing for a man to perform that which he ought, and another thing to owe that which he performeth not.

Biſhops in the church of Rome, preſuming upon their titles as if God could not ſtrike them now with amazing dulneſs as well as others in the old world.

5. Yet let no man take theſe our words in ſuch part, as though I would every where and raſhly without any choice diminiſh the authority of paſtors. I do but only admoniſh that even among paſtors themſelves there is a choice to be had, that we ſhould not immediately think them to be paſtors that are ſo called. But the Pope withal his flock of biſhops, upon no other reaſon, but becauſe they are called paſtors, ſhaking away the obedience of the word of God, do tumble and toſs all things after their own luſt: and in the mean time they labour to perſuade, that they cannot be deſtitute of the light of truth, that the ſpirit of God perpetually abideth in them, that the church conſiſteth in them and dieth with them. As though there were now no judgments of the Lord, whereby he may puniſh the world at this day with the ſame kind of puniſhment wherewith ſometimes he took vengeance of the unthankfulneſs of the old people, that is, to ſtrike the paſtors with blindneſs and amazing dulneſs. Zech. xii. 4. Neither do they, moſt fooliſh men underſtand, that they ſing the ſame ſong, which thoſe in old time did ſing that warred againſt the word of God. For the enemies of Jeremiah did thus prepare themſelves againſt the truth: come, and we will imagine gine imaginations againſt Jeremiah: foraſmuch as the law ſhall not periſh from the prieſt, nor counſel from the wiſe man, nor the word from the prophet. Jer. xviii. 18.

The blind prieſts and falſe prophets that were of old being aſſembled in a council together might no doubt have erred, and did.

6. Hereby it is eaſy to anſwer to that other objection concerning general councils. It cannot be denied but that the Jews had a true church in the time of the prophets. But if there had then been a general council gathered together of the prieſts, what manner of a face of the church had there appeared? We hear what God ſaith, not to one or two of them but to the whole order: the prieſts ſhall be aſtonied, and the prophets ſhall be made afraid. Jer. iv. 9. Again, the law ſhall periſh from the prieſt, and counſel from the elders. Ezek. vii. 26. Again, Night ſhal be to you inſtead of a viſion, and darkneſs inſtead of prophecying: and the ſun ſhall fall down upon the prophets and be darkened upon theſe days, &c. Micah. iii. 6. Well: if all ſuch had then been gathered together in one, what ſpirit ſhould have governed in that aſſembly? Of that thing we have a notable example in that counſel which Achab called together. There were preſent four hundred prophets. But becauſe they were come together of no other mind but to flatter the wicked king: therefore Satan was ſent of the Lord to be a lying ſpirit in the mouth of them all. There, by all their voices the truth was condemned. 1 King. xxii. 5. and 22. Micah was condemned for an heretic, ſtriken and caſt in priſon: ſo was done to Jeremiah, ſo to the other prophets.

A counſel of biſhops and Phariſees aſſembled together againſt Chriſt in Jeruſalem.

7. But let one example ſuffice for all, which is more notable than the reſt. In that council which the biſhops and Phariſees gathered at Jeruſalem againſt Chriſt, what can a man ſay that there wanted, in ſo much as pertained to the outward ſhew? For if there had not then been a church at Jeruſalem, Chriſt would never have communicate with their ſacrifices and other ceremonies. There was made a ſolemn ſummoning of them together: the high biſhop ſat as chief: the whole order of prieſts ſat by him: John. xi. 47. yet Chriſt was there condemned, and his doctrine driven away. This doing is a proof that the church was not encloſed in that council. But there is no peril that any ſuch thing ſhould happen to us. Who hath given us aſſurance thereof? For it is not without fault of ſluggiſhneſs, to be too careleſs in ſo great a matter. But where the holy Ghoſt doth with expreſs words prophecy by the mouth of Paul, that there ſhall come a departing 2 Theſ. ii. 3. (which cannot come but that the paſtors muſt be the firſt that ſhall forſake God) why are we herein wilfully blind to our own deſtruction? Wherefore it is in no wiſe to be granted, that the church conſiſteth in the company of paſtors, for whom the Lord hath no where undertaken that they ſhall perpetually be good, but he hath pronounced that they ſhall ſometimes be evil. But when he warneth us of the danger, he doth it to this intent to make us beware.

How far councils are to be received.

8. What then? wilt thou ſay: Shall the councils have no authority in determining? Yes forſooth. For neither do I here argue that all councils are to be condemned, or all their acts to be repelled, or (as the ſaying is) to be defaced with one blot. But (thou wilt ſay to me) thou bringeſt them all into ſubjection, that it may be free for every man to receive or refuſe that which the councils have determined. Not ſo. But ſo oft as the decree of any council is brought forth, I would have it firſt to be diligently weighed, at what time it was holden, for what cauſe it was holden, what manner of men were preſent: and then the very thing that is treated of, to be examined by the rule of the ſcripture: and that in ſuch ſort as the determination of the council may have his force, and be as a forejudged ſentence, and yet not hinder the aforeſaid examination. I would to God all men did keep that moderation which Auguſtine preſcribeth in the third book againſt Maximinus. For when he minded briefly to put to ſilence this heretic contending about the decrees of councils: neither (ſaith he) ought I to object againſt thee the ſynod of Nice, nor thou againſt me the ſynod of Ariminum, as to the intent to conclude one another by forejudged ſentence, neither am I bound by the authority of the one nor thou of the other. By authorities of ſcriptures, not ſuch as are proper to either one, but ſuch as are common to both, let there ſtrive matter with matter, cauſe with cauſe, reaſon with reaſon. So ſhould it come to paſs, that councils ſhould have the majeſty that they ought: but in the mean ſeaſon the ſcripture ſhould be alone in the higher place that there might be nothing that ſhould not be ſubject to the rule thereof. So theſe old ſynods, as of Nice, of Conſtantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chalcedon, and such others, which were holden for confuting of errors, we willingly embrace and reverence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they contain nothing but the pure and natural exposition of scripture, which the holy fathers with spiritual wisdom applied to the subduing of the enemies of religion that then rose up. In some of the latter councils also, we see appearing a true zeal of godliness, and plain tokens of wit, learning, and wisdom. But as things are wont commonly to grow to worse, we may see by the latter councils, how much the church hath now and then degenerate from the pureness of that golden age. And I doubt not but that in these corrupter ages also, councils have had some bishops of the better sort. But in these the same happened which the senators themselves complained to be not well done in making of ordinances the senate of Rome. For while the sentence are numbered, not weighed, it is of necessity that oftentimes the better part is overcome of the greater. Truly they brought forth many wicked sentences. Neither is it here needful to gather the special examples, either because it should be too long, or because others have done it so diligently, that there cannot much be added.

The disagreement between the council of Constantinople and Nice, of Chalcedon and Ephesus.

9. Now, what need I to rehearse, councils disagreeing with councils? And it is no cause that any should murmur against me, and say that of those councils that disagree the one is not lawful. For, how shall we judge that? By this, if I be not deceived, that we shall judge by the scriptures, that the decrees thereof are not agreeable with true doctrine. For this is the only certain law to discern them by. It is now about nine hundred years ago, since the synod of Constantinople gathered together under Leo the emperor, judged that images set up in churches should be overthrown, and broken in pieces. A little afterward, the council of Nice, which Irene the empress assembled in spite of him, decreed that they should be restored. Whether of these two shall we acknowlege for a lawful council? The latter which gave images a place in churches, hath prevailed among the people. But Augustine saith that that cannot be done without most present peril of idolatry. Epiphanius which was before in time, speaketh much more sharply: for he saith that it is wickedness and abomination to have images seen in a church of christians. Would they that so speak, allow that council, if they were alive at this day? But if both the historians tell truth, and the very acts he believed, not only images themselves, but also the worshipping of them was there received. But it is evident that such a decree came from Satan. How say you to this, that in depraving and tearing the scripture, they shew that they made a mocking stock of it? Which thing I have before sufficiently made open. Howsoever it be, we shall no otherwise be able to discern between contrary and disagreeing synods which were many, unless we try them all by that balance of all men and angels, that is, by the word of the Lord. So we embrace the synod of Chalcedon, refusing the second synod of Ephesus, because in this latter one the wickedness of Eutyches was confirmed, which the former condemned. This thing holy men have judged no otherwise but by the scripture: whom we so follow in judging: that the word of God which gave light to them doth also now give light to us. Now let the Romanists go and boast, as they are wont, that the holy Ghost is fastened and bound to their councils.

The great weakness of the fathers assembled in the council of Nice against Arius.

10. Howbeit there is also somewhat which a man may well think to be wanting in those ancient and purer councils: either because they that then were at them, being otherwise learned and wise men, wholly bent to the business then in hand, did not foresee many other things, or for that many things of lighter importance escaped them being busied with weightier and more earnest matters: or for that simply, as being men they might be deceived with unskilfulness: or for that they were sometimes carried headlong with too much affection. Of this last point (which seemeth the hardest of all) there was a plain example in the Nicene synod, the dignity whereof hath by consent of all men, as it was worthy, been received with most high reverence. For when the principle article of our faith was there in danger, Arius the enemy was present in readiness, with whom they must fight hand to hand, and the chief importance lay in the agreement of them that came prepared to fight against the error of Arius, this notwithstanding, they careless of so great dangers, yea, as it were having forgotten gravity, modesty, and all humanity, leaving the battle that they had in hand, as if they had come thither of purpose to do Arius a pleasure, began to wound themselves with inward dissentions, and to turn against themselves the stile that should have been bent against Arius.

Arius. There were heard foul objectings of crimes, there were ſcattered books of accuſations, and there would have been no end made of contentions, until they had with mutual wounds one deſtroyed another, unleſs the emperor Conſtantine had prevented it, which profeſſing that the examining of their life was a matter above his knowlege, and chaſtiſed ſuch intemperance rather with praiſe than with rebuking. How many ways is it credible that the other councils alſo failed, which followed afterward? Neither doth this matter need long proof. For if a man read over the acts of the councils, he ſhall note therein many infirmities: though I ſpeak of nothing more grievous.

The ſynod of Chalcedon charged with ambition and unadviſed raſhneſs: infirmities apparent in holy ſynods leaſt we ſhould too much reſt upon men.

11. And Leo biſhop of Rome ſticketh not to charge with ambition and unadviſed raſhneſs, the ſynod of Chalcedon, which yet he confeſſeth to be ſound in doctrines. He doth indeed not deny that it was a lawful ſynod: but he openly affirmeth, that it might err. Some man peradventure will think me fond, for that I buſy myſelf in ſhewing ſuch errors: foraſmuch as our adverſaries do confeſs, that councils may err in thoſe things that are not neceſſary to ſalvation. But this labour is not yet ſuperfluous. For although becauſe they are compelled, they do indeed confeſs it in word: yet when they thruſt unto us the determination of all councils in every matter whatſoever it be, for an oracle of the holy Ghoſt, they do therein require more than they took at the beginning. In ſo doing what do they affirm, but that conncils cannot err: or if they err, yet it is not lawful for us to ſee the truth, or not to ſooth their errors? And I intend nothing elſe, but that it may thereby be gathered that the holy Ghoſt, ſo governed the godly and holy ſynods, that in the mean rime he ſuffered ſomewhat to happen to them by the nature of men, leaſt we ſhould too much truſt to men. This is a much better ſentence, than that of Gregory Nazianzene that he ever ſaw a good end of any council. For he that affirmeth that all without exception ended ill doth not leave them much authority. It is now nothing needful to make mention ſeverally of provincial councils: foraſmuch as it is eaſy to judge by the general, how much authority they ought to have to make new articles of faith and to receive what kind of doctrine ſoever it pleaſeth them.

Spiritual rulers no further to be followed than themſelves do follow the conduct of their heavenly guide.

12. But our Romaniſts, when they ſee that in defence of their cauſe all help of reaſon doth fail them, do reſort to that extreme and miſerable ſhift: that although the men themſelves be blockiſh in wit and council, and moſt wicked in mind and will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commandeth to obey rulers. Is it ſo? what if I deny that they be rulers that are ſuch? For they ought to take upon themſelves no more than Joſhua had, which was both a prophet of the Lord, and an excellent paſtor, Joſh. ii. 7. But let us hear with what word he is ſet by the Lord into his office. Let not (ſaith he) the volume of this law depart from thy mouth: but thou ſhalt ſtudy upon it days and nights. Thou ſhalt neither bow to the right hand nor to the left: then ſhalt thou direct thy way and underſtand it. They therefore ſhall be to us ſpiritual rulers which ſhall not bow from the law of the Lord, neither to the one ſide or to the other. But if the doctrine of all paſtors whatſoever they be, is to be received without any doubting, to what purpoſe was it that we ſhould ſo oft and ſo earneſtly be admoniſhed not to hearken to the ſpeech of falſe prophets. Hear not (ſaith he by Jeremiah) the words of the prophets that prophecy unto you. For they teach vanity and not out of the mouth of the Lord, Jer. xxiii. 16. Again, Beware of falſe prophets, that come unto you in ſheeps clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves, Matth. vii. 15. And John ſhould in vain exhort us, that we ſhould prove the ſpirits, whether they be of God, 1 John iv. 1. From which judgment the very angels are not exempted, much leſs Satan with all his lies. What is to be ſaid of this ſaying: if the blind lead the blind they ſhall both fall into the ditch? Mat. xv 10. Doth it not ſufficiently declare, that it is of great importance, what manner of prophets are heard, and that not all are raſhly to be heard. Wherefore there is no reaſon that they ſhould make us afraid with their titles, thereby to draw us into partaking of their blindneſs: foraſmuch as we ſee on the other ſide, that the Lord had a ſingular care to fray us away from ſuffering ourſelves to be led with other mens error, under what viſor of name ſoever it lurketh. For if the anſwer of Chriſt be true, then all blind guides, whether they be called fathers of the church, or prelates, or biſhops, can do nothing but draw their partners into the ſame headlong downfal. Wherefore let no names of councils, paſtors, biſhops (which may as well be falſely pretended as truly uſed) hinder us, but that being taught by leſſons both of words and examples, we may examine all ſpirits of all men by the rule of the word of God, that we may prove whether they be of God or no.

The uſe of councils in ſetting down the true ſenſe of ſcripture when controverſies riſe and trouble the church.

13. Foraſmuch as we have proved that there is not given to the church a power to ſet up a new doctrine, now let us ſpeak of the power which they attribute unto it in expounding of ſcripture. Truly we do willingly grant, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better, no ſurer remedy than if a ſynod of true biſhops aſſemble together, where the doctrine in controverſy may be diſcuſſed. For ſuch a determination, whereunto the paſtors of churches ſhall agree in common together, calling upon the ſpirit of Chriſt, ſhall have much greater force, than if every one ſeverally ſhould conceive it at home, and ſo teach it to the people, or if a few private men ſhould make it. Again, when biſhops are gathered in one, they do the more commodiouſly take advice in common, what and in what form they ought to teach, leaſt diverſity ſhould bread offence. Thirdly Paul preſcribeth this order in diſcerning of doctrines: for whereas he giveth to every ſeveral church a power to diſcern, he ſheweth what is the order of doing in weightier cauſes, that is, that the churches ſhould take upon them a common trial of the matter together, 1 Cor. xiv. 29. And ſo doth the very inſtinct of godlineſs inſtruct us, that if any man trouble the church with an unwonted doctrine, and the matter proceed ſo far that there be peril of greater diſſention, the churches ſhould firſt meet together, and examine the queſtion propounded: at laſt, after juſt diſcuſſing had, bring forth a determination taken out of the ſcriptures, ſuch as may both take away doubting out of the people, and ſtop the mouths of the wicked and greedy men, that they may not be ſo hardy to proceed any further: ſo when Arius was riſen, the Nicene ſynod was gathered together, which with the authority thereof both did break the wicked endeavours of the ungodly man, and reſtored peace to the churches which he had vexed, and defended the eternal godhead of Chriſt, againſt his blaſphemous doctrine. When afterward Eunomius and Macedonius ſtirred up new troubles, their madneſs was reſiſted with like remedy by the ſynod of Conſtantinople. In the council at Epheſus the wickedneſs of Neſtorius was baniſhed. Finally this hath been from the beginning the ordinary mean in the church to preſerve unity, ſo oft as Satan began to work any thing. But let us remember, that not in all ages or in all places are found Athanaſies, Baſiles, Cyrilles, and ſuch defenders of true doctrine whom the Lord then raiſed up. But let us think what happened at Epheſus in the ſecond ſynod, where the hereſy of Eutyches prevailed, the man of holy memory Flavianus was baniſhed with certain other godly men, and many ſuch miſchiefs committed: even becauſe Dioſcorus a ſeditious man and of a very naughty nature, was there the chief, and not the ſpirit of the Lord. But there was not the church. I grant. For this I determine utterly that the truth doth not therefor die in the church, although it be oppreſſed of one council: but that the Lord marvellouſly preſerveth it that it my again in due time riſe up, and get the overhand. But I deny that this is perpetual, that this is a true and certain expoſition of ſcripture which hath been received by conſents of a council.

Not every determination of a council to be received as a true and ſound expoſition of the ſcripture, ſome councils having expreſly defined things againſt ſcripture: ſo far off it is that councils ſhould have power to authorize ſcripture.

14. But the Romaniſts ſhoot at another mark, when they teach that the power to expound the ſcripture belongeth to the councils, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abuſe this colour, to call it an expoſition of the ſcripture whatſoever is decreed in the councils. Of purgatory, of the interceſſion of ſaints, of auricular confeſſion, and ſuch others there cannot be found one ſyllable in the ſcriptures. But becauſe all theſe things have been eſtabliſhed by the authority of the church, that is to ſay (to ſpeak truly) received in opinion and uſe, therefore every one of them muſt be taken for an expoſition of ſcripture. And not that only: but if a council decree any thing, though ſcripture cry out againſt it, yet it ſhall bear the name of an expoſition thereof. Chriſt commandeth all to drink of the cup which he reacheth in the ſupper, Matth. xxvi. 26. The council of Conſtance forbade that it ſhould be given to the lay people, but willed that the prieſt only ſhould drink of it. That which ſo directly oppoſeth the inſtitution of Chriſt, they will have to be taken for an expoſition of it. Paul calleth the forbidding of marriage marriage, the doctrine of devils, 1 Tim. iv. 1.: and the holy Ghoſt in another place pronounceth that marriage is in all men holy and honourable, Heb. xiii. 4. Whereas they have afterward forbidden prieſts to marry, they require to have that taken for the true and natural expoſition of the ſcripture, when nothing can be imagined more againſt it. If any dare once open his mouth to the contrary, he ſhall be judged an heretic: becauſe the determination of the church is without appellation: and to doubt of her expoſition, that it is not true, is a hainous offence. Why ſhould I inveigh againſt ſo great ſhameleſneſs? For the very ſhewing of it is an overcoming of it. As for that which they teach of the power to allow the ſcripture, I wittingly paſs it over. For in ſuch ſort to make the oracles of God ſubject to the judgment of men, that they ſhould therefore be of force becauſe they have pleaſed men, is a blaſphemy unworthy to be rehearſed: and I have before touched the ſame matter already. Yet I will aſk them one thing: If the authority of the ſcripture be founded upon the allowance of the church, what council's decree will they allege of that matter? I think they have none. Why then did Arius ſuffer himſelf to be overcome at Nice with teſtimonies brought out of the goſpel of John: for after theſe mens ſaying, it was free for him to have refuſed them, forаſmuch as there had now allowance of a general council gone before. They allege the old roll, which is called the canon, which they ſay to have proceeded from the judgment of the church. But I aſk them again, in what council that canon was ſet forth. Here they muſt needs be dumb. Howbeit I deſire further to know, what manner of canon they think that that was. For I ſee that the ſame was not very certainly agreed among the old writers. And if that which Jerom ſaith ought to be of force, the books of Macabees, Tobia, Eccleſiaſticus and ſuch others ſhall be thruſt among the apochrypha: which thoſe canons do in no wiſe ſuffer to be done.

CHAP. X.

Of the power in making of laws: wherein the pope and his, have uſed a moſt cruel tyranny and butchery upon ſouls.

The tyranny of the church of Rome in charging the conſciences of men with the burden of their laws.

NOW followeth the ſecond part, which they will have to conſiſt in making of laws, out of which ſpring have flowed innumerable traditions of men, even ſo many ſnares to ſtrangle poor ſouls. For they have had no more conſcience, than had the Scribes and Phariſees to lay burdens upon other mens ſhoulders, which they themſelves would not touch with one finger. I have in another place taught how cruel a butchery is that which they command concerning auricular confeſſion. In other laws there appeareth not ſo great violence: but thoſe which ſeem the moſt tolerable of all, do tyrannically oppreſs conſciences. I leave unſpoken how they corrupt the worſhip of God, and do ſpoil God himſelf of his right, who is the only law-maker. This power is now to be treated of, whether the church may bind conſciences with her laws. In which diſcourſe the order of policy is not touched, but this only is intended, that God be rightly worſhipped according to the rule which himſelf hath preſcribed, and that the ſpiritual liberty, which hath regard unto God, may remain ſafe unto us. Uſe hath made that all thoſe decrees be called traditions of men, whatſoever they be that have concerning the worſhipping of God proceeded from men beſide his word. Againſt theſe do we ſtrive, not againſt the holy and profitable ordinances of the church which make for the preſervation either of diſcipline, or honeſty, or peace. But the end of our ſtriving is, that the immeaſurable and barbarous empire may be reſtrained, which they uſurp upon ſouls, that would be counted paſtors of the church, but in very deed are moſt cruel butchers. For they ſay that the laws which they make are ſpiritual, and pertaining to the ſoul, and they affirm them to be neceſſary to eternal life. But ſo (as I have even now touched) the kingdom of Chriſt is invaded, ſo the liberty by him given to the conſciences of the faithful is utterly oppreſſed and thrown down. I ſpeak not now with how great ungodlineſs they ſtabliſh the obſerving of their laws, while out of it they teach men to ſeek both forgiveneſs of ſins, and righteouſneſs and ſalvation, while they ſet in it the whole ſum of religion and godlineſs. This one thing I earneſtly hold, that there ought no neceſſity to be laid upon conſciences in thoſe things wherein they are made free by Chriſt, and unleſs they be made free, as we have before taught, they cannot reſt with God. They muſt acknowlege one only king Chriſt their deliverer, and be governed by one law of liberty, even the holy word of the Goſpel, if they will ſtill keep the grace which they have once obtained in Chriſt: they muſt be holden with no bondage, and bound with no bonds.

The liberty which Chriſt hath given abridged in the church of Rome by many hard and heavy conſtitutions: which notwithſtanding they call ſweet and eaſy burthens.

2. Theſe Solons do indeed feign that their conſtitutions are laws of liberty, a ſweet yoke, a light burden: but who cannot ſee that they are mere lies? They themſelves indeed do feel no heavineſs of their own laws, who caſting away the fear of God, do careleſly and ſtoutly neglect both their own and God's laws. But they that are touched with any care of their ſalvation, are far from thinking themſelves free ſo long as they are intangled with theſe ſnares. We ſee with how great warineſs Paul did deal in this behalf, that he durſt not ſo much as in any one thing lay upon men any ſnare at all, 1 Cor. vii. 2, 5. and that not without cauſe. Truly he foreſaw with how great a wound conſciences would be ſtriken, if they ſhould be charged with a neceſſity of thoſe things whereof the Lord had left them at liberty. On the other ſide the conſtitutions are almoſt innumerable, which theſe men have moſt grievouſly ſtabliſhed with threatning of eternal death, which they moſt ſeverely require as neceſſary to ſalvation. And among thoſe there are many moſt hard to be kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them be laid together) are impoſſible: ſo great is the heap. How then ſhall it be poſſible, that they upon whom ſo great a weight of difficulty lieth, ſhould not be vexed in perplexity with extreme anguiſh and terror? Therefore my purpoſe is here to impute ſuch conſtitutions, as tend to this end, inwardly to bind ſouls before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things neceſſary to ſalvation.

What conſcience is.

3. This queſtion doth therefore incumber the moſt part of men, becauſe they do not ſubtily enough put difference between the outward court (as they call it) and the court of conſcience. Moreover this increaſeth the difficulty, that Paul teacheth that the magiſtrate ought to be obeyed not only for fear of puniſhment, but for conſcience ſake. Rom. xiii. 1. Whereupon followeth, that conſciences are alſo bound with the politic laws. But if it were ſo, then all ſhould fall that we have ſpoken in the laſt chapter, and intend now to ſpeak concerning the ſpiritual government. For the looſing of this knot, firſt it is good to learn what is conſcience. The definition is to be gathered of the proper derivation of the word. For as when men do with mind and underſtanding conceive the knowlege of things, they are thereby ſaid ſcire, to know, whereupon is derived the name of ſcience knowlege: ſo when they have a feeling of God's judgments as a witneſs adjoined with them which doth not ſuffer them to hide their ſins, but that they be brought accuſed to the judgment ſeat of God, that ſame feeling is called conſcience. For it is a certain mean between God and man: becauſe it ſuffereth not man to ſuppreſs that which he knoweth, but purſueth him ſo far till it bring him to guiltineſs. This is it that Paul meaneth when he teacheth that conſcience doth together witneſs with men, when their thoughts do accuſe or acquite them in the judgment of God. Rom. xii. 15. A ſimple knowlege might remain in man as incloſed. Therefore this feeling which preſenteth man to the judgment of God, is as it were a keeper joined to man, to mark and watch all his ſecrets, that nothing ſhould remain buried in darkneſs. Whereupon alſo cometh that old proverb, conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes. For the ſame reaſon alſo Peter hath ſet the examination of a good conſcience, for quietneſs of mind, when we being perſuaded of the grace of Chriſt, do without fear preſent our ſelves to God. 1 Pet iii. 21. And the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews uſeth theſe words, to have no more conſcience of ſin, Heb. x. 2. inſtead of, to be delivered or acquitted, that ſin may no more accuſe us.

How a law is ſaid to bind the conſcience.

4. Therefore as works have reſpect to men, ſo the conſcience is referred to God: ſo that conſcience is nothing elſe but the inward pureneſs of the heart. In which ſenſe Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the law, out of a pure conſcience, and, faith unfeigned, 1 Tim. i. 5. Afterward alſo in the ſame chapter he ſheweth how much it differeth from underſtanding, ſaying that ſome had ſuffered ſhipwreck from the faith, becauſe they had forſaken a good conſcience. For in theſe words he ſignifieth, that it is a lively affection to worſhip God, and a ſincere deſire to live godlily and holily. Sometime indeed it is referred alſo to men, as in Luke, when the ſame Paul teſtifieth, that he exerciſed himſelf that he might walk with a good conſcience toward God and men. Act xxiv. 16. But this was therefore ſaid, becauſe the fruits of a good conſcience do flow and come even to men. But in ſpeaking properly, it hath reſpect to God only, as I have already ſaid. Hereupon cometh that a law is ſaid to bind conſcience, which ſimply bindeth a man, without regard of men, or not having any conſideration of them. As for example. God commanded not only to keep the mind chaſte and pure from all luſts, but alſo forbiddeth all manner of filthineſs of words and outward wantonneſs whatſoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conſcience is ſubject, although there lived not one man in the world. So he that behaveth himſelf intemperately, doth not only ſin in this that he giveth evil example to his brethren, but he hath his conſcience bound with guiltineſs before God. In things that are of themſelves mean, there is another conſideration. For we ought to abſtain from them, if they breed any offence: but the conſcience ſtill being free. So Paul ſpeaketh of fleſh conſecrate to idols. If any (ſaith he) make doubt, touch it not, for conſciences ſake. I ſay for conſcience, not thine own, but the others. 1 Cor. x. 28. A faithful man ſhould ſin, who being firſt warned, ſhould nevertheleſs eat of ſuch fleſh. But howſoever in reſpect of his brother, it be neceſſary for him to abſtain, as it is preſcribed of God, yet he ceaſeth not to keep ſtill the liberty of conſcience. We ſee how this law binding the outward work, leaveth the conſcience unbound.

How men for conſcience ſake are bound to obey the laws of men.

4. Now let us return to the laws of men. If they are made to this end, to charge us with a religion, as though the obſerving of them were of it ſelf neceſſary, then we ſay that that is laid upon conſcience which was not lawful to be laid upon it. For our conſciences have not to do with men, but with God only: whereunto pertaineth that common difference between the earthly court and the court of conſcience. When the whole world was wrapped in a moſt thick miſt of ignorance, yet this ſmall ſparkle of light remained, that they acknowleged a man's conſcience to be above all judgments of men. Howbeit the ſame thing that they did with one word confeſs, they did afterward in deed overthrow: yet it was God's will that there ſhould then alſo remain ſome teſtimony of chriſtian liberty, which might deliver conſciences from the tyranny of men. But that difficulty is not yet diſſolved, which ariſeth out of the words of Paul. For if we muſt obey princes not only for penalties ſake, but alſo for conſcience, it ſeemeth thereupon to follow that princes laws haue alſo dominion over conſcience. If this be true, then the ſame alſo ought to be ſaid of the laws of the church: I anſwer, that firſt here we muſt put a difference between the generalty and ſpecialty. For though all ſpecial laws do not touch the conſcience, yet we are bound by the general commandment of God, which commendeth unto us the authority of magiſtrates. Rom. xiii. 1. And upon this point ſtandeth the diſputation Paul, that magiſtrates are to be honoured becauſe they are ordained of God. In the mean time he teacheth not that thoſe laws that are preſcribed by them, do belong to the inward government of the ſoul: whereas he every where extolleth both the worſhipping of God, and the ſpiritual rule of living righteouſly, above all the ordinances of men whatſoever they be. Another thing alſo is worthy to be noted, (which yet dependeth upon the former) that the laws of men, whether they be made by the magiſtrate or by the church, although they be neceſſary to be kept, (I ſpeak of the good and righteous laws) yet therefore do not by themſelves bind conſcience, becauſe the whole neceſſity of keeping them is referred to the general end, but conſiſteth not in the things commanded. From this ſort do far differ both thoſe that preſcribe a new form of the worſhipping of God, and thoſe that appoint neceſſity in things that are indifferent.

The authority which the popiſh prelacy challengeth in making laws.

5. But ſuch are thoſe that at this day are called eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions in the papacy, which are thruſt in, inſtead of the true and neceſſary worſhipping of God. And as they are innumerable: ſo are there infinite bonds to catch and ſnare ſouls. But although in the declaration of the law we have ſomewhat touched them: yet becauſe this place was fitter to treat fully of them, I will now labour to gather together the whole ſum in the beſt order that I can. And becauſe we have already diſcourſed ſo much as ſeemed to be ſufficient, concerning the tyranny which the false bishops do take upon themselves, in liberty to teach whatsoever they list. I will now omit all that part: And I will here tarry only upon declaring the power, which they say they have, to make laws. Our false bishops therefore do burden consciences with new laws, under this pretence, that they are ordained to the Lord spiritual law-makers, since the government of the church is committed unto them. Therefore they affirm that whatsoever they command and prescribe, ought necessarily to be observed of the christian people: and that he that breaketh it, is guilty of double disobedience, for that he is rebellious both to God and to the church. Certainly, if they were true bishops, I would in this behalf grant to them some authority, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to the well ordering of the policy of the church. Now since they are nothing less than that which they would be accounted, they cannot take any thing to them, be it never so little, but that they shall take too much. But because this hath been elsewhere considered, let us grant them at this present, that whatsoever power true bishops have, the same rightly belongeth to them also: yet I deny that they are therefore appointed law-makers over the faithful, that may of themselves prescribe a rule to live by, or compel to their ordinances the people committed unto them. When I say this, I mean, that it is not lawful for them, to deliver to the church to be observed of necessity, that which they have devised of themselves without the word of God. Forasmuch as that authority both was unknown to the apostles, and so oft taken away from the ministers of the church by the Lord's own mouth: I wonder who have been so bold as to take it upon them, and at this day are so bold as to defend it, contrary the example of the apostles, and against the manifest prohibition of God.

All things needful to the perfect rule of well living contained in the law.

7. As touching that, that pertained to the perfect rule of well living, the Lord hath so contained all that in his law, that he hath left nothing for men that they might add to that sum. And this he did first for this purpose, that because the whole uprightness of living standeth in this point, if all works be governed by his will as by a rule, he should be holden of us the only master and directer of life: then, to declare that he requireth of us nothing more than obedience. For this reason James saith: he that judgeth his brother judgeth the law: he that judgeth the law, is not an observer of the law, but a judge. But there is one only law-maker, that can both save and destroy. Jam. iv. 12. We hear that God doth claim this one thing as proper to himself, to rule us with the government and laws of his word. And the same thing was spoken before of Isaiah, although somewhat more darkly: the Lord is our king, the Lord is our law-maker, the Lord is our judge he shall save us. Isa. xxxiii. 22. Truly in both these places is shewed, that he that hath power over the soul, hath the judgment of life and death. Yea James pronounceth this plainly: Now, no man can take that upon him. Therefore God must be acknowleged to be the only king of souls, to whom alone belongeth the power to save and destroy, as those words of Isaiah express, and to be the king, and judge, and law-maker and Saviour. Therefore Peter, when he admonisheth the pastors of their duty, exhorteth them so to feed the flock not as using a lordship over the clergy, 1 Pet. ix. 2. by which word clergy he signifieth the inheritance of God, that is to say, the faithful people. That if we rightly weigh, that it is not lawful, that that should be transferred to man, which God maketh his own only: we shall understand that so all the power is cut off whatsoever it be, that they challenge, which advance themselves to command any thing in the church without the word of God.

The way to judge what ordinances of men are repugnant to the word of God.

8. Now, forasmuch as the whole cause dependeth thereupon, that if God be the only law-maker, it is not lawful for men to take that honour to themselves: it is meet also therewithal to keep in mind those two reasons which we have spoken, why the Lord claimeth that to himself alone. The first is that his will may be to us a perfect rule of all righteousness and holiness: and that so in the knowing of him may be the perfect knowlege to live well. The other is, that (when the manner is sought how to worship him rightly and well) he only may have authority over our souls, whom we ought to obey, and upon whose back we ought to depend. These two reasons being well marked, it shall be easy to judge, what ordinances of men are contrary to the word of God. Of that sort are all those which are feigned to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the observing whereof consciences are bound, as though they were necessary to be observed.

ved. Let us therefore remember that all laws of men ought to be weighed with this balance, if we will have a ſure trial that may never ſuffer us to err. The firſt of theſe reaſons Paul in the epiſtle to the Coloſſians uſeth in contending againſt the falſe apoſtles that attempted to oppreſs the churches with new burthens. The ſecond reaſon he more uſeth with the Galatians in the like caſe. This therefore he laboureth to prove in the epiſtle to the Coloſſians, that the doctrine concerning the true worſhipping of God is not to be ſought at mens hands: becauſe the Lord hath faithfully, and fully inſtructed us how he ought to be worſhipped. To prove the ſame in the firſt chapter, he ſaith that in the Goſpel is contained all wiſdom, whereby the man of God may be made perfect in Chriſt. Col. i. 8. In the beginning of the ſecond chapter he ſaith, that all the treaſures of wiſdom and underſtanding are hidden in Chriſt. Thereupon he afterward concludeth, let the faithful beware that they be not by vain philoſophy led from the flock of Chriſt, according to the conſtitutions of men. But in the end of the chapter, he doth yet with greater boldneſs condemn all Ethelothreſkias, that is to ſay, all feigned worſhippings, which men deviſe to themſelves, or receive of others, and whatſoever precepts they dare of themſelves give concerning the worſhipping of God. We have therefore, that all thoſe ordinances are wicked, in obſerving whereof the worſhipping of God is feigned to be. As for the places in the Galatians wherewith he earneſtly affirmeth that conſciences, which ought to be ruled of God only, ought not to be intangled with ſnares, they are open enough, ſpecially in the fifth chapter. Therefore let it be ſufficient to have but noted them.

The cauſe why the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions of the Pope as well concerning ceremonies as diſcipline are impugned.

9. But becauſe the whole matter ſhall better be made open by examples, before that we go any further, it is good alſo to apply this doctrine to our own times. We ſay that the conſtitutions which they call eccleſiaſtical, wherewith the Pope and his do burden the church, are pernitious and wicked: our adverſaries defend that they are holy and available to ſalvation. There be two kinds of them: for ſome concern ceremonies and rites, other ſome pertain more to diſcipline. Is there then a juſt cauſe to move us to impugn them both? Truly a juſter than we would. Firſt do not the authors themſelves clearly define, that the very worſhipping of God is contained in them? To what purpoſe do they apply their ceremonies, but that God ſhould be worſhipped by them? And that cometh to paſs not only by the error of the ignorant multitude, but by their allowance that have the place of teaching. I do not touch the groſs abominations, wherewith they have gone about to overthrow all godlineſs. But it ſhould not be imagined among them to be ſo hainous an offence to have failed in any of the leaſt petty traditions, unleſs they did make the worſhipping of God ſubject to their feigned deviſes. What do we then offend, if at this day we cannot bear that which Paul taught to be intolerable, that the lawful order of the worſhipping of God ſhould be reduced to the will of men: ſpecially when they command men to worſhip according to the elements of the world, which Paul teſtifieth to be againſt Chriſt? Col. ii. 20. Again, it is not unknown, with how preciſe neceſſity they bind conſciences to keep whatſoever they command. Here when we cry out to the contrary, we have all one cauſe with Paul, which in no wiſe ſuffereth faithful conſciences to be brought into bondage of men. Gal. v. 1.

A leſs fault in the papacy to tranſgreſs the law of God than to miſs in the keeping of human conſtitutions.

10. Moreover this worſt of all is added, that when religion hath once begun to be defiled with ſuch vain inventions, there ever followeth after that perverſeneſs, another abominable frowardneſs, whereof Chriſt reproached the Phariſees that the commandment of God is made void by the traditions of men. I will not uſe mine own words in fighting againſt our law-makers at theſe days. Let them have the victory, if they can by any means purge themſelves from this accuſation of Chriſt. But how ſhould they excuſe them, when among them it is thought infinitely more hainous, to have omitted auricular confeſſion when time of year cometh about, than to have continued a moſt wicked life a whole year together? to have infected their tongue with a little taſting of fleſh on a Friday, than to have defiled their body with whoredom all the days of the week? to have put their hand to an honeſt work upon a day conſecrate to I wot not what petty ſaints, than to have continually exerciſed their members in moſt wicked offences? for a prieſt to be coupled with one lawful marriage, than to be entangled with a thouſand adulteries? not to have performed a vowed pilgrimage, than to break faith in all promiſes? not to have wasted somewhat upon monstrous and no less superfluous, and unprofitable excessive gorgeousness of temples, than to have failed to help the extreme necessities of the poor? to have passed by an idol without honour, than to have despitefully intreated all kinds of men? not to have mumbled up at certain hours a great number of words without understanding, than never to have conceived a true prayer in their heart? What is it to make void the commandment of God for the traditions of men, if this be not: when commending the keeping of God's comandments, but coldly and as it were lightly by the way, they do no less earnestly and busily exact the obeying of their own, than if they contained in them the whole strength of godliness? when revenging the transgressing of God's law, with light penalties of satisfactions, they punish the very least offence of one of their own decrees with no less pain than with prisonment, banishment, fire or sword? Being not so sharp and hard to entreat against the despisers of God, they persecute the despisers of themselves with unappeasable hatred to the extremity, and do so instruct all those, whose simplicity they hold captive, that they would with more contented mind see the whole law of God overthrown, than one small title (as they call it) in the commandments of the church to be broken. First in this point is grievous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it should be tried by God's judgment) are at liberty, one man despiseth, judgeth and casteth away another. But now as though that were not evil enough, those trifling elements of the world (as Paul calleth them in writing to the Galatians. Gal. iv. 9.) are weighed of more value than the oracles of God. And he that is in a manner acquitted in adultery, is judged in meat: he that hath leave to use a harlot, is forbidden to have a wife. This profit verily is gotten by that transgressing obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men.

Human ordinances though unprofitable in respect of their quality, and for their number burdensome, yet embraced by man because they are most agreeable to his vanity, because they seem introductions to humility, and because they make a shew of restraining fleshly desires.

11. There be also other two not slender faults, which we disallow in the same ordinances. First, because they prescribe for the most part unprofitable, and sometimes also fond observations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinite multitude of them, and being rolled back into a certain Jewishness, they so cleave to shadows, that they cannot attain to Christ. Whereas I call them foolish and unprofitable, I know that that will not seem credible to the wisdom of the flesh, which so well liketh them, that it thinketh the church to be utterly deformed when they are taken away. But this is it, that Paul writeth of, to have a resemblance of wisdom in counterfeit worshipping, in humility, and in this that they think that with their severities they are able to tame their flesh. Col. ii. 23. This is truly a most wholsome admonition, such as ought never to slip away from us. Mens traditions (saith he) do deceive under the shew of wisdom, whence have they this colour? because they are feigned of men therefore the wit of man doth therein own his own, and owning it doth more, gladly embrace it, than any thing were it never so good, that less agreed with his vanity. Again they have hereby another commendation, because they seem to be fit introductions to humility, for that with their yoke they hold the minds of men pressed down to the ground. Last of all, because they seem to tend to this end to restrain the wantonness of the flesh, and to subdue it with rigor of abstinence, therefore they are thought to be wisely devised. But what saith Paul to these things? doth he not shake off those visors: lest the simple should be deceived with false pretences? Because he judged this enough for confutation of them, that he had said that they were the inventions of men, he passeth over all these things without confutation, as though he esteemed them for nothing: yea, because he knew that all feigned worshippings in the church were condemned, and are so much more suspicious to the faithful as they more delight the wit of man: because he knew that the feigned image of outward humility doth so much differ from true humility, as it might easily be discerned: finally because he knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed than an exercise of the body: therefore he willed that the very same things should be to the faithful instead of a confutation of mens traditions, by favour of which they were commended among the ignorant.

Vain men, hypocrites and fools delighted, the wiser sort offended with the toyish

12. So at this day not only the unlearned common people, but every man as he is most puffed up with worldly wisdom, so is he most marvelously delighted with beholding of ceremonies. But hypocrites

hypocrites and fooliſh women think that there be nothing deviſed more glorious nor better. But they who do more deeply ſearch, and more truly weigh according to the rule of godlineſs, of what value ſo many and ſuch ceremonies are, do underſtand firſt that they are trifles, becauſe they have no profit: then, that they are deceits, becauſe they do with vain pomp beguile the eyes of the beholders. I ſpeak of thoſe ceremonies, under which the Romiſh maſters will that there be great myſteries: but we find them by experience to be nothing elſe but merry mockeries. And it is no wonder that the authors of them have fallen ſo far as to mock both themſelves and others with trifling follies: becauſe they partly took their examplar out of the dotages of the Gentiles, and partly after the manner of apes did undiſcreetly counterfeit the old uſages of the law of Moſes, which no more pertained to us, than the ſacrifices of beaſts and ſuch other things. Truly although there were none other argument, yet no man that hath his ſound judgment will look for any goodneſs of a heap ſo ill patched together. And the thing itſelf plainly ſheweth that many ceremonies have no other uſe but to amuſe the people rather than to teach them. So in theſe new found canons, they do rather pervert than preſerve diſcipline, the hypocrites repoſe great importance: but if a man do better look into them he ſhall find that they are nothing elſe but a ſhadowiſh and vaniſhing ſhew of diſcipline.

The number of ceremonies grown intolerable in the church.

13. But now (to come to the other point) who doth not ſee that traditions with heaping one upon another, are overgrown into ſo great a number, that the chriſtian church may in no wiſe bear them. Hereby it is come to paſs, that in ceremonies there appeareth I wot not what Jewiſhneſs, and the other obſervations bring a grievous butchery to chriſtians ſouls. Auguſtine complained (Ad Jan. epiſt. 119.) that in his time, the commandments of God neglected, all things were full of ſo many preſumptions, that he was more grievouſly rebuked that in his Octaves had touched the ground with bare foot, than he that had buried his wit with drukenneſs. He complaineth that the church, which the mercy of God willed to be free, was ſo burdened, that the ſtate of the Jews was much more tolerable. If that holy man had happened to live in our age, with what complaints would he have bewailed the bondage that now is? For both the number is ten times greater, and every ſmall title is a hundred times more rigorouſly looked unto, than at that time. So is wont to be done: when theſe perverſe law-makers have gotten the dominion, they make no end of bidding and forbidding, till they come to extreme peeviſhneſs. Which thing Paul hath alſo very well declared in theſe words: If ye be dead to the world, why are ye holden as though ye were living with traditions, as eat not, taſte not, handle not? Col. ii. 20. For whereas the Greek word apteſthai, ſignifieth both to eat and to touch, doubtleſs in this place it is taken in the firſt of theſe two ſignifications, leaſt there ſhould be a ſuperfluous repetition. Therefore he doth here excellently well deſcribe the proceedings of the falſe apoſtles. They begin at ſuperſtition, ſo that they do not only forbid to eat, but alſo even ſo ſlenderly to chaw: when they have obtained this, they then alſo forbid to taſte. When this is alſo granted them, they reckon it not lawful ſo much as to touch with a finger.

Chriſtianity buried under heaps of ceremonies.

14. This tyranny in the ordinances of men we do at this day worthily blame, by which it is come to paſs that poor conſciences are marvellouſly tormented with innumerable decrees and immeaſurable exacting of keeping of them. Of canons pertaining to diſcipline we have ſpoken in another place. Of the ceremonies what ſhall I ſay, by which it is brought about that Chriſt being half buried, we are returned to Jewiſh figures? Our Lord Chriſt (ſaith Auguſtine, Epi. 118. ad. Januar.) hath bound together the fellowſhip of the new people, with ſacraments very few in number, moſt excellent in ſignification, moſt eaſy in obſerving. How far the multitude and diverſity of uſages wherewith at this day we ſee the church to be intangled, doth differ from this ſimplicity, it cannot be ſufficiently declared. I know with what crafty ſhift ſome ſubtle men do excuſe this perverſneſs. They ſay that among us there are many as rude as they were in the people of Iſrael: that ſuch introduction was ordained for their ſakes, which although the ſtronger may well want, yet they ought not to neglect it, foraſmuch as they ſee it to be profitable for the weak brethren. I anſwer, that we are not ignorant, what we owe to the weakneſs of our brethren: but on the other ſide we take exception and ſay, that this is not the way whereby the weak may be provided for, that they ſhould be overwhelmed with great heaps of ceremonies. The Lord did not in vain put this difference between us and the old people, that his will was to inſtruct them like children with ſigns and figures, but us more ſimply without ſuch outward furniture. As (ſaith Paul, Gal. iv. 2.) a child is ruled of his ſchool-maſter, and kept under cuſtody, according to the capacity of his age: ſo the Jews are kept under the law. But we are like unto full grown men, who being ſet at liberty from tutorſhip and government, have no more need of childiſh introductions. Truly the Lord did foreſee what manner of common people there ſhould be in his church, and how they ſhould be ruled. Yet he did in this manner as we have ſaid, make difference between us and the Jews. Therefore it is a fooliſh way, if we will provide for the ignorant, in raiſing up Jewiſhneſs which is abrogate by Chriſt: Chriſt alſo touched in his own words this difference of the old and new people, when he ſaid to the woman of Samaria, that the time was come, wherein the true worſhippers ſhould worſhip God in ſpirit and in truth. This verily had always been done: but the new worſhippers differed from the old in this point, that under Moſes the ſpiritual worſhipping of God was ſhadowed and in a manner intangled with many ceremonies, which being aboliſhed, he is now more ſimply worſhipped. Therefore they that confound this difference, do overthrow the order inſtitute and eſtabliſhed by Chriſt. Shall there then (wilt thou ſay) no ceremonies be given to the ruder ſort to help their unſkilfulneſs? I ſay not ſo: for I verily think that this kind of help is profitable for them. I do here labour only that ſuch a mean may be uſed, as may brightly ſet out Chriſt and not darken him. Therefore there are given us of God few ceremonies, and thoſe not labourſome, that they ſhould ſhew Chriſt being preſent. The Jews had more given them, that they ſhould be images of him being abſent. Abſent I ſay he was, not in power, but in manner of ſignifying. Therefore, that mean may be kept, it is neceſſary to keep that fewneſs in number, eaſineſs in obſerving, and dignity in ſignifying, which alſo conſiſteth in clearneſs. What need I to ſay that this hath not been done? For the thing itſelf is in all mens eyes.

and

Righteouſneſs ſought in the church of Rome by the obſervation of ceremonial ordinances ſevered from the doctrine that ſhould direct men unto Chriſt, and invented many of them only to make money of.

15. Here I omit with how pernitious opinions mens minds are filled in thinking that they are ſacrifices wherewith oblation is rightly made to God, whereby ſins are cleanſed, whereby righteouſneſs and ſalvation is obtained. They will deny that good things are corrupted with ſuch foreign errors: foraſmuch as in this behalf a man may no leſs offend in the very works alſo commanded of God. But this hath hainouſneſs, that ſo much honour is given to works raſhly feigned by the will of man, that they are thought to be the things deſerving eternal life. For the works commanded of God have reward therefore, becauſe the law-maker himſelf in reſpect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receive not their value of their own worthineſs, or of their own deſerving, but becauſe God ſo much eſteemeth our obedience toward him. I ſpeak here of the perfection of of works which is commanded of God, and is not performed of men. For therefore the very works of the law which we do, have no thank but of the free goodneſs of God, becauſe in them our obedience is weak and lame. But becauſe we do not here diſpute, of what value works are without Chriſt, therefore let us paſs over that queſtion. I come back again to that which properly belongeth to this preſent argument, that whatſoever commendation works have in them, they have it in reſpect of the obedience, which only the Lord doth look upon as he teſtifieth by the prophet, Jer. vii. 22. I gave not commandment of ſacrifices and burnt offrings, but only that ye ſhould with hearing, hear my voice. But of feigned works he ſpeaketh in another place, ſaying, (Iſa. lv. 2. and xxix. 13.) Ye ſpend your ſilver, and not in bread. Again, They worſhip me in vain with the precepts of men, Mat. xv. 9. This therefore they can by no ways excuſe, that they ſuffer the ſilly people to ſeek in thoſe outward trifles the righteouſneſs whereby they may ſtand againſt God and uphold themſelves before the heavenly judgment ſeat. Moreover, is not this a fault worthy to be inveighed againſt, that they ſhew forth ceremonies not underſtood, as it were a ſtage play, or a magical inchantment? For it is certain that all ceremonies are corrupt and hurtful, unleſs men be by them directed to Chriſt. But the ceremonies that are uſed under the papacy, are ſevered from doctrine, that they may the more hold men in ſigns without all ſignification: finally (ſuch a cunning craftſman is the belly) it appeareth that many of them have been invented by covetous ſacrificing prieſts, to be ſnares to catch money. But what beginning ſoever they have, they are all ſo given forth in common for filthy gain, that we muſt needs cut off a great part of them, if we will will bring to pass that there be not a prophane market, and full of sacrilege used in the church.

What human ordinances are, and the inconveniences whereunto they are subject.

16. Although I seem not to teach a continual doctrine concerning the ordinances of men, because this speaking is altogether applied to our own time: yet there is nothing spoken that shall not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superstition creepeth in, that men will worship God with their own feigned devices, whatsoever the laws be that are made to that purpose, they do by and by degenerate to those gross abuses. For the Lord threatneth not this curse to one or two ages, but to all ages of the world, that he will strike them with blindness and amazed dulness, that worship him with the doctrines of men, Isa. xxix. 13. This blinding continually maketh that they fly from no kind of absurdity, which despising so many warnings of God, do wilfully wrap themselves in those deadly snares. But if, setting aside circumstances, you will have simply shewed what are the mens tradition of all ages, which it is meet to be rejected of the church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shall be a sure and a plain definition which we have above set: that all laws without the word of God, are made by men to this end, either to prescribe a manner of worshipping God, or to bind consciences with religion, as though they gave commandment of things necessary to salvation. If to the one or both of these there be adjoined other faults: as, that with the multitude they darken the brightness of the gospel: that they nothing edify, but are rather unprofitable and trifling occupations than true exercises of godliness: that they are laid abroad to filthiness and dishonest gain: that they be too had to be kept: that they are defiled with evil superstitions: these shall be helps that we may the more easily find how much evil is in them.

The defence which the church of Rome maketh for traditions, that a great part of them were delivered by Christ and his apostles, that for the rest the church is authorised to make ordinances, and to injoin men to observe them as the apostles did injoin the Gentiles.

17. I hear what they answer for themselves, that their traditions are not of themselves, but of God. For, they say that the church is governed of the holy Ghost, that it cannot err: and that the authority thereof remaineth with them. When this is obtained, it therewithal followeth, that their traditions are the revelations of the holy Ghost, which cannot be despised but wickedly and with the contempt of God. And that they should not seem to have attempted any thing without great authority, they will have it believed that a great part of their observations came from the apostles: and they affirm that by one example is sufficiently declared what the apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one council, they did by the decree of the council command the Gentiles to abstain from things offered to idols, from blood and things strangled, Acts xv. 20. and 29. We have already in another place declared, how falsly for boasting of themselves, they lyingly usurp the title of the church. So much as concerning this present cause of plucking away visors, and deceitful colours, we truly look upon that which we ought principally to care for, and which chiefly is for our behoof, that is, what manner of church Christ will have, that we may fashion and frame ourselves to the rule thereof: it shall easily be evident unto us, that it is not the church, which passing the bounds of the word of God, doth outrage and run at riot in making of new laws. For doth not that law which was once prescribed to the church, remain eternal? What I command thee, that thou shalt keep that thou mayest do it. Thou shalt not add any thing, nor take any thing from it, Deut. xii. 32. And in another place: Add not to the word of the Lord, nor diminish any thing: lest he peradventure reprove thee, and thou be found a liar, Prov. xxx. 6. Since they cannot deny that this was spoken to the church, what do they else but report the stubbornness of that church, which they boast to have been so bold as after such prohibitions nevertheless to add and mingle of her own with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we should assent to their lies, whereby they burden the church with so great a slander: but let us understand, that the name of the church is falsly pretended, so oft as this lust of mens rashness is spoken of, which cannot hold it self within the prescribed bounds of God, but that it wildly rangeth and runneth out into her own inventions? There is nothing intangled, nothing dark, nothing doubtful in these words, in which the whole church is forbidden to add to the word of God, or take any thing from it, when the worshipping of God, and precepts concerning salvation, are intreated of. But this (say they) was spoken of the law only, after which followed the prophecies and the whole ministration of the gospel. I grant indeed: and I add also, which are rather fulfillings of the law, than additions or diminishings. But if the Lord suffered nothing to be added to, or taken from the ministry of Moses, which was (as I may so term it) dark by reason of many doubtful inwrappings, till by his servants, the prophets, and at length by his beloved Son, he ministred a clearer doctrine: why should we not think it much more severely forbidden us, that we should add nothing to the law, the prophets, the psalms, and the gospel? The Lord is not inconsistent with himself, who hath long ago declared, that he is with nothing so highly offended, as when he is worshipped with the inventions of men. Wherefore came those notable sayings in the prophets, which ought to have continually sounded in our ears, Jer. vii. 22. I spake no words to your fathers, in the day that I brought them out of Egypt, concerning sacrifice and burnt offerings. But this word I commanded them, saying: With hearing hear my voice: and I will be your God and you shall be my people, and you shall walk in all the way that I shall command you. Again, Jer. xi. I have with protesting protested unto your fathers, Hear my voice. And other like sayings: but this is notable above the rest, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Will God have burnt offerings and sacrifices, and not rather that his voice be obeyed? For, obedience is better than sacrifice, and to harken is better than to offer the fat of rams. For, to resist is as the sin of soothsaying: and not to obey is as the wickedness of idolatry. Therefore whatsoever inventions of men are in this behalf defended with the authority of the church, forasmuch as the same cannot be excused from the crime of ungodliness, it is easy to prove that it is falsly imputed to the church.

The apostles no authors of those things for which their names are pretended in the church of Rome.

18. After this sort we freely inveigh against this tyranny of mens traditions, which is proudly thrust in among us, under the title of the church. For neither do we scorn the church (as our adversaries, to bring us in hatred, do unjustly lie upon us) but we give unto her the praise of obedience, than which she knoweth no greater praise. They rather are very sore wrong doers to the church, which make her obstinate against her Lord, while they feign that she hath proceeded further than she lawfully might do by the word of God: though I speak nothing how it is a notable shamelessness joined with as great malice, continually to cry out of the authority of the church, and in the mean time dissemblingly to hide both what is commanded by the Lord, and what obedience she oweth to the commandment of the Lord. But if we have a mind, as it is meet we should have, to agree with the church, this pertaineth rather to the purpose, to have an eye unto, and remember what is commanded by the Lord both to us and the church, that we should with one agreement obey him. For there is no doubt but we shall very well agree with the church, if we do in all things shew ourselves obedient to the Lord. But now to father upon the apostles, the original of the traditions wherewith the church hath been hitherto oppressed, was a point of mere deceit: forasmuch as the doctrine of the apostles serveth wholly to this end, that consciences should not be burdened with new observations, nor the worshipping of God be defiled with our inventions. Moreover, if there be any faithfulness in histories and ancient monuments, the apostles not only never knew, but also never heard of this that they attribute unto them. Neither let them prate, that the most part of their decrees were received in use and in mens behaviours, which never were put in writing: even those things forsooth, which, while Christ was yet living, they could not understand, after his ascending they learned by the revelation of the holy Ghost. Of the exposition of that place we have elsewhere already seen, so much as is sufficient for this present cause: truly they make themselves worthy to be laughed at, while they feign that those great mysteries, which so long time were unknown to the apostles, were partly observations either Jewish or Gentile (of which all the one sort had been long before published among the Jews, and all the other sort among the Gentiles, and partly fooliſh gesturings and vain petty ceremonies, which fooliſh sacrificing priests that can neither skill of swimming nor of letters, use to do very trimly: yea such as children and fools do so aptly counterfeit that it may seem that there are no fitter ministers of such holy mysteries. If there were no histories at all: yet men that have their sound judgment might consider by the thing itself, that so great a heap of ceremonies and observations did not suddenly burst into the church, but by little and little crept in. For when those holier bishops, which were next in time to the apostles, had ordained some things that belonged to order and discipline, afterward there followed men, some after others, not discreet enough, and too curious and greedy, of which the latter that every one was, so he more strived ſtrived with his predeceſſors in fooliſh envious counterfeitings, not to give place in inventing of new things. And becauſe there was peril leſt their devices would ſhortly grow out of uſe, by which they coveted to get praiſe among their poſterity, they were much more rigorous in exact calling upon the keeping of them. This wrongful zeal hath bred us a great part of theſe ceremonies which they ſet out unto us for apoſtolic. And this alſo the hiſtories do teſtify.

The acceſs of ceremonies unto that which the apoſtles themſelves uſed and preſcribed unto others concerning the ſupper of the Lord.

19. Leſt in making a regiſter of them we ſhould be too tedious: we will be content with one example. In the miniſtring of the Lord's ſupper, there was in the apoſtles time great ſimplicity. The next ſucceſſors, to garniſh the dignity of the myſtery, added ſomewhat that was not to be diſallowed. But afterward there came thoſe fooliſh counterfeiters, which with now and then patching of pieces together, have made us this apparel of the prieſts which we ſee in the maſs, thoſe ornaments of the altar, thoſe geſturings, and the whole furniture of unprofitable things. But they object, that this in old time was the perſuaſion, that thoſe things which were with one conſent done in the univerſal church, came from the apoſtles themſelves, whereof they cite Auguſtine for witneſs. But I will bring a ſolution from no other where than out of the words of Auguſtine himſelf, Epiſt. 118. Thoſe things (ſaith he) that are kept in the whole world, we may underſtand to have been ordained either of the apoſtles themſelves, or of the general councils, whoſe authority is moſt healthful in the church: as, that the Lord's paſſion, and reſurrection, and his aſcending into heaven, and the coming of the holy Ghoſt are celebrate with yearly ſolemnity: and whatſoever like thing be found, that is kept of the whole church, which way ſoever it be ſpread abroad. When he reckoneth up ſo few examples, who doth not ſee that he meant to impute to authors worthy of credit and reverence, the obſervations that then were uſed, even none but thoſe ſimple, rare, and ſober ones, with which it was profitable that the order of the church ſhould be kept together? but how far doth this differ from that which the Romiſh maſters would enforce men to grant, that there is no petty ceremony among them that ought not to be judged apoſtolic.

20. That I be not too long, I will bring forth only one example. If any man aſk them, whence they have their holy water: they by and by anſwer, from the apoſtles. As though the hiſtories do not attribute this invention to I wot not what biſhop of Rome, which truly if we had called the apoſtles to council, would never have defiled baptiſm with a ſtrange and unfit ſign. Altho' I do not think it like to be true, that the beginning of that hallowing is ſo old as it is there written. For, that which Auguſtine ſaith, (Epiſt. 118. ad Janu.) that certain churches in his time did ſhun that ſolemn following of Chriſt's example in waſhing of feet, leſt that uſage ſhould ſeem to pertain to baptiſm, ſecretly ſheweth that there was then no kind of waſhing that had any likeneſs with baptiſm. Whatſoever it be, I will not grant that this proceeded from an apoſtolic ſpirit, that baptiſm, when it is with a daily ſign brought into remembrance, ſhould after a certain manner be repeated. And I paſs not upon this, that the ſelf ſame Auguſtine in another place aſcribeth other things alſo to the apoſtles. For ſince he hath nothing but conjectures, judgment ought not upon them to be given of ſo great a matter. Finally, admit that we grant them alſo, that thoſe things which he rehearſeth came from the time of the apoſtles: yet there is great difference between inſtituting ſome exerciſe of godlineſs, which the faithful with a free conſcience may uſe, or if the uſe of it ſhall not be profitable for them, they may forbear it: and making a law that may ſnare conſciences with bondage. But now, from what author ſoever they proceeded, ſince we ſee that they are ſlidden into ſo great abuſe, nothing withſtandeth, but that we may without offence of him aboliſh them: foraſmuch as they were never ſo commended, that they muſt be perpetually immoveable.

The inſtitution of holy water.

21. Neither doth it much help them, that to excuſe their tyranny they pretend the example of the apoſtles. The apoſtles (ſay they) and the elders of the firſt church, made a decree beſide the commandment of Chriſt, wherein they commanded all the Gentiles to abſtain from things offered to idols, from ſtrangled, and from blood. If that was lawful for them, why is it not alſo lawful for their ſucceſſors, to follow the ſame ſo oft as occaſion ſo requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other things and in this thing follow them. For I deny that the apoſtles did there inſtitute or decree any new thing, which is eaſy to be proved by a ſtrong reaſon. For whereas Peter in that council pronounceth that God is tempted, if a yoke be laid upon the necks of the diſciples: he doth himſelf overthrow his own ſentence, if he afterward conſent to have any yoke laid upon them. But there is a yoke laid, if the apoſtles do decree of their own authority that the Gentiles ſhould be forbidden, that they ſhould not touch things offered to idols, blood, and ſtrangled. Indeed there yet remaineth a doubt, for that they do nevertheleſs ſeem to forbid. But this doubt ſhall eaſily be diſſolved, if a man do more nearly conſider the meaning of the decree it ſelf: in the order and effect whereof the chief points is, that to the Gentiles their liberty is to be left, and that they ought not to be troubled, nor accombered about the obſervations of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our ſide. But the exception that immediately followeth, neither is any new law made by the apoſtles, but the divine and eternal commandment of God that charity ought not to be broken, nor doth diminiſh one title of that liberty: but only admoniſh the Gentiles, how they ſhould temper themſelves to their brethren, that they abuſe not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore be the ſecond point, that the Gentiles ſhould uſe a harmleſs liberty, and without offence to the brethren. But yet they preſcribe ſome certain thing: that is, they teach and appoint, ſo far as was expedient for the time, by what things they might run into the offence of their brethren, that they might beware of thoſe things: but they add no new thing of their own to the eternal law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

The church of Rome in her ordinances nothing leſs than a follower of the apoſtles in theirs.

The apoſtles in their conſtitution about the Gentiles, made no new law of their own, but applied to the times a law which God had made before.

22. Like as if the faithful paſtors which govern the churches not yet well reformed, ſhould command all their people, that till the weak with whom they live do grow ſtronger, they ſhould not openly eat fleſh on Friday, or openly labour upon holy days, or any ſuch thing. For although theſe things ſetting ſuperſtition aſide, are by themſelves indifferent: yet when there is added offence of brethren, they cannot be done without a fault. But the times are ſuch, that the faithful cannot ſhew ſuch a ſight to the weak brethren, but that they ſhall ſore wound their conſciences. Who, but a caviller, will ſay that ſo they make a new law, whereas, it is certain that they do only prevent offences, which are expreſly enough forbidden of the Lord: and no more can it be ſaid of the apoſtles, whoſe purpoſe was nothing elſe, but in taking away the matter of offences, to call upon the law of God concerning the avoiding of offence: as if they had ſaid: it is the Lord's commandment that ye offend not a weak brother. Ye cannot eat things offered to images, ſtrangled and blood, but that the weak brethren ſhall be offended. Therefore we command you in the word of the Lord, that ye eat not with offence. And that the apoſtles had reſpect to the ſame thing, Paul himſelf is a very good witneſs, which writeth thus, verily none otherwiſe than according to the meaning of the council: concerning meats that are offered to idols, we know that the idol is nothing. But ſome with conſcience of the idol, do eat it as offered to idols, and their conſcience, foraſmuch as it is weak, is defiled. 1 Cor. viii. 4. See that your liberty be not made an offence to the weak. He that ſhall have well weighed theſe things, ſhall not afterward be deceived with ſuch a falſe colour as they make, that pretend the apoſtles for defence of their tyranny, as though the apoſtles had begun with their decree to break the liberty of the church. But, that they may not be able to eſcape, but be driven even with their own confeſſion to allow this ſolution, let them anſwer me, by what right they were ſo bold to abrogate the ſame decree. Becauſe there was no more peril of thoſe offences and diſſentions: which the apoſtles meant to provide for, and they know that the law was to be weighed by the end thereof. Foraſmuch as therefore this law was made in reſpect of charity, there is nothing preſcribed in it, but ſo much as pertaineth to charity. When they confeſs that the tranſgreſſing of this law is nothing but a breaking of charity, do they not therewithal acknowlege, that it is not a forged addition to the law of God, but a natural and ſimple appliance to the times and manners whereunto it was directed?

The commandment of God ſtrictly to be obſerved in things appertaining to his honour and ſervice.

23. But although ſuch laws are a hundred times unjuſt and injurious unto us, yet they affirm that they muſt be heard without exception: for they ſay that this is not here intended, that we ſhould conſent to errors, but only that being ſubjects we ſhould bear the hard commandments of our governors which it is not our parts to refuſe. But here alſo the Lord very well reſiſteth them with the truth of

of his word, and delivereth us out of ſuch bondage into the liberty, which he hath purchaſed for us with his holy blood, the benefit whereof he hath more than once confirmed with his word. For that it is not here only intended (as they maliciouſly feign) that we ſhould ſuffer ſome grievous oppreſſion in our body, but that our conſciences being ſpoiled of their liberty, that is of the benefit of the blood of Chriſt, ſhould be ſlaviſhly tormented. Howbeit let us paſs over this alſo, as though it made little to the matter. But of how great importance do we think it is, that the Lord's kingdom is taken away from him, which he claimeth to himſelf with ſo great ſeverity? But it is taken away ſo oft as he is worſhipped with the laws of mens inventions, whereas he will be holden for the only law-maker of his own worſhip. And leſt any man ſhould think it to be a matter of nothing, let us hear how much the Lord eſteemeth it? Becauſe (ſaith he) this people hath feared me with the commandment and doctrine of men: behold I will aſtoniſh them with a great and wondrous miracle. For wiſdom ſhall periſh from the wiſe men thereof, and underſtanding ſhall depart from the elders. Iſa. xxix. 13. In another place, They worſhip me in vain, teaching doctrines, the commandments of men. Matth. xv. 9. And truly whereas the children of Iſrael defiled themſelves with many idolatries, the cauſe of all that evil is aſcribed to this unclean mixture, that tranſgreſſing the commandments of God, they have forged new worſhippings. And therefore the holy hiſtory rehearſeth that the new ſtrangers that had been tranſplanted by the king of Babylon to inhabit Samaria, were torn in pieces and conſumed of wild beaſts, becauſe they knew not the judgments or ſtatutes of the God of that land. Although they had nothing offended in the ceremonies, yet God would not have allowed a vain pomp: but in the mean time he ceaſed not to take vengeance of the defiling of his worſhip, for that men did thruſt in devices ſtrange from his word. Whereupon it is afterward ſaid, that they being made afraid with that puniſhment, received the ceremonies preſcribed in the law: but becauſe they did not yet purely worſhip the true God, it is twice repeated that they did fear him and did not fear him. Whereupon we gather, that the part of reverence which is given to him, conſiſteth in this, while in worſhipping him we ſimply follow what he commandeth with mingling none of our inventions. And therefore the godly kings are oftentimes praiſed, becauſe they did according to all the commandments, and declined not to the right hand nor to the left. 2 Kings. xxii. I go yet further: although in ſome feigned worſhipping there do not openly appear ungodlineſs, yet it is ſeverely condemned of the holy Ghoſt, ſo ſoon as men depart from the commandment of God. The altar of Ahaz, the pattern whereof was brought out of Samaria, might have ſeemed to increaſe the garniſhment of the temple, whereas his device was to offer ſacrifices thereupon to God only, which he ſhould do more honourably than upon the firſt and old altar: 2 Kings. xvi. 10. yet we ſee how the Spirit deteſteth that boldneſs, for none other cauſe but for that the inventions of men in the worſhipping of God are unclean corruptions. And how much more clearly the will of God is opened unto us, ſo much the leſs excuſable is our forwardneſs to attempt any thing. And therefore worthily with this circumſtance the crime of Manaſſes is inforced, for that he builded a new altar at Jeruſalem, of which God had pronounced, I will there ſet my name, 2. Kings. xxi. 3. becauſe the authority of God is now as it were of ſet purpoſe refuſed.

The reaſon why God abhorreth ſervices wherewith men deviſe to pleaſe him.

24. Many do marvel why God ſo ſharply threateneth that he will do things to be wondered at to the people of whom he was worſhipped with the commandments of men, and pronounceth that he is worſhipped in vain with the precepts of men. But if they conſidered, what it is in the cauſe of religion, that is to ſay of heavenly wiſdom, to hang upon the only mouth of God, they would therewithal ſee, that it is no ſlender reaſon why God ſo abhorreth ſuch perverſe ſervices, that are done to him according to the luſt of man's wit. For although they that obey ſuch laws for the worſhipping of God, have a certain ſhew of humility in this their obedience, yet they are not humble before God, to whom they preſcribe the ſame laws which they themſelves do keep. This is the reaſon why Paul willeth us ſo diligently to beware, that we be not deceived by the traditions of men, Col. ii. 4. and that which he calleth Ethelthreſkian, that is, will-worſhip invented of men beſide the doctrine of God. This is verily true, both our own wiſdom, and all mens wiſdom muſt be fooliſh unto us, that we may ſuffer him alone to be wise. Which way they keep not which do ſtudy with ſuperſtitious obſervations framed by the will of men to commend themſelves unto him, and do thruſt unto him as it were againſt his will a tranſgreſſing obedience toward him, which is indeed given to men. As it hath been done both in many ages heretofore, and in the time within our own remembrance, and is alſo at this day done in thoſe places where the authority of the creature is more eſteemed than of the creator: where religion (if yet the ſame be worthy to be called religion) is defiled with more and more unſavoury ſuperſtitions, than ever was any heathen wickedneſs. For what could the wit of men breed but all things carnal and fooliſh and ſuch as truly reſemble their authors?

Samuel and Manoah no examples to juſtify the church of Rome in her boldneſs, but rather Gideon to condemn her.

25. Whereas alſo the patrons of ſuperſtitions allege, that Samuel ſacrificed in Ramatha, and though the ſame was done beſide the law, yet it pleaſed God: the ſolution is eaſy, that it was not a certain ſecond altar to ſet againſt the one only altar: but becauſe the place was not yet appointed for the ark of the covenant, he appointed the town where he dwelled for ſacrifices, as the moſt convenient place. Truly the mind of the holy prophet was not to make any innovation in holy things, whereas God had ſo ſtraitly forbidden any thing to be added or diminiſhed. As for the example of Manoah, I ſay that it was an extraordinary and ſingular caſe. He being a private man offered ſacrifice to God and not without the allowance of God: verily becauſe he enterpriſed it not of a raſh motion of his own mind, but by a heavenly inſtinction. But how much the Lord abhorreth thoſe things that men deviſe of themſelves to worſhip him withal, another not inferior to Manoah, Gideon is a notable example, Judg. viii. 27. whoſe ephod turned to deſtruction not only to him and his family, but to the whole people. Finally, every new fond invention, wherewith men covet to worſhip God, is nothing elſe but a defiling of true holineſs.

The miniſterial authority of the Scribes and Phariſees confirmed by Chriſt but not their preſumption to burden men with what they liſted.

26. Why then (ſay they) did Chriſt will that thoſe intolerable burdens ſhould be born, which the Scribes and Phariſees bound upon men? but why in another place did the ſame Chriſt will that men ſhould beware of the leaven of the Phariſees: calling leaven (as Matthew the Evangeliſt expoundeth it) all their own doctrine that they mingled with the pureneſs of the word of God? what would we have more plain, than that we be commanded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? whereby it is made moſt certain unto us, that in the other place alſo the Lord willed not, that the conſciences of his, ſhould be vexed with the Phariſees own traditions. And the very words, if they be not wreſted, ſound of no ſuch thing. For the Lord purpoſing there to inveigh ſharply againſt the manners of the Phariſees, did firſt ſimply inſtruct them that heard him, that although they ſaw nothing in their life meet for them to follow, yet they ſhould not ceaſe to do thoſe things which they taught in words, while they ſat in the chair of Moſes, that is, to declare the law. Therefore he meant nothing elſe but to provide that the common people ſhould not with the evil examples of the teachers be brought to deſpiſe the doctrine. But for as much as many are nothing at all moved with reaſons, but alway require authority, I will allege Auguſtine's words, In Joh. Tract. 46. in which the very ſame thing is ſpoken. The Lord's ſheepfold hath governors, ſome faithful, and ſome hirelings. The governors that are faithful, are true paſtors: but hear ye, that the hirelings alſo are neceſſary: for many in the church following earthly profits, do preach Chriſt, and by them the voice of Chriſt is heard: and the ſheep do follow, not a hireling, but a paſtor by the means of a hireling. Hear ye that hirelings are ſhewed by the Lord himſelf. The ſcribes (ſaith he) and the Phariſees ſit in the chair of Moſes. Do ye thoſe things that they ſay, but do not thoſe things that they do. What other thing ſaid he, but hear the voice of the paſtor by the hirelings? for in ſitting in the chair they teach the law of God: therefore God teacheth by them. But if they will teach their own, hear it not, do it not. This ſaith Auguſtine.

In forbidding mens conſciences to be charged with human traditions, laws whereby the church is ſet in order are not prejudiced.

27. But whereas many unſkilful men, when they hear that conſciences are wickedly bound and God worſhipped in vain with the traditions of men, do at once blot out altogether all laws whereby the order of the church is ſet in frame: therefore it is convenient alſo to meet with their error: verily in this point it is eaſy to be deceived, becauſe at the firſt ſight

it doth not by and by appear what difference is between the one sort and the other. But I will so plainly in few words set out the whole matter, that the likeness may deceive no man. First let us hold this, that if we see in every fellowship of men some policy to be necessary, that may serve to nourish common peace, and to retain concord: if we see that in the doing of things there is alway some orderly form, which is behooveful for public honesty and for very humanity not to be refused, the same ought chiefly to be observed in churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, and without agreement are no churches at all. Therefore if we will have the safety of the church well provided for, we must altogether diligently procure that which Paul commandeth, that all things be done comely and according to order. 1 Cor. xiv. 40. But forasmuch as there is so great diversity in the manners of men, so great variety in minds, so great disagreement in judgments and wits: neither is there any policy stedfast enough, unless it be stablished by certain laws, nor any orderly usage can be observed without a certain appointed form: therefore we are so far off from condemning the laws that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirm that when those be taken away, churches are dissolved from their sinews, and utterly deformed and scattered abroad. For this which Paul requireth, that all things be done decently and in order, cannot be had, unless the order it self and comliness be established, with observations adjoined as with certain bonds. But this only thing is alway to be excepted in those observations, that they be not either believed to be necessary to salvation, and so bind consciences with religion, or be applied to the worshipping of God, and so godliness be reposed in them.

The difference between wicked observations and the lawful constitutions of the church.

28. We have therefore a very good and most faithful mark, which putteth difference between those wicked ordinances, by which we have said that true religion is darkened and consciences subverted, and the lawful observations of the church: if we remember that the lawful observations tend alway to one of these two things or to both together, that in the holy assembly of the faithful all things be done comely and with such dignity as beseemeth: and that the very common fellowship of men should be kept in order as it were by certain bonds of humanity and moderation. For when it is once understood that the law is made for public honesties sake, the superstition is now taken away, into which they fall that measure the worshipping of God by the inventions of men. Again, when it is known that it pertaineth to common use, then that false opinion of bond and necessity is overthrown, which did strike a great terror into consciences, when traditions were thought necessary to salvation. For herein is nothing required but that charity should with common dutiful doing be nourished among us. But it is good yet to define more plainly, what is comprehended under that comeliness which Paul commendeth, and also what under order. The end of comeliness is, partly that when such ceremonies are used as may procure a reverence to holy things, we may by such helps be stirred up to godliness: partly also that the modesty and gravity which ought to be seen in all honest doings may therein principally appear. In order this is the first point, that they which govern may know the rule and law to rule well; and the people who are governed may be accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: then, that the state of the church being well framed, peace and quietness may be provided for.

What things they are that serve for comeliness and order in the church.

29. Therefore we shall not say that comeliness is in that, wherein shall be nothing but vain delectation: such as we see in that player-like apparel, which the Papists use in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing else, but an unprofitable visor of gayness, and excess without fruit. But we shall account that to be comeliness, which shall so be becoming the reverence of holy mysteries, that it be a fit exercise to godliness, or at the least such as shall serve to convenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof: and the same not without fruit, but that it may put the faithful in mind with how great modesty, religiousness and reverence, they ought to handle holy things. Now, that ceremonies may be exercises of godliness, it is necessary that they lead us the straight way to Christ. Likewise we may not say that order consisteth in those trifling pomps that have nothing else than a vanishing splendor: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as may take away all confusion, barbarousness, obstinacy, and all strifes and dissensions. Of the first sort are these examples in Paul: 1 Cor. xi. 21. and 5. that prophane banquetings should not be mingled with the holy supper of the Lord: that women should not come abroad, but covered: and many other which we have in com-common use: as this, that we pray kneeling and bare headed: that we minister the Lord's sacraments not uncleanly, but with some dignity: that in the burying of the dead we use some honest rites: and other things that are of the same sort. Of the other kind are the hours appointed for public prayers, sermons, and celebrations of mysteries: at sermons, quietness and silence, places appointed, singing together of hymns, days prefixed for celebrating of the Lord's supper, that Paul forbiddeth that women should teach in the church, and such like. 1 Cor xiv. 34. But specially those things that concern discipline, as the teaching of the catechism, the censures of the church, excommunication, fastings, and such as may be reckoned in the same number. So all the constitutions of the church, which we receive for holy and wholesome, we may refer to two chief titles: for some pertain to rites, and ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

A rule for church ordinances.

30. But because here is peril, lest on the one side the false bishops should thereby catch a pretence to excuse their wicked and tyrannous laws, and lest on the other side there be some men too fearful, who admonished with the foresaid evils, do leave no place to laws be they never so holy: here it is good to protest, that I allow only those ordinances of men which are both grounded upon the authority of God, and taken out of the scripture, yea and altogether God's own. Let us take for an example the kneeling which is used in time of common prayer. It is demanded, whether it be a tradition of man, which every man may lawfully refuse or neglect, I say that it is of men, that it is also of God. It is of God, in respect that it is a part of that comeliness, the care and keeping whereof is commended unto us by the apostle: 1 Cor. xiv. 40. it is of men, in respect that it specially betokeneth that which had in generality rather been pointed to, than declared. By this one example we may judge, what is to be thought of that whole kind: verily because the Lord hath in his holy oracles both faithfully contained and clearly set forth both the whole sum of true righteousness, and all the parts of the worshipping of his divine majesty, and whatsoever was necessary to salvation: therefore in these things he is alone to be heard as our schoolmaster. But because in outward discipline and ceremonies his will we ought to follow (because he foresaw this to depend upon the state of times, and did not think one was not to prescribe every thing particularly what form to be fit for all ages) herein we must flee to those general rules which he hath given, that thereby all those things should be tried which the necessity of the church shall require to be commanded for order and comeliness. Finally, forasmuch as he hath therefore taught nothing expressly, because these things both are not necessary to salvation, and according to the manners of every nation and age ought diversly to be applied to the edifying of the church: therefore as the profit of the church shall require, it shall be convenient as well to change and abrogate those that are used, as to institute new. I grant indeed, that we ought not rashly, nor oft, nor for light causes to run to innovation. But what may hurt or edify, charity shall best judge: which if we will suffer to be the governess, all shall be safe.

The obedience required unto lawful ordinances of the church.

31. Now it is the duty of christian people, to keep such things as have been ordained according to this rule, with a free conscience and without any superstition, but yet with a godly and easy readiness to obey, not to despise them, not to pass them over with careless negligence: so far is it off, that they ought by pride and obstinacy openly to break them. What manner of liberty of conscience (wilt thou say) may there be in so great observation and wariness? Yea, it shall stand excellently well when we shall consider, that they are not stedfast and perpetual stayed laws, whereunto we are bound, but outward rudiments for the weakness of men: which although we do not all need, yet we do all use them, because we are mutually one bound to another, to nourish charity among us. This we may gather from the examples above rehearsed. What? Doth religion stand in a woman's vail, that it is not lawful to go out of doors with her head uncovered: Is that holy decree of his concerning silence, such as cannot be broken without most hainous offence? Is there any mystery in kneeling, or in burying of a dead carcase, that may not be omitted without sin? No, For if a woman need, for the helping of her neighbour, to make such haste as may not suffer her to cover her head, she offendeth not if she run thither with her head uncovered. And it may sometime befal that it may be no less convenient for her to speak, than at another time to hold her peace. And there is no cause to the contrary, but that he who by reason of disease cannot bow his knees may pray standing. Finally, it is better to burd a dead man speedily ſpeedily in time, than when they lack a winding ſheet, or when there are not men preſent to convey him, or tarry till he rot unburied. But nevertheleſs in theſe things there is ſomewhat which the manner and ordinances of the country, and finally very natural honeſty, and the rule of modeſty appointeth to be done or avoided: wherein if a man ſwerve any thing from them, by unwarineſs, or forgetfulneſs, there is no crime committed: but if upon contempt, ſuch ſtubbornneſs is to be diſallowed. Likewiſe the days themſelves, which they be, and the hours, and how the places be builded, and what pſalms be ſung upon ſuch a day, it maketh no matter. But it is meet that there be both certain days, and appointed hours, and a place fit to receive all, if there be regard had to the preſervation of peace. For how great an occaſion of brawlings ſhould the confuſion of theſe things be, if it were lawful for every man as he liſts, to change thoſe things that belong to common ſtate: foraſmuch as it will never come to paſs that the ſelf ſame thing ſhall pleaſe all men, if things be left as it were in the midſt to the choice of every man? If any man do carp againſt us, and will herein be more wiſe than he ought, let him ſee himſelf by what reaſon he can defend his own preciſeneſs to the Lord. As for us, this ſaying of Paul ought to ſatisfy us, that we have not an uſe to contend, nor the churches of God. 1 Cor. xi. 16.

Cautions touching church ordinances.

32. Moreover it is with great diligence to be endeavoured, that no error creep in, that may corrupt or obſcure this pure uſe. Which ſhall be obtained, if all obſervations, whatſoever they ſhall be, ſhall have a ſhew of manifeſt profit, and if very few be received: but principally if there be adjoined a faithful doctrine of the paſtor, that may ſtop up the way to perverſe opinions. This knowlege maketh that in all theſe things every man may have his own liberty preſerved, and nevertheleſs ſhall willingly charge his own liberty with a certain neceſſity, ſo far as either this comelineſs that we have ſpoken of, or the order of charity ſhall require. Secondly that both we our ſelves ſhould without any ſuperſtition, be buſied in the obſerving of thoſe things, and ſhould not too preciſely require them of others, ſo as we ſhould think the worſhipping of God to be the better for the multitude of ceremonies that one church ſhould not deſpiſe another for the diverſity of diſcipline: laſt of all that ſetting herein no perpetual law to our ſelves, we ſhould refer the whole uſe and end of obſervations to the edification of the church, that when it requireth we may without any offence ſuffer not only ſomewhat to be changed, but all the obſervations that were before in uſe among us, to be altered. For this age is a preſent experience, that certain rites, which otherwiſe are not ungodly nor uncomely, may according to the fit occaſion of the matter, be conveniently abrogate. For (ſuch hath been the blindneſs and ignorance of the former times) churches have heretofore, with ſo corrupt opinion and with ſo ſtiff affection, ſtuck to ceremonies, that they can ſcarcely be ſufficiently purged from monſtrous ſuperſtitions, but that many ceremonies muſt be taken away, which in old time were peradventure ordained not without cauſe, and of themſelves have no notable ungodlineſs in them.

CHAP. XI.

Of the juriſdiction of the church, and the abuſe thereof, ſuch as is ſeen in the Papacy.

The uſe of a policy in the church different from that which is civil: the antiquity of eccleſiaſtical judgments: the difference of authority given to the church in the xviii. of Mat.

NOW remaineth the third part of the power of the church, yea and the chief part in a well ordered ſtate, which we have ſaid to conſiſt in juriſdiction. The whole juriſdiction of the church pertaineth to the diſcipline of manners of which we ſhall treat by and by. Foraſmuch as no city nor town can ſtand without magiſtrate and policy: ſo the church of God (as I have already taught, but now I am compelled to repeat it again) needeth her certain ſpiritual policy: but ſuch as is utterly ſevered from the civil policy, and is ſo far from hindering or miniſhing it, that it rather doth much help and further it. Therefore this power of juriſdiction ſhall in ſum be nothing elſe but an order framed for the preſervation of ſpiritual policy. To this from that which is given in the xvi. of Mat. and the xxi. of John.

end from the beginning were ordained judicial orders in churches, which might uſe examination of manners, correct vices and exerciſe the office of the keys. This order Paul ſpeaketh of in the epiſtle to the Corinthians, when he nameth governments. 1 Cor xii. 21. Again, to the Romans, when he ſaith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulneſs. Rom. xii. 8. For he ſpeaketh not to the magiſtrates, (for at that time there were no chriſtian magiſtrates) but to them that were joined with the paſtors for the ſpiritual government of the church. Alſo in the epiſtle to Timothy, he maketh two ſorts of elders: ſome, that labour in the word: other ſome, that do not uſe the preaching of the word, and yet do rule well. 1 Tim. v. 17. By this latter ſort it is no doubt that he meaneth them that were appointed to look unto manners, and to the whole uſe of the keys. For this power, of which we now ſpeak, dependeth wholly upon the keys which Chriſt gave to the church, in the xviii. chapter of Matthew: where he commandeth, that they ſhould be ſharply admoniſhed in the name of the whole church, that have deſpiſed private admonitions: but if they go forward in their obſtinacy, he teacheth that they ſhould be put out of the fellowſhip of the faithful. But theſe admonitions and corrections cannot be without knowlege of the cauſe: therefore there needeth both ſome judgment and order. Wherefore unleſs we will make void the promiſe of the keys, and take utterly away excommunication, ſolemn admonitions and all ſuch things whatſoever they be: we muſt needs give to the church ſome juriſdiction. Let the readers mark that that place treateth not of the general authority of doctrine as in the xvi. chapter of Matthew, and the xxi. of John: but that the power of the ſynagogue is for the time to come transferred to the flock of Chriſt. Until that day the Jews had their order of governing, which Chriſt ſtabliſheth in his church, and that with great penalty, ſo much as concerneth the pure inſtitution of it. For ſo it behoved, foraſmuch as otherwiſe the judgment of an unnoble and unregarded congregation might be deſpiſed of raſh and proud men. And that it ſhould not encumber the readers, that Chriſt doth in the ſame words expreſs things ſomewhat differing one from the other, it ſhall be profitable to diſſolve this doubt. There are therefore two places, that ſpeak of binding and looſing. The one is in the xvi. chapter of Matthew, where Chriſt, after that he had promiſed that he would give to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven, immediately addeth, that whatſoever he ſhall bind or looſe in earth, ſhall be confirmed in heaven. In which words he meaneth no other thing, than he doth by other words in John, John. xx. 23. when ſending his diſciples to preach, after that he had breathed upon them, he ſaid, whoſe ſins ye forgive, they ſhall be forgiven: and whoſe ye retain they ſhall be retained in heaven. I will bring an expoſition not ſubtile, not enforced, not wreſted: but natural, flowing, and offering it ſelf. This commandment of forgiving and retaining ſins, and that promiſe of binding and looſing made to Peter, ought to be referred to no other thing but to the miniſtry of the word: which when the Lord committed to the apoſtles, he did therewith alſo arm them with this office of binding and looſing. For what is the ſum of the goſpel, but that we all being bond ſervants of ſin and of death, are looſed and made free by the redemption that is in Chriſt Jeſus: and that they who do not receive nor acknowlege Chriſt their deliverer and redeemer, are damned and adjudged to everlaſting bonds? When the Lord delivered this meſſage to his apoſtles, to be carried into all nations, to approve that it was his own, and proceeding from himſelf, he honoured it with this noble teſtimony; and that to the ſingular ſtrengthening both of the apoſtles themſelves, and of all thoſe to whom it ſhould come. It behoved that the apoſtles ſhould have a ſtedfaſt and ſound certainty of their preaching, which they ſhould not only execute with infinite labours, cares, troubles and dangers, but alſo at the laſt ſeal it with their blood. That they might (I ſay) know the ſame not to be vain nor void, but full of power and force: it behoved that in ſo great carefulneſs, in ſo great hardneſs of things, and in ſo great dangers, they ſhould be perſuaded that they did the buſineſs of God: that when all the world withſtood them, and fought againſt them, they ſhould know that God ſtood on their ſide; that having not Chriſt the author of their doctrine preſent by ſight in earth, yet they ſhould underſtand him to be in heaven, to confirm the truth of the doctrine which he had delivered them. It behoved again that it ſhould alſo be moſt certainly proved by teſtimony to the hearers, that the doctrine of the goſpel was not the word of the apoſtles, but of God himſelf: not a voice bred in earth, but come down from heaven. For theſe things, the forgiveneſs of ſins, the promiſe of everlaſting life, the meſſage of ſalvation, cannot be in the power of man. Therefore Chriſt hath teſtified, that in the preaching of the goſpel there is nothing of the apoſtles, but the miniſtry only: that it was he himſelf that ſpake

and promiſed all things by their mouths as by inſtruments: and therefore that the forgiveneſs of ſins which they preached, was the true promiſe of God: and the damnation which they pronounced, was the certain judgment of God. But this teſtifying is given to all ages, and remaineth in force, to certify and aſſure all men, that the word of the goſpel, by what man ſoever it is preached, is the very ſentence of God, publiſhed at the ſovereign judgment ſeat, written in the book of life, ratified, firm and fixed in heaven. Thus we ſee that in thoſe places the power of the keys is nothing but the preaching of the goſpel: and that it is not ſo much a power as a miniſtry, if we have reſpect to men. For Chriſt hath not given this power properly to men, but to his own word, whereof he hath made men miniſters.

The power of binding and looſing by diſcipline committed to the church.

2. The other place which we have ſaid to be concerning the power of binding and looſing, is in the xviii. chapter of Matthew, where Chriſt ſaith: If any brother hear not the church, let him be to thee as a heathen man or publican. Verily I ſay unto you, whatſoever ye bind upon earth, ſhall be bound alſo in heaven: whatſoever ye looſe ſhall be looſed. This place is not altogether like the firſt, but is a little otherwiſe to be underſtood But I do not make them ſo diverſe, that they have not great affinity together. This firſt point is like in both, that either of them is a general ſentence, that in both, there is always all one power of binding and looſing, namely by the word of God, all one commandment, all one promiſe. But herein they differ, that the firſt place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the miniſters of the word do execute: this latter place to the diſcipline of excommunication, which is committed to church. The church bindeth, whom ſhe excommunicateth, not that ſhe throweth him into perpetual ruin and deſperation, but becauſe ſhe condemneth his life and manners, and unleſs he repent, doth already warn him of his damnation. She looſeth whom ſhe receiveth into communion: becauſe ſhe doth make him as it were partaker of the unity which ſhe hath in Chriſt Jeſus. Therefore that no man ſhould obſtinately deſpiſe the judgment of the church, or little regard that he is condemned by the conſenting voices of the faithful: the Lord teſtifyeth that ſuch judgment of the faithful is nothing elſe but a publiſhing of his own ſentence: and that whatſoever they do in earth is confirmed in heaven. For they have the word of God, whereby they may condemn the perverſe: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into grace. And they cannot err, nor diſſent from the judgment of God: becauſe they judge not but after the law of God: which is not an uncertain or earthly opinion, but the holy will of God, and a heavenly oracle. Out of theſe two places, which I think I have both briefly, familiarly, and truly expounded, thoſe furious men without difference as they are carried with their own giddineſs, go about to eſtabliſh ſometimes confeſſion, ſometimes excommunication, ſometimes juriſdiction, ſometimes the power to make laws, ſometimes pardons. But the firſt place they allege the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome: they are ſo well ſkilled to fit their keys to all locks and doors, that a man may ſay they have practiſed ſmiths-craft all their life.

The difference between eccleſiaſtical judgment and civil, and the neceſſity as well for the one as the other to continue.

3. For whereas many think that thoſe things endured but for a time, when the magiſtrates were yet ſtrangers from the profeſſion of our religion: they are deceived in this, that they conſider not, how great difference and what manner of unlikeneſs there is of the eccleſiaſtical and civil power. For the church hath not the power of the ſword to puniſh or reſtrain, no empire to command, no priſon, no other pains which the magiſtrate is wont to lay upon men. Again, it tendeth not to this end, that he that hath ſinned ſhould be puniſhed againſt his will, but ſhould with willing chaſtiſement profeſs his repentance. Therefore there is a far diverſe order becauſe neither doth the church take to it ſelf any thing which properly belongeth to the magiſtrate, nor can the magiſtrate execute that which the church doth. This ſhall be made plainer by an example. Is any man drunk? In a well ordered city, priſon ſhall be his puniſhment. Hath he committed fornication? He ſhall have like or rather greater puniſhment. So ſhall both the laws, and the magiſtrate, and outward judgment be ſatisfied: but it may be that he ſhall give no ſignification of repentance, but rather murmur and grudge againſt it. Shall the church in this caſe do nothing? But ſuch cannot be received to the ſupper, without doing wrong both to Chriſt and his holy inſtitution. And reaſon requireth this, that he which offendeth the church with an evil example, ſhould with ſolemn declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raiſed. The reaſon which they bring that are of a contrary opinion, is too cold: Chriſt ſay they, committed theſe doings to the church, when there was no magiſtrate to execute them. But it happeneth oftentimes that the magiſtrate is more negligent, yea ſometimes peradventure that himſelf is to be chaſtiſed, which happened to the emperor Theodoſius. There may beſide this as much be ſaid of the miniſtry of the word. Now therefore after that ſentence, let paſtors ceaſe to blame manifeſt wicked doings, let them ceaſe to chide, to reprove, to rebuke, for there are Chriſtian magiſtrates, who ought to correct theſe things with the law and with the ſword. But as the magiſtrate ought by puniſhing, and by reſtraining with force, to purge the church of offences; ſo likewiſe the miniſter of the word for his part ought to help the magiſtrate that there may not ſo many offend. So ought their workings to be conjoined that the one may be a help, not a hinderance to the other.

Eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction not aboliſhed by civil.

4. And truly if a man more nearly weigh the words of Chriſt he ſhall eaſily perceive that in theſe places, is deſcribed a ſtayed ſtate, and a perpetual order of the church, not ſuch as endureth but for a time. For it is not meet that we ſhould accuſe them to the magiſtrate, that will not obey our admonitions: which yet ſhould be neceſſary if the magiſtrate ſucceeded into the office of the church. What is this promiſe? Shall we ſay that it is a promiſe of one or a few years? Verily verily I ſay unto you, whatſoever you bind on earth, &c. Moreover Chriſt did here inſtitute no new thing, but followed the cuſtom alway obſerved in the ancient church of his own nation: whereby he ſignifieth that the church cannot want the ſpiritual juriſdiction, which had been from the beginning. And this hath been confirmed by the conſent of all times. For when emperors and magiſtrates began to profeſs Chriſt, the ſpiritual juriſdiction was not by and by aboliſhed: but only ſo ordered, that it ſhould diminiſh nothing of the civil juriſdiction, or be confounded with it. And rightfully. For the magiſtrate, if he be godly, will not exempt himſelf from the common ſubjection of the children of God, whereof it is not the leaſt part to ſubmit himſelf to the church, judging by the word of God: ſo far is it off, that he ought to take away that order of judgment. For what is more honourable (ſaith Ambroſe Epiſt. 32. ad. Valent.) for the emperor, than to be called the ſon of the church? For a good emperor is within the church, not above the church. Therefore they who to honour the magiſtrate do ſpoil the church of her power, do not only with falſe expoſition corrupt the ſentence of Chriſt, but alſo do not ſtenderly condemn ſo many holy biſhops which have been from the time of the apoſtles, that they have by falſe pretence uſurped the honour and office of the magiſtrate.

Spiritual power ſevered from the power of the ſword.

5. But on the other ſide it is good to ſee this, what was in old time the true uſe of the juriſdiction of the church, and how great abuſe is crept in, that we may know what is to be abrogate, and what is to be reſtored of antiquity, if we will overthrow the kingdom of Antichriſt, and ſet up the true kingdom of Chriſt again. Firſt this is the mark to be ſhot at, that offences be prevented, and if any offence be riſen up, that it may be aboliſhed. In the uſe two things are to be conſidered: firſt, that this ſpiritual power be altogether ſevered from the power of the ſword: then, that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawful aſſembly. Both theſe things were obſerved in the purer church. For the holy biſhops did not exerciſe their power with fines, or impriſonments, or other civil puniſhments: but they uſed only the word of the Lord, as they ought to do. For the ſevereſt revenge, and as it were the uttermoſt thunderbolt of the church is excommunication, which is not uſed but in neceſſity. But this requireth neither force nor ſtrong hand, but is content with the power of the word of God. Finally, the juriſdiction of the old church was nothing elſe but a declaration in practice (as I may ſo call it) of that which Paul teacheth concerning the ſpiritual power of paſtors. There is (ſaith he 2 Cor. x. 4.) power given to us, whereby we may throw down ſtrong holds, whereby we may make low all height that lifteth up itſelf againſt the knowlege of God, whereby we may ſubdue all thought, and may lead it captive into the obedience of Chriſt, and we have in readineſs a revenge againſt all diſobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Chriſt: ſo leſt the doctrine ſhould be ſcorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be judged which profeſs themſelves of the houſhold of faith. But that cannot be done, unleſs there be joined wth the miniſtry a power to call them that are to be privately admoniſhed; or to be more ſharply corrected, and alſo a power to exclude them from the communion of the ſupper, which cannot be received without prophaning of ſo great a myſtery. Therefore when in another place he ſaith, that it belongeth not to us to judge ſtrangers, 1 Cor. v. 12. he maketh the children ſubject to the the cenſures of the church, which may chaſtiſe their faults, and he ſecretly ſignifieth that there were then judicial orders in force from which none of the faithful were free.

Spiritual juriſdiction executed by the will not of one but of many in the time of Cyprian and Ambroſe.

6. But ſuch authority (as we have declared) was not in the power of one man, to do every thing according to his own will: but in the power of the aſſembly of the elders, which was the ſame thing in the church that a ſenate is in a city. Cyprian, when he maketh mention by whom it was exerciſed in his time, uſeth to join the whole clergy with the biſhop. But in another place alſo he ſheweth, that the very clergy ſo governed, that in the mean time the people were not excluded from the hearing of matters. For this he writeth: (Epiſt. 14. and 9. lib. 2.) Since the beginning of my biſhopric I have determined to do nothing without the counſel of the clergy and conſent of the people. But this was the common and uſual manner, that the juriſdiction of the church ſhould be exerciſed by a ſenate of elders: of whom (as I have ſaid) there were two ſorts: for ſome were ordained to teaching, and other ſome were only judges in manners. By little and little this inſtitution grew out of kind from the beginning of it: ſo that even in the time of Ambroſe only clerks were judges in eccleſiaſtical judgments. Which thing he himſelf complaineth of in theſe words: (In 5. capite. 1. ad Tim.) The old ſynagogue (ſaith he) and ſince that time the church hath had elders, without whoſe counſel nothing was done; which by what negligence it is grown out of uſe I know not, unleſs peradventure by the ſlothfulneſs or rather the pride of the teachers, while they alone would be thought to be ſomewhat. We ſee how much the holy man is diſpleaſed, that any thing of the better ſtate is decayed, when notwithſtanding they had yet continuing an order that was at the leaſt tolerable. What then would he do if he ſaw thoſe deformed ruins that ſhew almoſt no ſign of the old building? What bewailing would he uſe? Firſt, againſt law, and right, the biſhop hath claimed to himſelf alone, that which was given to the whole church. For it is like as if the council, driving out the ſenate, ſhould take the empire upon himſelf alone. But as he is above the reſt in honour, ſo in the whole aſſembly is more authority than in one man. Therefore it was too wicked a deed, that one man removing the common power to himſelf, hath both opened an entry to tyrannous luſt, and hath taken from the church that which belonged unto her, and hath ſuppreſſed and put away the aſſembly ordained by the ſpirit of Chriſt.

The abuſe of ſpiritual courts.

7. But (as of one evil always groweth another) biſhops diſdaining it as a thing unworthy of their care, have committed it over to others. Hereupon are created officials to ſerve that room: I do not yet ſpeak what kind of men they are, but only this I ſay, that they differ nothing from prophane judges. And yet they ſtill call it a ſpiritual juriſdiction, where men contend about nothing but earthly matters. Although there were no more evil, with what face dare they call a brawling court the judgment of the church? but there are admonitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mock with God. Doth a poor man owe a little money? he is cited: if he appear, he is condemned. When he is condemned, if he do not ſatisfy it, he is admoniſhed: after the ſecond admonition they proceed one ſtep toward excommunication: if he appear not, he is admoniſhed to come and yield himſelf to judgment: if he then make delay, he is admoniſhed, and by and by excommunicate. I beſeech you, what is there any thing like either to the inſtitution of Chriſt, or to the ancient manner, or to an eccleſiaſtical order? But there is alſo correction of vices. But how? Verily they not only ſuffer, but with ſecret allowance do after a certain manner cheriſh and confirm adulteries, wantonneſs, drunkenneſs and ſuch kind of miſchievous doings: and that not only in the common people, but alſo in the clergy themſelves. Of many they call a few before them, either that they ſhould not ſeem ſlothful in winking at them, or that they may milk out ſome money. I ſpeak not of the pillages, robberies, briberies, and ſacrileges that are gathered thereby, I mention not what manner of men are for the moſt part choſen to this office. This is enough and too much, that when the Romaniſts do boaſt that their juriſdiction is ſpiritual, it is eaſy to ſhew that there is nothing more contrary to the order inſtitute by Chriſt, and that it hath no more likeneſs to the ancient cuſtom than darkneſs hath to light.

Spiritual power abuſed, civil uſurped by the Pope.

8. Although we have not ſpoken all things that might be alleged for this purpoſe, and thoſe things that we have ſpoken of, are knit up in few words: yet I truſt that we have ſo ſought it out, that there is now no more cauſe why any man ſhould doubt, that the ſpiritual power whereof the pope with all his kingdom proudly glorieth, is wicked againſt God, and an unjuſt tyranny over his people. Under the name of ſpiritual power I comprehend both boldneſs in framing new doctrines, wherewith they have turned away the ſilly people from the natural pureneſs of the word of God, and the wicked traditions wherewith they have inſnared them, and alſo the falſe eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction which they execute by ſuffrages and officials. For if we grant unto Chriſt a kingdom among us, it is not poſſible but that all this kind of dominion muſt immediately be overthrown and and fall down. As for the power of the ſword which they alſo give to themſelves, becauſe it is not exerciſed upon conſciences, it pertaineth not to our preſent purpoſe to treat of it. In which behalf yet it is alſo to note, that they be alway like themſelves, verily nothing leſs than that which they would be taken for, that is to ſay, paſtors of the church. Neither do I blame the peculiar faults of men, but the common wickedneſs of the whole order, yea the very peſtilence of the order: foraſmuch as it is thought that the ſame ſhould be maimed, unleſs it be glorioufly ſet forth with wealth and proud titles. If we require the authority of Chriſt concerning this matter, it is no doubt but that his mind was to debar the miniſters of his word from civil dominion and earthly government, when he ſaid, The kings of the Gentiles bear rule over them: but you ſhall not do ſo. Matth. xx. 25. Luke xxii. 25. For he ſignifieth not only that the office of a paſtor is diſtinct from the office of a prince, but that they are things ſo ſevered, that they cannot meet together in one man. For whereas Moſes did bear both the offices together: firſt that was done by rare miracle: again, it was but for a time till things were better ſet in order. But when a certain form was once preſcribed of God, the civil government was left unto him, and he was commanded to reſign the prieſthood to his brother. Exod. xviii. 16. And worthily: for it is above nature, that one man ſhould ſuffice to bear both burdens. And this hath in all ages been diligently obſerved in the church. And there was never any of the biſhops, ſo long as the true form of the church endured, that once thought of uſurping the power of the ſword: ſo that this was a common proverb in the time of Ambroſe, that emperors rather coveted the prieſthood, than prieſts the empire. Hom. de Baſilic. traden. For this which he afterward ſaith, was imprinted in the minds of all men, that palaces pertained to the emperor, and churches to the prieſts.

Neither honourable for the church, nor, if performance of duty be reſpected, profitable for Romiſh prelates to be both biſhops and kings.

9. But ſince that a way hath been deviſed, whereby biſhops might hold the title, honour and riches of their office without burden or care: leſt they ſhould be left altogether idle, the power of the ſword was given them, or rather they did by uſurpation take it upon themſelves. By what colour will they defend this ſhameleſneſs? Was this the duty of biſhops to wrap themſelves with judicial hearing of cauſes, with the governments of cities and provinces, and through large circuits to meddle in buſineſs ſo unpertaining to them: who have ſo much work and buſineſs in their own office, that if they were wholly and continually occupied in it, and were withdrawn with no callings away from it, yet they were ſcarcely able to manage it? But (ſuch is their frowardneſs) they ſtick not to boaſt, that by this means the church doth flouriſh according to her worthineſs, and that they themſelves in the mean time are not too much drawn away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the firſt point: if this be a comely ornament of the holy office, that they be advanced to ſuch height, that the higheſt monarchs may ſtand in fear of them: then they have cauſe to quarrel with Chriſt, which hath in ſuch ſort grievouſly pinched their honour. For, at leaſt in their opinion what could have been ſpoken more diſhonourably than thoſe words: the kings of the Gentiles and princes bear rule over them, but you ſhall not do ſo? Matth. xx. 25. Luke xxii. 25. And yet he laid no harder law upon his ſervants than he firſt laid and received upon himſelf. Who (ſaith he) hath made me a judge or divider among you? Luke xii. 14. We ſee that he plainly putteth away from himſelf the office of judging, which he would not do if it were a thing agreeing with his office: will not the ſervants ſuffer themſelves to be brought into that order, whereunto the Lord hath yielded himſelf ſubject? As for the other point, I would to God they could prove it ſo in experience as it is eaſy to ſpeak it. But foraſmuch as the apoſtles thought it not good, to leave the word of God and miniſter at tables: Acts vi. 2. thereby, becauſe they will not be taught, they are convinced, that it is not all one man's work to be both a good biſhop and a good prince. For if they (who according to the largeneſs of the gifts wherewith they were endued, were able to ſatisfy more and greater cares than any men that have been born ſince them) have yet confeſſed that they cannot at once apply the miniſtry both of the word and of tables, but that they ſhould faint under the burden: how could theſe that are men of no valour in compariſon of the apoſtles a hundred fold excel the induſtry of the apoſtles? Truly, to attempt it was a point of moſt ſhameleſs and too preſumptuous boldneſs: yet we ſee that it hath been attempted: but with what ſucceſs, it is evident. For it could not otherwiſe come to paſs, but that forſaking their own office they ſhould remove into other men's charge.

The ſteps and occaſions whereby Romiſh biſhops have riſen unto more than convenient power

10. And it is no doubt but that of ſmall beginning they have by little and little grown to ſo great increaſes. For it was not poſſible that they ſhould at the firſt ſtep climb up ſo high. But ſometimes with ſubtilty and crooked crafty means they privily advanced themſelves, ſo as no man could foreſee that it would come to paſs till it was done: ſometimes when occaſion ſerved they did by terror and threatenings wring from princes ſome augmentation of their power: ſometimes when they ſaw princes not hard laced to give, they abuſed their fooliſh and unadviſed gentleneſs. In old time if any controverſy happened, the godly to eſcape the neceſſity of going to law, committed the arbitrement to the biſhop, becauſe they doubted not his uprightneſs. With ſuch arbitrements the old biſhops were oftentimes encumbered, which indeed greatly diſpleaſed them (as Auguſtine in one place teſtifieth) but leſt the parties ſhould run to contentious lawing, they did though againſt their wills take that encumbrance upon them. Theſe men have of voluntary arbitrements, which were altogether differing from the noiſe of judicial courts, made an ordinary juriſdiction. In a little while after, when cities and countries were troubled with divers hard diſtreſſes, they reſorted to the protection of biſhops, to be ſafe guarded by their faithful ſuccour: the biſhops by marvellous ſubtlety, of protectors made themſelves lords. Yea, and it cannot be denied that they have gotten the poſſeſſion of a great part by violent ſeditious partakings. As for the princes, that willingly gave juriſdiction to biſhops, they were by divers affections moved thereunto. But admitting that their gentleneſs had ſome ſhew of godlineſs: yet with this their wrongful liberality, they did not very well provide for the profit of the church, whoſe ancient and true diſcipline they have ſo corrupted, yea (to ſay truth) have utterly aboliſhed. But thoſe biſhops that have abuſed ſuch goodneſs of princes to their own intereſt, have by ſhewing of this one example, enough and too much teſtified that they are not biſhops. For if they had had any ſparkle of an apoſtolic ſpirit, they would without doubt have anſwered out of the mouth of Paul, the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but ſpiritual. But they being raviſhed with blind greedineſs, have deſtroyed both themſelves, their ſucceſſors, and the church.

The ſhifts which the biſhops of Rome uſeth to hold the power which by robbery he hath gotten.

11. At length the biſhop of Rome not contented with mean lordſhips, firſt laid hand upon kingdoms, and afterward upon the very empire. And that he may with ſome colour whatſoever it be, retain the poſſeſſion gotten by mere robbery, he ſometimes boaſteth that he hath it by the law of God, he ſometimes pretendeth the gift of Conſtantine, ſometimes ſome other title. Firſt I anſwer with Bernard. (Liber de Conſid. 25. Admit that he do by any other reaſon whatſoever, claim this unto him, yet he hath it not by apoſtolic right. For Peter could not give that which he had not: but he gave to his ſucceſſors that which he had, the care of churches. But when the Lord and maſter ſaith, that he is not appointed judge between two, a ſervant and ſcholar ought not to think ſcorn if he be not judge of all men. But Bernard ſpeaketh of civil judgments. For he addeth: Therefore your power is in crimes, not in poſſeſſions: becauſe for thoſe and not for theſe ye have received the keys of the kingdom of heaven. For which ſeemeth to thee the greater dignity, to forgive ſins, or to divide lands? There is no compariſon. Theſe baſe and earthly things have kings and princes of the earth their judges. Why do ye invade the bounds of others? &c. Again, Thou art made a ſuperior: (he ſpeaketh of Pope Eugenius) but whereunto? Not to bear lordſhip, I think. Therefore how much ſoever we think of our ſelves, let us remember that there is a miniſtry laid upon us, not a lordſhip given us. Learn that thou haſt need of a weed-hook, not of a ſcepter, that thou mayeſt do the work of a prophet. Again, it is plain, lordſhip is forbidden to the apoſtles. Go thou therefore, and preſume to uſurp to thyſelf either being a Lord, an apoſtleſhip: or be-being an apoſtle, a lordſhip,. And by and by after: the form of an apoſtleſhip is this, lordſhip is forbidden them, miniſtry is bidden them. Whereas theſe things are ſo ſpoken by that man, that it is evident to all men that the very truth it ſelf ſpeaketh to them, yea whereas the very thing it ſelf is manifeſt without all words: yet the biſhop of Rome was not aſhamed in the council at Orleance to decree that the ſupreme power of both the ſwords belong to him in the law of God. (Concil. Arelatenſe.)

The figment of Conſtantine's donation.

12. As for the gift of Conſtantine, they that are but meanly practiſed in the hiſtories of thoſe times need not to be taught how much this not only fabulous, but alſo to be laughed at. But to paſs over hiſtories, Gregory himſelf is both a ſufficient and moſt full witneſs hereof. For ſo oft as he ſpeaketh of the emperor, he calleth him moſt noble lord, and himſelf his unworthy ſervant. (Epiſt. 5. lib 2. Epiſt. 20. lib. 3. Epiſt. 61. lib. 2. Epiſt. 31. lib. 4.) Again, in another place: (Epiſt. 34. lib. 4.) But let not our lord by the earthly power be the ſooner angry with the prieſts: but with excellent conſideration, for his ſake whoſe ſervants they be, let him ſo rule over them, that he alſo give them due reverence. We ſee how in common ſubjection he would be accounted as one of the people. For he there pleadeth not any other man's cauſe but his own. In another place, I truſt in the almighty God, that he will give a long life to our godly lords, and will diſpoſe us under your hand according to his mercy. Neither have I therefore alledged theſe things, for that it is my purpoſe throughly to diſcuſs this queſtion concerning the gift of Conſtantine: but only that the readers ſhould ſee by the way how childiſhly the Romaniſts do lie, when they go about to challenge an earthly empire to their biſhop. And ſo much the more abominable, is the ſhameleſneſs of Auguſtine Steuchus, who in ſuch a deſperate cauſe hath been ſo bold to ſell his labour and tongue to the biſhop of Rome. Valla (as it was not hard for a man learned and of a ſharp wit) had ſtrongly confuted that fable. And yet (as a man little exerciſed in eccleſiaſtical matters) he had not ſaid all that might have made for that purpoſe. Steuchus burſt in, and ſcattered ſtinking triſles to ſuppreſs the clear light. And truly he doth no leſs coldly handle the cauſe of his maſter, than if ſome merry conceited fellow feigning himſelf to do the ſame, would indeed take Valla's part. But verily it is a worthy cauſe, for which the Pope ſhould hire ſuch patrons for money: and no leſs worthy are thoſe hired cheats to be deceived of their hope of gain, as it happened to Eugubinus.

The time when the Pope began firſt to overtop the emperor.

13. But if any man require to know the time, ſince his feigned empire began to riſe up, there are not yet paſſed five hundred years, ſince the biſhops yet remained in ſubjection to the princes, neither was the pope created without authority of the emperor. Henry the fourth of that name, a light and raſh man, and of no forecaſt, of great boldneſs and diſſolute life, gave firſt occaſion to Gregory the ſeventh to alter this order. For when he had in his court the biſhoprics of all Germany partly to be ſold, and partly laid open for ſpoil: Hildebrand, who had received diſpleaſure at his hand, caught hold of a ſpecious pretext to purſue an honeſt and godly cauſe, he was furthered with the favour of many. And Henry was otherwiſe, by reaſon of his inſolent manner of governing, hated of the moſt part of princes. At the length Hildebrand, who called himſelf Gregory the ſeventh, as he was a filthy and naughty man, bewrayed the malice of his heart: which was the cauſe that he was forſaken of many that had conſpired with him. But he thus much prevailed, that his ſucceſſors might freely without puniſhment not only ſhake off the yoke, but alſo bring emperors in ſubjection to them. Hereunto was added that from thenceforth there were many empeperors liker to Henry than to Julius Cæſar: whom it was no hard thing to ſubdue, while they ſat at home careleſs of all things and ſlothful, when they had moſt need with virtue and lawful means to repreſs the greedineſs of the biſhops. Thus we ſee with what colour that ſame godly gift of Conſtantine is ſhadowed, whereby the Pope feigneth that the empire of the weſt was delivered unto him.

The violent means whereby the power of the Pope hath grown.

14. In the mean time the Popes ceaſed not, ſometimes with fraud, ſometimes with treaſon, and ſometimes with force to invade other mens dominions: and the very city it ſelf, which before was free, within a hundred and thirty years, or there about they brought into their ſubjection, till they grew to the ſame power which they have at this day; and for the obtaining or increasing whereof, they have so troubled Christendom by the space of two hundred years, (for they began before that they took to them the dominion of the city) that they have almost destroyed it. In the old time when under Gregory the keepers of the goods of the church, did take possession of the lands which they reckoned to belong to the church, and after the manner of the seasing to the use of the prince, did set titles upon them for token of claim. Gregory assembling a council of bishops, inveighing sore against that prophane manner, asked whether they did not judge that clerk accursed which did of his own will by writing of any title attempt to enter upon any possession. They all pronounced accursed. If to claim a piece of ground by writing of a title be in a clerk an offence worthy of accursing: when whole two hundred years together Popes do practise nothing else but battles, shedding of blood, destructions of armies, sackings of some cities, razing of others, overthrows of nations, wastings of kingdoms, only that thy might catch hold of other mens possessions: what cursings can be enough to punish such examples? Truly it is very plain that they seek nothing less than the glory of Christ. For if they of their own will do wholly resign all the secular power that they have, therein is no danger to the glory of God, no danger to sound doctrine, no danger to the safety of the church: but they are carried blind and headlong with greediness of dominion only: because they think nothing safe, unless they may bear rule with rigorousness (as the prophet saith Ezek. xxxiv. 4.) and with power.

The Romish clergy exempting themselves from the power of the civil judge, contrary to the ancient custom of the church.

15. To jurisdiction is annexed immunity, which the Romish clergy took to themselves. For they think it against their dignity, if they answer in personal causes before a temporal judge: and therein they think both the liberty and dignity of the church to consist, if they be exempt from common judgment and laws. But the old bishops, who otherwise were most rigorous in defending the rights of the church, judged themselves and their order to be nothing hurt, if they were subject to them. And the godly emperors, without gainsaying of any man did always call clerks to their judgment seats so oft as need required. For thus saith Constantine in his epistle to the Nicomedians: if any of the bishops shall indiscreetly disorder himself, his boldness shall be restrained by the execution of the minister of God, that is by my execution. And Valentinian saith; good bishops do not speak against the power of the emperor, but do sincerely both keep the commandments of God their great king, and also obey our laws. At that time all men were persuaded of this without controversy. But ecclesiastical causes were referred to the judgment of the bishop. As if any clerk had offended nothing against the laws, but only was accused by the canons: he was not cited to the common judgment seat, but in that cause had the bishop for his judge. Likewise if there were a question of faith in controversy, or such a matter as properly pertained to the church, the judgment thereof was committed to the church. So is that to be understood, which Ambrose writeth to Valentinian. (Epi. 32.) Your father of honourable memory, not only answered in word, but also decreed by laws, that in a cause of faith he ought to be judge that is neither unfit in office nor unlike in right. Again: if we have regard to the scriptures, or old examples, who is there that can deny that in a cause of faith (I say) of faith, bishops are wont to judge of christian emperors, and not emperors of bishops? Again: I would have come, O emperor, to your consistory, if either the bishops or the people would have suffered me to go: saying, that the cause of faith ought to be debated in the church before the people. (Hom. de Basilic. trad.) He affirmeth verily that a spiritual cause, that is to say, the cause of religion, ought not to be drawn into the temporal court where prophane causes are pleaded. Worthily do all men praise his constancy in this behalf. And yet in a good cause he proceedeth but thus far, that if it come to violence and strong hand, he saith that he will give place. Willingly (saith he) I will not forsake the place committed unto me; but when I am enforced, I know not how to resist: for our armour are prayers and tears. Let us note the singular modesty and wisdom of the holy man, joined with stoutness of courage and boldness. Justina the emperor's mother, because she could not draw him to the Arians side, practised to drive him from the government of the church. And so should it have come to pass, if he had come when he was called to the palace to plead his cause. Therefore he denieth the emperor to be a competent judge of so great a controversy. Which manner of doing both the necessity of that time, and the continual nature of the matter required. For he judged that he ought rather to die than that such an example should by his consent be given to posterity: and yet if violence be offered, he thinketh not of resistance. For he denieth it to be like a bishop, to defend the faith and rights of the church with arms. But in other causes he sheweth himself ready to do whatsoever the emperor shall command him. If he demand tribute, (saith he) we deny it not: the lands of the church do pay tribute. If he ask lands, he hath power to claim them, none of us resisteth. After the same manner also speaketh Gregory, Lib. 3. epist. 20. I am not ignorant (saith he) of the mind of our most noble sovereign Lord, that he useth not to intermeddle in causes pertaining to priests, lest he should in any thing be burdened with our sins. He doth not generally exclude the emperor from judging of priests: but he saith that there be certain causes, which he ought to leave to the judgment of the church.

The immunity of Romish clergymen from secular courts in the time of Gregory not stood upon.

16. And by this very exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that princes less zealous of religion should not with tyrannous violence and wilfulness interrupt the church in doing her office. For neither did they disallow, if princes sometimes did use their authority in ecclesiastical matters, so that it were done to preserve the order of the church not to trouble it, to establish discipline, not dissolve it. For since the church hath not the power of compelling, nor ought to require it (I speak of civil constraining:) it is the office of godly kings and princes to maintain religion with laws, proclamations, and judicial proceedings. After this manner, when the emperor Maurice had commanded certain bishops that they should receive their fellow bishops that were neighbours and driven out by the barbarous nations: Gregory confirmeth that commandment, and exhorteth them to obey it, Lib. 1. epist. 43. And when he himself is admonished by the same emperor to come to atonement with John the bishop of Constantinople, he doth indeed render a reason why he ought not to be blamed, (Lib. iv. epi. 32. & 34.) yet he doth not boast of immunity from the secular court, but rather promiseth that he will be obedient, so far as his conscience will give him leave: and therewithal he saith this, that Maurice did as became a godly prince, when he gave such commandments to the priests, Lib. 7. Epist. 39.

CHAP. XII.

Of the discipline of the church, whereof the chief use is in the censures and excommunication.

The necessity of discipline in the church.

THE discipline of the church the treating whereof we have deferred unto this place, is briefly to be declared, that we may at length pass over to the rest. But that same for the most part dependeth upon the power of the keys and spiritual jurisdiction. That this may be the more easily understood, let us divide the church into two principal degrees, that is to say the clergy, and the people. Clerks I call by the usual name those that execute public ministry in the church. First we will speak of common discipline, to which all ought to be subject: then we will come to the clergy, which beside that common discipline, have a several discipline by themselves. But because many for hatred of discipline do abhor the very name thereof, let them hear this: if no fellowship, yea no house though it have but a small household, can be kept in right state without discipline, the same is much more necessary in the church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth salvation is the soul of the church, so discipline is in stead of sinews therein; whereby it is brought to pass, that the members of the body hang together every one in his fit place. Wherefore whosoever do either desire to have discipline taken away, or hinder the restoring thereof whether they do it of set purpose or by unadvisedness, verily they seek the extreme dissipation of the church. For what shall betide, if what is lustful be lawful to every man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preaching of doctrine adjoined private admonishments, corrections, and such other helps which sustain doctrine and suffer it not to be idle: discipline therefore is as it were a bridle wherewith they may be holden back and taimed, which coltishly resist against Christ: or as it were a prick, wherewith they that are not willing enough may be stirred up: and sometimes, as a fatherly rod, wherewith with they who have more grievously fallen, may be chastised mercifully and according to the mildness of the spirit of Christ. Since therefore we do now see at hand certain beginnings of a horrible wasteness in the church, because there is no care nor order to keep the people in awe, mere necessity crieth out that there is need of remedy. But this is the only remedy, which both Christ hath commanded, and hath always been used among the godly.

The use of admonition towards them that are offenders.

2. The first foundation of discipline is, that private admonitions should have place; that is to say, that if any man of his own accord do not his duty, if he behave himself licentiously, or live not honestly, or have committed any thing worthy of blame, he should suffer himself to be admonished: and that every man should study to admonish his brother when occasion shall require. But especially let the pastors and priests be watchful to do this, whose office is not only to preach to the people, but in every house to admonish and exhort if at any time they do not sufficiently prevail by general doctrine: as Paul teacheth, when he rehearseth that he taught privately and in houses, and protesteth that he is clean from the blood of all men, because he hath not ceased with tears day and night to admonish every one, Acts xx. 20. and 26. For doctrine doth then obtain force and authority, when the minister not only doth declare to all together what their duty is to Christ, but also hath power and order to require the keeping thereof, of them whom he marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or slothful. If any man do either stubbornly refuse, or in going forward in his faults, do despise such admonitions: when he hath been the second time admonished with witnesses called to it, Christ commandeth them to be called to the judgment of the church, which is the assembly of elders: and that there they should be more severely admonished as it were by public authority, that if he reverence the church he may submit himself and obey. But if he be not hereby subdued, but do continue in his wickedness, then he commandeth him, as a despiser of the church, to be put away from the fellowship of the faithful, Matth. xviii. 15. and 17.

The difference of dealing in faults secretly and in faults openly committed.

3. But because he speaketh here only of secret faults, we must make this division: that some sins are private, and some public or openly manifest. Of the first sort Christ saith to every private man, Reprove him between thee and him alone, Matth. xviii. 15. Of manifest sins Paul saith to Timothy. Reprove him before all men, that the rest may fear, 1 Tim. v. 22. For Christ had said before, If thy brother have offended against thee. Which words (against thee) unless thou wilt be contentious, thou canst not otherwise understand than under thine own secret knowlege, so that there are no more privy to it. But the same thing which the apostle teacheth Timothy concerning the rebuking of them openly, that sin openly he himself disallowed in Peter. For when Peter sinned even to public offence, he did not admonish him apart by himself, but brought him forth into the sight of the church, Gal. ii. 14. Therefore this shall be the right order of doing, if in secret faults we go forward according to those degrees that Christ hath set: but in manifest faults, we immediately proceed to the churches' solemn rebuking, if the offence be public.

Not one and the same proceeding against mean, and heinous offenders.

4. Let this also be another distinction: that of sins some are defaults, other some are wicked doings, or heinous offences. To the correcting of this latter sort, not only admonishment or rebuking is to be used, but also a severe remedy: as Paul sheweth who not only chastised with word the Corinthian that had committed incest, but also punished him with excommunication, so soon as he was certified of his wicked deed, 1 Cor. v. 4. Now therefore we begin better to see how the spiritual jurisdiction of the church, which punisheth sins according to the word of the Lord, is the best maintenance of health, and foundation of order, and bond of unity. Therefore when the church doth banish out of her company manifest adulterers, whoremongers, thiever, robbers, seditious persons, perjured men, false witnesses, and such others; again, obstinate men, which being orderly admonished even of small faults do scorn God and his judgment, she taketh nothing upon herself without reason, but executeth the jurisdiction given her of the Lord. Moreover, that none should despise such judgment of the church, or lightly regard that he is condemned by the consenting voices of the faithful: the Lord hath testified, that the same is nothing else but a pronouncing of his own sentence, and that whatsoever they do in earth is confirmed in heaven, Matth. xvi. 10. For they have the word of the Lord, whereby they may condemn the froward: they have the word, whereby they may receive the repentant into favour. They, I say, that trust that without this bond of discipline churches may long stand, are deceived in opinion: unless perhaps we want that help which the Lord foresaw that it should be necessary for us. And truly how great is the necessity thereof, shall be better perceived by the manifold use of it.

To what ends corrections and excommunications were ordained in the church.

5. There are three ends which the church hath respect unto in such corrections and excommunication. The first is, that they should not to the dishonour of God, be named among christians, that lead a filthy and a sinful life as though his holy church were a conspiracy of naughty and wicked men. For since the church is the body of Christ, it cannot be defiled with such filthy and rotten members, but that some shame must come to the head, Eph. v. 25. Therefore that there should not be any such thing in the church, whereby his holy name may be spotted with any reproach, they are to be driven out of her household, by whose dishonesty any slander might redound to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideration to be had of the supper of the Lord, that it be not prophaned with giving it to all without distinction. For it is most true, that he to whom the distribution of it is committed if he wittingly and willingly admit an unworthy man whom he might lawfully put back, is as guilty of sacrilege, as if he did give the Lord's body to dogs. Wherefore Chrysostome, (Hom. in Mat. iii Ezek. iv. 18. and xxxiii. 10.) grievously inveigheth against the priests who while they fear the power of great men, dare debar no man. The blood (saith he) shall be required at your hands. If ye fear man, he shall laugh you to scorn: but if ye fear God, ye shall be reverenced also among men. Let us not fear maces, nor purple, nor crowns: we have here a greater power. I verily will rather deliver mine own body to death, and suffer my blood to be shed, than I will be made partaker of this defiling. Therefore lest this most holy mystery be spotted with slander, in the distributing thereof choice is greatly requisite: which yet cannot be had but by the jurisdiction of the church. The second end is, lest (as it is wont to come to pass) with the continual company of the evil, the good should be corrupted. For such is our ready inclination to go out of the way, there is nothing easier than for us to be led by evil examples from the right course of life. This use the apostle touched, when he commanded the Corinthians to put the incestous man out of their company. A little leven (saith he) corrupteth the whole lump of dough. 1 Cor. v. 6. and 11. And he foresaw herein so great danger, that he forbade him even from all fellowship. If any brother (saith he) among you be named either a whoremonger, or a covetous man, or a worshipper of idols, or a drunkard, or an evil speaker, with such a one I grant you not leave so much as to eat. The third end is, that they themselves confounded with shame may begin to repent of their filthiness. So it is profitable for them also to have their own wickedness chastised, that with feeling of the rod they may be awaked, who otherwise by tender bearing with them would have become more obstinate. The same thing doth the apostle mean when he saith thus: If any man do not obey our doctrine, mark him, and keep no company with him, that he may be ashamed. 2 Thes. iii. 14. Again in another place, when he writeth that he hath delivered the Corinthian to satan, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord: 1 Cor. v. 5. that is (as I expound it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be saved for ever. But he therefore saith that he delivereth him to satan, because the devil is out of the church as Christ is in the church. For whereas some do refer it to a certain vexing of the flesh, I think that to be very uncertain. (Aug. de ver. apost. ho 58.)

The manner of ecclesiastical correction.

6. When these ends are set forth, now it remaineth to see how the church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in jurisdiction. First let us keep the division above set, that of sins some are public, and other some are private or more secret. Public are those that have not only one or two witnesses, but are committed openly and with the offence of the whole church. Secret I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sins of hypocrites, for those come not into the judgment of the church, but those of the mean kind which are not without witnesses, and yet are not public. The first kind requireth not those degrees which Christ rehearseth: but when any such thing appeareth, the church ought to do her duty in calling the sinner and correcting him according to the proportion of the offence. In the second kind according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the church till there be also obstinacy added. When it is once come to knowlege, then is that other division to be noted between wicked doings and defaults. For in lighter sins there is not to be used uſed ſo great ſeverity, but chaſtiſement of words ſufficeth, and the ſame gentle and fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the ſinner, but bring him home to himſelf, that he may more rejoice than be ſorry that he was corrected. But it is meet that hainous offences be chaſtiſed with ſharper remedies. For it is not enough, if he that by doing a wicked deed of evil example hath grievouſly offended the church, ſhould be chaſtiſed only with words, but he ought for a time to be deprived of the communion of the ſupper, till he have given aſſurance of his repentance. For againſt the Corinthian Paul uſeth not only rebuking of words, but driveth him out of the church, and blameth the Corinthians that they had ſo long born him. 1 Cor. v. 5. The old and better church kept this order, when rightful government flouriſhed. For if any man had done any wicked deed whereupon was grown offence, firſt he was commanded to abſtain from partaking of the holy ſupper, then both to humble himſelf before God, and to teſtify his repentance before the church. There were alſo certain ſolemn uſages, whith were enjoined to them that had fallen, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had ſo done, that the church was ſatisfied, then by laying on of hands he was received into favour. Which receiving is oftentimes called of Cyprian peace, who alſo briefly deſcribeth this uſage. (Epi. 2. lib. 1. Liber. 3. Epi. 14. & 26.) They do penance (ſaith he) in a certain full time: then they come to confeſſion, and by the laying on of hands of the biſhop and the clergy they receive power to come to the communion. Howbeit the biſhop and his clergy had ſo the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewithal require the conſent of the people: as he ſheweth in another place.

All men ſubject unto church diſcipline, which to execute belongeth unto ſome, but unto all to ſee executed not as doers but as beholders of that which is done.

7. From this diſcipine there was no man exempted, that even the princes together with the common people did ſubmit themſelves to bear it. And rigntfully, ſince it was evident that it was the diſcipline of Chriſt, to whom it is meet that all ſcepters and crowns of kings be ſubmitted. So when Theodoſius was deprived by Ambroſe of power to come to the communion becauſe of the ſlaughter committed at Theſſalonica, he threw down all the royal ornament wherewith he was clothed: he openly in the church bewailed his ſin, which had crept upon him by fraud of other men: he craved pardon with groaning and tears. For great kings ought not to think this to be any diſhonour to them, if they humbly throw down themſelves before Chriſt the king of kings, neither ought it to diſpleaſe them that they are judged by the church. For ſince in their court they hear nothing elſe but mere flatteries, it is then more neceſſary for them to be rebuked of the Lord by the mouth of the prieſts. But rather they ought to wiſh, that the prieſts ſhould not ſpare them, that the Lord may ſpare them. In this place I omit to ſpeak by whom this juriſdiction is to be exerciſed, becauſe it is ſpoken of in another place. This only I add that that is the lawful manner of proceeding in excommunicating a man which Paul ſheweth: if the elders do it not only by themſelves, but with the church knowing and allowing it: that is, in ſuch ſort that the multitude of the people may not govern the doing, but may mark it as a witneſs and a keeper that nothing ſhould be done of a few by wilful affection. But the whole manner of doing, beſide the calling upon the name of God, ought to have ſuch gravity, as may reſemble the preſence of Chriſt, that it may be undoubted that he there ſitteth for ruler of his own judgment.

The lenity and gentleneſs that ſhould be uſed in execution of church diſcipline.

8. But this ought not to be paſſed over, that ſuch ſeverity becometh the church as is joined with the ſpirit of mildneſs. For we muſt always diligently beware (as Paul teacheth 2 Cor. ii. 7.) that he which is puniſhed be not ſwallowed up of ſorrow: for ſo a remedy ſhould be made a deſtruction. But out of the end may better be gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication that the ſinner ſhould be brought to repentance, and evil examples taken away, leſt either the name of Chriſt ſhould be evil ſpoken of, or other men be provoked to follow them: if we ſhall have an eye to theſe things, we ſhall be able eaſily to judge how far ſeverity ought to proceed, and where it ought to end. Therefore when the ſinner giveth a teſtimony of his repentance, and doth by his teſtimony as much as in him lieth, blot out the offence: he is not to be enforced any further: but if he be enforced, rigorouſneſs doth then exceed meaſure. In which behalf the immeaſurable ſeverity of the old fathers cannot be excuſed, who both diſagreed from the preſcribed order of the Lord, and alſo was marvellouſly dangerous. For when they charged a ſinner with ſolemn penance, and deprivation from the holy communion sometimes for seven years, sometimes four years, sometimes three years, sometimes for their whole life: what other thing could follow thereof but either great hypocrisy or most great desperation! Likewise whereas no man that had fallen the second time was admitted to second penance, but was cast out of the church even to the end of his life: that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosever shall weigh the matter with sound judgment, shall herein perceive want of their discretion. Howbeit I do here rather disallow the public manner, than accuse all them that used it, whereas it is certain that many of them misliked it: but they did therefore suffer it, because they could not amend it. Truly, Cyprian declareth, how much against his own will he was so rigorous. (Ad Cor. Epi. 31. Liber. 1.) Our patience (saith he) and easiness and gentleness is ready to them that come. I wish all to return into the church: I wish all our fellow soldiers to be inclosed within the tents of Christ and in the houses of God the father. I forgive all things, I dissemble many things, for zeal and desire to gather brotherhood together, I examine not with full judgment those things that are committed against God, in pardoning defaults more than I ought, I am myself almost in default, I do with ready and full love embrace them that return with repentance, confessing their sins with humble and plain satisfaction. Chrysostom is somewhat harder, and yet he saith thus: If God be so kind, why will his priest seem so rigorous? Moreover we know what gentleness Augustine used toward the Donatists, insomuch that he sticked not to receive into bishopric those that had returned from schism, even immediately after their repentance. But because a a contrary order had grown in force, they were compelled to leave their own judgment to follow it.

Men separated from the church by excommunication not rashly to be condemned in the judgment of men.

9. But as this mildness is required in the whole body of the church, that it should punish them that are fallen, mercifully and not to the extremity of rigor, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirm charity toward them: so every private man for himself ought to temper himself to this mercifulness and gentleness. Therefore it is not our part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are driven out of the church, or to despair of them as though they were already lost. We may indeed judge them strangers from the church, and therefore strangers from Christ: but that is only during the time that they abide in divorce. But if then also they shew a greater resemblance of stubbornness than of gentleness, yet let us commit them to the judgment of the Lord, hoping better of them in time to come than we see in time present, and let us not therefore cease to pray to God for them, and (to comprehend all in one word) let us not condemn to death the person it self, which is in the hand and judgment of God alone, but let us rather weigh by the law of the Lord of what sort every man's works are. Which rule while we follow, we rather stand to the judgment of God than pronounce our own. Let us not take to our selves more liberty in judging, unless we will bind the power of God within bounds, and appoint a law to his mercy, at whose pleasure when he thinketh it good, very evil men are turned into very good, strangers are graffed and foreigners are chosen into the church. And this the Lord doth, thereby to mock out the opinion of men, and rebate their rashness: which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to itself power of judging more than it ought.

The difference between excommunicating and accursing.

10. For whereas Christ promiseth that that shall be bound in heaven, which they that are his shall bind in earth, he limiteth the power of binding, to the censure of the church: by which they that are excommunicate, are not thrown into everlasting ruin and damnation: but hearing their lives and manners to be condemned, they are, also certified of their own everlasting condemnation, unless they repent. For excommunication herein differeth from accursing, that accursing taking away all pardon doth condemn a man and adjudge him to eternal destruction: excommunication rather revengeth and punisheth manners. And though the same do also punish the man, yet it doth so punish him, that in forewarning him of his damnation to come, it doth call him back to salvation. If that be obtained, reconciliation and restoring to the communion is ready. But accursing is either very seldom or never in use. Therefore, although ecclesiastical discipline, permitteth not to live familiarly, or to have friendly conversation with them that are excommunicate: yet we ought to endeavour by such means as we may, that returning to amendment, they may return to the fellowship and unity of the church: as the apostle also teacheth. Do not (saith he) count them as enemies, nemies, but correct them as brethren. 2 Thes. iii. 15. Unless this gentleness be kept as well privatly as in common, there is danger lest from discipline we forthwith fall to butchery.

Mens duties in keeping unity where transgressions cannot conveniently be corrected.

11. This also is principally required to moderate discipline, which Augustine treateth of in disputing against the Donatists: (Lib. 2 contra. Parm. cap. 1.) that private men, if they see faults not diligently enough corrected by the council of elders, should not therefore depart from the church: nor the pastors themselves, if they cannot according to their heart's desire purge all things that need amendment, should therefore throw away the ministry, or with unusual rigour trouble the whole church. For it is most true which he writeth: that he is free and discharged from the curse, whosoever he be that either by rebuking amendeth what he can: or what he cannot amend excludeth, always preserving the bond of peace: or what he cannot exclude, saving the bond of peace, he disalloweth with equity, and bear with stedfastness. He giveth the reason thereof in another place: (Lib. 3. cap. 1.) because godly order and manner of ecclesiastical discipline ought always to have respect to the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace: which the apostle commandeth to be kept by our bearing one with another, and when it is not kept the medicine of punishment begins to be not only superfluous, but hurtful, and therefore ceaseth to be a medicine. He that (saith he Cap. 2.) diligently thinks upon these things doth neither in preserving of unity neglect the severity of discipline, nor doth by immoderate correction break the bond of fellowship. He granteth indeed that not only the pastors ought to labour to gain this point, that there may remain no fault in the church, but also that every man ought to his power endeavour thereunto: and he plainly declareth that he who neglecteth to admonish, rebuke, and correct the guilty, though he do not favour them, nor sin with them, yet is guilty before the Lord. But if he be in such a station, that he may sever them from the partaking of sacraments, and doth it not, he sinneth not by anothers evil, but his own. Only he willeth it to be done, with discretion, which the Lord also requireth, lest while the tares be rooting out, the corn be hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Cyprian, let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: and what he cannot, let him patiently suffer, and with love groan and lament it.

The preciseness of the Donatists, making sacrilegious schism in the church, under pretence of a religious desire to have vice severely punished, wherein the bishops being less keen and fiery than some wished, they were accounted betrayers of discipline.

12. This he saith because of the preciseness of the Donatists, who when they saw faults in the churches which the bishops did indeed rebuke with words, but not punish with excommunication, (because they thought that they could this way nothing prevail) did sharply inveigh against the bishops as betrayers of discipline, and did with an ungodly schism divide themselves from the flock of Christ. As the Anabaptists do at this day, which when they acknowlege no congregation to be of Christ, unless it do in every point shine with angelic perfection, do under pretence of their zeal overthrow all edification. Such (saith Augustine) not for hatred of other mens wickednesses, but for desire to maintain their own contentions, covet either wholly to draw away, or at least to divide weak people who are led aside by the boasting of their name: they swelling with pride, mad with stubbornness, traiterous with slanders, troublesome with seditions, lest it should openly appear that they want the light of truth, do pretend a shadow of rigorous severity: and those things which in scripture are commanded to be done with moderate healing for correcting of the faults of brethren, preserving the sincerity of love, and keeping the unity of peace, they abuse to sacrilege of schism and occasion of cutting off. So doth Satan transform himself into an Angel of light, when by occasion as it were of just severity he persuadeth to unmerciful cruelty, coveting nothing else but to corrupt and break the bond of peace and unity: which bond remaining fast among christians, all his forces are not able to hurt, his traps of treasons are broken, and his councils of overthrowing do vanish away.

How to deal in faults so common that they cannot with the peace of the church be corrected.

13. This one thing he chiefly commendeth, that if the infection sin have entred into the whole multitude, then the severe mercy of lively discipline is necessary. For (saith he) the devices of separation are vain, hurtful and full of sacrilege, because they are ungodly and proud, and do more trouble the weak good ones, than than they amend bold transgressors. And that which he there teacheth others, he himself also faithfully followed. For writing to Aurelius bishop of Carthage, he complaineth that drunkenness which is so sore condemned in scripture, doth range unpunished in Africa: and he adviseth him, that assembling a council of bishops he should provide a remedy for it. He addeth by and by after, these things (as I think) are taken away not roughly, not hardly, not after an imperious manner, but more by teaching than by commanding, more by admonishing than by threatning. For so must we deal with a multitude of sinners, but severity is to be exercised upon the sins of a few. Yet he doth not mean that bishops should therefore wink or hold their peace at public faults, because they cannot severely punish them: as he himself afterwards expoundeth it: but he willeth that the measure of correction be so tempered, that so far as may be, it may rather bring health than destruction to the body. And therefore at length he concludeth thus: Wherefore both this commandment of the apostle 1 Cor. v. 7. is in no wise to be neglected, to sever the evil, when it may be done without peril of breaking of peace: and this is also to be kept, Ephes. iv. 2. that bearing one with another, we should endeavour to preserve the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace.

The use of exhortation to public exercises of humility in the church.

14. The part that remaineth of discipline, which is not properly contained in the power of the keys, standeth in this, that according to the necessity of times the pastors should exhort the people either to fasting, or to common supplications, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, and faith, of which things there is neither time, nor measure, nor form prescribed by the word of God, but is left to the judgment of the church. The observing of this part also, as it is profitable, so it hath always been used by the old church even from the very apostles. Howbeit the apostles themselves were not the first authors of them, but took their example out of the law and the prophets. For we see that there so oft as any weighty business happened, the people were called together, common prayers enjoined, and fasting commanded. Therefore the apostles followed that which was not new to the people of God, and they also foresaw that it would be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, wherewith the people may either be stirred up to their duty, or kept in awe and obedience. There are examples every where in holy scripture, which we need not gather together. In short this is to be holden, that so oft as there happeneth any controversy of religion, which must be determined either by a synod or by ecclesiastical judgment so oft as they are about choosing of a minister, finally, so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doing: again, when there appear tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, war, or famine: this is a holy ordinance and profitable for all ages that pastors should exhort the people to common fasting, and to extraordinary prayer. If any man do not allow the testimonies which may be cited out of the old Testament, as though they were not meet for the christian church, it is certain that the apostles also did the same. Howbeit of prayer I think there will scarcely any be found that will make any question. Therefore let us say somewhat of fasting: because many when they understand not what profit it hath, judge it not so necessary: some also utterly refuse it as superfluous: and when the use of it not well known, it is easy to fall into superstition.

A triple use of fasting.

15. Holy and true fasting hath three ends. For we use it, either to make lean and subdue the flesh, that it should not wax wanton, or that we may be better disposed to prayer and holy meditation, or that it should be a testimony of our humbling ourselves before God, when we are willing to confess our guilt before him. The first end hath not so often place in common fasting, because all men have not like estate of body, nor like health: therefore it rather agreeth with private fasting. The second end is common to both, for as well the whole church as every one of the faithful hath need of such preparation to prayer. The third also is likewise common. For it will sometimes happen that God shall strike some nation with war, or pestilence, or with some calamity. In such a common scourge the whole people must accuse themselves, and openly confess their own guilt. But if the hand of the Lord strike any private man, he ought to do the same either alone, or with his own family. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the mind. But when the mind is affected as it ought to be, it is scarcely possible, but that it will break out in outward testifying: and then chiefly if it turn to common edifying, that altogether in openly confessing their sin they should yield praise of righteousness to God, and every one mutually exhort each other with their example.

Fasting joined with prayer by the Antiochians, Anna, Nehemias, Paul.

16. Wherefore fasting, as it is a sign of humbling, is of more use publicly, than among private men, howsoever it be common, as is already said. Therefore as touching the discipline whereof we now treat: so oft as we must make supplication to God for any great matter, it were expedient to command fasting together with prayer. So when the Antiochians Act. xiv. 3. laid hands upon Paul and Barnabas, that they might the better commend their ministry to God which was of so great importance, they joined fasting with prayer: so both they afterwards, Act. xiv. 23. when they made ministers over churches, were wont to pray with fasting. In this kind of fasting they had regard to no other thing, but that they might be made fresher and more uncumbered to pray. Verily this we find by experience, that when the belly is full, the mind is is not so lifted up to God, that it can both with hearty and fervent affection be carried to prayer, and continue in it. So is that to be understood which Luke rehearseth of Anna, Luke. ii. 37. that she served the Lord by fasting and prayer. For he doth not set the worshipping of God in fasting: but signifieth that the holy woman did after that manner exercise her self to continuance in prayer. Such was the fasting of Nehemias Nehem. i. 4. when he did with earnest zeal pray to God for the deliverance of his people. For this cause Paul saith 1 Cor. vii. 5. that the faithful do well, if they abstain for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply to prayer and fasting. Where joining fasting to prayer instead of a help, he putteth us in mind that it is of no value but so far as it is referred to this end. Again, when in the same place he giveth a rule to married folks, that they should mutually render good will one to another, it is plain that he doth not speak of daily prayers, but of such as require a more earnest attention of mind.

Public fasting in the public calamities of the church.

17. Again, if either pestilence, or famine, or war begin to range abroad, or if any other calamity seem to hang over any country and people: then also it is the duty of pastors to exhort the church to fasting, that they may humbly beseech the Lord to turn away his wrath. For he giveth warning that he is prepared and in a manner armed to revenge, when he maketh any danger to appear. Therefore as accused men in time past with long hanging beard, with uncombed hair, with black array, were wont humbly to abase themselves, to procure the mercy of the judge: so when we are accused before the judgment seat of God, it behoveth us both for his glory, and for our common edification, and also it is profitable and healthful for us, that we should in piteous array pray to escape his severity. And that this was used among the people of Israel, it is easy to gather by the words of Joel. ii. 25. For when he commandeth a trumpet to be sounded, the congregation to be gathered together, fasting to be appointed, and the rest that follow: he speaketh of them as a common custom. He had a little before said, that examination is appointed of the wicked deeds of the people, and had declared that the day of judgment was now at hand: and had summoned them being accused to plead their cause: then he crieth out that they should hast to put on sackcloth and ashes, to weeping and fasting: that is, that they should also with outward appearances throw themselves down before the Lord. Sackcloth and ashes peradventure did more agree with those times: but there is no doubt that the calling together, and weeping, and fasting and such like do pertain also to our age, so oft as the state of things doth so require. For since is a holy exercise, both to humble men, and to confess humility, why should we use it less than the old people did in like necessity? We read that not only the people of Israel, who were informed and instructed by the word of God, but also the Ninivites who had no doctrine, but the preaching of Jonas, fasted in token of sorrow. What cause is there therefore why we should not do the same? But it is an outward ceremony, which was with the rest ended in Christ. Yea rather even at this day it is, as it always hath been, a very good help to the faithful, and a profitable admonition, to stir them up, that they should not with too great carelessness and sluggishness more and more provoke God when they are chastised with his scourges. Therefore Christ when he excuseth his apostles, (Matth. ix. 15.) because they fasted not, doth not say that fasting is abrogate: but he appointeth it for times of calamity, and joineth it with mourning. The time shall come (saith he Luke v. 34.) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them.

In fasting time, quality and quantity of meat to be respected.

18. But that there may be no error in the name, let us define what fasting is. For we do not here understand by it only abstinence and sparing in meat and drink but a certain other thing. The life of the godly ought indeed to be tempered with honest sparing and sobriety, that so near as is possible it may in the whole course thereof bear a certain resemblance to fasting. But besides this there is another fasting for a time, when we withdraw any of our wonted diet, either for one day or for a certain time, and charge ourselves with a stricter and severer abstinence in diet than ordinary. This consisteth in three things, in time, in quality of meats, and in straitness of quantity. I mean by time, that we should use those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordained. As for example, if a man fast for common prayer: that he come empty unto it. Quality standeth in this, that all daintiness should be absent, and being content with common and baser meats, we should not stir up appetite with delicates. The rule of quantity is in this, that we eat more sparingly and less than we are wont, only for necessity, and not for pleasure.

Superstition and the opinion of merit in fasting to be taken heed of.

19. But we must always principally beware, that no superstition creep in upon us, as it hath heretofore happened to the great hurt of the church. For it were much better that there were no use at all of fasting than that it should be diligently kept, and in the mean time be corrupted with false and hurtful opinions, whereunto the world sometimes falleth, unless the pastors do with great faithfulness and wisdom prevent it. The first point therefore is, that they should always inforce that which Joel teacheth, (Joel ii. 13.) that they should rent their hearts and not their garments: that is, that they should inform the people that God doth not greatly esteem fasting of itself unless there be an inward affection of the heart, a true misliking of sin and himself, true humbling, and true sorrow through the fear of God: yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause but for that it is joined to these as an inferior help. For God abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signs and an outward shew instead of innocency of heart, labour with fair colours to deceive themselves. Therefore Isaiah most sharply inveigheth against this hypocrisy, that the Jews thought they had satisfied God, when they had only fasted, altho' they nourished ungodliness and unclean thoughts in their heart. Is it (saith he, Isa. lviii. 5.) such a fasting which the Lord requireth? and so forth as followeth. Therefore hypocritical fasting is not only an unprofitable and superfluous wearying, but also a great abomination. Another evil near unto this is chiefly to be taken heed of, that it be not taken for a meritorious work, or a form of worshipping God. For since it is a thing indifferent of itself, and hath no value but by reason of those ends which it ought to have respect unto, it is a most hurtful superstition, to confound it with the works commanded by God, and necessary of themselves without any other respect. Such was in old time the dotage of the Manichees: whom when Augustine confuteth, he doth plainly enough teach, that fasting is to be judged by no other ends than those which I have spoken of, and is no otherwise allowed of God, unless it be referred to the same. The third error is indeed not so ungodly, yet it is perilous: to require the keeping of it more precisely and rigorously as it were one of the chief duties, and so to advance it with immoderate praise, that men should think they have done some excellent thing when they have fasted. In which behalf I dare not altogether excuse the old fathers, because they have sown some seeds of superstition, and given occasion to the tyranny which hath risen since. There are found indeed sometimes in them sound and wise sentences of fasting, but afterwards we now and then meet with extravagant praises of fasting which set it among the chief virtues.

The fast of Lent superstitious if it be used under colour of following Christ in his forty days fast.

20. And at that time the superstitious observing of Lent was every where grown in use: because both the common people thought that they therein did some notable service to God, and the pastors did commend it for a holy following of Christ: whereas it is plain, Matth. iv. 2. that Christ did not fast to prescribe an example to others, but that in so beginning the preaching of the gospel he might in very deed prove that it was not a doctrine of men, but descended from heaven. And it is marvellous, that so gross an error, which is confuted with so many and so evident reasons, could creep into men of so sharp judgment. For Christ did not fast oft (which he must needs have done if he would have set forth a law of yearly fasting) but only once when he prepared himself for publishing the gospel. And he fasted not after the manner of men, as he would have done if he would have provoked men to follow him; but rather he sheweth an example, whereby he may draw men to wonder at him than stir them up to follow him. Finally there is no other cause of this fasting than for that which Moses fasted (Exod. xxiv.

xxiv. 18. and xxxiv. 28.) when he received the law at the hand of the Lord. For since that miracle was shewed in Moses to establish the authority of the law, it ought not to have been omitted in Christ, lest the gospel should seem to give place to the law. But since that time it never came into any any man's mind under colour of following of Moses to require such a form of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy prophets and fathers follow it, when yet they had mind and zeal enough to godly exercises. For, that which is said of Elias, 1 Kings xix. 6. that he spent forty days without meat and drink, tended to no other end but that the people should know that he was stirred up to be a restorer of the law from which almost all Israel had departed. Therefore it was a wrong zeal and full of superstition, that they set forth fasting with the title and colour of following of Christ. Howbeit in the manner of fasting there was then great diversity, as Cassiodorus rehearseth out of Socrates in the ninth book of his history. For the Romans (saith he) had but three weeks, but in these three there was a continual fasting, except on the Sabbath and Saturday. The Slavonians and Grecians had six weeks: others had seven: but their fasting was by divided times. And they disagreed no less in difference of meats. Some did eat nothing but bread and water: some added herbs: some did not forbear fish and fowls; some had no difference in meats. Of this diversity Augustine also maketh mention in the latter epistle to Januarius.

The gross abuse of fasting.

21. Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeal of the people was added both ignorance and rudeness of the bishops, and a lust to bear rule, and a tyrannical rigour. There were made wicked laws, which strained consciences with pernicious bonds. The eating of flesh was forbidden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of sacrilege one upon another, till they came to the bottom of all errors. And that no perverseness should be omitted, they began with a most foolish pretence of abstinence to mock with God. For in the most exquisite daintiness of fare is sought the praise of fasting: no delicates do then suffice, there is never greater plenty, or diversity, or sweetness of meats. In such and so gorgeous preparation they think that they serve God rightly. I speak not how they never more foully glut themselves, than when they would be counted most holy men. Briefly, they count it the greatest worshipping of God to abstain from flesh, and (these excepted) to use all kind of dainties. On the other side they think this the greatest ungodliness, and such as can scarcely be recompensed by death, if a man taste never so little a piece of bacon or unsavory flesh with brown bread. Jerome telleth, (Ad Nepotian.) that even in his time were some that with such follies did mock with God: who because they would not eat oil, caused most dainty meats from every place to be brought them: yea to oppress nature by violence, they abstained from drinking of water, but caused sweet and costly suppings to be made for them, which they did not drink out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which fault was then in a few, at this day it is a common fault among all rich men, that they fast to no other end but that they may feast more sumptuously and daintily. But I will not waste many words in a matter not doubtful. Only this I say, that both in fasting and in all other parts of discipline, the papists have nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereof they may be proud, as if there were any thing remaining among them worthy of praise.

The ancient canons and orders of the church for the government of the clergy.

22. There followeth another part of discipline, which peculiarly belongeth to the clergy, which is contained in the canons which the old bishops have enjoined themselves, and their order. Such as these: that no clerk should give himself to hunting, or dicing, nor to banqueting: that none should occupy usury, or merchandise: that none should be present at wanton dancings, and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties whereby the authority of the canons was established, that none might break them unpunished. For this end to every bishop was committed the government of his own clergy, that they should rule their clerks according to the canons, and hold them in their duty. For this end were ordained yearly overseeings and synods, that if any was negligent in his duty, he should be admonished: if any had offended, he should be punished according to the measure of his offence. The bishops also themselves had yearly their provincial synods, and in old time yearly two synods, by which they were judged if they had done any thing beside their duty. For if any bishop was too hard or violent against his clergy, they might appeal to those synods, although there was but one that com-complained. The severest punishment was that he who had offended should be removed from his office, and be deprived for a time of the communion, And because that same was a continual order, they never used to dismiss any synod, but they appointed a place and time for the next synod. For, to gather a general council, pertained to the emperor only, as all the old summonings of councils do testify. So long as this severity flourished, the clerks did require in word no more of the people, than themselves did perform in example and deed. Yea they were much more rigourous to themselves than to the people. And verily it is proper, that the people should be ruled with a gentler and looser discipline, if I may so term it: but the clerks should use a deeper discipline among themselves, and should less bear with themselves, than with other men. How all this is grown out of use, there is no need to rehearse, when at this day nothing can be imagined more unbridled and dissolute than the clergy, and they are broken forth to so great licentiousness, that the whole world exclaimeth against it. That all antiquity should not seem to be utterly buried among them, I grant indeed that they do with certain shadows deceive the eyes of the simple: but those come no nearer to the ancient manners, than the counterfeiting of an ape approacheth to that which men do by reason and advice. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where he teacheth how foully the Persians had swerved from the ordinances of their elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kind of life, to softness and daintiness, that yet they covered this shame, saying, that they diligently kept the ancient usages. For when in the time of Cyrus sobriety and temperance so far flourished that men needed not to weep, yea, and it was accounted a shame: with posterity this continued a religious observation, that no man should draw snot out of his nostrils, but it was lawful to suck it up, and feed within even till they had rotten the stinking humours which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the old order it is unlawful to bring wine pots to the table: but to swill in wine that they need to be carried away drunken is tolerable. It was ordained to eat but once a day: this these good successors have not abrogate, but they give leave to continue their surfeitings from mid-day to mid-night. The custom was that men should make an end of their days journey fasting. But they were at liberty, and it was the common custom to avoid weariness, to shorten their journey to two hours. Whensoever the papists shall pretend their bastard rules, to shew themselves like the holy fathers: this example will sufficiently reprove their foolish counterfeiting, so that no painter can more lively express it.

23. In one thing they are too rigorous and severe, that they give not leave to priests to marry. But how great liberty there is among them to use whoredom unpunished, is not needful to be spoken: and being bold upon their abominable unmarried life, they have hardened themselves to all wicked doings: but for this forbidding doth plainly shew, how pestilent all their traditions are, for as much as it hath not only spoiled the church of good and fit pastors, but also hath brought in a horrible train of mischiefs, and thrown many souls into the gulf of desperation. Truly whereas marriage hath been forbidden to priests, that same hath been done by wicked tyranny, not only against the word of God, but also against all equity. First to forbid that which the Lord had left at liberty, was by no means lawful for men: again, God hath expressly provided by his word that this liberty should not be broken, is so evident that it needeth no long demonstration. I speak not how Paul in many places willeth a bishop to be the husband of one wife. 1 Tim. iii. 2. But what could be more vehemently spoken, than where he pronounceth by the holy Ghost, Tit. i. 6. 1 Tim. iv. 3. that there shall be in the last times wicked men that shall forbid marriage: and he calleth them not only deceivers, but devils? This therefore is a prophecy, this is a holy oracle of the holy Ghost, wherewith he chose to arm the church beforehand against dangers, that the forbidding of marriage is the doctrine of devils. But they think they have happily escaped when they wrest this sentence to Montanus, the Tatians, Encratites, and other old heretics. They only (say they) condemned marriage: but we do not condemn it, but debar the clergy from it, for whom we think it is not convenient. As though this prophecy being first fulfilled in the aforesaid men, it might not also be applied to these: or as though this childish foolish subtilty were worth the hearing, when they say they forbid it not, because they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a tyrant would affirm that it is not an unjust law, by the injustice whereof only one part of the city is oppressed.

The clergy forbidden marriage in the church of Rome.

24. They object, that the priest by some mark differs from the people. As though the Lord

Marriage in the clergy allowed by the apostle, by the church of Rome not only disallowed, but disgraced by unseemly speech.

did not foresee with what ornaments priests ought to excel. Thus they accuse the apostle of troubling the order and confounding the comliness of the church, who when he described the form of a good bishop placed marriage among the other gifts which he required in him. I know how they expound this, namely that none is to be chosen that hath had a second wife. And I grant that this is no new exposition: but that it is a false exposition, appeareth by the text itself, because he by and by after setteth out what qualities the wives of bishops and deacons ought to have. Paul reckoneth marriage among the virtues of a bishop, these men teach that it is an intolerable fault among the clergy. And, on God's name, not contented with this general dispraise they call it in their canons, uncleanness and a defiling of the flesh. Let every man think with himself out of what work-shop these things are come: Christ vouchsafeth so to honour marriage that he pitched upon it as an image of his holy union with the church. What could be spoken more honourably to set out the dignity of marriage? With what face therefore shall that be called unclean or defiled, wherein shineth a likeness of the spiritual grace of Christ.

The separation of Levites from their wives when they ministred in the temple, proveth but slenderly the forbidding of marriage in the clergy under the gospel.

25. But even when their prohibition so evidently fighteth with the word of God, yet they find in the scriptures wherewith to defend it. The Levitical priests were bound to lie asunder from their wives, so oft as it came to their turns to minister, that they might handle the holy things pure and undefiled. Therefore, say they, it were very uncomely, that our holy things, since they are both much more noble and daily, should be handled by married men. As though a minister of the gospel, and a Levitical priest were all one. They, as figures, represented Christ, who being the Mediator of God and men should with most absolute purity reconcile the Father unto us: but as sinners could not in every behalf express the figure of his holiness, yet that they might with certain rough draughts yield a shadow of him, they were commanded to purify themselves beyond the manner of men, when they came to the sanctuary; namely because they then properly figured Christ, because as pacifiers, to reconcile the people to God, they appeared at the tabernacle, the image of the heavenly judgment seat. Forasmuch as the pastors of the church do not represent this person at this day, therefore they are rashly compared with them. Wherefore the apostle Heb. xiii. 4. doth without exception boldly pronounce, that marriage is honourable among all men, but that for whoremongers, and adulterers abideth judgment of God. And the apostles themselves did by their own example prove that marriage is not unmeet for the holiness of any office be it never so excellent. For Paul witnesseth 1 Cor. ix. 5. that they not only kept wives, but also carried them about with them.

Marriage allowed in bishops by the ancient fathers of the church.

26. Again it was a marvellous shamelessness that they durst set out this comliness of chastity as a necessary thing, to the great reproach of the old church: which when it abounded with singular learning of God, yet excelled more in holiness. For if they will not submit to the apostles, (as they are wont sometimes stoutly to despise them) what I beseech you will they do with all the old fathers, who it is certain have not only suffered but also allowed marriage in the order of bishops? They forsooth did nourish a filthy prophaning of holy things, for as much as by it the mysteries of the Lord were not properly reverenced among them. It was moved indeed in the Nicene synod to have an unmarried life commanded: as there always want not some superstitious men, who still invent some new thing, to bring themselves into admiration. But what was decreed? The sentence of Paphnutius was assented to, which pronounceth that a man's lying with his own wife is chastity. Therefore marriage remained holy among them: neither did it reflect any shame on them, nor was it thought to defile the ministry.

How a single life grew to be so much advanced in the clergy.

27. Then followed times, in which too superstitious an observation of a single life gained force. Hence came those often and extravagant praises of virginity, so that scarcely any other virtue was thought among the people to be compared with it. And though marriage was not condemned as unclean, yet the dignity thereof was so diminished, and the holiness of it obscured, that he seemed not to aspire with a strong enough courage to perfection, who did not refrain himself from it. Hence came those canons whereby it was first forbidden that they who were come to the degree of priests should not contract marriage; then, that none should be taken into that order but unmarried men, or such as did forsake marriage together with their wives. These things, because they seemed to procure reverence to the priesthood, were (I grant) even from antiquity received with great good liking. But if our adversaries object antiquity against me, first I answer that this liberty remained both under the apostles and in certain ages after them, that bishops might be married; that the apostles themselves, and other pastors of great authority who succeeded in their places, used the same without hesitation. The example of that ancienter church ought worthily to be of greater weight with us, than that we should think it either unlawful or indecent for us, which was then with praise received and used. Secondly I say that that age which for an immoderate affection to virginity began to be partial against marriage, did not lay upon priests the law of an unmarried life, as if it were a thing necessary of it self, but because they preferred unmarried men above the married. Finally I answer, that they did not so require it, that they did with force and necessity constrain them to continence who were not fit to keep it. For when they punished whoredom with most severe laws, in them that contracted marriage, they decreed no more but that they should give over the execution of their office.

where

Two notes to the church of Rome concerning the life: so of single life which they require in the order of priests.

28. Therefore whenever the defenders of this new tyranny shall seek the pretence of antiquity to defend their unmarried life: so oft we shall answer by requiring them to restore the old chastity in their priests: that they remove adulterers and whoremongers: that they will not allow those in whom they suffer not the honest and chaste use of the marriage bed, to run unpunished into all kind of lust: that they revive the discontinued discipline, whereby all wantonness may be restrained: that they deliver the church from this wicked filthiness, wherewith it hath been long deformed. When they have granted this, then they must again be put in mind not to boast of any thing as necessary, which being of it self at liberty, dependeth upon the profit of the church. Yet I say not this, because I think that in any condition place is to be given to those canons which lay the bond of unmarried life upon the order of priests; but that the wiser sort may understand with what face our enemies slander marriage in priests by objecting the name of antiquity. As touching the fathers, whose writings remain, even they when they speak their own judgment, except Jerome, did not with so great spitefulness deface the honesty of marriage. We shall be content with one commendation of Chrysostom, because he, since he was a principal esteemer of virginity, cannot be thought to have been more lavish than others in the commendation of marriage. Thus he saith. The first degree of chastity is pure virginity: the second is faithful marriage. Therefore the second kind of virginity is the chaste love of matrimony.

CHAP. XIII.

Of vows, by the rash promising whereof every man hath miserably entangled himself.

The hurt that hath come to the church by vows.

IT is verily a thing to be lamented, that the church, for whom liberty was purchased with the inestimable price of the blood of Christ, hath been so oppressed with cruel tyranny, and almost overwhelmed with a huge heap of traditions: but in the mean time every man's private madness sheweth, that not without most just cause there hath been so much permitted by God to Satan and his ministers. For they thought it not enough neglecting the commandment of Christ, to bear any burdens that were laid upon them by false teachers, unless they did also each man procure to himself several burdens of his own, and so with digging pits for themselves should drown themselves deeper. This was done while they strove in devising of vows, by which there might be added to the common bonds a greater and straiter binding. Since therefore we have taught, that by their boldness who have born rule under the title of pastors in the church, the worshipping of God hath been corrupted, when they ensnared silly consciences with their unjust laws: here it will not be out of season to adjoin another evil which is near unto it, that it may appear that the world according to the perverseness of its own disposition, hath always always, with such stops as it could, put away the helps whereby it should have been brought to God. Now, that it may the better appear that very great hurt hath been brought in by vows, let the readers keep in mind the principles above set. For first we have taught, that whatever may be required to the framing of life godly and holily, is comprehended in the law. Again, we have taught that the Lord, that he might thereby the better call us away from devising of new works, hath comprehended the whole praise of righteousness in the simple obedience of his will. If these things be true, it is easy to judge that all feigned worshippings, which we invent to ourselves to deserve the favour of God, are not acceptable to him, how much soever they please us. And truly the Lord himself in many places doth not only openly refuse them, but also grievously abhor them. Hence ariseth a doubt of those vows which are made without the express word of God, what account is to be made of them, whether they may rightly be vowed by Christian men, and how far they bind them. For the same which among men is called a promise, in respect of God is called a vow. But to men we promise those things either which we think will be pleasant unto them, or which we owe out of duty. Therefore there ought to be a much more careful observation in vows which are directed to God himself, with whom we ought to deal more earnestly. In this point superstition hath in all ages marvellously raged, so that men without judgment and without choice, vowed unto God whatsoever came in their mind, or into their mouth. Hence came those follies, yea monstrous absurdities of vows among the heathens, wherewith they did too insolently mock with their gods. And I would to God that Christians also had not followed this their boldness. It ought not indeed to have been so; but we see that in certain ages past nothing hath been more usual than this wickedness, that people every where despising the law of God did wholly burn with mad greediness to vow whatsoever had pleased them in their dreams. I will not hatefully enforce, nor particularly rehearse how hainously and how many ways herein men have offended: but I thought good to say this by the way, that it may the better appear that we do not move a question of a needless matter, when we treat of vows.

The first thing to be respected in vows, is the person of God to whom they are made.

2. Now if we would not err in judging what vows are lawful and what are unlawful, it behooveth us to weigh three things: that is to say, who it is to whom the vow is made: who we are that make the vow: last of all with what mind we vow. The first point hath respect to this, that we should think that we have to do with God, whom our obedience so much delighteth, that he pronounceth all will-worship to be accursed, how gay and glorious soever it be in the eyes of men. If all voluntary worship, which we devise without commandment, be abominable to God, it followeth that no worship can be acceptable to him but that which is allowed by his word. Therefore let us not take so great liberty to ourselves as to dare to vow any thing to God which hath no testimony how it is esteemed of him. For whereas that which Paul teacheth, that whatsoever is done without faith is sin, extendeth to all actions, then verily it chiefly hath place, when thou directest thy thought the straight way to God. But if we fail and err even in the smallest things, (as Paul there disputeth of the difference of meats) where we have not a certainty of faith; how much more modesty is to be used, when we attempt a thing of the greatest weight? For nothing ought to be more earnest unto us than the duties of religion. Let this therefore be the first consideration in vows, that we never vow any thing till conscience have first certainly determined that it attempeth nothing rashly. But it shall then be free from danger of rashness, when it shall have God going before it, and as it were informing it by his word what is good and profitable to be done.

The second thing to be regarded in the making of a vow, is the measure of their strength that make it.

3. In the other thing which we have said ought here to be considered, this is contained, that we measure our own strength, that we have an eye to our vocation, that we neglect not the benefit of the liberty which God hath given us. For he who voweth what either is not in his power, or disagreeth with his vocation, is rash: and he that despiseth the bounty of God, whereby he is appointed Lord of all things, is unthankful. When I say thus, I do not mean that any thing is so set in our own hand, that standing upon the confidence of our own strength we may promise the same to God. For it was most truly decreed in the council at Araufum, that nothing is rightly vowed to God but that which we have received of his hand, forasmuch as all things which are offered him are his mere gifts. But ſince ſome things are by God's goodneſs given us, and other ſome things by his equity denied us: let every man (as Paul commandeth Rom. xii. 3. and 1 Cor. xii. 11.) have reſpect to the meaſure of grace given unto him. Therefore I here mean nothing elſe, but that vows muſt be tempered to that meaſure which the Lord preſcribeth there in his giving: leſt if thou attempt further than he permitteth, thou throw thy ſelf down headlong with taking too much upon thee. As for example. When thoſe murderers, of whom mention is made in Acts xxiii. 12. vowed that they would taſte no meat till Paul was ſlain: though the device had not been wicked, yet the raſhneſs itſelf was not to be ſuffered, that they made the life and death of a man ſubject to their power. So Iephtha Judg. xi. 30. ſuffered puniſhment for his folly, when with a raſh heat he conceived an unadviſed vow. In which kind unmarried life hath the chief place of mad boldneſs. For ſacrificing prieſts, monks, and nuns, forgetting their own weakneſs, think themſelves able to remain unmarried. But by what oracle are they taught that they ſhall have chaſtity throughout all their life, to the very end whereof they vow it? They hear the word of God concerning the univerſal ſtate of men, Gen. ii. 18. it is not good for man to be alone. They underſtand, and would to God that they did not feel that ſin remaining in us is not without moſt ſharp pricks. With what confidence dare they ſhake off that general calling all their life long: whereas the gift of continence is oftener granted for a certain time as opportunity requireth? In ſuch ſtubbornneſs let them not look for God to be their helper: but let them rather remember that which is ſaid, Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God. And this is to tempt God, to endeavour againſt the nature put in us by him, and to deſpiſe his preſent gifts as though they did not belong unto us. Which they not only do: but alſo marriage itſelf, which God thought it not againſt his majeſty to inſtitute, which he hath pronounced honourable in all men, Heb. xiii. 4. which Chriſt our Lord John ii. 2. hath ſanctified with his preſence, which he vouchſafed to honour with his firſt miracle, yet they dare call defiling, only to advance with marvellous commendations a certain unmarried life of what ſort ſoever it be. As though they themſelves did not ſhew a clear example in their life, that an unmarried ſtate is one thing, and virginity another: which life they moſt ſhamelesly call angelic, doing herein verily too great injury to the angels of God, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and ſomewhat elſe much worſe and filthier. And truly we need no arguments when they are openly confuted by the thing it ſelf. For we plainly ſee, with what horrible pains the Lord doth commonly take vengeance on ſuch arrogancy, and contempt of his gifts by too much truſt in themſelves. I ſpare for ſhame to ſpeak of their more ſecret faults, of which even this that is already perceived is too much. It is beyond doubt that we ought to vow nothing, that may hinder us from ſerving our vocation. As if a houſholder ſhould vow, that he will leave his wife and his children and take other charges in hand: or if he that is fit to bear office, when he is choſen vow that he will be a private man. But what is meant by this, when we ſaid that our liberty ſhould not be deſpiſed, hath ſome difficulty if it be not declared. Therefore thus in few words I expound it. Since God hath made us lords of all things, and hath made them ſubject unto us that we ſhould uſe them all for our convenience: there is no cauſe why we ſhould hope that it will be an acceptable work to God, if we yield our ſelves in bondage to outward things, which ought to be a help unto us. I ſay this for this purpoſe, becauſe many hereby ſeek praiſe of humility, if they inſnare themſelves with many obſervations, from which God not with-out cauſe willed us to be free and diſcharged. Therefore if we will eſcape this danger, let us always remember that we ought not to depart from that order which the Lord hath ordained in the chriſtian church.

The third thing to be reſpected in a vow, is the mind of the vower which in vows that have relation to the time paſt hath two ends to be directed by.

4. Now I come to that which I ſet in the third place: that it is very material with what mind thou makeſt a vow, if thou wilt have it allowed of God. For ſince the Lord regardeth the heart, not the outward ſhew, it cometh to paſs that the ſelf ſame thing, by changing the purpoſe of the mind, doth ſometimes pleaſe him and is acceptable unto him, and ſometimes highly diſpleaſeth him. If thou vow the abſtaining from wine, as though there were any holineſs in it, thou art ſuperſtitious; if thou have reſpect to any other end which is not evil, no man can diſallow it. But in my judgment there are four ends, to which our vows ſhall be rightly directed: of which for inſtructions ſake I refer two to the time paſt, and the other two to the time to come. To the time paſt past belong those vows, whereby we either testify our thankfulness to God for benefits received, or to crave the turning away of his wrath, we punish our selves for the offences that we have committed. Let us call the first sort, if you will, the exercises of thankfulness, the other of repentance. Of the first kind we have an example in the tithes which Jacob vowed, Gen. xxviii. 20. if the Lord did bring him home safe out of banishment into his country. Again in the old sacrifices of the peace offerings, which godly kings and captains, when they took in hand a just war, vowed that they would pay if they had obtained the victory, or at least when they were oppressed with any great distress, if the Lord had delivered them. So are all those places in the psalms Psal. xxii. 27. & lvi. 12. & cxvi. 14, 18. to be understood which speak of vows. Such vows at this day may also be in use among us, sooft as the Lord hath delivered us either out of any calamity, or from a dangerous sickness, or from any other danger. For then it is not against the duty of a godly man, to consecrate to God his vowed oblation, as a solemn token of his acknowlegement, lest he should seem unthankful toward his goodness. Of what sort the second kind is, it shall suffice to shew by a single example. If any by the vice of gluttony be fallen into any offence, nothing withstandeth but that to chastise his intemperance he may for a time forsake all dainty meats, and may do the same with a vow adjoined, that he may bind himself with the straiter bond. Yet I do not make a perpetual law to them that have likewise offended: but I shew what is lawful for them to do, who shall think such a vow profitable for themselves. I therefore make such a vow lawful, that in the mean time I leave it at liberty.

Two other ends of vows which have relation to the time to come.

5. The vows that are applied to the time to come, (as we have already said) tend partly to this end that we may be made more wary: and partly as it were by certain spurs we may be pricked forward to our duty. Some man seeth himself so inclined to some certain vice, that in a thing which otherwise is not evil, he cannot hinder himself from falling forthwith into an evil; he will do nothing inconveniently, if he do for a time by a vow cut off from himself the use of that thing. As if a man know that this or that apparel of body is dangerous to him, and yet enticed with desire he earnestly covet it, what can he do better, than if in putting a bridle upon himself, that is in charging himself with a necessity of abstaining from it, he deliver himself from all doubting? Likewise if a man be forgetful or slow to necessary duties of godliness, why may he not by taking a vow upon him both awaken his memory and shake off his slothfulness? In both I grant that there is a form of childish schooling: but even in this as they are helps to our weakness, they are not without profit used by the raw and imperfect. Therefore we shall say that those vows are lawful which have respect to one of these ends, especially in outward things, if they both be upheld with the allowance of God, and agree with our vocation, and be measured by the power of grace given us of God.

How to judge of vows; as well those which generally all men, or particularly some, make unto God.

6. Now also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all vows. There is one common vow of all the faithful, which being made in baptism we confirm and as it were establish by catechism and receiving of the supper. For the sacraments are as charters, by which the Lord delivereth to us his mercy, and thereby everlasting life, and we again on our behalfs promise him obedience. But this is the form or rather the sum of the vow, that forsaking satan, we yield our selves into God's service, to obey his holy commandments, and not to follow the perverse desires of our flesh. It ought not to be doubted but that this vow, since it hath a testimony of the scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to salvation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience to the law which God requireth of us. For since this form of covenanting is comprised within the covenant of grace, under which is contained both forgiveness of sins and the spirit of sanctification: the promise which we there make is joined both with beseeching of pardon, and craving of help. In judging of particular vows, it is necessary to keep in mind the three former rules, whereby we may safely weigh of what sort every vow is. But do not think, that I so commend the very same vow, which I affirm to be holy, that I would have them to be daily. For though I dare teach no certain rule of the number or time: yet if any man obey my counsel, he shall take upon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou oftentimes break forth into making of many vows, all religiousness will by the very continuance grow out of esteem with the, and thou shalt come to a yielding readineſs to fall into ſuperſtition. If thou bind thy ſelf with a perpetual vow, either for great pain and tedioufneſs thou ſhalt undo it, or being wearied with long continuance, thou ſhalt at one time or other be bold to break it.

Superſtitious vows of faſtings, pilgrimages and ſuch like.

7. Now alſo it is plain with how great ſuperſtition in this behalf the world hath in certain ages paſt been poſſeſſed. One man vowed that he would abſtain from wine: as though abſtaining from wine were of it ſelf a worſhip acceptable to God. Another bound himſelf to faſting, another to abſtaining from fleſh for certain days in which he had with vain opinion feigned to be a ſingular holineſs above the reſt. And ſome things alſo were vowed much more childiſh, though not by children. For it was held for great wiſdom, to take upon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, and ſometimes either to go all their journey on foot, or with their body half naked, that by their wearineſs the more merit might be gotten. Theſe and ſuch others, with incredible zeal whereof the world hath a while ſwelled, if they be examined by thoſe rules which we have above ſet, will be found not only vain and trifling, but full of manifeſt ungodlineſs. For however the fleſh judge, God abhorreth nothing more than feigned worſhippings. There are beſides this thoſe pernicious and damned opinions, that hypocrites when they have ſuch trifles think that they have gotten no ſmall righteouſneſs: they repoſe the ſum of godlineſs in outward obſervations: they deſpiſe all others that are leſs careful of ſuch things.

Monkiſh vows and the end why monkeries were firſt inſtituted.

8. To reckon up all the particular forms is to no purpoſe. But as the monkiſh vows are had in greater reverence, becauſe they ſeem allowed by the common judgment of the church: of thoſe it is proper to ſpeak briefly. Firſt leſt any ſhould by long preſcription defend monker, ſuch as it is at this day, it is to be noted that in old time there was in monaſteries a far other order of living. Such as were diſpoſed to exerciſe themſelves to the greateſt ſeverity and patience, went thither. For what manner of diſcipline they ſay the Lacedemonians had under the laws of Lycurgus, ſuch was at that time among the monks, yea and much more rigorous. They ſlept upon the ground: their drink was water: their meat was bread, herbs, and roots: their chief dainties were in oil and peaſe. They abſtained from all delicate diet and trimming of body. Theſe things might ſeem above truth, if they were not written by witneſſes that ſaw and proved them, as Gregory Nazianzen, Baſil, and Chryſoſtom. But by ſuch introductions they prepared themſelves to great offices. That the colleges of monks, were then as it were the ſeed-pots of the order of miniſters of the church, both theſe whom we have now named are a proof plain enough (for they were all brought up in monaſteries and from thence called to the office of biſhops,) and alſo many other ſingular and excellent men in their time. And Auguſtine ſheweth that this was alſo uſed in his time, that monaſteries produced clerks to the church. For he ſpeaketh thus to the monks of the iſle of Caprarea: but you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that you keep your purpoſe and continue to the end: and if at any time our mother the church ſhall require your labour, neither with greedy pride take it upon you, nor with flattering ſlothfulneſs refuſe it: but with a meek heart obey God. Neither prefer your own quiet leiſure above the neceſſities of the church: who if no good men would have aſſiſted her in her labour, you would not not have found how you ſhould have been born. He ſpeaketh there of the miniſtry, by which the faithful are ſpiritually born again. Alſo to Aurelius. There is both occaſion of falling given to themſelves, and moſt hainous wrong done to the order of the clergy, if forſakers of monaſteries be choſen to the ſoldierſhip of the clergy: when even of thoſe that remain in the monaſtery, we uſe to take into the clergy none but the moſt approved and beſt. Unleſs perhaps as the common people ſay, he is an ill piper but a good fidler: ſo it ſhall alſo be jeſtingly ſaid of us, he is an ill monk, but a good clerk. It is too much to be lamented, if we lift up monks into ſuch a ruinous pride, and think clerks worthy of ſo great reproach, whereas ſometimes even a good monk maketh not a good clerk, if he have ſufficient continuance and yet want neceſſary learning. By theſe places it appeareth, that godly men were wont with the diſcipline of monks to prepare themſelves for the government of the church, that they might being the fitter and better inſtructed, take ſo great an office upon them. Not that they all attained to this end, or even tended toward it, when for the moſt part they were unlearned men: but ſuch were choſen out as were meet for it.

9. But chiefly in two places he painteth out unto us the form of the The orders and exercises of ancient monks.

the old monkery. In the book of the manners of the catholic church, where he setteth the holiness of that profession against these slanders of the Manichees: and in another book which he entitled of the works of monks, where he inveigheth against certain degenerate monks, who began to corrupt that order. I will here gather a sum of those things which he saith, and so near as I can, I will use his own words. Despising (saith he) the inticements of this world, gathered into one most chaste and holy life, they spend their time together, living in prayers, readings, and disputations, not swelling with pride, not troublesome with stubbornness, nor pale with enviousness. None possesseth any thing of his own, none is burdensome, to any man. They get by working with with their hands those things wherewith both their body may be fed, and their mind not hindred from God. Their work they deliver to them whom they call deans. Those deans disposing all things with great carefulness make account thereof to one whom they call father. These fathers not only most holy in manners, but also most excellent in godly doctrine, high in all things, with no pride provide for them whom they call children, with great authority of them in commanding, and great willingness of the other in obeying: they come together at the very last time of the day, every one from his dwelling, while they are yet fasting, to hear that father, and there meet together to every of these fathers, at the least three thousand men, (he speaketh chiefly of Egypt, and of the East) then they refresh their body, so much as sufficeth for life and health, every man restraining his desire, not taking largely even of those things that they have present tho' very spare and vile. They not only abstain from flesh and wine, so much that they may be able to tame their lusts, but from such things which so much more greedily provoke appetite of the belly and throat, how much they seem to others, to be cleaner, under pretence whereof the filthy desire of exquisite meats, which is not in flesh, is wont to be so foolishly and foully defended. Whatsoever remaineth above necessary food (as there remaineth often much of their manufactures, and pinching of their fare) is with greater care distributed to the poor, than it was gotten by them that distribute it. For they do not work that they may have abundance of these things, but they by all means endeavour that that which they have abounding may not remain with them. Afterwards when he hath related the hardness, whereof he himself had seen examples both at Milan, and else where: among these things (saith he) no man is inforced to hard things which he cannot bear: no man is charged with that which he refuseth: neither is he therefore condemned by the rest, because he owneth he hath not strength to follow them: for they remember how much charity is commended: they remember that all things are clean to the clean. Therefore all their diligence watcheth, not to the refusing of kinds of meat as unclean, but to tame lust, and to retain the love of the brethren. They remember, 2 Cor. vi. 13. meat for the belly, and the belly for meats, &c. Yet many strong men abstain for the sake of the weak. Many of them have no need to do this: but because it pleaseth them to sustain themselves with baser diet and nothing sumptuous. Therefore they who being in health do forbear, if consideration of their health compel, when they are sick thy take without any fear. Many drink no wine, and yet they think not themselves defiled with it: for they most gently cause it be given to the fainter, and to them that cannot get the health of their body without it: and some who foolishly refuse it, they in a brotherly way admonish them that they be not with vain superstition sooner made weaker than holier. They diligently exercise godliness: but they know that the exercising of the body pertaineth but to a short time. Charity is chiefly kept: to charity the diet, to charity the speech, to charity the apparel, to charity the countenance is fitted. They meet and conspire into one charity. To offend it is counted as hainous as to offend God. If any resist charity, he is cast out and shunned. If any offend charity, he is not suffered to abide one day. Forasmuch as in these words, as in a painted picture, that holy man seemeth to have set out what kind of life monkery was in old time, though they were somewhat long, yet I was content to place them here: because I saw that I should have been somewhat longer if I had gathered the same things out of divers authors, how much soever I studied brevity.

The difference between popish monks and the monks of the old church.

10. But my purpose here is not to go through this whole matter, but only by the way to point out only what kind of monks the old church had, but what the profession of monks was at that time: so as the sound witted readers may judge by the comparison, what face they have who quote antiquity to maintain the present monkery. Augustine when he painteth a holy and true monkery, would put away all rigorous exacting of those things which by the word of the Lord are left us at liberty. But there is nothing that is at this day more severely required. For they count it a mischief that can never be purged, if any do never so little swerve from the prescribed rule in the colour or fashion of a garment, in a kind of meat, or in other trifling and cold ceremonies. Augustine stoutly maintaineth, that it is not lawful for monks to live idle upon other men. He denieth that there was ever in his time any such example of a well ordered monastery. Our men place the chief part of their holiness in idleness. For if you take idleness from them, where is that contemplative life whereby they boast they excel all other men, and approach near unto angels? Finally Augustine requireth such a monkery, as should be nothing but an exercise and help to the duties of godliness which are commended to all Christians. What? when he maketh charity the chief, yea, and almost only rule thereof, do we think that he praiseth an association, whereby a few men being bound together, are separated from the whole body of the church? But rather he desireth them by their example to give light to others to keep the unity of the church. In both these points there is so much difference between the old and present monkery that a man can scarcely find any thing more unlike, I will not say contrary. For our monks not contented with that godliness, to the study of which alone, Christ commandeth them that are his, continually to apply, imagine I wot not what new godliness, by meditation whereof they may be perfecter than others.

The monkish life only termed perfection by the Papists.

11. If they deny this, I would know of them why they vouchsafe to give their order alone the title of perfection, and take away the same from all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophistical solution, that it is not so called because it doth contain perfection in it, but because it is the best of all others to attain perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselves before the people, to insnare unskilful and unwary young men, when to maintain their privileges, when to advance their own dignity to the reproach of others, then they boast that they are in the state of perfection. When they are so hard pressed that they cannot defend this vain arrogancy, then they fly to this starting hole, that they have not yet attained perfection, but that they are in a state wherein they aspire unto it above others. In the mean time that admiration among the people remaineth, as though the monkish life alone were angelic, perfect, and cleansed from all fault. By this pretence they make very gainful markets, but that moderation lieth buried in a few books. Who doth not see that this is an intolerable mockery? But let us reason with them, as though they attributed no more to their profession than to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giving it this name, they do as by a special mark make it different from other kinds of life. And who can abide this, that so great honour should be given away to an ordinance that is no where allowed: and that by the same all other callings of God, which are by his own holy mouth not only commanded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted unworthy? And how great wrong (I beseech you) is done to God, when I wot not what new found thing is preferred above all the kinds of life ordained by himself, and praised by his own testimony?

Popish monks proud and vainglorious as if their obedience did extend to farther perfection than the law of Christ doth require to be in all men.

12. But go to, let them say that it is a slander which I have before said, that they are not contented with the rule prescribed by God. Yet though I hold my peace, they themselves do more than is necessary accuse themselves. For they openly teach, that they take upon them a greater burden than Christ laid upon his: because forsooth they promise to keep the counsels of the gospel concerning loving their enemies, not coveting of revenge, nor swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bound. Herein what antiquity will they shew forth against us? This never came into any of the old fathers minds. They all cry out with one voice that there was not one little word at all uttered of Christ, which ought not necessarily to be obeyed. And without any doubting they every where teach, that these very same things by name were commandments, which these good expositors triflingly say, Christ did only counsel. But forasmuch as we have before taught that this is a most pestilent error, let it suffice here to have briefly observed that the monkery which is at this day, is grounded upon the same opinion, which all the godly ought worthily to abhor: which is that there should be imagined some perfecter rule of life, than this com-common rule which is given by God to the whole church. Whatsoever is builded upon this foundation, cannot be but abominable.

Nothing less than monkish perfection meant by Christ in saying, if thou wilt be perfect sell all and give.

13. But they bring another proof of their perfection, which they think to be very strong for them. Our Lord said to the young man that asked him of the perfection of righteousness, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all thou hast, and give it to the poor. Whether they do so or no, I do not yet dispute: but grant them that for this present. Therefore they boast that they are made perfect by forsaking all theirs. If the sum of perfection consists in this, what means Paul when he teacheth that he who hath distributed all his goods to the poor, unless he have charity, is nothing? What manner of perfection is this, which if charity be absent, is brought to nothing? Here they must answer, that this is the chiefest, but not the only work of perfection. But here also Paul crieth out against them who stick not to make charity the bond of perfection, without any such forsaking. Col. iii. 14. If it be certain that there is no disagreement betwixt the master and the disciple, and the one of them clearly denieth the perfection of man to consist in this, that he should forsake all his goods, and again affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see how that saying of Christ is to be taken, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast. Now, it will be no dark sense, if we weigh (which we ought always to mark in all the preachings of Christ) to whom these words are directed. A young man asketh, by what works he shall enter into everlasting life. Luke xx. 25. Christ, because he was asked of works, sendeth him to the law, and rightfully: for it is the way of eternal life, if it be considered in itself, and is no otherwise unable to bring salvation unto us, but by our own perverseness. By this answer Christ declareth, that he taught no other rule to frame our life by, than the same that he had in old time been taught in the law of the Lord. So did he both give witness to the law of God, that it was the doctrine of perfect righteousness: and therewithal did answer slanders, that he would not seem by a new rule of life to stir up the people to forsake the law. The young man being indeed not of a bad mind, but swelling with vain confidence, answered that he had from his childhood kept all the commandments of the law. It is most certain that he was an infinite space distant from what he boasted he had attained. And if his boasting had been true, he had wanted nothing of the highest perfection. For we have before shewed, that the law containeth in itself perfect righteousness: and the same appeareth hereby, that the keeping of it is called the way of eternal salvation. That he might be taught to know how little he had profited in that righteousness, which he had too boldly answered he had fulfilled, it was necessary and useful to shake out a familiar fault of his. When he abounded in riches, he had his heart fastened upon them; therefore because he felt not this secret wound, Christ lanced him. Go (saith he) sell all that thou hast. If he had been so good a keeper of the law as he thought he was, he would not have gone away sorrowful when he heard this word. For he who loveth God with all his heart, whatsoever disagreeth with the love of him, he not only taketh it for dung, but abhorreth as bringing destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commandeth the covetous rich man to leave all that he hath, it is all one, as if he should command the ambitious man to forsake all honours, the voluptuous man all delights, and the unchaste man all the instruments of lust. Thus consciences that are touched with no feeling by general admonition, must be called back to the particular feeling of their own evil. Therefore they in vain draw this special case to a general exposition, as though Christ set the perfection of a man in forsaking of goods; whereas he meant nothing else by this saying, than to drive the young man that stood too much in his own conceit, to feel his own sore, that he might understand he was yet a great way distant from the perfect obedience of the law, which otherwise he did falsely take upon him. I grant that this place hath been ill understood by some of the fathers, and that hence grew this coveting of wilful poverty, whereby they only were thought to be blessed, who forsaking all earthly things, did dedicate themselves naked to Christ. But I trust that all the good and not contentious men will be satisfied with this my exposition, so that they shall no more doubt of the meaning of Christ.

Popish monks how unlike to the monks of old, even in respect of their very order and profession.

14. Howbeit the fathers thought nothing less, than to establish such perfection, as hath since been framed by the cowled sophisters, thereby to raise up a double Christianity. For that doctrine full of sacrilege was not yet hatched which compareth the the profeſſion of monkery to baptiſm, yea and openly affirmeth, that it is a form of ſecond baptiſm. Who can doubt that the fathers with all their heart abhorred this blaſphemy? Now as touching that laſt thing, which Auguſtine ſaith to have been among the old monks, that is, that they applied themſelves wholly to charity: what need I to ſhew in words that it is very far from this new profeſſion? The thing itſelf ſpeaketh, that all they that go into monaſteries, depart from the church. Why? Do not they ſeparate themſelves from the lawful fellowſhip of the faithful in taking to themſelves a peculiar miniſtry and private miniſtration of ſacraments? What is it to diſſolve the communion of the church, if this be not it? And that I may follow the compariſon which I began to make, and may once conclude it, what have they in this behalf like to the old monks? They although they dwelt ſeverally from other men, yet had not a ſeveral church: they did partake of the ſacraments together with others: they appeared at ſolemn aſſemblies: there they were a part of the people. Theſe men in erecting to themſelves a private altar, what have they elſe done but broken the bond of unity? For they have both excommunicate themſelves from the whole body of the church, and have deſpiſed the ordinary miniſtry, whereby the Lord willed to have peace and charity kept among his. Therefore how many miniſters there be at this day, I ſay that there be ſo many aſſemblies of ſchiſmatics, which troubling the order of the church, are cut off from the lawful fellowſhip of the faithful. And that this departing ſhould not be ſecret, they have given to themſelves divers names of ſects. Neither were they aſhamed to boaſt of that, which Paul doth ſo deteſt that he cannot ſufficiently amplify the hainouſneſs of it. Unleſs perhaps we think that Chriſt was divided of the Corinthians, when one gloried of one teacher, and another of another: and that now it is done without any injury to Chriſt, that inſtead of Chriſtians we hear ſome called Benedictines, ſome Franciſcans, ſome Dominicans: and that they are ſo called, that they themſelves when they covet to be ſeverally known from the common ſort of Chriſtians, do with great pride take theſe titles to them for the profeſſion of their religion.

A greater difference in the manners of theſe new and thoſe ancient monks.

15. Theſe differences which I have hitherto rehearſed between the old monks and the monks of our age, are not differences in manners, but in the profeſſion itſelf. Therefore let the readers remember that I have rather ſpoken of monkery than of monks, and have touched thoſe faults, not which ſtick in the life of a few of them, but which cannot be ſevered from their very order of living itſelf. But what difference is in their manners, what need I particularly to declare? This is certain, that there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthineſs of vices: no where are more factions, hatreds, affections of parties, ambitions hotter than among them. Indeed in a few monaſteries they live chaſtely, if it be to be called chaſtity where luſt is ſo far kept down that it is not openly ſpoken of: yet a man ſhall ſcarcely find every tenth monaſtery which is not rather a ſtews than a holy houſe of chaſtity. But what honeſt ſparing is in their diet? Swine are no otherwiſe fatted in ſtyes. But leſt they ſhould complain that I handle them too ungently, I go no further. Howbeit in thoſe few things which I have touched, whoſoever knoweth the thing itſelf will confeſs that there is nothing ſpoken accuſer-like. Auguſtine, when according to his teſtimony monks excelled in ſo great chaſtity, yet complaineth that there were many vagabonds, which with evil crafts and deceits wiped ſimple men from their money, which with carrying about the reliques of martyrs did uſe filthy merchandizings, yea and inſtead of the reliques of martyrs did ſhew forth the bones of any other dead men, and which with many ſuch wicked doings ſlandered the order. As he reporteth that he ſaw no better men than them which have profited in monaſteries, ſo he lamenteth that he had ſeen no worſe men than thoſe that diſprofited in monaſteries. What would he ſay if at this day he ſaw all monaſteries to ſwell, and in a manner to burſt with ſo many and ſo diſpaired vices? I ſpeak nothing but that which is well known to all men. Yet doth not this diſpraiſe pertain to all without any exception at all. For as there was never rule and diſcipline of living ſo holily eſtabliſhed in monaſteries, but that there remained ſome drones much unlike the reſt: ſo I do not ſay that monks are at this day ſo run out of kind from that holy antiquity, but that they have yet ſome good men in their flock. But they lie hidden, a few and ſcattered in that huge multitude of naughty and wicked men: and they are not only deſpiſed, but alſo lewdly railed at, and ſometimes cruelly handled of others, which (as the Mileſians proverb is) think that there ought to be no place for any honeſt man among them.

Some what amiſs even in the very profeſſion of monkery which was of old.

16. By this compariſon of the old and preſent monkery, I truſt I have brought to paſs that which I purpoſed, that it may appear that our cowled men do falſly pretend the example of the firſt church for defence of their profeſſion: for as much as they no leſs differ from them than apes from men. In the mean time I ſtick not to declare, that even in that old form which Auguſtine commendeth, there is ſomewhat which little pleaſeth me. I grant that they were not ſuperſtitious in exacting the outward exerciſes of rougher diſcipline, but I ſay there wanted not too much affectation and wrongful zeal. It was a goodly thing, forſaking their goods, to be without all earthly carefulneſs: but God more eſteemeth care to rule a houſhold godly, when a holy houſholder being looſe and free from all covetouſneſs, ambition, and other deſires of the fleſh, laboureth to this purpoſe to ſerve God in a certain vocation. It is a godly thing to play the philoſopher in a wilderneſs far from the company of men: but it agreeth not with Chriſtian gentleneſs, as it were for hatred of mankind to fly into deſarts and ſolitarineſs, and therewithal to forſake thoſe duties which the Lord hath chiefly commanded. Although we grant that there was no other evil in that profeſſion, yet this verily was no ſmall evil, that it brought an unprofitable and perilous example into the church.

The vows wherewith monks at this day enter into that order: as firſt perpetual virginity.

17. Now therefore let us ſee what manner of vows they be, wherewith monks at this day are profeſſed into this goodly order. Firſt, becauſe their mind is to inſtitute a new and feigned worſhipping to deſerve God's favour: I conclude by the things before ſpoken, that whatſoever they vow is abominable before God. Secondly, without any regard of God's calling, without any of his allowance, they invent for them ſuch a kind of living as pleaſeth themſelves. I ſay that it is raſh, and therefore an unlawful enterpriſe: becauſe their conſcience hath nothing whereupon it may uphold itſelf before God, and whatſoever is not of faith, is ſin, Rom. xiv. 23. Moreover when they bind themſelves to many perverſe and wicked worſhippings, which the monkery at this day containeth in it, I affirm that they be not conſecrate to God, but to the devil. For why was it not lawful for the prophet to ſay, that the Iſraelites offered their children to devils and not to God, (Pſal. cvi. 37.) only for this that they had corrupted the true worſhipping of God with prophane ceremonies: and ſhall it not be lawful for us to ſay the ſame of monks, which with their cowly do put upon themſelves a ſnare of a wicked thouſand ſuperſtitions? Now what ſort of vows are there? They promiſe to God perpetual virginity, as though they had bargained with God before, that he ſhould deliver them from need of marriage. There is no cauſe why they ſhould allege, that they do not make this vow but by truſting upon the grace of God. For ſince he pronounceth that he giveth it not to all men, it is not in us to conceive a confidence of a ſpecial gift. Let them that have it, uſe it, Mat. xix. 21. If at any time they feel themſelves to be troubled of their fleſh, let them flee to this help, by whoſe only power they may reſiſt. If they prevail not, let them not deſpiſe the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certain word of God are called to marriage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is only kept clean from whoredom, but whereby the mind keepeth the chaſtity undefiled. For Paul commandeth not only outward wantonneſs, but alſo the burning of the mind, to be avoided, 1 Cor. vii. 9. This (ſay they) hath from furtheſt time of memory been obſerved, that they which would dedicate themſelves wholly to the Lord, ſhould bind themſelves to the vow of continence. I grant indeed that this manner hath alſo been of antient time received: but I do not grant that that age was ſo free from all fault, that whatſoever was then done muſt be taken for a rule. And by little and little this unappeaſable ſeverity crept in, that after a vow made there was no room for repentance. Which is evident by Cyprian. If virgins have of faith dedicated themſelves to God, let them continue ſhamefaſtly, and chaſtely without any feigning. So being ſtrong and ſtedfaſt, let them look for the reward of virginity. But if they will not or cannot continue, it is better that they ſhould marry than with their delights fall into the fire. What reproaches would they now ſpare to tear him withal, that would with ſuch equity temper the vow of continency? Therefore they are departed far from that antient manner, which will not only admit no moderation or pardon if any be found unable to perform his vow: but they do without all ſhame pronounce that he ſinneth more grievouſly if he remedy the intemperance perance of the flesh with taking a wife, than if he defile both his body and soul with whoredom.

The bond of continual single life otherwise than now undertaken of old.

18. But they still enforce the matter, and go about to shew that such a vow was used in the apostle's time time: because Paul saith, that the widows which having been once received into the public ministry did marry, denied their first faith, 1 Tim. v. 12. But I do not deny to them, that the widows which bound themselves and their services to the church, did therewithal take upon them the bond of continual unmarried life: not because they reposed any religion therein, as it afterward began to be used: but because they could not bear that office, but being at their own liberty and loose from the yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once given their faith, they looked back to new marriages, what was this else but to shake off the calling of God? Therefore it is no wonder that with such desires, he saith that they wax wanton against Christ. Afterward to amplify the matter, he saith, that they do not so perform that which they have promised to the church, that they do also break and make void their first faith given in baptism: in which this is comprehended, that every man should answer his calling. Unless perhaps you had rather understand it thus, that having as it were lost all shame, they did from thenceforth cast away all care of honesty, did give forth themselves to all wantonness and unchastity, and did in licentious and dissolute life resemble nothing less than Christian women: which sense I like very well. Therefore we answer, that those widows which were then received to public ministry, did lay upon themselves a bond to continue unmarried: if they afterward married, we easily perceive that that happened to them which Paul speaketh of, that casting away shame they became more wanton than beseemed Christian women. That so they not only sinned, in breaking their faith given to the church, but swerved from the common law of godly women. But first I deny that they did profess unmarried life for any other reason, but because marriage agreed not with that ministry which they took in hand: and I deny that they did bind themselves at all to single life, but so far as the necessity of their vocation did bear. Again, I do not grant that they were so bound, but that it was then also better for them to marry, than either be troubled with the prickings of the flesh, or to fall into any uncleanness. Thirdly, I say that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commonly out of danger: especially since he commandeth them only to be chosen which contented with one marriage have already shewed a token of their continency. And we do for no other reason disallow the vow of unmarried life, but because it is wrongfully taken for a service of God, and it is rashly yowed of them to whom power of continence is not given.

St. Paul's words concerning widows wrested unto the maintenance of nuns.

19. For how was it lawful to draw this place of Paul to nuns? For there were created deaconnesses, not to delight God with singing and with mumbling not understood, and live the rest of their time idle: but that they should execute public ministration toward the poor, that they should with all study, earnestness and diligence, endeavour themselves with the duties of charity. They did not vow unmarried life, to yield thereby any worship to God because they abstained from marriage: but only because they were thereby the more uncumbred to execute their office. Finally they did vow it, neither in the beginning of their youth, nor yet in the midst of their flowing age, that they might afterward learn too late by experience into how great a headlong downfal they had thrown themselves: but when they seemed to have passed all danger, then they vowed a no less safe than holy vow. But (not to enforce their first two points) I say it was not lawful to have women received to vow continency before the age of threescore years: forasmuch as the Apostle admitteth only women of sixty years old, and commandeth both the younger to marry and bring forth children. Therefore, neither that release made of twelve years, and then twenty, and afterwards of thirty years can be any way excused: and much less is it tolerable, that silly maids, before that they can by age know themselves, or have any experience of themselves, are not only trained by fraud, but constrained by force and threatnings to put on those cursed snares. I will not tarry upon confuting the other two vows. Only this I say: besides this that they are intangled with not a few superstitions, (as the matter is now a days) they seem to be made to this purpose, that they which vow them should mock both God and men. But lest we should seem too maliciously to snake up every small parcel, we will be content with that general confutation which is above set.

20. What

The way for consciences intangled with rash vows to disengage themselves.

20. What manner of vows be lawful and acceptable to God, I think is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime unskilful and fearful consciences, even when they mislike or disallow any vow, do nevertheless doubt of the binding, and are grievously tormented when they both dread to break their faith given to God, and on the other side they fear lest they should more sin in keeping it: here they are to be succoured, that they may wind themselves out of this distress. But, to take away all doubt at once: I say that all vows being not lawful, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be void to us. For if in contracts of men those promises only do bind, in which he with whom we contract, would have us bound: it is an absurdity, that we should be driven to the keeping of those things which God doth not require of us: specially since our works are no otherwise right, but when they please God, and when consciences have this testimony that they please him. For this remaineth certain, whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the work which is taken in hand with doubting, is therefore faulty, because faith is the root of all good works, by which we are assured that they are acceptable to God. Therefore if it be lawful for a christian man to go about nothing without this assuredness: if by fault of ignorance they have taken any thing in hand, why should they not afterward give it over when they are delivered from errors? Since vows unadvisedly made are such, they do not only nothing bind, but are necessarily to be undone. Yea, if they are not only nothing esteemed, but also are abominable in the sight of God, as is above shewed? It is needless to discourse any longer of a matter not needful. This one argument seemeth to me to be enough to pacify godly consciences and deliver them from all doubt: that whatsoever works do not flow out of the pure fountain and are not directed to the lawful end, are refused of God and so refused that he no less forbiddeth us to go forward in them, than to begin them. For hereupon followeth, that those vows which proceed of error and superstition, are both of no value before God and to be forsaken of us.

Departure from monkery to some other honest kind of life justifiable.

21. Moreover he that shall know this solution, shall have wherewith he may defend against the slanders of the wicked, them that depart from monkery to some honest kind of life. They are grievously accused of breach of faith and perjury, because they have broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bond wherewith they were bound to God and to the church. But I say that there was no bond where God doth abrogate that which man confirmeth. Moreover, admitting that they were bound, when they were holden entangled with not knowing of God and with error: now since they are lightened with the knowlege of the truth, I say that they are therewithal free by the grace of Christ. Gal. iii. 3. For if the cross of Christ have so great effectualness, that it looseth us from the curse of the law of God, wherewith we were holden bound, how much more shall it deliver us from foreign bonds, which are nothing but the snaring nets of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his gospel, it is no doubt that he looseth them from all snares which they had put upon themselves by superstition. Howbeit they want not yet another defence, if they were not fit to live unmarried. For if an impossible vow be a sure destruction of the soul, whom the Lord would have saved and not destroyed: it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But how impossible is the vow of continence to them that are not indued with a singular gift, we have already taught, and experience speaketh it though I hold my peace. For neither is it unknown with how great filthiness almost all monasteries do swarm. And if any of them seem honester, and more shamefast than the rest, yet they are not therefore chaste because they suppress and keep in the fault of unchastity. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldness of men, who forgetting their own weakness, do against nature covet that which is denied them, and despising the remedies which the Lord had given them at hand, do trust that they can with stubbornness and obstinacy overcome the disease of incontinency. For what else shall we call it but stubbornness, when one being warned that he needeth marriage, and that the same is given him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not only despise it, but also bindeth himself with an oath to the despising of it?

CHAP XIV.

Of ſacraments.

The definition of a ſacrament. BESIDE the preaching of the goſpel, another help of like ſort is in the ſacraments: of which to have ſome certain doctrine taught, is much behoveful for us, wereby we may learn both to what end they were ordained, and what is how the uſe of them. Firſt it is meet to conſider what is a ſacrament. It ſeemeth to me that this ſhall be a plain and proper definition, if we ſay that it is an outward ſign, wherewith the Lord ſealeth to our conſciences the promiſes of his good will toward us, to ſuſtain the weakneſs of our faith: and we again on our behalfs do teſtify our godlineſs toward him as well before him and the angels as before men. We may alſo with more briefneſs define it otherwiſe: as to call it a teſtimony of God's favour toward us confirmed by an outward ſign, with a mutual teſtifying of our godlineſs toward him. Whetherſoever you chooſe of theſe definitions, it differeth nothing in ſenſe from that definition of Auguſtine, which teacheth that a ſacrament is a viſible ſign of a holy thing, or a viſible form of inviſible grace: but it doth better and more certainly expreſs the thing it ſelf. For whereas in that briefneſs there is ſome darkneſs wherein many of the unſkilfuller ſort are deceived: I thought good in more words to give a fuller ſentence, that there ſhould remain no doubt.

The ancient uſe of the word ſacrament. 2. For what reaſon the old writers uſed this word in that ſenſe, it is not hard to ſee. For ſo oft as the old tranſlator would render in Latin this Greek word Myſterion myſtery, ſpecially when divine matters were treated of, he tranſlated it ſacrament. So to the Epheſians, that he might make known unto us the ſacrament of his will. Eph. i. 9. and iii. 2. Again, if yet ye have heard the diſtribution of the grace of God, which is given to me in you, becauſe according to revelation the ſacrament was made known to me. To the Coloſſians, the myſtery which hath been hidden from ages and generations, but now is manifeſted to his ſaints, to whom the Lord would make known the riches of this ſacrament, &c. Col. i. 26. Again, to Timothy, A great ſacrament of godlineſs: God is openly ſhewed in the fleſh. 1 Tim. iii. 16. He would not ſay a ſecret, leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſay ſomewhat under hegreatneſs of the things. Therefore he hath put ſacrament inſtead of ſecret, but of a holy thing. In that ſignification it is ſometimes found among the eccleſiaſtical writers. And it is well enough known, that thoſe which in Latin are called ſacraments, in Greek are myſteries: which expreſſing of one thing in two ſeveral words endeth all the contention. And hereby it came to paſs that it was drawn to thoſe ſigns which had a reverend repreſentation of high and ſpiritual things. Which Auguſtine alſo noteth in one place. It were long (ſaith he) to diſpute of the diverſity of ſigns, which when they pertain to divine things, are called ſacraments. (Epi. 5. ad Marcel.) Sacraments ordained of God as ſeals of his promiſes, not that they: but we ſtood in need of ocnfirmation by ſuch means.

3. Now of this definition which we have ſet, we underſtand that a ſacrament is never without a promiſe going before it but rather is adjoined as a certain addition hanging to it, to this end that it ſhould confirm and ſeal the promiſe it ſelf, and make it more approved unto us, yea after a certain manner ratified. Which mean the Lord foreſeeth to be needful firſt for our ignorance and dulneſs, and then for our weakneſs: and yet (to ſpeak properly not ſo much to confirm his holy word, as to ſtabliſh us in the faith thereof. For the truth of God is by it ſelf ſound and certain enough, and canuot from any other where receive better confirmation than from it ſelf: but our faith, as it is ſmall and weak, unleſs it be ſtaid on every ſide, and be by all means upholden, is by and by ſhaken, wavereth, ſtaggereth, yea, and fainteth. And herein verily the merciful Lord according to his great tender kindneſs tempereth himſelf to our capacity: that, whereas we are natural men, who always creeping upon the ground, and ſticking faſt in the fleſh, do not think nor ſo much as conceive any ſpiritual thing, he vouchſafeth even by theſe earthly elements to guide us unto himſelf, and in the fleſh it ſelf to ſet forth a mirror of ſpiritual good things. For if we were unbodily (as Chryſoſtome ſaith) he would have given us the very ſame things naked and unbodily. (Hom. 60. ad popul.) Now becauſe we have ſouls put within bodies, he giveth ſpiritual things under viſible things. Not becauſe there are ſuch gifts planted in the natures of the things things which are set forth to us in the sacraments: but because they were signed by God to this signification.

With the sacraments the word of promise to be joined, not as they join it in the church of Rome, but as Christ did and taught this disciples after him to do.

4. And this is it which they commonly say, that a sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward sign. For we must understand the word to be, not that which being whispered without meaning and faith, only with noise as it were with a magical enchantment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached maketh us to understand what the visible sign meaneth. Therefore that which was usually done under the tyranny of the Pope, was not without a great prophaning of the mysteries. For they thought it enough, if the priest, while the people stood amazedly gazing at it without understanding, did mumble up the form of consecration. Yea, they of set purpose provided this, that no whit of doctrine should thereof come to the people: for they spake all things in Latin before unlearned men. Afterward superstition brake out so far that they believed that the consecration was not formally made, unless it were with a hoarse whispering sound which few might hear. But Augustine teacheth far otherwise of the saramental word. Let the word (saith he) be added to the element, and there shall be made a sacrament. (Hom. in John. 13.) For whence cometh this so great strength to the water, to touch the body and wash the soul, but by the word making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is believed. For in the very word it self the sound which passeth is one thing, and the power which abideth is another. This is the word of faith which we preach, saith the Apostle. Rom. x. 8. Whereupon in the Acts of the Apostles it is said, by faith cleansing their hearts. Act xv. 9. And Peter the Apostle said, by faith, so baptism also saveth us: not the putting away of the filthiness of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience, 1 Pet. iii. 21. this is the word of faith which we preach: by which without doubt, that it may be able to cleanse, baptism is also hallowed. You see how it requireth preaching, whereupon faith may grow. And we need not to labour much in proof hereof, forasmuch as it is clear what Christ did, what he commanded us to do, what the Apostles followed, what the purer church observed. Yea even from the beginning of the world it is known, that so oft as God offered any sign to the holy fathers, there was added an unseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made amazed with bare beholding. Therefore when we hear mention made of the sacramental word, let us understand the promise, which being with a loud voice preached of the minister, may lead the people thither as it were by the hand, whether the sign tendeth and directeth us,

A sophistical dilemma to exclude the use of sacraments.

5. Neither are some to be heard who labour to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather subtle than sound. Either (say they) we know, or we know not, that the word of God which goeth before the sacrament, is the true will of God. If we know it, than we learn no new thing of the sacrament which followeth after. If we know it, then neither will the sacrament teach it: whose whole force standeth in the word. Whereunto let this briefly be for an answer: that the seals which are annexed to patents and other public instruments, taken by themselves are nothing, forasmuch as they should be annexed in vain if the parchment had nothing written in it: yet they do not therefore not confirm and seal that which is written, when they are added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately feigned by us, which Paul himself used, calling circumcision a seal, where he purposely laboureth to prove, that circumcision was not righteousness to Abraham, but a sealing of that covenant, by faith whereof he had already been justified before, Rom. iv. 11. And what, I beseech you is there that may much offend any man, if we teach that the promise is sealed with sacraments, when of the promises themselves it is evident that one is confirmed with another? For as every one is manifester, so is it more fit to uphold faith. But the sacraments do both bring most clear promises, and have this peculiar more than the word, that they livelily represent them to us as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to move us, which is wont to be objected, between sacraments and seals of patents: that whereas both consist of carnal elements of this world, those cannot suffice or be meet to seal the promises of God, which are spiritual and everlasting, as these are wont to be annexed to, for sealing of the grants of princes concerning fading and frail things. For a faithful man, when the sacraments are present before his eyes, remaineth not in that fleshly sight, but by those degrees of proportion, which I have spoken of, he riſeth up with godly conſideration to the high myſteries which lie hidden in the ſacraments.

Sacraments as ſeals, pictures, pillars, glaſſes.

6. And ſince the Lord calleth his promiſes, covenants: Gen. vi. 18. and ix. 9. and xvii. 22. and his ſacraments ſeals of his covenants: a ſimilitude may well be brought from the covenants of men. What effect can the killing of a ſow have, if words were not uſed, yea unleſs they went before: for ſwine are many times killed without any more inward or higher myſtery. What can the giving of a mans right hand do, ſince oftentimes hands are matched with enmity? But when words have gone before, by ſuch ſigns the laws of covenants are eſtabliſhed though they were firſt conceived, made, and decreed in words. Therefore ſacraments are exerciſes which make the credit of the word of God more certain unto us: and becauſe we are carnal, they are delivered under carnal things, that ſo they ſhould inſtruct us according to the dulneſs of our capacity, and guide us by the hand as ſchoolmaſters guide children. For this reaſon Auguſtine calleth a ſacrament, a viſible word: becauſe it repreſenteth the promiſes of God, as it were painted in a picture, and ſetteth them before our ſight curiouſly expreſſed and as in an image. Other ſimilitudes alſo may be brought, whereby ſacraments may be more plainly ſet out, as if we call them pillars of our faith. For a building ſtandeth and reſteth upon the foundation: yet by ſetting pillars under, it is more ſurely eſtabliſhed: ſo, faith reſteth upon the word of God, as upon a foundation: but when the ſacraments are added, it ſtayeth yet more ſoundly upon them as upon pillars. Or if we call them looking glaſſes, in which we may behold the riches of the grace of God, which he giveth us. For (as we have already ſaid) he doth in them manifeſtly ſhew himſelf to us, ſo much as is given to our dulneſs to know, and he doth more expreſly teſtify his good will and love toward us than by his word.

Sacraments though adminiſtred to the wicked are teſtimonies nevertheleſs of the good will of God, and effectual to augment faith.

7. Neither do they reaſon juſtly, when they labour to prove hereby that they are not teſtimonies of the grace of God, becauſe they are alſo given to the wicked, who yet do not thereby feel God more favourable to them, but rather procure to themſelves more grievous condemnation. For by the ſame argument neither ſhould the Goſpel which is heard and deſpiſed by many, be the teſtimony of the grace of God: nor yet Chriſt himſelf, who was ſeen and known of many, of whom very few received him. The like we may alſo ſee in patents. For a great part of the multitude laugh at and ſcorn that authentic ſeal, tho' they know that it proceeded from the prince to ſeal his will withal: ſome regard it not, as a thing not pertaining to them: ſome alſo abhor it: ſo that conſidering this equal relation to both, the ſame ſimilitude which I have above uſed, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certain that the Lord doth offer unto us mercy and a pledge of his grace both in his holy word and in the ſacraments: but the ſame is not received but by them who receive the word and ſacraments with ſure faith: like as Chriſt is offered by the Father unto the ſalvation of all, yet he is not acknowleged and received by all. Auguſtine in one place intending to declare the ſame, ſaid that the effectualneſs of the word is ſhewed forth in the ſacrament: not becauſe it is ſpoken, but becauſe it is believed. Therefore Paul, when he ſpeaketh to the faithful, ſo treateth of ſacraments that he includeth the communion of Chriſt in them, as when he ſaith: Gal. iii. 27. all ye that are baptiſed, have put on Chriſt. Again, 1 Cor. xii. 1. we are all one body and one ſpirit, who are baptiſed in Chriſt. But when he ſpeaketh of the wrong uſe of the ſacraments, he giveth no more to it than to cold and uſeleſs figures. Whereby he ſignifieth, that tho' the wicked and hypocrites with their perverſeneſs do either oppreſs, darken, or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the ſacraments, yet that hindereth not but that where and ſo oft as it pleaſeth God, they may both bring a true teſtimony of the communicating of Chriſt, and the ſpirit of God himſelf may deliver and perform that which they promiſe. We determine therefore that ſacraments are truly called teſtimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certain ſeals of the good will which he beareth towards us: which by ſealing it unto us, do by this means ſuſtain, nouriſh, confirm, and increaſe our faith. As for the reaſons which ſome are wont to object againſt this ſentence, they are too triflling and weak. They ſay that if our faith be good, it cannot be made better: for they ſay that it is no faith, but which without ſhaking ſtedfaſtly, and without withdrawing, reſteth upon the mercy of God. It had been better for ſuch to pray with the apoſtles Luke xvii. 5. that the Lord would increaſe their faith, than careleſly to pretend ſuch a perfection tion of faith, which never any of the ſons of men have obtained, nor ſhall obtain in this life. Let them anſwer, what manner of faith they think that he had who ſaid: Mark. ix. 24. I believe, Lord, help my unbelief. For even that faith, though it was but a begun faith, was a good faith, and might be made better when unbelief was taken away. But they are confuted by no ſtronger argument than their own conſcience. For if they confeſs themſelves ſinners, (which whether they will or no they cannot deny,) they muſt needs impute the ſame to the imperfection of their faith.

Though we believe with all our hearts, and though it be the work of the holy Ghoſt, to begin, maintain and perfect faith, yet the ſacraments are not hereby proved ineffectual to increaſe faith.

8. But (ſay they Act. viii. 37.) Philip anſwered the eunuch, that he might be baptized, if he believed with all his heart. What place hath the confirmation of baptiſm here, where faith filleth the whole heart? Again, I aſk them whether they do not feel a good part of their heart void of faith: whether they do not daily acknowlege new increaſes. The heathen man gloried that he waxed old with learning. Therefore we chriſtians are very miſerable, if we wax old and profit nothing, whoſe faith ought to go forward by all degrees of ages, till it grow into a perfect man. Eph. iv. 15. Therefore in this place to believe with all the heart, is not perfectly to believe Chriſt, but only from the heart and with a ſincere mind to imbrace him: not to be with him, but with full fervent affection to hunger, and thirſt, and ſigh toward him. This is the manner of the ſcripture to ſay, that it is done with the whole heart, which it means to be done ſincerely and heartily. Of this ſort are theſe ſayings: Pſal. cxix. 10. cxi, 1. and cxxxviii. 1. I have with all my heart ſought the: I will confeſs to thee with all my heart, and ſuch other. As on the other ſide, where it rebuketh guilful and deceitful men, it uſeth to reproach them with a double. Pſal. xii. 3. Then they ſay further, that if faith be increaſed by ſacraments, the holy Ghoſt is given in vain, whoſe ſtrength and work it is to begin, maintain, and perfect faith. I grant, indeed, that faith is the proper and whole work of the holy Ghoſt, by whom being inlightened we know God and the treaſure of his goodneſs, and without whoſe light our mind is ſo blind, that it can ſee nothing, ſo ſenſeleſs, that it can ſmell nothing of ſpiritual things. But for one benefit of God which they ſet forth, we conſider three. For firſt the Lord teacheth and inſtructeth us with his word: then he ſtrengthneth us with the ſacraments: laſt of all he ſhineth into our minds with the light of his holy ſpirit, and openeth an entry for the word and ſacraments into our hearts, which otherwiſe ſhould but ſtrike our ears, and be preſent before our eyes, and not move the inward parts.

How the ſacraments are ſaid to confirm faith.

9. Wherefore as touching the confirmation and increaſe of faith, I would have the reader warned (which I think I have already in plain words expreſſed) that I do aſſign that miniſtry to the ſacraments, not as though I thought that there is always in them I know not what ſecret force, by which of themſelves they are able to further or confirm faith: but becauſe they are ordained by the Lord to this end, that they ſhould ſerve to the ſtabliſhing and increaſing of faith. But then only they truly perform their office, when that inward ſchoolmaſter the ſpirit comes along with them, by whoſe power only both the heart is pierced, and the affections moved, and the entry is ſet open for the ſacraments into our ſouls. If he be abſent, ſacraments can do no more to our minds, than if the brightneſs of the ſun ſhould ſhine upon blind eyes, or a voice ſound to deaf ears. Therefore I make ſuch a diviſion between the ſpirit and ſacraments, that the power of working may remain with the ſpirit, and to the ſacraments, be left only the miniſtration, yea and the ſame empty and trifling without the working of the ſpirit: but of much effectualneſs, when he inwardly worketh and putteth forth his force. Now it is plain in what manner according to this ſentence, a godly mind is confirmed in the faith by the ſacraments: that is to ſay, as the eyes ſee by the brightneſs of the ſun, and the ears hear by the ſound of a voice: of which the eyes ſhould not perceive any light, unleſs they had a ſight in themſelves that might naturally be inlightened, and the ears ſhould in vain be knocked at with any crying whatſoever it were, unleſs they were naturally made fit to hear. But if it be true, which ought at once to be determined among us, that what the ſight worketh in our eyes to ſeeing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our ears to the perceiving of a voice, the ſame is the work of the holy Ghoſt in our hearts, both to the conceiving, ſuſtaining, cheriſhing and ſtabliſhing of faith: then both theſe things likewiſe follow, that the ſacraments do not at all profit without out the power of the holy Ghoſt: and that nothing hinders but that in hearts already taught by that ſchoolmaſter, they may make faith both ſtronger, and increaſe it more. Only there is this difference, that the power of hearing and ſeeing is naturally ſet in our ears and eyes: but Chriſt beſide the meaſure of nature doth by ſpecial grace work the ſame in our minds.

By this doctrine concerning the force of the ſacraments nothing is taken from the power of the holy Ghoſt.

10. Whereby thoſe objections alſo, which trouble ſome men, are diſſolved: that if we aſcribe to creatures either the increaſe or confirmation of faith, there is wrong done to the Spirit of God, whom we ought to acknowlege the only author thereof. For we neither take from him either the praiſe of confirming or increaſing it: but we rather affirm when we ſay that he increaſeth and confirmeth faith, we mean nothing elſe but with his inward enlightening to prepare our minds to receive that confirming which is ſet forth by the ſacraments. But if it be yet too darkly ſpoken, it ſhall be made very clear by a ſimilitude which I will bring. If thou purpoſe with words to perſuade a man to do any thing, thou wilt ſearch out all the reaſons, whereby he may be drawn to thy opinion, and may be in a manner ſubdued to obey thy council. But thou haſt not hitherto prevailed, unleſs he likewiſe have a piercing and ſharp judgment, whereby he may weigh what pith is in thy reaſons, and alſo have a tractable wit and ready to hearken to teaching: finally unleſs he have conceived ſuch an opinion of thy faithfulneſs and wiſdom, as may be to him like a certain fore-judgement to cauſe him to ſubſcribe. For the are many ſtubborn heads, which a man can never bow with any reaſons: and alſo where credit is ſuſpected, where authority is deſpiſed, little good is done even with thoſe who are willing to learn. On the other ſide if all thoſe things concur, they will certainly bring the hearer, to whom thou giveſt counſel, to obey the ſame which otherwiſe he would have laughed to ſcorn. The ſame work alſo the Spirit worketh in us. For leſt there word ſhould beat our ears in vain, leſt the ſacraments ſhould ſtrike our eyes in vain, he ſheweth us that it is God who ſpeaketh therein, ſoftneth the ſtubbornneſs of our heart, and frameth it to the obedience which is due to the word of the Lord. Finally he conveyeth thoſe outward words and ſacraments from the ears into the ſoul. Therefore both the word and the ſacraments confirm our faith, when they ſet before our eyes the good will of the heavenly father towards us, by which knowlege the ſtedfaſtneſs of our faith ſtandeth faſt, and the ſtrength of it encreaſeth: the Spirit confirmeth it, when engraving the ſame confirmation in our minds he maketh it effectual. In the mean time the father of lights cannot be forbidden, but as he enlighteneth the bodily eyes with the beams of the ſun, ſo he may enlighten our minds with ſacraments, as with a brightneſs ſet mean between.

As by the ſacraments, ſo alſo by the word, faith is ſown, increaſed, and brought to ripeneſs thro' the forcible operation of the Spirit.

11. Which property the Lord taught was in his outward word, when in the parable he calleth it ſeed. Matth. xiii. 4. For as ſeed if it fall upon a deſart and untilled piece of ground, will die: but if it be thrown upon arable land well manured and tilled, it will bring forth fruit with very good increaſe: ſo the word of God, if it light upon a ſtiff neck, it will grow baren as that which is ſown upon ſand: but if it light upon a ſoul manured with the hand of the heavenly Spirit, it will be very fruitful. But if the reaſon of ſeed and of the word be like: as we ſay that from ſeed, corn both ſpringeth, increaſeth, and groweth up to ripeneſs; why may we not ſay that faith taketh from the word of God both beginning, increaſe, and perfection? Paul very well expreſſeth both theſe things in ſundry places. For when he puts the Corinthians in remembrance how effectually God uſed his labour, he glorieth that he hath the miniſtry of the Spirit, as though the power of the holy Ghoſt were with an unſeparable knot joined with his preaching, to enlighten and thoroughly move the mind. 2 Cor. ii. 4. But in another place when he intends to admoniſh them, of what force the word of God is of it ſelf being preached by man, he compareth the miniſters to huſbandmen, who when they have beſtowed their labour and travail in tilling the earth have no more to do. 1 Cor. iii. 6. But what profit ſhould tilling, ſowing, and watering yield unleſs that which is ſown receive life by heavenly benefit? Therefore he concludeth, that both he that planteth and he that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to be aſcribed to God, who alone giveth the increaſe. Therefore the Apoſtles in their preaching utter the power of the Spirit, ſo far as God uſeth the inſtruments ordained by himſelf to ſet forth his ſpiritual grace. Yet we muſt keep ſtill that diſtinction, and remember, what what man is able to do by himſelf, and what is proper to God.

When ſacraments are removed to take away mens confidence in thoſe things which were thereby confirmed, this ſhews them to be means whereby faith groweth, yet ſo that no power proper unto God be tranſcribed from him to them.

12. Sacraments are ſuch confirmations of our faith, that many times when the Lord intends to take away the confidence of the things that are by him promiſed in the ſacraments, he taketh away the ſacraments themſelves. When he ſpoileth and thruſteth away Adam from the gift of immortality, he ſaith: Gen. iii. 3. Let him not eat of the fruit of life, leſt he live for ever. What ſaith he? Could that fruit reſtore to Adam his uncorruption, from which he was now fallen? No. But this is all one as if he had ſaid: Leſt he ſhould enjoy a vain confidence if he keep ſtill the ſign of my promiſe, let that be ſhaken away from him which might bring him ſome hope of immortality. After this manner when the Apoſtle exhorteth the Epheſians Eph. ii. 12. to remember that they were ſtranger from the covenants, aliens from the fellowſhip of Iſrael, without God, and without Chriſt, he ſaith, that they were not partakers of circumciſion. Whereby he doth (by figure of tranſnomination) ſignify that they were excluded from the promiſe itſelf, who had not received the ſign of the promiſe. To their other objection, that the glory of God is conveyed to creatures, to whom ſo much power is aſcribed, and that thereby it is ſo far diminiſhed, we have in readineſs to anſwer that we ſet no power in creatures. Only this we ſay, that God uſeth ſuch means and inſtruments, as he ſeeth expedient: that all things may ſerve his glory, foraſmuch as he is Lord and judge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nouriſhment he feedeth our body; as by the ſun he enlighteneth the world; as by fire he warmeth; yet neither bread, the ſun, nor fire, are any thing but ſo far as by thoſe inſtruments he diſtributes his bleſſings unto us: ſo ſpiritually he nouriſheth faith by the ſacraments, whoſe only office is to ſet his promiſes before our eyes to be looked upon, and to be pledges unto us of them. And as it is our duty to place no confidence in the creatures, which by the liberality and bounty of God are ordained to our uſe, and by the miniſtery whereof he giveth us his gifts, nor to have them in admiration, and praiſe them as cauſes of our good: ſo neither ought our confidence to reſt finally in the ſacraments, nor the glory of God to be transferred unto them: but forſaking all things our faith and confeſſion ought to riſe up to him the author both of the ſacraments and of all things.

The word ſacrament tranſlated from the military to the Chriſtian profeſſion: the power which ſacraments have in augmenting faith not thereby diſapproved.

13. Whereas ſome bring an argument out of the very word Sacrament, it is not good. A ſacrament (ſay they) though it hath among allowed authors many ſignifications, yet it hath but one which agreeth with the ſigns: that is, whereby it ſignifieth that ſolemn oath which the ſoldier maketh to his captain when he entreth into the profeſſion of a ſoldier. For as by that oath of warefare new ſoldiers pledge their faith to the captain, and profeſs to be his ſoldiers: ſo by our ſigns we profeſs Chriſt our captain, and teſtify that we ſerve under his banner. They add ſimilitudes to make the matter more plain. As a gown made the Romans known from the Greeks who wore cloaks: as the very ranks of men at Rome were diſcerned by their ſeveral ſigns: the degree of ſenators from the degree of knights, by a purple coat and picked ſhoes: again a knight from a commoner, by a ring: ſo we bear our ſigns that may make us known from prophane men. But by the things above ſaid it is evident that the old writers, who gave to the ſigns the name of ſacraments, had no regard how this word was uſed among Latin writers, but for their own purpoſe feigned this new ſignification, whereby they ſignified only holy ſigns. But if we will ſearch the matter more deeply, it may ſeem that they have with the ſame relation applied this word to ſuch a ſignification, wherewith they have removed the name of faith to that ſenſe wherein it is now uſed. For whereas faith is a truth in performing promiſes: yet they have called faith an aſſurance, or ſure perſwaſion which is had of the truth itſelf. Likewiſe whereas a ſacrament is the ſoldier's part whereby he voweth himſelf to his captain: they have made it the captain's part, whereby he receiveth ſoldiers into rooms of ſervice. For by the ſacrament the Lord doth promiſe that he will be our God, and that we ſhall be his people. But we paſs over ſuch ſubtilties, as I think I have proved with plain enough arguments, that they had reſpect to nothing elſe but to ſignify that theſe are ſigns of holy and ſpiritual things. We receive indeed the ſimilitudes which they bring of outward tokens: but we allow not that that which is the laſt point in the ſacraments, is by them ſet for the chief, and only thing. But this is the firſt point, that they ſhould ſerve our faith before God: the later point that they ſhould teſtify our confeſſion before men. According to this latter conſideration thoſe ſimilitudes have place. But in the mean time let that firſt point remain: becauſe otherwiſe (as we have already proved) the myſteries ſhould be but cold, unleſs they were helps to our faith, and additions to doctrine ordained to the ſame uſe and end.

As by ſome too little, ſo by others to much force is aſcribed unto ſacraments.

14. Again we muſt be warned, that as theſe men weaken the force, and utterly overthrow the uſe of ſacraments: ſo on the contrary, there are ſome who feign to ſacraments I wot not what ſecret virtues which are no where read to be put in them by God. By which error the ſimple and unlearned are dangerouſly deceived, while they are taught to ſeek the gifts of God where they cannot be found, and are by little and little drawn away from God, to embrace mere vanity inſtead of his verity. For the Sophiſtical ſchools have taught with one conſent, that the ſacraments of the new law, that is to ſay, thoſe which are now in uſe in the Chriſtian church juſtify and give grace, if we do not ſtop it by ſome deadly ſin. It cannot be expreſſed how pernicious and peſtilent this opinion is, and ſo much the more, becauſe many ages heretofore, to the great loſs of the church, it hath prevailed in a great part of the world. Truly it is utterly deviliſh. For when it promiſeth righteouſneſs without faith, it driveth ſouls headlong into deſtruction: then becauſe it fetcheth the cauſe of righteouſneſs from the ſacraments, it bindeth the miſerable minds of men, already bending naturally too much to the earth, with this ſuperſtition that they rather reſt in the ſight of a bodily thing than of God himſelf. Which two things I would to God we had not ſo proved in experience, ſo they need not any long proof. But what is a ſacrament taken without faith, but the moſt certain deſtruction of the church? For as nothing is to be looked for therefrom without the promiſe, and the promiſe doth no leſs threaten wrath to the unfaithful, than it offereth grace to the faithful: he is deceived who thinketh that there is any more given him by the ſacraments, than that which being offered by the word of God, he receiveth by faith. Whence another thing alſo is gathered, that the affiance of ſalvation dependeth not upon the partaking of the ſacrament, as tho' juſtification conſiſted therein: which we know to be repoſed in Chriſt only, and to be communicated unto us no leſs by the preaching of the goſpel, than by the ſealing of the ſacrament: and without that it cannot ſtand. So true is that which Auguſtine alſo writeth, (Libr. 4. de quæſt. vet. teſtament.) that inviſible ſanctification may be without a viſible ſign, and again that a viſible ſign may be without true ſanctification. For (as he alſo writeth in another place, Lib. 5. de bap. cont. Donat cap. 14.) men do put on Chriſt ſometimes until the receiving of a ſacrament, ſometimes even until the ſanctification of life. And that firſt point may be commonly both to good and to evil: but the other is proper to the good and godly.

Hidden grace not always joined with the viſible ſign of the ſacraments.

15. Hence cometh that diſtinction if it be well underſtood, which the ſame Auguſtine hath often obſerved, between a ſacrament, and the thing of the ſacrament. For it not only ſignifieth, that the figure and truth are there contained, but that they are not ſo joined together but that they may be ſeparated: and that even in the very conjoining the thing muſt always be diſcerned from the ſign, that we give not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He ſpeaketh of the ſeparation, when he writeth that the ſacraments work in the elect only that which they figure. Again, when he writeth thus of the Jews: when the ſacraments were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the ſacraments. So now alſo the waſhing of regeneration is common to all: but the grace itſelf, whereby the members of Chriſt are regenerate with their head, is not common to all. Again, in another place of the ſupper of the Lord, We alſo at this day receive viſible meat. But the ſacrament is one thing, and the power of the ſacrament another thing. What is this, that many receive of the altar and die, and in receiving to die? For the Lord's morſel was poiſon to Judas: not becauſe he received a bad thing, but becauſe he being evil received a good thing evily. A little after: The ſacrament of this thing, that is of the unity of the body and blood of Chriſt, is ſomewhat prepared on the Lord's tabledaily, ſomewhere by certain diſtances of days: and thereof is received into life by ſome and into deſtruction by ſome. But the thing itſelf whereof it is a ſacrament, is received into life by all men, but unto deſtruction by no man, whoever is partaker of it.

And

And a little before he had ſaid, He ſhall not die who eateth: but he who pertaineth to the power of the ſacrament, not to the viſible ſacrament: who eateth within, not without: who eateth with the heart, not he who preſſeth with his tooth. Thus you hear every where, that a ſacrament is ſo ſeparated from his own truth by the unworthineſs of the receiver, that their remaineth nothing but a vain and unprofitable figure. But that thou mayeſt not have a ſign void of truth, but the thing with the ſign, thou muſt conceive by faith the word which is there incloſed. So how much thou ſhalt by the ſacraments profit in communicating of Chriſt, ſo much profit ſhalt thou take of them.

Chriſt the ſubſtance of all ſacraments and the only cauſe of righteouſneſs: the ſacraments effectual meanes to nouriſh the knowlege of Chriſt tho' the wicked lacking faith not nouriſhed by them.

16. If this be ſomewhat dark becauſe of the ſhortneſs, I will ſet it out in more words. I ſay that Chriſt is the matter, or (if thou wilt) the ſubſtance of all ſacraments: for as much as in him they have all their perfection, and do promiſe nothing without him. So much leſs tolerable is the error of Peter Lombard, who doth expreſly make them cauſes of righteouſneſs and ſalvation, whereof they are only parts. Therefore bidding all cauſes farewel, which man's wit doth imagine to itſelf, we ought to ſtay in this one cauſe. Therefore how much we are by their miniſtry helped to the nouriſhing, confirming, and increaſing of the true knowlege of Chriſt in us, and to the poſſeſſing of him more fully, and to the enjoying of his riches, ſo much effectualneſs they have with us. But that is done when with true faith we receive that which is there offered. Do the wicked then (wilt thou ſay) bring to paſs by their unthankfulneſs, that the ordinances of God are void and turn to nothing? I anſwer that what I have ſaid, is not ſo to be taken, as though the efficacy and truth of the ſacrament did depend upon the ſtate or will of him that receiveth it. For that which God hath ordained remaineth ſtedfaſt and keepeth ſtill its nature, however men vary. But ſince it is one thing to offer, and another to receive; nothing hinders but that the ſign hallowed by the word of God may be indeed that which it is called, and keep its own force: and yet that there come thereby no profit to an evil doer and wicked man. But Auguſtine doth in few words well ſolve this queſtion. If (ſaith he) thou receiveſt carnally, it ceaſeth not to be ſpiritual; but it is not ſo to thee. But as Auguſtine hath in the aforeſaid places ſhewed that a ſacrament is a thing of no worth, if it be ſeparated from the truth thereof: ſo in another place he giveth warning that even in the very conjoining there needeth a diſtinction, leſt we reſt too much in the outward ſign. As (ſaith he) to follow the letter, and to take the ſigns inſtead of the things, is a point of ſervile weakneſs: ſo to expound the ſigns unprofitably is a point of evil wandring error. He nameth two faults which are here to be avoided: the one when we ſo take the ſigns as though they were given in vain, and when with abaſing or diminiſhing their ſecret ſignifications by our enviouſneſs we bring to paſs that they bring us no profit at all. The other, when in not raiſing our minds beyond the viſible ſign, we give to the ſacraments the praiſe of all thoſe good things which are not given us but by Chriſt only, and that by the holy Ghoſt, who maketh us partakers of Chriſt himſelf: and indeed by the help of the outward ſigns: which if they allure us to Chriſt, when they are wreſted in another way, the whole profit of them is unworthily overthrown.

Chriſt ſet forth as by the word, ſo by the ſacraments neither available without faith, to whom they are available in them they work not by ſecret included force, grace cometh with the ſacraments, not from the ſacraments, but from God.

17. Wherefore let this remain certain, that there is no other uſe of the ſacraments than of the word of God: which is to offer and ſet forth Chriſt unto us, and in him the treaſures of heavenly grace, but they avail or profit nothing except when received by faith: even as wine, oil, or any other liquor, tho' you pour it on largely, yet it will run by and periſh, unleſs the veſſel's mouth be open to receive it, and the veſſel though it be wet round about the ſide will nevertheleſs remain void and empty within. Beſide this we muſt beware, leſt thoſe things which have been written by the old writers ſomewhat too vain glorioufly to amplify the dignity of ſacraments, which lead us away into an error near this: namely that we ſhould think that there is ſome ſecret power knit and faſtened to the ſacraments, that they can of themſelves give us the graces of the holy Ghoſt, as wine is given in a cup: whereas only this office is appointed to them by God, to teſtify and eſtabliſh to us the good will of God toward us, and profit no further unleſs the holy Ghoſt join himſelf to them, who can open our minds and hearts, and make us partakers of this teſtimony, wherein alſo clearly appear divers and ſeveral graces of God. For the ſacraments, as we have above touched, are that thing to us of God, which to men are meſſengers of joyful things, or earneſts in confirming of bargains: which do not of themſelves give any grace, but tell and ſhew us, and (as they are earneſts and tokens,) do ratify unto us thoſe things that are given us by the liberality of God. The holy Ghoſt (whom the ſacraments do not in common without difference bring to all men, but whom the Lord peculiarly giveth to them that are his) is he that bringeth the graces of God with him, who giveth to the ſacraments place in us, who maketh them to bring forth fruit. But tho' we do not deny that God himſelf with the power of his Spirit is preſent with his own inſtitution, leſt the miniſtration which he hath ordained of the ſacraments ſhould be fruitleſs and vain: yet we affirm that the inward grace of the Spirit, as it is ſeparated from the outward miniſtry, ſo ought to be ſeparatly weighed and conſidered. God therefore truly performeth indeed whatſoever he promiſeth and figureth in ſigns: neither doth the ſigns want their effect, that the author of them may be proved true and faithful. The queſtion here is only whether God worketh by his own and by inward power (as they call it) or reſigneth his office to outward ſigns. But we affirm, that whatever inſtruments he uſe, his original working is nothing hindred thereby. When this is taught concerning the ſacraments, both their dignity is honourably ſet out, and their uſe is plainly ſhewed, and their profitableneſs is abundantly reported, and the beſt mean in all theſe things is retained, that neither any thing is attributed to them which ought not, nor again any thing taken from them which is not proper to be taken from them. In the mean time that feigned device is taken away, whereby the cauſe of juſtification and power of the holy Ghoſt is incloſed in elements as in veſſels or waggons, and that principal force which hath been ommitted of others is expreſly ſet out. Here alſo it is to be noted, that God inwardly worketh that which the miniſter figureth and teſtifieth by outward action: leſt that be given to a mortal man, which God claimeth to himſelf alone. The ſame thing alſo doth Auguſtine wiſely touch. How (ſaith he) doth both Moſes ſanctify, and God: not Moſes for God: but Moſes with viſible ſacraments by his miniſtry, and God with inviſible grace by his holy Spirit: where alſo is the whole fruit of viſible ſacraments. For without this ſanctification of inviſible grace, what do thoſe viſible ſacraments profit?

18. The name of Sacrament, as we have hitherto treated of the nature of it doth generally contain all the ſigns that ever God gave to men, to certify and aſſure them of the truth of his promiſes. Thoſe he ſometimes willed to remain in natural things, ſometimes he delivered them in miracles. Of the firſt kind theſe are examples as when he gave Adam and Eve the tree of life as an earneſt of immortality, that they might aſſure themſelves of it, ſo long as they did eat of the fruit thereof, Gen. ii. 17. and iii. 3. And when he ſet the rain bow for a monument to Noah and his poſterity, that he would no more from thence forth deſtroy the earth by the overflowing of water, Gen. ix. 13. Theſe Adam and Noah had for ſacraments. Not that the tree did give them immortality, which it could not give to it ſelf: nor that the bow (which is but a ſtriking back of a ſun-beam upon the clouds againſt it) was of force to hold in the waters: but becauſe they had a mark graven in them by the word of God, that they ſhould be examples and ſeals of his covenant. And the tree was a tree before, and the bow a bow. When they were written upon with the word of God, then a new form was put into them, that they ſhould begin to be that which they were not before. That no man may think theſe things ſpoken without cauſe, the bow itſelf is at this day alſo a witneſs of that covenant which God made with Noah: which bow ſo oft as we behold, we read this promiſe of God written in it, that the earth ſhall never be deſtroyed with overflowing of waters. Therefore if any fooliſh philoſopher, to mock the ſimplicity of our faith, do affirm that ſuch variety of colours do naturally ariſe from reflected beams and a cloud ſet againſt them: let us grant it indeed, but let us laugh to ſcorn his ſenſeleſs folly, who doth not acknowlege God the Lord and governour of nature: who at his pleaſure uſeth all the elements to the ſervice of his own glory. If he had imprinted ſuch tokens in the ſun, the ſtars the earth, ſtones, and ſuch like, they ſhould all have been ſacraments to us. Why are not uncoined and coined ſilver both of one value, ſince they are both one metal: becauſe the one hath nothing but what it is natural, when it ſtruck with a common mark, it is made money, and receiveth a new value. And ſhall not God be able to mark his creatures with his word, that they may be made ſacraments, which before were naked elements? Of the second kind these were examples, when he shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking oven, Gen. xv. 17.: when he watereth the fleece with dew, the earth remaining dry: again he watered the earth, the fleece being untouched, to promise victory to Gideon, Judges vi. 37.: when he drew the shadow of the dial nine lines backward, to promise safety to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. 9. and Isa. xxxviii. 7. These things, when they were done to relieve and confirm the weakness of their faith, were then also sacraments.

Sacraments on God's behalf testimonies of grace on ours notes and andmarks of profession.

19. But our present purpose is, to discourse peculiarly of those sacraments, which the Lord appointed to be ordinary in his church to nourish his worshippers and servants into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to use the words of Augustine) men can be settled together into no name of religion either true or false, unless they be bound together with some fellowship of visible signs and sacraments. Since therefore the most good Father forsaw this necessity, he did from the beginning ordain certain exercises of godliness for his servants, which afterwards Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippings, hath many ways depraved and corrupted. Hence came those solemn professions of the Gentiles into their holy orders, and other bastard usages: which though they were full of error and superstition, yet they also were therewith a proof that men could in profession of religion be without such outward signs. But because they were neither grounded upon the word of God, nor were referred to that truth whereunto all signs ought to be directed, they are unworthy to be spoken of where mention is made of the holy signs which are ordained by God, and have not swerved from their foundation, that is, that they should be helps to true godliness. They consist not of bare signs, as were the bow and the tree, but upon ceremonies: or rather the signs that are here given are ceremonies. But as it is above said, that they are on the Lord's behalf testimonies of grace and salvation; so they are again on our behalf marks of profession, by which we openly swear to the name of God, for our parts binding our faith unto him. Therefore Chrysostom in one place fitly calleth them covenantings whereby God bindeth himself in league with us, and we are bound to purity and holiness of life, because here is made a mutual form of covenanting between God and us. For as the Lord therein promiseth that he will cancel and blot out whatever guilt and penalty we have contracted by offending, and doth reconcile us to himself in his only begotten Son: so we again on our behalf by this profession bind ourselves unto him to follow godliness and innocency: so that a man may rightly say that such sacraments are ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring up, and strengthening of faith inwardly then to the testifying of religion before men.

Sacraments before Christ, and after, and the scope of both.

20. And these sacraments also were different, after the divers order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lord to shew himself after this or that manner to men. For to Abraham and his posterity circumcision was commanded, Gen. xvii. 10. whereunto afterward purifyings and sacrifices, and other ceremonies were added by the law of Moses, Levit. x. These were the sacraments of the Jews until the coming of Christ: at whose coming those being abrogate, two sacraments were ordained, which the christian church now useth, baptism, and the supper of the Lord, Matth. xxviii. 19. and xxvi. 26. I speak of those that were ordained, for the use of the whole church. As for the laying on of hands, whereby the ministers of the church are entered into their office, as I do not unwillingly suffer it to be called a sacrament, so I do not reckon it among the ordinary sacraments. As for the rest which are commonly called sacraments, what they are to be accounted, we shall see by and by. Howbeit the old sacraments also had respect to the same mark, whereunto ours tend, that is, direct and in a manner lead us by the hand to Christ: or rather as images to represent him, and shew him forth to be known. For as we have already taught, that they are certain seals wherewith the promises of God are sealed: and where it is most certain that there was never any promise offered of God, to men but in Christ: that they may teach us of some promise of God, they must needs shew Christ. Whereunto pertaineth that heavenly pattern of the tabernacle and of the worshipping in the law, which was given to Moses in the mount. One only difference there is, that those did shadow out Christ being promised, when he was yet looked for: these do testify him already given and delivered.

The intent of circumcision, purify-made much plainer. Circumciſion was to the Jews a ſign, whereby they were put in mind, that whatſoever cometh of the ſeed of man, that is to ſay the whole nature of man is corrupt, and hath need of pruning. Moreover it was a teaching, and token of remembrance whereby they ſhould confirm themſelves in the promiſe given to Abraham, concerning that bleſſed ſeed in whom all the nations of the earth were to be bleſſed, Gen. xxii. 18. from whom they had their own bleſſing to be looked for. Now that healthful ſeed (as we are taught of Paul Gal. iii. 16.) was Chriſt, in whom alone they hoped that they ſhould recover that which they had loſt in Adam. Wherefore circumciſion was to them the ſame thing which Paul ſaith that it was to Abraham, namely a ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith: that is to ſay, the ſeal where by they ſhould be more certainly aſſured, that their faith wherewith they looked for that ſeed, ſhould be accounted to them of God for righteouſneſs. Rom. iv. 11. But we ſhall on a more proper occaſion in another place go through with the compariſon of circumciſion and baptiſm. Baptiſings and purifyings did ſet before their eyes their own uncleanneſs, filthineſs and pollution, wherewith they were defiled in their own nature: but they promiſed another waſhing, whereby all their filthineſſes ſhould be wiped and waſhed away. Heb ix. 1. And this waſhing was Chriſt, with whoſe blood being waſhed, we bring his cleanneſs into the ſight of God, that it may hide all our defilings. 1 John. i. 7. Rev. i. 5. Their ſacrifices did accuſe them of wickedneſs, and alſo taught, that it was neceſſary that there ſhould be ſome ſatisfaction which ſhould be paid to the judgement of God. That for this there ſhould be ſome one chief biſhop, a mediator between God and men, who ſhould ſatisfy God by ſhedding of blood, and by offering of a ſacrifice which ſhould ſuffice for the forgiveneſs of ſins. This chief prieſt was Chriſt: he himſelf ſhed his own blood: he himſelf was the ſacrifice: for he offered himſelf obedient to his Father unto death: by which obedience he took away the diſobedience of man, who had provoked the diſpleaſure of God. Heb. iv. 14. and v. 5. and ix. 11. Phil. ii. 8. Rom. v. 19.

The ſacraments of the new teſtament baptiſm and the ſupper of the Lord, wherein Chriſt ſhineth more clearly than in the ſacraments of the old.

22. As for our ſacraments, they do ſo much more clearly preſent Chriſt unto us, as he was more nearly ſhewed to men, ſince he hath been truly delivered of his father ſuch as he had been promiſed. For baptiſm teſtifieth unto us that we are cleanſed and waſhed, the ſupper of thankſgiving teſtifieth that we are redeemed. In water, is figured waſhing: in blood, ſatisfaction. Theſe two things are found in Chriſt, which (as John ſaith) came in water and blood, that is to ſay, that he might cleanſe and redeem. Of which thing the ſpirit of God alſo is a witneſs, Yea there are three witneſſes in one, water, blood, and ſpirit. 1 John. v. 6. In water and blood we have a teſtimony of cleanſing and redeeming: but the ſpirit the principal witneſs bringeth unto us aſſured credit of ſuch witneſſing. This high myſtery hath notably well been ſhewed us in the croſs of Chriſt, when water and blood flowed out of his holy ſide: John. xix. 34. which ſide for that cauſe Auguſtine juſtly called the fountain of our ſacraments: of which yet we muſt treat ſomewhat more at large. There is no doubt but that more plentiful grace alſo of the ſpirit doth here ſhew forth it ſelf if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kingdom of Chriſt, as we gather out of many places, but ſpecially out of the ſeventh chapter of John. In which ſenſe we muſt take that ſaying of Paul, Col. ii. 17. that under the law were ſhadows, but in Chriſt is the body. Neither is it his meaning to ſpoil the teſtimonies of grace of their power, in which God's will was in old time to prove himſelf to the fathers a true ſpeaker, even as at this day he doth to us in baptiſm and in the holy ſupper. But his purpoſe was only by way of compariſon to magnify that which was given us leſt any ſhould think it marvellous, that the ceremonies of the law were aboliſhed by the coming of Chriſt.

Too great a difference made by ſchoolmen between the ſacraments of the law and ours.

23. But that doctrine of the ſchoolmen (as I may alſo briefly touch this by the way) is utterly to be hiſſed out, whereby there is made ſo great a difference between the ſacraments of the old and new law, as though thoſe did only ſhadow out the grace of God, and theſe do preſently give it. For the apoſtle ſpeaketh no leſs honorably of thoſe than theſe when he teacheth that the fathers did eat the ſame ſpiritual meat which we eat, and expoundeth that ſame meat to be Chriſt. 1 Cor. x. 3. Who dare make that an empty ſign, which delivered to the Jews.

Jews a true communion of Chriſt? And the ground of the cauſe which the apoſtle there handleth, doth plainly fight on our ſide. And, that no man truſting upon a cold knowlege of Chriſt, an empty title of chriſtianity, and outward tokens, ſhould preſume to deſpiſe the judgement of God, he ſheweth forth examples of God's ſeverity to be ſeen in the Jews: that we might know that the ſame pains which they ſuffered, hang over us, if we follow the ſame faults. Now that the compariſon may be fit, it behoved that he ſhould ſhew that there is no inequality between us and them in thoſe good things whereof he forbade us to boaſt falſely. Therefore firſt he maketh us equal in the ſacraments, and leaveth us not ſo much as any ſmall piece of prerogative, that might encourage us to hope of eſcaping unpuniſhed. Neither verily is it lawful to give any more to our baptiſm, than he in another place giveth to circumciſion, when he calleth it, the ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith. Rom. iv. 11. Whatever therefore is at this day given us in our ſacraments, the ſame thing the Jews formerly received in theirs, that is to ſay, Chriſt with his ſpiritual riches. What power our ſacraments have, the ſame they alſo felt in theirs: that is to ſay, that they were to them ſeals of God's good will toward them, into the hope of eternal ſalvation. If they had been ſkilful expoſitors of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, they would not have been ſo blinded. But when they read there, that ſins were not cleanſed by the ceremonies of the law, yea that the old ſhadows had no availing force to righteouſneſs; Heb. x. 1. neglecting the compariſon which is there handled, while they took hold of this one thing, that the law of it ſelf did nothing profit the followers of it, thought ſimply that the figures were void of truth. But the apoſtle's meaning is to bring the ceremonial law to nothing, until it come to Chriſt, on whom alone dependeth all the effectualneſs of it.

What is ſpoken in ſcripture to diminiſh the eſteem of circumciſion, the ſame in like occaſion and ſenſe might as well be ſaid of baptiſm.

24. But they will object thoſe things which are read in Paul concerning the circumciſion of the letter, that it is in no eſtimation with God, that it giveth nothing, that it is vain. For ſuch ſayings ſeem to place it far beneath baptiſm. Not ſo. For the very ſame might be ſaid of baptiſm. And alſo the ſame is ſaid, firſt by Paul himſelf, where he ſheweth that God regardeth not the outward waſhing whereby we enter into profeſſion of religion, unleſs the mind within be both cleanſed and continue pure to the end: 1 Cor x. 5. Again, by Peter, when he teſtifieth that the truth of baptiſm conſiſteth not in the outward waſhing, but in the witneſſing of a good conſcience. 1 Pet. iii. 21. But ſeemeth alſo in another place, Col. ii. 11. utterly to diſpiſe the circumciſion made with hands, when he compareth it with the circumciſion of Chriſt. I anſwer that even in this place nothing is abated of the dignity of it. Paul there diſputeth againſt them, who required it as neceſſary when it was now abrogate. Therefore he warneth believers, that leaving the old ſhadows they ſhould ſtand faſt in the truth. Theſe maſters (ſaith he) inſtantly call upon you, that your bodies may be circumciſed. But ye are ſpiritually circumciſed according to the ſoul and body. Ye have therefore the deliverance of the thing indeed, which is much better than the ſhadow. A man might take exception to the contrary and ſay that the figure is not therefore to be deſpiſed becauſe they had the thing indeed? foraſmuch as the putting off the old man, of which he there ſpeaks, was alſo among the fathers, to whom yet outward circumciſion had not been ſuperfluous: he preventeth this objection, when he by and by addeth, that the Coloſſians were buried with Chriſt by baptiſm. Whereby he ſignifieth that at this day baptiſm is the ſame to chriſtians, which circumciſion was to the old people: and therefore that circumciſion cannot be enjoined to chriſtians without wrong done to Chriſt.

The ſacraments of the law ſhadows not in reſpect of their working: but in regard of their manner of ſignifying that which is wrought, ſpoken of as things of ſmall account, not ſimply but when Chriſt is ſeparated from them.

25. But that which followeth, and which I now alleged, is harder to aſſoil, that all the Jewiſh ceremonies were ſhadows of things to come, and that in Chriſt is the body: but the moſt hard of all is that which is treated in many chapters of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, that the blood of beaſts, attained not to conſciences: that the law had a ſhadow of good things to come, not an image of things, that the followers of is obtained no perfection by the ceremonies of Moſes and ſuch others. I go back to that which I have already touched, that Paul doth not therefore make the ceremonies ſhadowiſh, becauſe they had no thing found in them:

them: but becauſe the fulfilling of them was after a certain manner in ſuſpence until the delivering of Chriſt. Again I ſay that this is to be underſtood not of the effectualneſs, but rather of the manner of ſignifying. For till Chriſt was manifeſted in the fleſh, all the ſigns ſhadowed him out as abſent, howſoever he did inwardly utter to the faithful the preſence of his power and of himſelf. But this we ought chiefly to mark, that in all thoſe places Paul doth not ſpeak ſimply, but by way of contention. Becauſe he ſtrove with the falſe apoſtles, who would have godlineſs to conſiſt in the ceremonies only without any reſpect to Chriſt: to confute them it ſufficient only to treat what value ceremonies are of by themſelves. This mark alſo the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews followed. Let us therefore remember that Paul here diſputed of ceremonies, not as they are taken in their own and natural ſignification, but as they are wreſted to a falſe and wrong expoſition: not of the lawful uſe of them, but of the abuſe of ſuperſtition. What marvel is it therefore if ceremonies being ſeparated from Chriſt, are unclothed of all force? For all ſigns whatſoever they be, are brought to nought, when the thing ſignified is taken away. So when Chriſt had to do with them who thought that manna was nothing elſe but meat for the belly, John. vi. 27. he applieth his ſpeech to their groſs opinion, and ſaith that he miniſtreth better meat, which may feed ſouls to hope of immortality. But if you require a plainer ſolution, the ſum of all tendeth to this: firſt, that all thoſe ceremonies which were in the law of Moſes, are vaniſhing things and of no value, unleſs they be directed to Chriſt. Secondly, that they had ſuch a reſpect to Chriſt, that when he at length was manifeſtly ſhewed in the fleſh, they had their fulfilling. Finally, that it behoved that they ſhould be taken away by his coming, even as a ſhadow vaniſheth away in the clear light of the ſun. But becauſe I yet defer any longer diſcourſe of that matter to that place where I have purpoſed to compare baptiſm with circumciſion, therefore I do now more ſparingly touch it.

26. Perhaps alſo thoſe extravagant praiſes of ſacraments, which are read in old writers concerning our ſigns, deceived thoſe miſerable ſophiſters. As this of Auguſtine. That the ſacraments of the old law did only promiſe the Saviour, but ours give ſalvation. When they obſerved not that theſe and ſuch other forms of ſpeaking were ſpoken: they alſo publiſhed their exceſſive doctrines, but in a clean contrary ſenſe from the writings of the old fathers. For Auguſtine meant no other thing in that place, than as the ſame Auguſtine writeth in another place, that the ſacraments of the law of Moſes did foretel of Chriſt, but ours ſpeak of him preſent. And againſt Fauſtus. That thoſe were promiſes of things to be fulfilled, theſe were tokens of things fulfilled: as if he ſhould ſay, that thoſe figured him when he was looked for, but ours ſhew him as it were preſent which hath been already delivered. Moreover he ſpeaketh of the manner of ſignifying, as alſo he ſheweth in another place. The law (ſaith he) and the prophets had ſacraments, foretelling a thing to come: but the ſacraments of our time teſtify that that is already come, which thoſe did declare was to come. But what he thought of the thing and effectualneſs, he expoundeth in many places: as when he ſaith, that the ſacraments of the Jews were in ſigns different; but in the thing ſignified, equal with ours: different in the viſible form, but equal in ſpiritual power. Again: in divers ſigns is all one faith: ſo in divers ſigns, as in divers words: becauſe words change their ſounds by times: and truly words are nothing but ſigns. The fathers did drink the ſame ſpiritual drink, for they drunk not the ſame bodily drink. Obſerve therefore, the faith remaining one, the ſigns varied. To them the rock was Chriſt: to us that is Chriſt, which is ſet upon the altar. And they drink for a great ſacrament, the water flowing out of the rock: what we drink, the faithful know. If thou conſider the viſible form they drunk another thing: if a ſenſible ſignification they drunk the ſame ſpiritual drink. In another place, in the myſtery the ſame is their meat and drink which is ours, the ſame in ſignification, not in form: becauſe Chriſt was figured to them in the rock, and ſhewed to us in the fleſh. Howbeit in this behalf alſo we grant that there is ſome difference. For both ſacraments teſtify that the fatherly good will of God and the graces of the holy Ghoſt are offered us in Chriſt: but our ſacraments teſtify it more clearly and brightly. In both is a delivering of Chriſt: but in theſe more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the Old and New Teſtament beareth, of which we have treated before. And this is it that the ſame Auguſtine meant (whom we more often cite as the beſt and faithfulleſt witneſs of all the old writers) where he teacheth that when when Chriſt was revealed, ſacraments were ordained, in number fewer, in ſignification higher, in force more excellent. Of this alſo it is expedient that the readers be briefly warned, that whatever the ſophiſters have triflingly taught concerning the work wrought, is not only falſe, but diſagreeth with the nature of the ſacraments, which God hath ordained, that believers being void and needy of all good things ſhould bring nothing thither but beggary. Whence it followeth that in receiving them, theſe men do nothing whereby they may deſerve praiſe: or that in doing (which in this their reſpect is merely paſſive) no work can be aſcribed unto them.

CHAP. XV.

Of Baptiſm.

The firſt uſe of baptiſm to be a token of our cleanſing, and therefore not a mark of recognizance and a ſign of profeſſion only as ſome would have it.

BAPTISM is a ſign of entering whereby we are received into the fellowſhip of the church: that being graffed into Chriſt, we may be reckoned among the children of God. Now it was given us by God for this end, (which I have taught to be common to all the myſteries) firſt, that it ſhould ſerve to our faith with him, and to our confeſſion before men. We will orderly declare the manner of both purpoſes. Baptiſm bringeth three things to our faith, which alſo muſt be ſeparately treated of. This is the firſt which the Lord ſetteth out unto us, that it ſhould be a token and proof of our cleanſing: or (to expreſs my mind better) it is like a certain ſealed charter, whereby he confirmeth that all our ſins are ſo eraſed, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may never come in his ſight, nor be rehearſed, nor be imputed. For he hath appointed that all they who believe, ſhould be baptized into forgiveneſs of ſins. Therefore they who thought that baptiſm is nothing elſe but a mark and token whereby we profeſs our religion before men, as ſoldiers bear the conuſance of their captain for a mark of their profeſſion, weigh not that which was the chief thing in baptiſm. That is this, that we ſhould receive it with this promiſe, that whoſoever believe and are baptized, ſhall be ſaved. Mark. xvi. 16.

Our cleanſing not made by baptiſm as by a cauſe but manifeſted by it as by a ſign.

2. In this ſenſe is to be underſtood which Paul writeth, that the church is ſanctified by Chriſt her ſpouſe, and cleanſed with the waſhing of water in the word of life. Epheſ. v. 26. And in another place, that we are ſaved according to his mercy by the waſhing of regeneration and the renewing of the holy Ghoſt. Tit. iii. 5. And that which Peter writeth that baptiſm ſaveth us, 1 Pet. iii. 22. Paul's will was not to ſignify, that our waſhing and ſalvation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in itſelf the power to cleanſe, regenerate and renew. Neither did Peter mean the cauſe of ſalvation, but only the knowlege and certainty of ſuch gifts to be received in this ſacrament: which is evidently enough expreſſed in the words themſelves. For Paul joineth together the word of life, and baptiſm of water: as if he had ſaid, that by the goſpel the meſſage of waſhing and ſanctifying is brought us, that by baptiſm ſuch meſſage is ſealed. And Peter immediately addeth, that baptiſm is not the putting away of the filthineſs of the fleſh, but the anſwer of a good conſcience before God, which is of faith. Yea baptiſm promiſeth us no other cleanſing, but by the ſprinkling of the blood of Chriſt: which is figured by water, for its likeneſs of cleanſing and waſhing. Who therefore can ſay that we are cleanſed by this water, which certainly teſtifieth that the blood of Chriſt is our true and only waſhing? So that there cannot be brought a ſurer reaſon to confute their blind error who refer all things to the power of the water, than from the ſignification of baptiſm itſelf: which doth withdraw us as well from that viſible element which is ſet before our eyes, as from all other means, that it may bind our minds to Chriſt alone.

Baptiſm a confirmation of the waſhing out of all ſin and not only of ſins paſt before we be baptized.

3. Neither is it to be thought that baptiſm is applied only to the time paſt, that for new offences, into which we fall after baptiſm, we muſt ſeek new remedies of cleanſing, in I know not what other ſacraments, as though the force of baptiſm were worn out of uſe. By this error it came to paſs in old time, that ſome would not be baptiſed but when in the utteruttermoſt peril of life, and at the laſt gaſp, that ſo they may obtain pardon of their whole life. Againſt which wayward ſubtle proviſion the old biſhops ſo oft inveigh in their writing. But thus we ought to think, that at what time ſoever we are baptized, we are at once waſhed and cleanſed for all our life. Therefore ſo oft as we fall, we muſt go back to the remembrance of baptiſm, and therewith we muſt arm our mind, that it may be always certain and aſſured of the forgiveneſs of ſin. For though when it is once adminiſtred, it ſeemeth to be paſt, yet by later ſins it is not aboliſhed. For the purity of Chriſt is therein offered us: that always flouriſheth, is oppreſſed with no ſpots, but overwhelmeth and wipeth away all our filthineſs: yet ought we not to take from this a liberty to ſin in time to come (as verily we are not hereby armed to ſuch boldneſs) but this doctrine is given only to them, who when they have ſinned, do groan wearied and oppreſſed under their ſins, that they may riſe up and comfort themſelves, leſt they ſhould fall into confuſion and deſpair. So Paul ſaith, Rom. iii. 25. that Chriſt was made to us a propitiator, unto the forgiveneſs of faults going before. Wherein he denieth not that therein is obtained perpetual and continual forgiveneſs of ſins even unto death: but he meaneth that it was given by the Father, only to poor ſinners, who wounded with the ſcaring iron of conſcience, do ſigh for the phyſician. To theſe the mercy of God is offered. They who by eſcaping of puniſhment do hunt for matter and liberty to ſin, do but provoke to themſelves the wrath and judgment of God.

The force of baptiſm as well as repentance extended through out our whole life.

4. I know indeed that it is commonly thought otherwiſe: that by the benefit of repentance and of the keys we do after baptiſm obtain forgiveneſs, which at our firſt regeneration is given us only by baptiſm. But they who deviſe this err herein, becauſe they do not remember that the power of the keys, whereof they ſpeak, is ſo joined with baptiſm that it ought not to be ſeparated. The ſinner receiveth forgiveneſs by the miniſtry of the church, namely not without the preaching of the goſpel. But what manner of preachings? that? That we are cleanſed from ſins by the blood of Chriſt. But what ſign and teſtimony is there of that waſhing, but baptiſm? We ſee therefore how that abſolution is referred to baptiſm. And this error hath bred us the feigned ſacrament of penance: of which I have touched ſomewhat before, and the reſidue I will make an end of in place fit for it. But it is no wonder if men, who according to the groſſneſs of their wit were beyond meaſure tied to outward things, have in this behalf alſo bowared that fault, that not content with the pure inſtitution of God, they thruſt in new helps feigned by themſelves. As though baptiſm itſelf were not a ſacrament of repentance. But if repentance be commended to us for our whole life, the force of baptiſm ought to be extended as far. Wherefore there is no doubt but all the godly through their whole life, ſo oft as they are vexed with knowlege in conſcience of their own ſins, dare call themſelves back to the remembrance of baptiſm, that they may confirm themſelves in the confidence of that only and continual waſhing which we have in the blood of Chriſt.

A ſecond uſe of baptiſm to ſhew us our mortification and newneſs of life.

5. It bringeth alſo another fruit, becauſe it ſheweth us our mortification in Chriſt, and new life in him. For (as the Apoſtle ſaith) we are baptized into his death, being buried together with him into death, that we may walk in newneſs of life. Rom. vi. 3. By which words he doth not only exhort us to follow him (as though he ſaid that we are by baptiſm put in mind, that after a certain example of the death of Chriſt, we ſhould die to our luſts: and after the example of his reſurrection, we ſhould be raiſed up to righteouſneſs,) but he fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to ſay, that by baptiſm Chriſt hath made us partakers of his death, that we may be graffed into it. And as the graff receiveth ſubſtance and nouriſhment from the root into which it is graffed: ſo they that receive baptiſm with ſuch faith as they ought, do truly feel the power of the death of Chriſt in the mortifying of their fleſh: and alſo they feel the effect of his reſurrection in the quickening of the Spirit. Hence he gathereth matter of exhortation: that if we be Chriſtians, we ought to be dead to ſin, and to live to righteouſneſs. Col. ii. 12. This ſelf ſame argument he uſeth in another place that we are circumciſed, and have put off the old man, ſince we have been buried in Chriſt by baptiſm. Tit. iii. 5. And in this ſenſe, in the ſame place which we have before alleged, he called it the waſhing of regeneration and of renewing. Therefore the free forgiveneſs of ſins and imputation of righteouſneſs is firſt promiſed us, and then the grace of the holy Ghoſt, which may reform us into newneſs of life.

6. Laſt

A third use of baptism to testify our ingrafting into Christ, and partaking of his graces.

6. Last of all our faith receiveth this benefit by baptism, that it certainly testifieth unto us, that we are not only grafted into the death and life of Christ, but that we are so united to Christ himself that we are partakers of all his good things. Therefore he hath dedicated and hallowed baptism in his own body, Matth. iii. 13. that he might have it in common with us, as a most strong bond of the unity and fellowship which he vouchsafed to enter into with us: thus Paul proveth thereby that we are the children of God, because we have put on Christ in baptism. Gal. iii. 27. So we see that the fulfilling of baptism is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of baptism. Therefore it is no marvel if it be reported that the Apostles baptized into his name, Acts viii. 16. and xix. 5. who yet were commanded to baptize into the name of the Father also and of the holy Ghost. Matth. xxviii. 19. For whatever gifts of God are set forth in baptism, are found in Christ alone. And yet it cannot be, but that he who baptiseth into Christ, doth therewithal call upon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For we are therefore cleansed with his blood, because the merciful Father according to his incomparable kindness, willing to receive us into favour, hath set him as a mediator in the midst to procure us favour with him. But regeneration we only obtain, by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified by the Spirit we are endued with a new and spiritual nature. Wherefore both of our cleansing and regeneration we obtain and after a certain manner distinctly perceive the cause in the Father, the matter in the Son, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So John first baptised, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptism of repentance into the forgiveness of sin: meaning by this word repentance, such regeneration: and by forgiveness of sins, washing.

The baptism of John the same with that which the apostles ministred howsoever the old writers Chrysostom, and Augustine separate the one from the other.

7. Whereby also it is made most certain, that the ministry of John was altogether the same which was afterward comitted to the Apostles. For the different hands wherewith it is ministred, make not the baptism different: but the same doctrine sheweth it to be the same baptism. John and the apostles agreed in one doctrine: both baptised into repentance, both into the forgiveness of sins, both into the name of Christ, from whom flowed repentance and forgiveness of sins. Act. ii. 28. John said that he was the lamb of God, by whom the sins of the world should be taken away: John. i. 29. where he made him the sacrifice acceptable to the Father, the propitiator of righteousness, the author of salvation. What could the apostles add to this confession? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the old writers labour to separate the one from the other, whose voice we ought not so much to esteem that it should shake the certainty of the scripture. For who will rather harken to Chrysostom denying that forgiveness of sins was comprehended in the baptism of John, than to Luke on the contrary affirming that John preached the baptism of repentance into the forgiveness of sin? Luke. iii. 3. Neither is that subtlety of Augustine to be received, that in the baptism of John sins were forgiven in hope, but in the baptism of Christ they are forgiven indeed. Whereas the evangelist plainly testifieth, that John in his baptism promised the forgiveness of sins: Luke iii. 16. what need we abate this title of commendation, when no necessity compelleth us unto it? But if any man seek for a difference out of the word of God, he will find no other but this, that John baptised into him that was to come, the apostles into him that had already presented himself.

The baptising not different because the graces of the spirit were various which followed the ministry of John, and of Christ's apostles, yea even of the apostles before and after Christ's ascension.

8. As for this that more abundant graces of the spirit were poured out since the resurrection of Christ, it maketh nothing to establish a diversity of baptism. For the baptism which the apostles administred while he was yet conversant in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifulness of the spirit, than the baptism of John. Yea, even after his ascension, the spirit was not given to the Samaritans above the common measure of the faithful before the ascension, although they were baptised into the name of Jesus, till Peter and John were sent unto them to lay their hands upon them. This only thing, as I think, deceived the old writers, that they said that the baptism of John was but a preparation to the baptism of Christ, because they read, Act. viii. 14. that they were baptised again by Paul, who had once received the baptism of John. But how much they were herein deceived, shall elsewhere be plainly declared in place fit for it. What, is it therefore, that John said, that he baptized indeed with water, but that Christ should come who should baptise with the holy Ghost, and with fire? Mat. iii. 11. This may in few words be cleared. For he meant not to put a difference the one baptism and the other, but he compared his own person with the person of Christ, saying, that himself was a minister of water but that Christ was the giver of the holy Ghost, and should declare his power by a visible miracle the same day that he should send the holy Ghost to the apostles in the likeness of firy tongues. Act. ii 8. What could the apostles boast of more than this? What more could they also that baptise at this day? For they are only ministers of the outward sign, and Christ is the author of the inward grace: as the old writers themselves every where teach, and especially Augustine, whose principal argument against the Donatists is this, that what man soever he be that baptiseth, yet only Christ is ruler of it.

The grace of mortification and purification assured unto us by baptism shadowed to the people of Israel darkly under other figures.

9. These things which we have spoken both of mortification and of washing, are shadowed out in the people of Israel, whom for the same cause the apostle saith to have been baptized in the cloud and in the sea. Mortifying was figured, when the Lord delivering them out of the hand of Pharaoh and from cruel bondage, made for them a way through the Red sea, and drowned Pharaoh himself and the Egyptians their enemies, that followed them hard at their backs, and were even in their necks to overtake them. 1 Cor. x. 2. For after the same manner also he promiseth to us in baptism, and by a sign given sheweth us, that we are by his power brought forth and delivered out of the thraldom of Egypt, that is to say, out of the bondage of sin: that our Pharaoh is drowned, that is to say, the devil, although even so also he ceaseth not to exercise and weary us. But as that Egyptian was not thrown down into the bottom of the sea, but being overthrown on the shore, did yet with terrible sight make the Israelites afraid, but could not hurt them: so this our enemy yet indeed threatneth, sheweth his weapons, is felt, but cannot overcome. In the cloud was a sign of cleansing. For as then the Lord covered them with a cloud cast over them, and gave them refreshing cold, lest they should faint and pine away with too cruel burning of the sun: Num. ix. 21. so in baptism we acknowlege our selves covered and defended with the blood of Christ, lest the severity of God, which is indeed an intolerable flame, should lie upon us. But although this mystery was then dark and known to few: yet because there is no other way to obtain salvation, but in those two benefits, God would not take away the sign of them both from the old fathers, whom he had adopted to be heirs.

Faithful men by baptism not rid of original sin, but certified first that condemnation whereunto the corruption of their nature hath made them subject, is done away.

10. Now it is clear, how false that is which some have lately taught, and wherein some yet continue, that by baptism we are looked and delivered from original sin, and from the corruption which was from Adam spread abroad into his whole posterity, and that we are restored into the same righteousness and pureness of nature, which Adam should have obtained, if he had stood fast in the same uprightness wherein he was first created. For such kind of teachers never understood what was original sin, nor what was original righteousness, nor what was the grace of baptism. But we have already proved, that original sin is the perverseness and corruption of our nature, which first maketh us guilty of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth works in us, which the scripture calleth the works of the flesh. Gal. v. 19. Therefore these two points are distinctly to be marked, namely that we being in all parts of our nature defiled and corrupted are already for such corruption only, holden worthily condemned and convicted before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocency and cleanness. Yea, and very infants themselves bring their own damnation with them from their mothers womb. Who, although they have not yet brought forth the fruits of their iniquity, yet have the seed thereof inclosed within them. Yea, their whole nature is a certain seed of sin, therefore it cannot but be hateful and abominable to God. The faithful are certified by baptism that this damnation is taken away, and driven from them: forasmuch (as we have already said) the Lord doth by this sign promise us that full and perfect forgiveness is granted both of the fault which which should have been imputed to us, and of the pain which we should have suffered for the fault: they take hold also of righteousness, but such as the people of God may obtain in this life, that is to say by imputation only: because the Lord of his own mercy taketh them for righteous and innocent.

Secondly, that the works of the flesh shall not bear rule and have dominion over them.

11. The other point is, that this perverseness never ceaseth in us, but continually bringeth forth new fruits, namely those works of the flesh which we have before described: no otherwise than a burning furnace continually bloweth out flame and sparkles, or as a spring incessantly casteth out water. For lust never utterly dieth nor is quenched in men, until being by death delivered out of the body of death, they have utterly put off themselves. Baptism indeed promiseth us that our Pharaoh is drowned, and the mortification of sin: yet not so that it is no more, or may no more trouble us, but only that it may not overcome us. For so long as we live enclosed within this prison of our body, the remnants of sin shall dwell in us: but if we hold fast by faith the promise given us of God in baptism, they shall not bear rule nor reign. But let no man deceive himself: let no man flatter himself in his own evil, when he heareth that sin always dwelleth in us. These things are not spoken to this end, that they should carelessly sleep upon their sins, who are otherwise too much inclined to sin: but only, that they should not faint and be discouraged, who are tickled and pricked of their flesh. Let them rather think that they are yet in the way, and let them believe that they have much profited, when they feel that there is daily somewhat diminished of their lust, till they have attained thither whither they travail, namely to the last death of their flesh, which shall be ended in the dying of this mortal life. In the mean time let them not cease both to strive valiantly, and to encourage them to go forward and to stir them up to full victory. For this also ought more to whet on their endeavours, that they see that after that they have long laboured, they have yet no small business remaining. This we ought to hold: we are baptised into the mortifying of our flesh, which is begun by baptism in us, which we daily follow: but it shall be made perfect when we shall remove out of this life to the Lord.

Baptism according to St. Paul the earnest of our regeneration, the weakness of our nature hereunto, and the greatness of our comfort notwithstanding this weakness.

12. Here we say no other thing, than the apostle Paul in the seventh chapter to the Romans most clearly setteth out. For after that he had disputed of free righteousness, because some wicked men did thereof gather, that we might leave after our own lust, because we should not be acceptable to God by the deservings of works: he addeth, that all they that are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spirit, and that of his regeneration we have an earnest in baptism. Hereupon he exorteth the faithful, that they suffer not sin to have dominion in their members. Now because he knew that there is always some weakness in the faithful: that they should not therefore be discouraged, he adjoineth a comfort, that they are not under the law, Rom. vi. 14. Because again it might seem, that christians might grow insolent, because they are not under the yoke of the law, he treateth what manner of abrogating that is, and therewithal what is the use of the law: which question he had now the second time discussed. The sum is, that we are delivered from the rigour of the law, that we should cleave to Christ: but that the office of the law is, that we being convinced of our perverseness, should confess our own weakness and misery. Now forasmuch as that perverseness of nature doth no so easily appear in a prophane man, who followeth his own lust without fear of God; he setteth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himself. He saith therefore that he hath a continual wrestling with the remnants of his flesh, and that he is holden bound with miserable bondage, that he cannot consecrate himself wholly to the obedience of the law of God. Therefore he is compelled with groaning to cry out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me out of this body subject to death? Rom. vii. 24. If the children of God be holden captive in prison so long as they live, they must needs be much carefully grieved with thinking upon their own peril, unless this fear be met withal. Therefore he adjoineth to this use a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. Where he teacheth, that they whom the Lord hath once received into favour, engrafted into the communion of his Christ, hath by baptism admitted into the fellowship of his church, while they continue in the faith of Christ, although they be besieged of sin, yea and carry sin about within them, yet are acquitted from guiltiness and condemnation. If this be the ſimple and natural expoſition of Paul, there is no cauſe why we ſhould ſeem to teach any new unwonted thing.

Baptiſm the badge of our profeſſion.

13. But baptiſm ſo ſerveth our confeſſion before men. For it is a mark, whereby we openly profeſs that we ſhould be accounted among the people of God: whereby we teſtify that we agree with all chriſtians into the worſhipping of one God and into one religion: finally, whereby we openly affirm our faith: that not only our hearts ſhould breath out the praiſe of God, but alſo our tongues, and all the members of our body ſhould ſound it out with ſuch utterances as they are able. For ſo as we ought, all our things are employed to the ſervice of the glory of God, whereof nothing ought to be void, and others may by our example be ſtirred up to the ſame endeavours. Hereunto Paul had reſpect, when he aſked the Corinthians whether they had not been baptiſed into the name of Chriſt, 1 Cor. i. 2.: meaning verily, that even in this that they were baptiſed into his name, they avowed themſelves unto him, ſwore to his name, and bound their faith to him, before men, that they could no more confeſs any other but Chriſt alone, unleſs they would forſake the confeſſion which they had made in baptiſm.

The author of baptiſm is alſo the worker of grace ſpiritual therein figured not incloſed.

14. Now ſince it is declared what our Lord had regard unto in the inſtitution of baptiſm: it is plain to judge what is the way for us to uſe and receive it. For ſo far as it is given to the raiſing, nouriſhing and confirming of our faith, it is to be taken as from the hand of the author himſelf: we ought to hold it certain and fully perſuaded, that it is he who ſpeaketh to us by the ſign, that it is he who cleanſeth us, waſheth us, and putteth away the remembrance of our ſins, that it is he who maketh us partakers of his death, who taketh away from Satan his kingdom, who feebleth the forces of our luſts, yea, who groweth into one with us, that being cloathed with him we may be reckoned the children of God: that theſe things, I ſay, he doth inwardly ſo truly and certainly perform to our ſoul, as we certainly ſee our body outwardly to be waſhed, dipped, and clothed. For this either relation, or ſimilitude, is the moſt ſure rule of ſacraments: that in bodily things we ſhould behold ſpiritual things, as if they were preſently ſet before our eyes, foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed the Lord to repreſent them by ſuch figures: not for that ſuch benefits are bound and incloſed in the ſacrament, that they ſhould be given us by the force thereof: but only becauſe the Lord doth by this token teſtify his will unto us that is, that he will give us all theſe things. Neither doth he only feed our eyes with a naked ſight, but he bringeth us to the thing preſent and together fulfilleth that which it figureth.

Cornelius and Paul by baptiſm not indued with grace but aſſured that they were endued through faith, without which, baptiſm doth but teſtify our unthankfulneſs.

15. Hereof let Cornelius the captain be an example, who was baptiſed, having before received forgiveneſs of ſins and viſible graces of the holy Ghoſt, Acts x. 48.: ſeeking not by baptiſm a larger forgiveneſs but a more certain exerciſing of faith yea, an increaſe of confidence, by a pledge. Peradventure ſome man will object: Why therefore did Ananias ſay to Paul, that he ſhould waſh away his ſins by baptiſm, Acts ix. 17. if ſins are not waſhed away by the power of baptiſm itſelf? I anſwer: We are ſaid to receive, to obtain to get that which ſo far as concerneth the feeling of our faith, is given us of the Lord, whether he do then firſt teſtify it, or being teſtified doth more and certainlier confirm it. This therefore only was the meaning of Ananias: that thou mayeſt be aſſured. Paul, that thy ſins are forgiven thee, be baptiſed. For the Lord doth in baptiſm promiſe forgiveneſs of ſins: receive this, and be out of care. Howbeit I mean not to diminiſh the force of baptiſm, but that the thing and the truth is preſent with the ſign, ſo far as God worketh by outward means. But of this ſacrament, as of all others, we obtain nothing but ſo much as we receive by faith. If we want faith, it ſhall be for a witneſs of our unthankfulneſs, whereby we may be declared guilty before God, becauſe we have not believed the promiſe there given. But ſo far as it is a ſign of our confeſſion, we ought by it to teſtify that our affiance is in the mercy of God, and our cleanneſs is in the forgiveneſs of ſins, which is gotten us by Jeſus Chriſt: and that by it we enter into the church of Chriſt, that we may with one conſent of faith and charity live in one mind with all the faithful. This laſt point did Paul mean, when he ſaith that we are all baptiſed into one Spirit, that we may be one body, 1 Cor. xii. 13.

Nothing added unto or taken from baptiſm by

16. Now if this be true which we determine, that a ſacrament is not to be weighed according to his hand of whom it is miniſtred their worthiness or unworthiness which are ministers of it: and therefore rebaptization not to be received.

stred, but as of the very hand of God, from whom without doubt it proceeded: hereupon we may gather that nothing is added to it, nor taken from it by the worthiness of him by whose hand it is delivered. And even as among men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand and the seal be well known, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man be the carrier: so it ought to suffice to know the hand and seal of the Lord in his sacraments, by what carrier soever they be brought. Hereby the Donatists is very well confuted, who measured the force and value of the sacrament by the worthiness of the minister. Such at this day our Catabaptists, who deny that we are rightly baptised, because we were baptised by wicked men and idolaters in the popish kingdom: therefore they furiously call upon us to be baptised again. Against whose follies we shall be armed with a reason strong enough, if we think that we were professed by baptism, not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, Mat. xxviii. 19. and that therefore it is not the baptism of man, but of God, of whomsoever it be ministred. Although they were never so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godliness, who baptised us, yet they did not baptise us into the fellowship of their own ignorance or sacrilege, but into the faith of Jesus Christ: because they called not upon their own name, but the name of God, nor baptised us into any other name. Now if it were the baptism of God, it hath verily inclosed in it a promise of the forgiveness of sins, the mortifying of the flesh, the spiritual quickning, and the partaking of Christ. So it nothing hindred the Jews, to have been circumcised of unclean priests and apostates: neither was the sign therefore void, that it needeth to be done of new: but it was sufficient to return to the natural beginning. Where they object that baptism ought to be celebrate in the assemblies of the godly, that proveth not, that that which is faulty in part, should destroy the whole force thereof. For when we teach what ought to be done that baptism may be pure, and void of all defiling, we do not abolish the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. For when in old time circumcision was corrupted with many superstitions, yet it ceased not to be taken for a sign of grace: neither did Josiah and Hezekiah, when they had gathered out of all Israel them that had departed from God, call them to a second circumcision.

17. Now whereas they ask us, what faith of ours hath yet followed baptism in certain years past, that they thereby might prove that baptism is void, when it is not sanctified unto us, but by the word of promise received by faith: to this question we answer, that we indeed being blind and unbelieving, did for a long time not hold fast the promise given us in baptism: yet the promise itself, forasmuch as it was of God, continued always stayed, stedfast, and true. Although all men be liars and faith-breakers, yet God ceaseth not to be true: although all men be lost, yet Christ remaineth salvation. We confess therefore that baptism, for that time profited us nothing at all; forasmuch as in it the promise offered us, without which baptism is nothing, lay nothing regarded. Now since by the grace of God, we have begun to wax wiser, we accuse our own blindness and hardness of heart, who have so long been unthankful to his so great goodness. Rom. iii. 3. But we believe that the promise itself is not vanished away; but rather thus we consider. God by baptism promiseth the forgiveness of sins, and since he hath promised it, he will undoubtedly perform it to all that believe it. That promise was offered us in baptism: by faith therefore let us embrace it. It hath indeed long been buried from us because of infidelity: now therefore let us receive it by faith. Wherefore where the Lord calleth the Jewish people to repentance, he giveth them no commandment of a second circumcision, who being, as we have said, circumcised with a wicked and ungodly hand, lived a certain time intangled with the same wickedness. But he earnestly calleth upon the turning of the heart only. Because howsoever the covenant was broken of them, yet the sign of the covenant, by the ordinance of the Lord, remained always stedfast and inviolable. Therefore with the condition of repentance only they were restored into the covenant which the Lord had once made with them in circumcision: which yet being received by the hand of a league-breaker priest, so much as in them lay, they had defiled again, and the effect whereof they had quenched.

Baptism not made void by their remaining a long time in blindness that are baptised.

18. But they think that they shake a fiery dart at us, when they allege that Paul rebaptised them which were once baptised with the baptism of John. Acts xix. 3. For if by our own confession, the baptism of John was altogether the same that ours is now: even as they having been before perverſely inſtructed, when they were taught the true faith, they were again baptiſed into it: ſo that baptiſm, which was without true doctrine, is to be taken for nothing, and we ought to be newly baptiſed again into the true religion, wherein we are now firſt inſtructed. Some think that there was ſome ill affected man to John, who had entered them with their firſt baptiſm rather to a vain ſuperſtition. Of which thing to gather a conjecture hereupon, becauſe they confeſſed themſelves to be utterly ignorant of the Holy Ghoſt? Whereas John verily would never have ſent away from himſelf ſchollars ſo untaught. But neither is it likely that the Jews although they had not been baptiſed at all, were deſtitute of all knowlege of the Holy Ghoſt, which is famouſly ſpoken of by ſo many teſtimonies of ſcripture. Whereas therefore they anſwer that they know not whether there be any Holy Ghoſt, it is to be underſtood as if they had ſaid that they have not yet heard whether the graces of the ſpirit, of which Paul aſked them, were given to the diſciples of Chriſt. But I grant that that was the true baptiſm of John, and all one and the ſelf ſame with the baptiſm of Chriſt: but I deny that they were baptiſed again. What then mean theſe words, they were baptiſed in the name of Jeſus? Some do expound it, that they were but inſtructed of Paul with true doctrine. But I had rather underſtand it more ſimply, to be the baptiſm of the Holy Ghoſt, that is to ſay, that the viſible graces of the Spirit were given them by the laying on of hands: which to be expreſſed by the name of baptiſm, is no new thing. As on the day of pentecoſt it is ſaid, that the apoſtles remembered the words of the Lord, concerning the baptiſm of fire and of the Spirit. Acts i. 5. And Peter ſaith, that the ſame came to his remembrance, when he ſaw thoſe graces poured out upon Cornelius and his houſhold and kindred. Neither is that contrary which is afterwards adjoined: when he had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghoſt came down upon them. For Luke doth not tell of two divers things: but followeth the manner of telling commonly uſed among the Hebrews, who do firſt propound the ſum of the matter, and then do ſet it out more at large. Which every man may perceive by the very framing together of the words. For he ſaith, When they heard theſe things, they were baptiſed in the name of Jeſus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghoſt came down upon them. In this latter ſentence we ſee what manner of baptiſm that was. If ignorance do ſo corrupt a former baptiſm, that it muſt be amended with a ſecond baptiſm; the apoſtles ſhould have been rebaptiſed firſt of all, who in whole three years after their baptiſm, had ſcarcely taſted any ſmall parcel of purer doctrine. And now among us what rivers might ſuffice to renew ſo many waſhings, as there are ignorances by the mercy of the Lord daily amended in us?

Acceſſary inventions of men added unto Chriſt's inſtitution of baptiſm.

19. The force, dignity, profit, and end of the myſtery if I be not deceived, ought by this time to be plain enough. So much as concerneth the outward ſign, I would to God the natural inſtitution of Chriſt had prevailed ſo much as was meet, to reſtrain the boldneſs of men. For as though it were a contemptible thing to be baptiſed with water according to the precept of Chriſt, there is invented bleſſing, or rather inchanting, to defile the true hallowing of the water. Afterwards was added a taper with chreſme: but the blowing ſeemeth to open the gate to baptiſm. But although I am not ignorant, how ancient is the beginning of this added pack: yet it is lawful both for me and all the godly to refuſe whatſoever things men have preſumed to add to the ordinance of Chriſt. When ſatan ſaw that by the fooliſh light credit of the world at the very beginnings of the goſpel his deceits were eaſily received, he brake forth into groſſer mockeries. Hereupon ſpittle, and like trifles, were openly brought in with unbridled liberty to the reproach of baptiſm. By which experiences let us learn, that nothing is either holier, or better, or ſafer, than to be content with the authority of Chriſt alone. How much better therefore was it, leaving ſtage-like pomps, which dazle the eyes of the ſimple, and dull their minds, ſo oft as any was to be baptiſed, that he ſhould be preſented to the aſſembly of the faithful, and be offered to God, the whole church looking on as a witneſs; and praying over him: that the confeſſion of faith ſhould be rehearſed, wherewith he that is to be catechiſed ſhould be inſtructed: that the promiſes ſhould be declared which are contained in baptiſm: that the inſtructed ſhould be baptiſed in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt: at length that he be ſent away with prayers and thankſgiving. So is nothing omitted that might make to the matter, and that the only ceremony which proceeded from God the author thereof ſhould moſt clearly ſhine, being not overwhelmed with any foreign filthineſs. But whether he be wholly dipped who is baptiſed, and that thrice or once, or whether he be but ſprinkled with water water only poured upon him, it maketh very little matter: but that ought to be at liberty to churches according to the diversity of countries. Howbeit the very word of baptizing signifieth to dip, and it is certain that the manner of dipping was used of the old church.

Baptism not to be administred by private men.

20. This also pertaineth to the purpose, to know that it is done amiss if private men take upon themselves the administration of baptism. For as well the distribution of this as of the supper is a part of the ecclesiastical ministry. For Christ did not command women, nor yet every sort of men, that they should baptize: but whom he had ordained his Apostles, to them he gave this commandment. And when he commanded his disciples to do that in the ministration of the supper which they had seen him do, when he executed the office of a right distributer: he would without doubt, that they should therein follow his example. As for this that in many ages past, yea and in a manner at the very beginning of the church, it hath been received in use, that laymen might baptize in peril of death, if the minister were not present in time. I see not with how strong a reason it may be defended. The very old fathers themselves, which either held or suffered this manner were not sure whether it were well done. For Augustine seemeth to have this doubt, when he saith: (Lib. contra. epi. parm. 2. Cap. 13.) although a layman compelled by necessity do give baptism, I cannot tell whether a man may godlily say that it ought to be reiterate. For if it be done when no necessity compelleth, it is the usurping of another man's office: but if necessity enforceth, it is either none or a venial sin. Moreover of women it was decreed without any exception in the council at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptize at all. But there is danger, least if he who is sick should die without baptism, he should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so, God pronounceth that he adopteth our infants to be his own, before they are born, when he promiseth that he will be a God to us and to our seed after us. In this word is contained their salvation. Neither shall any man dare to be so reproachful against God, to deny that his promise is of itself sufficient to work the effect thereof How much harm that doctrine being evil expounded, that baptism is of necessity to salvation, hath brought in, few do mark: and therefore they take less heed to themselves. For where this opinion is grown in force, that all are lost to whom it hath not happened to be washed with water, our state is worse than the state of the old people, as though the grace of God were now more narrowly strengthened than it was under the law. For Christ shall be thought to become, not to fulfil the promises, but to abolish them: forasmuch as the promise which then was of itself effectual enough to give health before the eight day, now should not be of force without help of the sign.

Women not authorised to baptize

21. But how the custom was before that Augustin was born, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speak in the church, nor to teach, nor to baptize, nor to offer, that she should not claim to herself the execution of any man's office, much less of the priests. Lib. cont. Here. 1. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantial witness, where he reproacheth Marcion, that he gave women liberty to baptize. Neither am I ignorant of their answer who think otherwise, that is, that common use much differeth from extraordinary remedy, when extreme necessity inforceth: but when he pronouncing that it is a mockery to give women liberty to baptize, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that he condemneth this corruption, so that it is by no colour excusable. Also in the third book, where teaching that it was not permitted even to the holy mother of Christ, he addeth no restraint.

Zipporah no president for womens taking upon them to baptize.

22. The example of Zipporah is unseasonably alleged. For whereas the angel of God was appeased, after that she taking a stone circumcised her son, thereupon it was wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to be said, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Assyria raised up, pleased God. But by other strong reasons it is proved, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfully drawn to an example of imitation. If I should say that it is a certain singular case, which ought not to be made an example, and especially that since it is no where read that in old time there was given to the priests a special commandment to circumcise, the order of circumcision and baptism is unlike: this should be strong enough to confute them. For the words of Christ are plain: Matth. xxviii. 19. Go ye teach all nations, and baptize. When he ordained the self same men publishers of the gospel, and minister miniſters of baptiſm: and none (as the Apoſtle witneſſeth) doth take honour upon himſelf in the church, but he that is called as Aaron: Heb. v. 4. whoſoever without lawful calling baptizeth, he ruſheth into another man's office. Even in the ſmalleſt things, as in meat and drink, whatſoever we enterprize with a doubtful conſcience, Paul openly crieth out to be ſin. Rom. xiv. 23. Therefore in womens baptizing is much more grievouſly ſin, where it is evident that they brake the rule appointed by Chriſt, foraſmuch as we know that it is unlawful to pluck aſunder thoſe things that God conjoineth. But all this I paſs over. Only I would have the readers to note, that Zipporah's purpoſe was not to do any ſervice to God. Seeing her ſon to be in danger, ſhe grudged, and murmured, and not without ſtomaching threw the foreſkin upon the ground, ſhe ſo taunted her huſband, that ſhe was alſo angry with God. Finally it is plain that all this came of a furiouſneſs of mind, becauſe ſhe murmured againſt God and her huſband, for that ſhe was compelled to ſhed the blood of her ſon. Moreover if ſhe had in all other things behaved herſelf well, yet herein is an unexcuſeable raſh preſumption that ſhe circumciſed her ſon, her huſband being preſent, not any private man, but Moſes the principal prophet of God, than whom there never roſe any greater in Iſrael: which was no more lawful for her to do, than it is at this day for women in the ſight of the biſhop.

But this controverſy ſhall by and by be eaſily taken away by this principle, that infants are not debarred from the kingdom of heaven whom it happeneth to depart out of this preſent life before that it be granted them to be dipped in water. But it is already proved that no ſmall wrong is done to the covenant of God, if we do not reſt in it, as tho' it were weak of itſelf: whereas the effect thereof dependeth neither upon baptiſm, nor upon any additions. There is afterward added to it a ſacrament like a ſeal, not that it bringeth effectualneſs to the promiſe of God as to a thing weak of itſelf, but only confirmeth it to us. Whereupon followeth, that the children of the faithful are not therefore baptized, that they may then firſt be made the children of God, which before were ſtrangers from the church, but rather that they are therefore received by a ſolemn ſign into the church, becauſe by the benefit of the promiſe they did already belong to the body of Chriſt. Therefore if in omitting the ſign there be neither ſlothfulneſs nor contempt, nor negligence, we are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holy, to give this reverence to the ordinance of God, that we ſeek ſacraments from no where elſe, than where the Lord hath left them. When we may not have them of the church, the grace of God is not ſo bound to them but that we may obtain them by faith out of the word of the Lord.

CHAP. XVI.

That the baptiſm of infants doth very well agree with the inſtitution of Chriſt and the nature of the ſign.

The baptiſing of infants not deviſed and received only by raſhneſs of men without warrant from God himſelf.

BUT foraſmuch as in this age, certain phrantic ſpirits have raiſed up ſore troubles in the church for the baptiſm of infants, and do not yet ceaſe to turmoil: I cannot chooſe but join here an addition to reſtrain their furiouſneſs. If peradventure it ſhall ſeem to ſome man to be very much too long, let him (I beſeech him) weigh with himſelf, that we ought ſo much to eſteem the pureneſs of doctrine in a moſt great matter, together with the peace of the church, that nothing ought to be lothſomely received, which may avail to procure them both. Beſide that, I ſo ſtudy to frame this diſcourſe, that it ſhall be of no ſmall importance to the clearer declaration of the myſtery of baptiſm. They aſſail the baptiſm of infants with an argument indeed favourable in ſhew, ſaying that it is grounded upon no inſtitution of Chriſt, but that it was brought in only by the boldneſs of men, and perverſe curiouſneſs, and then afterward with fond eaſineſs raſhly received in uſe. For a ſacrament, unleſs it reſt upon a certain foundation of the word of God, hangeth but by a threed. But what if, when the matter is well conſidered, it ſhall appear that the Lord's holy ordinance is falſely and unjuſtly charged with ſuch a ſlander? Let us therefore ſearch out the firſt beginning of it. And if it shall appear, that it was devised by the rashness of men only, then bidding it farewel, let us measure the true observation of baptism by the will of God only. But if it shall be proved that it is not destitute of his certain authority, we must beware lest in pinching the holy ordinances of God, we be also slanderous against the author himself.

The right consideration of baptism grounded upon the promise and spiritual mistery thereof, not upon the outward ceremony alone.

2. First it is a doctrine well enough known, and confessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signs, consisteth not only in the outward ceremonies: but principally dependeth upon the promise, and upon the spiritual mysteries, for figuring whereof the Lord ordaineth the ceremonies themselves. Therefore he that will perfectly learn of what value baptism is, to what end it tendeth, finally what it is: let him not stay his thought upon the element and bodily sight: but rather let him raise it up to the promises of God, which are therein offered us, and to the inward secrets which are therein represented unto us. He that knoweth these things hath attained the sound truth of baptism, and the whole substance thereof as I may so call it: and thereby also he shall be taught, what is the reason, and what is the use of the outward sprinkling. Again, he that contemptuously passing over these, shall have his mind wholly fastened and bound to the visible ceremony, shall understand neither the force nor property of baptism: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what use it hath. Which sentence is proved with so many and so clear testimonies of scripture, that we need not at this present to tarry long about it. Therefore it remaineth now, that we seek out of the promises given in baptism, what is the force and nature of it. The scripture sheweth, that the cleansing of sins, which we obtain of the blood of Christ, is here first shewed: then the mortifying of the flesh, which standeth upon the partaking of his death, by which the faithful are regenerate into newness of life, yea, and into the fellowship of Christ. To this sum may be referred whatsoever is aught in the scriptures concerning baptism: saving that beside this it is a sign to testify religion before men.

The use of circumcision under the law.

3. But forasmuch as before the institution of baptism, the people of God had circumcision instead thereof: let us see in what these two signs differ the one from the other, and in what likeness they agree together. Whereupon may appear what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lord gave circumcision to Abraham to be kept, he telleth him before, that he would be God to him and to his seed: adding, that with him is the flowing store and sufficience of all things, that Abraham should account that his hand should be to him a spring of all good things. In which words the promise of eternal life is contained, as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argument from hence to prove the immortality of the faithful, and the resurrection. For God (saith he) is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Mat. xxii. 32. Luk. xx. 38. Wherefore Paul also shewing to the Ephesians from what destruction the Lord had delivered them, gathereth by this that they had not been admitted into the covenant of circumcision, that they were without Christ, without God, without hope, strangers from the covenants of the promise Eph. ii. 12.: all which things the covenant itself contained. But the first access to God, the first entry to immortal life, is the forgiveness of sins. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgiveness answereth to the promise of baptism concerning our cleansing. Afterward the Lord taketh covenant of Abraham that he should walk before him in pureness and innocency of heart which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man should doubt, that circumcision is a sign of mortifying, Moses in another place doth more plainly declare it, when he exhorteth the people of Israel, to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of the heart, because they were seperate chosen to be the people of God out of all the nations of the earth. Deut. x. 16. As God where he adopteth the posterity of Abraham to be his people, commandeth them to be circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hearts ought to be circumcised, declaring verily what is the truth of this circumcision. Then that no man should endeavour toward it by his own strength, he teacheth that they need the grace of God. Deut. xxx. 6. All these things are so often repeated of the prophets, that I need not to heap into this place many testimonies which do each where offer themselves. We have proved therefore, that in circumcision a spiritual promise was uttered to the fathers, such as in baptism is given: forasmuch as it figured to them the forgiveness of sins, and the mortifying of the flesh. Moreover as we have taught that Christ is the foundation of baptism, in whom both these things remain: so it is evident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promised to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all nations, to the sealing of which grace, the sign of circumcision is added.

The argument and difference between circumcision and baptism.

4. Now we may easily see, what there is like in these two signs, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon we have declared that the power of the signs consisteth, is all one in both, namely of the fatherly favour of God, of the forgiveness of sins, of life everlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The foundation whereupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is all one in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inward mystery, whereby the whole force and property of the sacraments is to be weighed. The unlikeliness that remaineth, lieth in the outward ceremony, which is the smallest portion: whereas the chiefest part dependeth upon the promise and the thing signified. Therefore we may determine, that whatsoever agreeth with circumcision, doth also belong to baptism, except the difference of the visible ceremony. To this relation and comparison, the Apostle's rule leadeth as by the hand, whereby we are commanded to examine all exposition of scripture by the proportion of faith. Rom. xii. 3. And truly the truth doth in this behalf almost offer it self to be felt. For as circumcision, because it was a certain token to the Jews, whereby they were certified that they were chosen to be the people and household of God, and they again on their behalfs professed that they yielded themselves to God, was their first entry into the church: so now also we by baptism enter into profession of God, that we may be reckoned among his people and mutually swear to his name. Whereby it appeareth out of controversy, that baptism is come into the place of circumcision, that it may have the same office with us.

Infants being partakers of the spiritual grace may not be denied the outward sign of baptism more than Jewish children circumcision.

5. Now if we list to search out, whether baptism be lawfully communicate to infants: shall we not say that he doth too much play the fool, yea dote, who will rest only upon the element of water, and the outward observation, but cannot abide to bend his mind to the spiritual mystery? Whereof if there be any consideration had it shall without doubt certainly appear that baptism is rightfully given to infants, as the thing that is due unto them. For the Lord in old time did not vouchsafe to admit them to circumcision, but that he made them partakers of all those things which were then signified by circumcision. Otherwise he should with mere deceits have mocked his people, if he had fed them with deceitful signs, which is horrible even to be heard of. For he pronounceth expressly, that the circumcision of a little infant should be instead of a seal to seal the promise of the covenant. But if the covenant remain unbroken and stedfast, it doth at this day no less belong to the children of christians, than under the old testament it pertained to the infants of the Jews. But if they be partakers of the thing signified, why shall they be debarred from the sign? If they have the truth, why shall they be put back from the figure? Although the outward sign cleave fast together with the word in the sacrament, so that they cannot be plucked in sunder: yet if they be separately considered, whether of them, I pray you shall we esteem of more value? Truly since we see that the sign serveth the word, we must say that it is under it, and must set it in the inferior place. Since therefore the word of baptism is extended to infants: why shall the sign, that is to say, the addition annexed to the word, be debarred from them? This one reason, if there were no more, were abundantly enough to confute all them that will speak to the contrary. That which is objected, that there was a day certainly set for circumcision, is altogether but a shift. We grant that we are not now bound to certain days, like the Jews: but when the Lord howsoever he certainly appointeth no day, yet declareth that he is pleased that infants should with a solemn formal usage be received into his covenant: what seek we more?

The children of christian parents being holy seed as Abraham's were, as necessarily the one bound to be baptized as the other to be circumcised.

6. Howbeit the scripture openeth unto us yet a certainer knowlege of the truth. For it is most evident, that the covenant which the Lord once made with Abraham, is at this day no less in force to christians, than it was in old time to the Jewish people: yea and that this word hath no less respect to Christians, than it then had respect to the Jews. Unless perhaps we think, that Christ hath by his coming diminished, or cut short the grace of his Father. Which saying is not without abominable blasphemy. Wherefore as even the children

dren of the Jews were called a holy ſeed, becauſe being made heirs of the ſame covenant they were made differing from the children of the ungodly: for the ſame reaſon even yet alſo the children of chriſtians are accounted holy, yea although they be the iſſue but of one faithful parent: and (as the Apoſtle witneſſeth 1 Cor. vii. 14.) they differ from the unclean ſeed of idolaters. Now when the Lord immediately after the covenant made with Abraham, commanded the ſame to be ſealed in infants with an outward ſacrament: Gen. xvii. 12. what cauſe will chriſtians allege, why they ſhould not at this day teſtify and ſeal the ſame in their children? Neither let any man object againſt me, that the Lord commanded his covenant to be confirmed with no other ſign than of circumciſion, which is long ago taken away. For we have in readineſs to anſwer, that for the time of the old teſtament he ordained circumciſion to confirm his covenant: but circumciſion being taken away, yet always remaineth the ſame manner of confirming which we have common with the Jews. Wherefore we muſt always diligently conſider what is common to both, and what they have diſtinct from us. The covenant is common, the cauſe of confirming it is common. Only the manner of confirming is diverſe, becauſe circumciſion was that to them, in place whereof baptiſm hath ſucceeded among us. Otherwiſe if the teſtimony whereby the Jews were aſſured of the ſalvation of their ſeed, be taken away from us, it ſhould be brought to paſs by the coming of Chriſt, that the grace of God ſhould be darker and leſs approved by teſtimonies to us, than it was before to the Jews. If that cannot be ſaid without extreme ſlander of Chriſt, by whom the infinite goodneſs of the Father hath more clearly and liberally than ever heretofore been poured forth upon the earth, and declared to men: we muſt needs grant, that it it at the leaſt not more pinchingly to be ſuppreſſed, nor to be ſet forth with leſs teſtimony, than it was under the dark ſhadows of the law.

Infants embraced, prayed for, termed the heirs of the kingdom of heaven by our ſaviour Chriſt, and therefore not to be excluded

7. Wherefore the Lord Jeſus, minding to ſhew a token whereby the world might underſtand that he was come rather to enlarge than to limit the mercy of God gently embraced children offered unto him, rebuking the diſciples who went about to forbid them to come to him: foraſmuch as they did lead thoſe, from baptiſm, to whom the kingdom of heaven belongeth, away from him by whom alone the entry is open into heaven. But (will ſome man ſay) what like thing hath baptiſm with this embracing of Chriſt? For neither is it reported that he baptiſed them, but that he received them, embraced them, and wiſhed them well. Therefore if we liſt to follow his example, let us help infants with prayer, but not baptiſe them. But let us weigh the doings of Chriſt ſomewhat more heedfully, than ſuch kind of men do. For neither is this to be lightly paſſed over, that Chriſt commandeth infants to be brought unto him, adding a reaſon why becauſe of ſuch is the kingdom of heaven, Matth. ix. 13. And afterward he witneſſeth his will with deed, when embracing them he commendeth them to his Father with his prayer and bleſſing. If it be meet that infants be brought to Chriſt, why is it not alſo meet that they be received to baptiſm, the ſign of our communion and fellowſhip with Chriſt? If the kingdom of heaven be theirs, why ſhall the ſign be denied them, whereby there is as it were an entry opened into the church, that being admitted into it they may be numbred among the heirs of the heavenly kingdom? How unjuſt ſhall we be, if we drive away them whom Chriſt calleth unto him! if we ſpoil them whom he garniſheth with his gifts? if we ſhut out them whom he willingly receiveth? But if we will examine how much that which Chriſt there did differeth from baptiſm, yet of how much greater price ſhall we have baptiſm, (whereby we teſtify that infants are contained in the covenant of God) than receiving, embracing, laying on of hands, and prayer, whereby Chriſt himſelf being preſent: declareth that they both are his, and are ſanctified of him? By the other cavil. whereby they labour to mock out this place, they do nothing but bewray their own ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Chriſt ſaith, Let little ones come to me, that they were in age good big ones which were already able to go. But they are called of the evangeliſts, brephe, and paidia, by which words the Greeks do ſignify babes yet hanging on the breaſts. Therefore this word (to come) is ſimply ſet for (to have acceſs.) Lo what ſnares they are compelled to make, who are grown hard againſt the truth. Now where they ſay, that the kingdom of heaven is not given to them, but to ſuch as are like them, becauſe it is ſaid to be of ſuch, not of them: that is no founder than the reſt. For if that be granted, ed, what manner of reaſon ſhall the reaſon of Chriſt be, whereby he meaneth to ſhew, that infants in age are not ſtrangers from him? when he commandeth that infants be ſuffered to have acceſs unto him, nothing is plainer than that very infancy indeed is there ſpoken of. And that this ſhould not ſeem an abſurdity, he by and by addeth: of ſuch is the kingdom of heaven. But it muſt needs be that infants are comprehended herein, it muſt be plain that by this word (ſuch) are meant very infants themſelves, and ſuch as are like them.

Though it be not expreſly mentioned in ſcripture what infants were baptiſed by the apoſtles: yet when they are reported to have baptiſed families, we have no reaſon to think that the children in ſuch families were not baptiſed: no writer ſo old that maketh not the baptiſm of infants as ancient as the apoſtles times.

8. Now there is no man that ſeeth not, that baptiſm of infants was not framed by man, which is upholden by ſo great approving of ſcripture. Neither do they colourably enough play the fool, which object that it is no where found, that any one infant was baptiſed by the hands of the apoſtles. For although it be not expreſly by name rehearſed of the evangeliſts: yet becauſe again they are not excluded, ſo oft as mention happeneth to be made of the baptiſing of any houſhold: who, unleſs he be mad, can reaſon thereupon that they were not baptiſed? If ſuch arguments were of any force, women ſhould be forbidden to partake of the Lord's ſupper, whom we read not to have been received unto it in the time of the apoſtles. But here we are content with the rule of faith. For when we conſider, what the inſtitution of the ſupper requireth, thereby alſo we may eaſily judge to whom the uſe thereof ought to be communicated. Which we obſerve alſo in baptiſm. For when we mark, to what end it was ordained, we evidently ſee, that it belongeth no leſs to infants, than to elder folks. Therefore they cannot be deprived of it, but that the will of the author muſt be manifeſtly defrauded. But whereas, they ſpread abroad among the ſimple people, that there paſſed a long row of years after the reſurrection of Chriſt, in which the baptiſm of infants was unknown: therein they moſt foully do lie. For there is no writer ſo old, that doth not certainly refer the beginning thereof to the time of the apoſtles.

The fruit that cometh by baptiſm both to children preſented, and to ſuch alſo as preſent them thereunto.

9. Now remaineth that we briefly ſhew, what fruit cometh of this obſervation, both to the faithful which preſent their children to the church to be baptiſed, and alſo to the infants themſelves that are baptiſed with the holy water: that no man ſhould deſpiſe it as unprofitable or idle. But if it come in any man's mind, upon this pretence to mock at the baptiſm of infants, he ſcorneth the commandment of circumciſion given by the Lord. For what will they bring forth to impugn the baptiſm of infants, which may not alſo be thrown back againſt circumciſion? So the Lord taketh vengeance of their arrogance, who do by and by condemn that which they comprehend not with the ſenſe of their own fleſh. But God furniſheth us with other armours, whereby their fooliſhneſs may be beaten flat. For neither this his holy inſtitution, by which we feel our faith to be holpen with ſingular comfort, deſerveth to be called ſuperfluous. For God's ſign communicated to a child doth as it were by an imprinted ſeal confirm the promiſe given to the godly parent, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lord will be God not only to him but alſo to his ſeed, and will continually ſhew his good will and grace, not to him only, but alſo to his poſterity even to the thouſand generation. Where when the great kindneſs of God uttereth it ſelf, firſt it yieldeth moſt largely to advance his glory and overſpreadeth godly hearts with ſingular gladneſs, becauſe they are therewithal more earneſtly moved to love again ſo godly a father, whom they ſee to have care of their poſterity for their ſakes. Neither do I regard, if any man take exception, and ſay that the promiſe ought to ſuffice to confirm the ſalvation of our children: foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed God otherwiſe, who as he knoweth our weakneſs, willed in this behalf ſo much to bear tenderly with it. Therefore let them that embrace the promiſe of God's mercy to be extended to their children, think that it is their duty to offer them to the church to be ſigned with the ſign of mercy, and thereby to encourage themſelves to a more aſſured confidence, becauſe they do with preſent eye behold the covenant of the Lord graven in the bodies of their children. Again, the children receive ſome benefit of their baptiſm, that being engraffed into the body of the church, they are ſomewhat the more commended to the other members. Then when they are grown to riper age, they are not ſlenderly ſtirred up to earneſt endeavour to worſhip God, of whom they have been received into his children by a ſolemn ſign of adoption, before that they could by age acknowlege lege him for their Father. Finally that ſame condemnation ought greatly to make us afraid, that God will take vengeance of it, if any man deſpiſe to mark his ſon with the ſign of the covenant, Gen. xvii. 14. becauſe by ſuch contempt the grace offered is refuſed and as it were foreſworn.

The difference which the enemies of baptiſm miniſtred unto children do put between the thing ſignified by baptiſm and circumciſion overthroweth them, their difference between the one and the other covenant moſt falſe.

10. Now let us examine the arguments, whereby certain furious beaſts do not ceaſe to aſſail this holy inſtitution of God. Firſt becauſe they ſee that they be exceedingly near driven and hard ſtrained with the likeneſs of baptiſm and circumciſion, they labour to pluck in ſunder theſe two ſigns with great difference, that the one ſhould not ſeem to have any thing common with the other. For they ſay that both divers things are ſignified, and that the covenant is altogether divers, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they go about to prove that firſt point, they allege that circumciſion was a figure of mortification and not of baptiſm. Which verily we do moſt willingly grant them. For it maketh very well for our ſide. Neither do we uſe any other proof of our ſentence, than that baptiſm and circumciſion are ſigns of mortification. Hereupon we determine that baptiſm is ſet in the place of circumciſion, that it ſhould repreſent unto us the ſame thing which in old time it ſignified to the Jews. In affirming the difference of the covenant, with how barbarous boldneſs do they turmoil and corrupt the ſcripture: and that not in one place alone, but ſo as they leave nothing ſafe or whole? For they paint unto us the Jews ſo to be carnal that they are liker beaſts than men: with whom forſooth the covenant made proceedeth not beyond the temporal life to whom the promiſes given do reſt in preſent and bodily good things. If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Jews were for a time filled with the benefits of God, no otherwiſe than as they fat a herd of ſwine in a ſtie, that at length they ſhould periſh with eternal damnation. For ſo ſoon as we allege circumciſion and the promiſes annexed unto it, they anſwer that circumciſion was a literal ſign, and the promiſes thereof were carnal.

Promiſes ſpiritual and heavenly, not earthly and carnal only made to the fathers in the old Teſtament.

11. Truly if circumciſion was a literal ſign, there is no otherwiſe to be thought of baptiſm. For the apoſtle in the ſecond chapter to the Coloſſians maketh the one no more ſpiritual than the other. For he ſaith that we are circumciſed in Chriſt, with a circumciſion not made with hand, putting away the body of ſin that dwelleth in our fleſh: which he calleth the circumciſion of Chriſt, Col. ii. 11. Afterward for declaration of that ſaying, he adjoineth, that we are buried with Chriſt by baptiſm. What meaneth he by theſe words, but that the fulfilling and truth of baptiſm, is alſo the truth and fulfilling of circumciſion, becauſe they figure both one thing? For he laboureth to ſhew that baptiſm is the ſame to Chriſtians, which circumciſion had been before to the Jews. But foraſmuch as we have now evidently declared, that the promiſes of both the ſigns, and the myſteries that are repreſented in them, do agree together, we will for this preſent tarry no longer upon them. Only I will put the faithful in mind, that though I hold my peace, they ſhould weigh with themſelves wether it be taken for an earthly and literal ſign, under which nothing is contained but ſpiritual and heavenly. But that they ſhould not ſell their ſmokes to the ſimple, we will by the way confute one objection wherewith they colour this moſt ſhameleſs lie. It is moſt certain that the principal promiſes, wherein was contained the covenant which in the old Teſtament God eſtabliſhed with the Iſraelites, were ſpiritual and tended to eternal life: and then again, that they were received of the fathers ſpiritually, as it was meet, that they might thereof receive aſſiance of the life to come, whereunto they longed with the whole affection of their heart. But in the mean time we deny not, but tha he witneſſed his good will toward them with earthly and carnal benefits: by which alſo we ſay that the ſame promiſe of ſpiritual things was confirmed. As when he promiſed everlaſting bleſſedneſs to his ſervant Abraham, that he might ſet before his eyes a manifeſt token of his favour, he addeth another promiſe concerning the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan, Gen. xv. 1. and 18. After this manner we ought to underſtand all the earthly promiſes that are given to the Jewiſh nation, that the ſpiritual promiſe, as the head whereunto they are directed, ſhould always have the chief place. But ſince I have more largely treated of theſe things in the difference of the new and old Teſtaments, therefore now I do the more ſlightly knit it up.

The supposed difference which the adversaries of infant baptism do put between the ancient circumcised, and the new baptised seed of Abraham.

12. In the naming of the children they find this difference, that in the Old Testament they were called the children of Abraham, who issued of his seed: but that now they are called by that name, who follow his faith: and that therefore that carnal infancy, which was by circumcision graffed into the fellowship of the covenant, figured the infants of the New Testament, which are regenerate by the word of God to immortal life. In which words we behold indeed a small sparkle of truth: but herein these light spirits grievously offend, that when they catch hold of that which first cometh to their hand, when they should go further and compare many things together, they stand stifly upon one word. Whereby it cannot otherwise be but that they must sometime be deceived who rest upon the sound knowlege of nothing. We grant indeed that the carnal seed of Abraham did for a time hold the place of the spiritual seed which is by faith graffed into him. For we are called his children howsoever there is no natural kindred between him and us. But if they mean, as they plainly shew that they do, that there was never spiritual blessings promised to the carnal seed of Abraham, herein they are much deceived. Wherefore we must level to a better mark, whereunto we are directed by the most certain guiding of the scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraham, that he should have a seed, wherein all nations of the earth shall be blessed: and therewithal assureth him, that he would be a God to him and his seed. Whosoever do by faith receive Christ the author of blessing, are heirs of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham. Gal. iv. 28. Rom. iv. 12.

The dignity of Abraham's children, circumcised and uncircumcised equal.

13. But although since the resurrection of Christ the bounds of the kingdom of God have begun to be far and wide enlarged into all nations without difference, that according to the saying of Christ, faithful ones should be gathered from every part to sit down in the heavenly glory with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: Matth. viii. 11. yet he had many ages before extended that same so great mercy to the Jews. And because passing over all other, he had chosen out that nation only in which he would restrain his grace for a time, called them his peculiar, possession, and his purchased people. Exod. xix. 5. For testifying of such liberality, circumcision was given, by the sign whereof the Jews might be taught that God is to them the author of salvation: by which knowlege their minds were raised into hope of eternal life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once received into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaning to prove that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham as well as the Jews, speaketh in this manner. Rom. iv. 10. Abraham (saith he) was justified by faith in uncircumcision. Afterward he received the sign of circumcision, the seal of the righteousness of faith, that he should be the father of all the faithful, both of uncircumcision and of circumcision, not of them that glory of circumcision only, but of them that follow the faith which our father Abraham had in uncircumcision. Do not we see that both sorts are made equal in dignity? For during the time appointed by the decree of God, he was the father of circumcision. When, the wall being plucked down (as the Apostle writeth in another place) by which the Jews were severed from the Gentiles, the entry was made open to them also into the kingdom of God, he was made their father, and that without the sign of circumcision, because they have baptism instead of circumcision. But where he expresly by name denieth, that Abraham is father to them who are of circumcision only, that same was spoken to abate the pride of certain, who omitting the care of godliness, did boast themselves only of ceremonies. After which manner at this day also their vanity may be confuted who seek in baptism nothing but water.

The carnal and spiritual seed of Abraham heretofore with the estimation due to them both.

14. But another place of the apostle out of the ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans shall be alleged to the contrary, where he teacheth that they who are of the flesh, are not the children of Abraham: but they only are counted his seed, who are the children of promise. For he seemeth to signify, that the carnal kindred of Abraham is nothing, which yet we do set in some degree. But it is more diligently to be marked, what matter the Apostle there treateth of. For, meaning to shew to the Jews how much the goodness of God was not bound to the seed of Abraham, yea how it nothing availeth of itself, he bringeth forth Ismael and Esau for example to prove it: whom being refused, as if they were stranſtrangers, although they were according to the fleſh the natural offspring of Abraham, the bleſſing reſted in Iſaac and Jacob. Whereupon is gathered that which he afterwards affirmeth, that ſalvation dependeth on the mercy of God, which he extendeth to whom it pleaſeth him: and that there is no cauſe why the Jews ſhould ſtand in their own conceit, or boaſt upon the name of the covenant, unleſs they keep the law of the covenant, that is to ſay, obey the word. Again when he had thrown them down from vain confidence of their kindred, yet becauſe on the other ſide he ſaw, that the covenant which was once made of God with the poſterity of Abraham, could in no wiſe be made void, in the eleventh chapter, he argueth that the carnal kindred is not to be ſpoiled of his due dignity: by the beneficial mean whereof he teacheth that the Jews are the firſt and natural heirs of the goſpel, but in reſpect that by their unthankfulneſs, they were forſaken as unworthy: yet ſo that the heavenly bleſſing is not utterly removed from their nation. For which reaſon, how much ſoever they were ſtubborn and covenant-breakers, nevertheleſs he calleth them holy (ſo much honour he giveth to the holy generation, with whom God had vouchſafed to make his holy covenant) but calleth us, if we be compared with them, as it were after born, yea or the untimely born children of Abraham, and that by adoption, not by nature: as if a twig broken off from his natural tree, ſhould be graffed into a ſtrange ſtock. Therefore that they ſhould not be defrauded of their prerogative, it behoveth that the goſpel ſhould be firſt preached to them: for they are in the houſhold of God as it were the firſt begotten children. Wherefore this honour was to be given them, until they refuſed it being offered them, and by their unthankfulneſs brought to paſs that it was carried away to the Gentiles. Neither yet, with how great obſtinacy ſoever they continue to make war againſt the goſpel, ought they to be deſpiſed of us: if we conſider that for the promiſes ſake, the bleſſing of God doth yet ſtill remain among them: as verily the Apoſtle teſtifieth that it ſhall never utterly depart from thence: becauſe the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. Rom. xi. 29.

The like difference between the one and the other now in the Chriſtian church.

15. Behold of what force is the promiſe given to the poſterity of Abraham, and with what balance it is to be weighed. Wherefore although in diſcerning the heirs of the kingdom from baſtards and ſtrangers, we doubt not that the election of God only ruleth with free right of government: yet we alſo therewithal perceive, that it pleaſed him peculiarly to embrace the ſeed of Abraham with his mercy, and that the ſame mercy might be the more ſurely witneſſed, to ſeal it with circumciſion. Now altogether like ſtate is there of the Chriſtian church. For as Paul there reaſoneth that the Jews are ſanctified of their parents: ſo in another place he teacheth, that the children of Chriſtians receive the ſame ſanctification of their parents. 1 Cor. vii. 14. Whereupon is gathered, that they are worthily ſevered from the reſt, which on the other ſide are condemned of uncleanneſs. Now who can doubt, but that it is moſt falſe which they do thereupon conclude, that ſay, that the infants which in old time were circumciſed, did only figure ſpiritual infancy, which ariſeth of the regeneration of the word of God. For Paul doth not ſo ſubtilly play the philoſopher, where he writeth that Chriſt is the miniſter of circumciſion, to fulfil the promiſes which had been made to the fathers, Rom. xv. 8. as if he had ſaid thus: Foraſmuch as the covenant made with Abraham hath reſpect to his ſeed, Chriſt to perform and diſcharge the promiſe once made by his Father, came to ſalvation to the nation of the Jews. See you not how alſo after the reſurrection of Chriſt, he judgeth that the promiſe of the covenant is to be fulfilled not only by way of allegory, but as the very words do ſound to the carnal ſeed of Abraham. To the ſame intent ſerveth that which Peter in the ſecond chapter of the Acts, declareth to the Jews, Acts ii. 39. that the benefit of the goſpel is due to them and their ſeed by right of the covenant, and in the chapter next following he calleth them the children of the teſtament, that is to ſay heirs, Acts iii. 25. From which alſo not much diſaccordeth the other place of the apoſtle above alleged, where he accounteth and ſetteth circumciſion imprinted in infants, for a teſtimony of that communion which they have with Chriſt. Eph. ii. 21. But if we hearken to their trifles, what ſhall be wrought by that promiſe, whereby the Lord in the ſecond article of his law undertaketh to his ſervants, that he will be favourable to their ſeed even to the thouſand generation? Shall we here flee to allegories? But that were too trifling a ſhift. Or ſhall we ſay this is aboliſhed? But ſo the law ſhould be deſtroyed, which Chriſt came rather to eſtabliſh, ſo far as it turneth us to good unto life. Let it therefore be out of controverſy, that God is ſo good and liberal to his, that that for their ſakes, he will ſave alſo their children, whom they ſhall beget, to be numbred among his people.

Abſurd differences between baptiſm and circumciſion to exclude children from the one, though from the other they were not excluded.

16. Moreover the differences which they go about to put between baptiſm and circumciſion, are not only worthy to be laughed at, and void of all colour of reaſon, but alſo diſagreeing with themſelves. For when they have affirmed that baptiſm hath relation to the firſt day of the ſpiritual battle, but circumciſion to the eight when mortification is already ended, by and by forgetting the ſame, they turn their ſong, and call circumciſion a figure of the fleſh to be mortified, but baptiſm they call burial, into which none are to be put till they be already dead. What dotages of frantic men, can with ſo great lightneſs leap into ſundry diverſities? For in the firſt ſentence. Baptiſm muſt go before circumciſion: by the other, it is thruſt back into the latter place. Yet is it no new example, that the wits of men be ſo toſſed up and down, when inſtead of the moſt certain word of God they worſhip whatſoever they have dreamed. We therefore ſay that that former difference is a mere dream. If they liſted to expound by way of allegory upon the eight day, yet it agreed not in that manner. It were much fitter, according to the opinion of the old writers, to refer the number of eight to the reſurrection which was done on the eight day, whereupon we know that the newneſs of life dependeth: or to the whole courſe of this preſent life, wherein mortification ought always to go forward, till when life is ended, mortification it ſelf may alſo be ended. Howbeit God may ſeem to have minded to provide for the tenderneſs of age, in deferring circumciſion to the eight day, becauſe the wound ſhould have been more dangerous to the children new born and yet red from their mother. How much ſtronger is that, that we being dead before, are buried by baptiſm: when the ſcripture expreſly crieth to the contrary that we are buried into death to this intent, that we ſhould die, and from thenceforth ſhould endeavour to this mortification? Now, by a like method of arguing, they maintain that women ought not to be baptized, if baptiſm muſt be framed like to circumciſion. For if it be moſt certain that the ſanctifying of the ſeed of Iſrael was teſtified by the ſign of circumciſion: thereby alſo it is undoubted, that it was given to ſanctify both males and females. But the bodies of male children only were marked with it, which might by nature be marked: yet ſo that women were by them after a certain manner companions and partners of circumciſion. Therefore ſending far away ſuch follies of theirs, let us ſtick faſt in the likeneſs of baptiſm and circumciſion, which we moſt largely ſee to agree in the inward myſtery, in the promiſes, in uſe, in effectualneſs.

Childrens want of underſtanding no reaſon to keep them from being baptized which is the ſeal of that ſanctity whereof they are capable.

17. They think alſo that they bring forth a moſt ſtrong reaſon why children are to be debarred from baptiſm, when they allege that they are not yet for age able to underſtand the myſtery there ſignified. That is ſpiritual regeneration, which cannot be in the firſt infancy. Therefore they gather, that they are to be taken for no other than the children of Adam, till they are grown to age meet for a ſecond birth. But the truth of God each where ſpeaketh againſt all theſe things. For if they be to be left among the children of Adam, than they are left in death: foraſmuch as in Adam we can do nothing but die. But contrariwiſe Chriſt commandeth them to be brought unto him. Why ſo? becauſe he is life: therefore that he may give life to them, he maketh them partakers of himſelf: when in the mean time theſe fellows driving them far away do adjudge them to death. For if they ſay for a ſhift that infants do not therefore periſh if they be accounted the children of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by witneſs of the ſcripture. For whereas it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 22. it followeth that there remaineth no hope of life but in Chriſt. Therefore that we may be made heirs of life, we muſt communicate with him Eph. ii. 3. Again when it is written in another place, that by nature we are ſubject to the wrath of God, and conceived in ſin, Pſal. li. 7. whereunto damnation perpetually cleaveth: we muſt depart out of our own nature, before that the entry be open to us into the kingdom of God. And what can be more plainly ſpoken, than that fleſh and blood cannot poſſeſs the kingdom of God? 1 Cor. xv. 50. Therefore let all be done away whatſoever is ours (which ſhall not be done without regeneration) then we ſhall ſee this poſſeſſion of the kingdom. Finally if Chriſt ſay truly, when he reporteth that he is life, John xi. 25. and xiv. 5. it is neceſſary that we be graffed into him, that we may be delivered out of the bondage of death. But (ſay they)

they) how are infants regenerate, who are not endowed with knowlege neither of good nor of evil? But we anſwer, that the work of God is not yet no work at all, although it be not ſubject to our capacity. Moreover it is not doubtful, that the infants who are to be ſaved (as verily of that age ſome are ſaved) are before regenerate of the Lord. For if they bring with them from their mother's womb the corruption naturally planted in them: they muſt be purged thereof, before that they be admitted into the kingdom of God, whereinto nothing entereth that is defiled or ſpotted. Rev. xxi. 27. If they are born ſinners, as both David and Paul affirm: Eph. ii. 3. Pſal. li. 7. either they remain out of favour and hateful to God, or they muſt needs be juſtified. And what ſeek we more, when the judge himſelf openly affirmeth that the entry into heavenly life is open to none but to them that are born again? John iii. 3. And to put ſuch carpers to ſilence, he ſhewed an example in John the Baptiſt, whom he ſanctified in his mother's womb, what he was able to do in the reſt. Neither do they any thing prevail by the ſhift wherewith they here mock, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by follow that the Lord is wont commonly to do ſo with infants. For neither do we reaſon after that manner: only our purpoſe is to ſhew, that the power of God is by them unjuſtly and enviouſly limited within thoſe narrow bounds within which it ſuffereth not itſelf to be bound. Their other by-ſhift is even of as great weight. They allege that by the uſual manner of the ſcripture, this word (from the womb) is as much in effect, as if it were ſaid, from childhood. But we may clearly ſee that the angel when he declared the ſame to Zachariah, meant another thing; that is, that it which was not yet born, ſhould be filled with the Holy Ghoſt. Luke i. 15. Let us not therefore attempt to point a law to God, but that he may ſanctify whom it pleaſeth him as he ſanctified this child, foraſmuch as his power is nothing diminiſhed.

Chriſt in his infancy ſanctified to ſhew that chriſtian infants are capable of ſanctity.

18. And truly Chriſt was therefore ſanctified from his firſt infancy, that he might ſanctify in himſelf his elect out of every age without difference. For as, to do away the fault of diſobedience which had been committed in our fleſh, he hath put on the ſame fleſh upon himſelf, that he might in it for us, and in our ſtead perform perfect obedience: ſo he was conceived of the Holy Ghoſt, that having the holineſs thereof fully poured into him in the fleſh which he had taken upon him, he might pour forth the ſame into us. If we have in Chriſt a moſt perfect pattern of all the graces which God continually ſheweth to his children, verily in this behalf alſo he ſhall be a proof unto us, that the age of infancy is not ſo far unfit for ſanctification. But howſoever it be, yet this we hold out of controverſy, that none of the elect is called out of this preſent life, who is not firſt made holy and regenerate by the Spirit of God. Whereas they object to the contrary, that in the ſcriptures the Spirit acknowlegeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible ſeed, that is, of the word of God: 1 Pet. i. 23. they do wrongfully expound that ſaying of Peter, wherein he comprehendeth only the faithful who had been taught only by preaching of the goſpel. To ſuch indeed we grant that the word of the Lord is the only ſeed of ſpiritual regeneration: but we deny that it ought thereupon to be gathered, that infants cannot be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as eaſy and ready as to us it is incomprehenſible and wonderful. Moreover it ſhould not be ſafe enough for us to take this away from the Lord, that he may not be able to ſhew himſelf to be known to them by whatſoever way he will.

No abſurdity that infants have ſome ſpark of that heavenly light here whereof in heaven the full brightneſs doth ſhine unto them though they die in their infancy.

19. But faith, ſay they, is by hearing, whereof they have not yet gotten the uſe, neither can they be able to know God, whom Moſes teacheth to be deſtitute of the knowlege both of good and evil. But they conſider not that the apoſtle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, deſcribeth only the ordinary diſtribution of the Lord and diſpoſition which he uſeth to keep in calling them that are his: but appointeth not to him a perpetual rule, that he may not uſe any other way. Which way verily he hath uſed in the calling of many, to whom he hath given the true knowlege of himſelf by an inward manner, by the enlightening of the ſpirit, without any preaching uſed for mean thereof. But whereas they think it ſhall be a great abſurdity, if any knowlege of God be given to infants, from whom Moſes taketh away the underſtanding of good and evil: Deut. i. 39. I beſeech them to anſwer me what danger is there if they be ſaid to receive ſome part of that grace, whereof a little after they ſhall enjoy the full plentifulneſs. For if the fulneſs of life ſtandeth in the perfect knowledge of God, when many of them, whom in their very firſt infancy death by and by taketh away, do paſs into eternal life, truly they are received to behold the immediate preſence of God. Whom therefore the Lord will enlighten with the full brightneſs of his light, why may he not preſently alſo, if it ſo pleaſe him, ſend out to ſhine upon them ſome ſmall ſparkle thereof: eſpecially if he do not firſt unclothe them of ignorance, before that he take them out of the priſon of the fleſh? Not that I mean raſhly to affirm that they are endued with the ſame faith we feel in ourſelves, or have altogether like knowlege of faith: (which I had rather leave in ſuſpenſe) but ſomewhat to reſtrain their fooliſh arrogance, who according as their mouth is puffed up with fulneſs do boldly deny or affirm they care not what.

Infants not excluded from baptiſm more than from circumciſion for want of faith and repentance.

20. But that they may yet ſtand more ſtrongly in this point, they add, that baptiſm is a ſacrament of repentance and faith, wherefore ſince neither of theſe can befal in tender infancy, we ought to beware leſt if they be admitted to the communion of baptiſm, the ſignification of it be made void and vain. But theſe darts are thrown rather againſt God than againſt us. For it is moſt evident by many teſtimonies of ſcripture, that circumciſion alſo was a ſign of repentance. Moreover it is called of Paul the ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith. Rom. xiv. 11. Let therefore a reaſon be required of God himſelf why he commanded it to be marked in the bodies of infants. For ſince baptiſm and circumciſion are both in one caſe, they can give nothing to the one, but that they muſt alſo therewithal grant the ſame to the other. If they look back to their wonted ſtarting hole, that then by the age of infancy were figured ſpiritual infants, the way is already ſtopped up againſt them. We ſay therefore, ſince God hath communicated to infants circumciſion a ſacrament of repentance and faith, it ſeemeth no abſurdity if they be made partakers of baptiſm, unleſs they liſt openly to rage againſt the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, and in this ſelf ſame doing alſo ſhineth wiſdom and righteouſneſs enough, to beat down the backbitings of the wicked. For though infants, at the ſame inſtant that they were circumciſed, did not comprehend in underſtanding what that ſign meant: yet they were truly circumciſed into the mortification of their corrupt and defiled nature, in which mortification they ſhould afterward exerciſe themſelves when they were grown to riper age. Finally, it is very eaſy to aſſoil this objection, with ſaying, that they are baptiſed into repentance and faith to come: which although they be not formed in them, yet by ſecret working of the ſpirit the ſeed of both lie dormant in them. With this anſwer at once is overthrown whatever they wreſt againſt us which they have fetched out of the ſignification of baptiſm. Of which ſort is that title wherewith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the waſhing of regeneration and renewing. Titus iii. 5. Whereupon they gather, that it is to be given to none but to ſuch a one as is able to conceive thoſe things. But we one the contrary ſide may anſwer, that neither was circumciſion which betokened regeneration, to be given to any other but to them that were regenerate. And ſo alſo we condemn the ordinance of God. Wherefore (as we have already touched in divers places) whatſoever arguments do tend to the ſhaking of circumciſion, they have no force in the aſſailing of baptiſm. Neither do they eſcape, if they ſay that we ought to take that for determined and certain, which ſtandeth upon the authority of God, although there appear no reaſon of it: which reverence is not due to the baptiſm of infants, nor to ſuch other things which are not commended unto us by the expreſs word of God: ſince they are ſtill faſt holden with this double argument. For the commandment of God concerning infants to be circumciſed, was either lawful and ſubject to no cavils, or worthy to be found fault withal. If there was no inconvenience nor abſurdity in the commandment of circumciſion, neither can there any abſurdity be noted in obſerving the baptiſm of infants.

No neceſſity that the underſtanding ſhould go before the receiving of the holy myſtery of baptiſm.

21. As for the ſpot of abſurdity which in this place they go about to lay upon it, we thus wipe it away. Whom the Lord hath vouchſafed to elect, if having received the ſign of regeneration, they depart out of this preſent life before that they be come to riper age, he reneweth them with the power of his ſpirit incomprehenſible to us, in ſuch manner as he alone foreſeeth to be expedient. If they chance to grow up to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptiſm, they ſhall hereby be the more inkindled to the endeavour of renewing, the token whereof they ſhall learn to have been given them from their firſt infancy, that they ſhould exerciſe themſelves in it throughout the whole courſe of their life. To the ſame intent ought that to be applied which Paul teacheth in two places, that by baptiſm we are buried together with Chriſt. Rom. vi. 4. Col. ii. 12. For he doth not not mean thereby, that he who is to be baptiſed muſt be already firſt buried together with Chriſt: but ſimply declareth what doctrine is contained under baptiſm, yea and that to them that are already baptiſed: ſo that very mad men would not affirm by this place that it goeth before baptiſm. After this manner Moſes and the prophets did put the people in mind what circumciſion meant, wherewith yet they had been marked while they were infants. Of the ſame effect alſo is that which he writeth to the Galatians, that they when they were baptiſed, did put on Chriſt. Gal. iii. 27. To what end? Verily that they ſhould from thenceforth live unto Chriſt, becauſe they had not lived before. And although in the older ſort the receiving of the ſign ought to follow the underſtanding of the myſtery: yet it ſhall be by and by declared that infants ought to be otherwiſe eſteemed and accounted of. And no otherwiſe ought we to judge of that place in Peter, in which they think that they have a ſtrong handle; when he ſaith that it is not a waſhing to wipe away the filthineſs of the body, but the anſwer of a good conſcience before God, by the reſurrection of Chriſt. 1 Pet. iii. 21. They indeed do gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptiſm of infants, but that it ſhould be a vain ſmoke, namely from which this truth is far diſtant. But they often offend in this error, that they will have the thing in order of time to go always before the ſign. For the truth of circumciſion alſo conſiſted of the ſame witneſs of a good conſcience. If it ought of neceſſity to have gone before, infants ſhould never have been circumciſed by the commandment of God. But he ſhewing that the anſwer of a good conſcience was contained under the truth of circumciſion, and yet therewithal alſo commanding infants to be circumciſed, doth in that point ſufficiently declare that circumciſion is applied to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more preſent efficacy to be required in the baptiſm of infants, than that it ſhould confirm and eſtabliſh the covenant made by the Lord with them. The reſt of the ſignification of that ſacrament ſhall afterward follow at ſuch time as God himſelf foreſeeth.

Baptiſm of infants proved by allegations brought to diſprove it, as that it is miniſtred to the forgiveneſs of ſins, that the church is therewith cleanſed of the Lord in the word of life, that thereby we are engraffed into the body of Chriſt.

22. Now I think there is no man, that doth not clearly ſee that all ſuch reaſons of theirs are mere miſconſtruings of ſcripture. As for the reſt that are of a near kind to theſe, we will lightly run through them by the way. They object that baptiſm is given unto the forgiveneſs of ſins: which when it is granted, will largely make for defence of our ſentence. For ſince we are born ſinners, we do even from our mother's womb need forgiveneſs and pardon. Now ſeeing the Lord doth no cut off, but rather aſſure to that age the hope of mercy: why ſhould we take from them the ſign which is much inferior to the thing itſelf? Wherefore that which they go about to throw againſt us, we thus throw back againſt themſelves: infants have remiſſion of ſins given them, therefore they ought not to have the ſign taken from them. They allege alſo this out of the epiſtle to the Epheſians, Eph. v. 26. that the church is cleanſed of the Lord, with the waſhing of water in the word of life. Than which there could be nothing alleged more fit to overthrow this error: for thereupon groweth an eaſy proof of our ſide. If the Lord will have that waſhing, wherewith he cleanſeth his church, to be teſtified by baptiſm: it ſeemeth not rightfully that it ſhould want the teſtimony of it in infants, which are rightfully accounted part of the church, foraſmuch as they be called heirs of the heavenly kingdom. For Paul ſpeaketh of the whole church, where he ſaith that it was cleanſed with the baptiſm of water, 1 Cor. xii. 17. Likewiſe of this that in another place he ſaith that we are by baptiſm graffed into the body of Chriſt, we gather that infants, whom he reckoneth among his members, ought to be baptiſed, leſt they be plucked away from his body. Behold with what violence as with ſo many engine they aſſault the fortreſſes of our faith.

The apoſtles in not baptſing any come unto yeers of diſcretion without repentance and profeſſion made of their faith, meant not hereby to teach that none ſhou'd be baptiſed but only ſuch as were of years to do this.

23. Then they come down to the practice and cuſtom of the time of the apoſtles, wherein none is found to have been admitted to baptiſm, but he who hath before profeſſed faith and repentance. For where Peter was aſked of them that were minded to repent, what was needful to be done, he counſelled them firſt to repent, and then to be baptiſed into the forgiveneſs of ſins, Acts ii. 37. Likewiſe Philip, when the eunuch required to be baptiſed, anſwered that he might be baptiſed if he believed with all his heart. Act. viii. 37. Hereby they think that they may win, that it is not lawful that baptiſm be granted to any, but where faith and repentance go before truly if we yield to this reaſon, the firſt of theſe two places where is no mention made of faith, will prove that repentance alone ſufficeth: and the other place, wherein repentance is not required, will prove that faith only is enough. I think they will anſwer that the one place is holpen with the other, and therefore muſt be joined together. I ſay likewiſe, that other places muſt be laid together, which make ſomewhat to the undoing of this knot: foraſmuch as there be many ſentences in ſcripture, the underſtanding whereof dependeth upon the circumſtance of the place. As this preſently is an example. For they to whom Peter and Philip ſpake theſe things were of age ſufficient to have practice of repentance and to conceive faith. We earneſtly deny that ſuch ought to be baptiſed, until after perceiving of their converſion and faith, at leſt ſo far as it may be ſearched out by the judgment of men. But, that infants ought to be accounted in another number, it is more than evident enough. For in old time if any man did join himſelf into communion of religion with Iſrael, it behoved that he ſhould firſt be taught the covenant of the Lord, and inſtructed in the law, before that he were marked with circumciſion, becauſe in birth he was a ſtranger from the people of Iſrael, with whom the covenant had been made with circumciſion eſtabliſhed.

As Abraham's faith went before circumciſion, but in his ſeed circumciſion before faith, ſo it is with baptiſm in chriſtian men and children.

24. As alſo the Lord, when he adopteth Abraham to himſelf, doth not begin at circumciſion, hiding in the mean time what he meaneth by that ſign: but firſt he declareth what covenant he intendeth to make with him, and then after faith given to the promiſe, he maketh him partaker of the ſacrament. Why doth in Abraham the ſacrament follow faith, and in Iſaac his ſon it goeth before all underſtanding? Gen. xv. 1. and xvii. 16. Becauſe it is meet that he, who being in full grown age is received into fellowſhip of the covenant, from which he had been hitherto a ſtranger, ſhould firſt learn the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him needed not ſo, which by right of inheritance according to the form of the promiſe is even from his mother's womb contained in the covenant. Or (that the matter may be more clearly and briefly ſhewed) if the children of the faithful, without the help of underſtanding, are partakers of the covenant, there is no cauſe why they ſhould be debarred from the ſign for this that they cannot ſwear to the form of the covenant. This verily is the reaſon, why in ſome places God affirmeth that the infants which are iſſued of the Iſraelites, are begotten and born to him, Gen. xvi. 20. and xxiii. 37. For without doubt he eſteemeth as his children, the children of them to whoſe ſeed he promiſeth that he will be a Father. But he who is unfaithful, iſſued of godly parents, till he be by faith united to God is judged a ſtranger from the communion of the covenant. Therefore it is no wonder if he be not partaker of the ſign, the ſignification whereof ſhould be deceitful and void in him to this effect Paul alſo writeth, that the Gentiles ſo long as they were drowned in their idolatry, were out of the teſtament, Eph. ii. 12. With this ſhort ſum, (as I think) the whole matter may be clearly opened: that they who in grown age, embrace the faith of Chriſt, foraſmuch as they were hitherto ſtrangers from the covenant, are not to be marked with baptiſm, but whereas faith and repentance come between, which only can open them the entry into the fellowſhip of the covenant: but the infants that are iſſued of Chriſtians, as they are received of God into the inheritance of the covenant, ſo ſoon as they are born; ſo ought to be received to baptiſm. Hereunto muſt that be applied which the evangeliſt ſpeaketh of, that they were baptiſed of John who confeſſed their ſins, Matth. iii. 6. Which example at this day alſo we think meet to be kept. For if a Turk offer himſelf to baptiſm, he ſhould not be raſhly baptiſed of us, namely not till after confeſſion whereby he may ſatisfy the church.

The words of Chriſt concerning birth of water and the ſpirit nothing leſs than a proof that actual regeneration muſt preſently always concur with baptiſm.

25. Moreover they bring forth the words of Chriſt, which are rehearſed in the third chapter of John iii. 5. whereby they think that a preſent regeneration is required in baptiſm. Unleſs a man be born again of water and the ſpirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Lo (ſay they) how baptiſm is by the Lord's own mouth called regeneration. Then therefore whom it is more than enough known to be unable to receive regeneration, by what colour do we admit to bap-baptiſm which cannot be without regeneration? Firſt they are deceived in this that they think that in this place mention is made of baptiſm, becauſe they hear the name of water. For after that Chriſt had declared to Nicodemus the corruption of nature, and taught him, that men muſt be born of new, becauſe Nicodemus dreamed of a bodily new birth, he there ſhewed the manner how God doth regenerate us, namely by water and the ſpirit: as though he ſhould ſay by the ſpirit which in cleanſing and watering faithful ſouls, doth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the ſpirit ſimply for the ſpirit, which is water. Neither is this a new form of ſpeech, for it altogether agreeth with the ſame which is in the third chapter of Matthew: he that followeth me, it is he that baptiſeth in the Holy Ghoſt and fire. Mat. iii. 11. Therefore as to baptiſe in the Holy Ghoſt and fire, is to give the Holy Ghoſt, which hath the office and nature of fire: ſo to be born again of water and the ſpirit, is nothing elſe but to receive that power of the holy Spirit which doth the ſame thing in the ſoul that water doth in the body. I know that others do otherwiſe expound it: but I am out of doubt that this is the natural meaning: becauſe the purpoſe of Chriſt is no other, but to teach that all they muſt put off their own nature who aſpire to the heavenly kingdom. Howbeit if we liſt to cavil unſavourily as they do, it were eaſy for us) when we have granted as they would have it) to infer upon them that baptiſm is before faith and repentance: foraſmuch as in the words of Chriſt it goeth before the ſpirit. It is certain that this is underſtood of ſpiritual gifts: which if it come after baptiſm, I have obtained what I require. But leaving cavils, we muſt hold faſt the plain expoſition, which I have brought, that no man till he has been renewed with living water, that is, with the ſpirit, can enter into the kingdom of God.

All unbaptiſed not to be adjudged to eternal death.

26. Now hereby alſo it is evident that their feigned invention is to be hiſſed out, who adjudge all the unbaptiſed to eternal death. Therefore let us according to their requeſt imagine baptiſm to be miniſtred to none but to them that are grown in age: what will they ſay, ſhall become of a child, who is rightly and well inſtructed with the introductions of godlineſs, if when the day of baptiſing is at hand, he happen to be taken away with ſudden death beſide all mens hope? The Lord's promiſe is clear, that whoſoever hath believed in the Son, ſhall not ſee death, nor ſhall come into judgment, but is already paſſed from death into life: and it is no where found that he ever damned him that was not yet baptiſed. I would not be ſo underſtood as though I meant that baptiſm might freely be deſpiſed (by which deſpiſing I affirm that the Lord's covenant is defiled: ſo much leſs can I abide to excuſe it) only it is enough for me to prove, that it is not ſo neceſſary, that he ſhould be immediately thought to be loſt, from whom power is taken away to obtain it. But if we agree to their feigned device, we ſhall damn all them without exception, whom any chance withholdeth from baptiſm, with how great faith ſoever (by which Chriſt himſelf is poſſeſſed) otherwiſe they are endued. Moreover they make all infants guilty of eternal death, to whom they deny baptiſm, which by their own confeſſion is neceſſary to ſalvation. Now let them look how trimly they agree with the words of Chriſt, by which the kingdom of heaven is adjudged to that age. Mat. xix. 14. But, to grant them every thing ſo much as pertaineth to the underſtanding of this place, yet they ſhall gather nothing thereof, unleſs they overthrow the former doctrine which we have ſtabliſhed concerning the regeneration of infants.

The baptiſm of infants not diſproved by the commandment which Chriſt gave to teach and baptiſe, nor by the promiſe of ſalvation which he maketh to every one that believeth and is baptiſed.

27. But they glory that they have the ſtrongeſt hold of all in the very inſtitution of baptiſm, which they fetch out of the laſt chapter of Matthew: Mat. xxviii. 19. where Chriſt ſending forth his Apoſtles to all nations giveth them the firſt commandment to teach them, and the ſecond to baptiſe them. Then alſo out of the laſt of Mark they adjoin this, Mark. xvi. 16. he that believeth and is baptiſed, ſhall be ſaved. What ſeek we further (ſay they) when the Lord's own words do openly ſound, that we muſt firſt teach ere we baptiſe, and do aſſign to baptiſm the ſecond ſtate after faith? Of which order the Lord alſo ſhewed an example in himſelf, who would be baptiſed not till the thirtieth year. But here, O good God, how many ways do they both entangle themſelves, and bewray their own ignorance? For herein they now more than childiſhly err, that they fetch the firſt inſtitution of baptiſm from thence, which Chriſt had from the beginning of his preaching given in charge to his Apoſtles to miniſter. Therefore there is no cauſe why they ſhould affirm that the law and rule of baptiſm is to be fetched out of theſe places, as though they contained the firſt inſtitution thereof. But to bear with them for this fault, yet how ſtrong is this manner of reaſoning? Truly if I liſted to dally with them, there is not a little lurking hole, but a moſt wide field offereth it ſelf open for us to eſcape them. For when they ſtick ſo faſt to the order of words, that they gather that becauſe it is ſaid, go, preach and baptiſe: Luk. iii. 23. Again, he that believeth and is baptiſed Mark xvi. 15. therefore they muſt preach before that they baptiſe, and believe before that they require baptiſm: why may not we again anwer them with ſaying that we muſt baptiſe beforeſ that we muſt teach the keeping of thoſe things that Chriſt hath commanded, namely ſince it is ſaid, baptiſe ye, teaching them to keep whatſoever things I have commanded you? which ſame things we have noted in that ſaying of Chriſt which hath been even now alleged concerning the regeneration of water and the Spirit. For if it be ſo underſtood as they would have it, verily in that place baptiſm muſt be before ſpiritual regeneration, becauſe it is named in the firſt place. For Chriſt doth teach that we muſt be regenerate, not of the Spirit and water, but of water and the Spirit.

The goſpel by Chriſt's appointment to be preached to men of capacity and they to believe before they be baptized: but not infants therefore to be unbaptized till they come unto years of ability to hear and believe.

28. Now this invincible reaſon whereupon they bear themſelves ſo bold, ſeemeth to be ſomewhat ſhaken: but becauſe truth hath defence enough in ſimplicity, I will not eſcape away with ſuch light arguments. Therefore let them take with them a full anſwer. Chriſt in this place giveth the chief commandment concerning the preaching of the goſpel, whereunto he adjoineth the miniſtry of baptiſm as an addition annexed it. Again, he ſpeaketh more otherwiſe of baptiſm, but ſo far as the miniſtration of it is under the office of teaching. For Chriſt ſendeth the Apoſtles to publiſh the goſpel to all the nations of the world, that they ſhould from each where with the doctrine of ſalvation gather together into his kingdom men that before were loſt. But whom, or what manner of men? It is certain that there is no mention but of them that are able to receive teaching. Afterward he addeth that ſuch, when they are inſtructed, ought to be baptized, adjoining a promiſe, that they who believe and are baptized ſhall be ſaved. Is there in all that ſaying ſo much as one ſyllable of infants? What form therefore of reaſoning ſhall this be wherewith they aſſail us: they who are of grown age, muſt firſt be inſtructed, that they may believe, ere they be baptized: therefore it is unlawful to make baptiſm common to infants? Altho' they would burſt themſelves, they ſhall prove nothing elſe by this place but that the goſpel muſt be preached to them that are of a capacity able to hear it, before that they be baptized, foraſmuch as he there ſpeaketh of ſuch only. Let them hereof if they can make a ſtop to debar infants from baptiſm.

Children no more excluded from baptiſm by commandment given that no men ſhould be baptized before they believe, than from meat by the Apoſtles injuction, that none ſhould eat that labour-eth not.

29. But that even blind men alſo may with groping find out their deceits, I will point them out with a very clear ſimilitude. If any man cavil that infants ought to have meat taken from them, upon this pretence that the Apoſtle ſuffereth none to eat but them that labour, ſhall he not be worthy that all men ſhould ſpit at him? Why ſo? Becauſe he without difference draweth that to all men, which was ſpoken of one kind and one certain age of men. No whit handſomer is their handling in this preſent cauſe. For that which every man ſeeth to belong to one age alone, they draw to infants, that this age alſo may be ſubject to the rule which was made for none, but them that were more grown in years. As for the example of Chriſt it nothing upholdeth their ſide, he was not baptized before that he was thirty years old. That is indeed true: but there is a reaſon thereof ready to be ſhewed: becauſe he then purpoſed by his preaching to lay a ſound foundation of baptiſm, or rather to eſtabliſh the foundation which had been before laid of John. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to inſtitute baptiſm, to procure the greater authority to his inſtitution, he ſanctified it with his own body, and that in ſuch fitneſs of time as was moſt convenient, namely when he began his preaching. Finally, they ſhall gather nothing elſe hereof, but that baptiſm took its original and beginning at the preaching of the goſpel. If they liſt to appoint the thirtieth year, why do they not keep it, but do receive every one to baptiſm as he hath in their judgment ſufficiently profited? yea and Servetus one of their maſters, when he he ſtiffly required this time, yet began at the 21 year of his age to boaſt himſelf to be a prophet. As though he were to be ſuffered that taketh on himſelf the place of a teacher in the church, before that he be a member of the church.

The ſcripture ſheweth reaſon why the Lord's ſupper ſhould not be given unto infants, but why baptiſm, none.

30. At the laſt they object, that there is no greater cauſe why baptiſm ſhould be given to infants, than the Lord's ſupper, which yet is not granted them. As though the ſcripture did not every way expreſs a large difference. The ſame was indeed uſually done in the old church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Auguſtine: but that manner is worthily grown out of uſe. For if we conſider the nature and property of baptiſm, it is truly an entry into the church, and as it were a form of admiſſion, whereby we are numbered the people of God, a ſign of our ſpiritual regeneration by which we are born again into the children of God: whereas on the other ſide the ſupper is given to them that are more grown in age, who having paſſed tender infancy, are now able to bear ſtrong meat. Which difference is very evidently ſhewed in the ſcripture. For there the Lord ſo much as pertaineth to baptiſm, maketh no choice of ages. But he doth not likewiſe give the ſupper to all to take part of it, but only to them who are fit to diſcern the body and blood of the Lord, to examine their own conſcience, to declare the Lord's death, to weigh the power thereof. Would we have any thing plainer, than that which the Apoſtle teacheth when he exhorteth that every man ſhould prove and examine himſelf, and then eat of this bread and drink of this cup? Therefore examination muſt go before, which ſhould in vain be looked for of infants. Again, he that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himſelf, not diſcerning the Lord's body. 1 Cor. xi. 28. If none can partake worthily but they that can well diſcern the holineſs of the Lord's body, why ſhould we give to our tender children, poiſon inſtead of lively food? What is that commandment of the Lord, ye ſhall do it in remembrance of me? what is that other which the Apoſtle deriveth from the ſame. So oft as ye ſhall eat of this bread, ye ſhall declare the Lord's death till he come? What remembrance (I beſeech you) ſhall we require at our infants of the thing which they never attained with underſtanding, what preaching of the croſs of Chriſt, the force and benefit whereof they do not yet comprehend in mind? None of theſe things is preſcribed in baptiſm. Therefore between theſe two ſigns is great difference: which we note alſo in like ſigns in the Old Teſtament; circumciſion, which is known to anſwer to our baptiſm, was appointed for infants. But the paſſover into whoſe place the ſupper hath now ſucceeded, did not receive all manner of gueſts without difference. But was rightly eaten of them only that might by age enquire of the ſignification of it. If theſe men had remaining one crumb of ſound brain, would they be blind at a thing ſo clear and offering itſelf to ſight.

Twenty arguments of Servetus againſt the baptiſm of children anſwered.

31. Although it grieveth me to load the readers with a heap of trifles: yet it ſhall be worth the pains briefly to wipe away ſuch gay reaſons as Servetus not the leaſt of the Anabaptiſts, yea the great glory of that company, thought himſelf to bring when he prepared himſelf to conflict. 1. He alledgeth that Chriſt's ſigns as they are perfect, ſo do require them that be perfect or able to conceive perfection. But the ſolution is eaſy: that the perfection of baptiſm, which extendeth even to death, is wrongfully reſtrained to one point of time. I ſay yet further that perfection is fooliſhly required in man at the firſt day, whereunto baptiſm allureth us all our life long, by continual degrees. 2. He objecteth that Chriſt's ſigns were ordained for remembrance, that every man ſhould remember that he was buried together with Chriſt. I anſwer that that which he hath feigned of his own head, needeth no confutation: yea that which he draweth to baptiſm, Paul's words ſhew to be proper to the holy ſupper, that every man ſhould examine himſelf: but of baptiſm there is no where any ſuch thing. Whereupon we gather that they are rightly baptized who for their ſmallneſs of age, are not yet able to receive examination. 3. Whereas he thirdly alledgeth, that all they abide in death who believe not the Son of God, and that the wrath of God abideth upon them: John iii. 36. and therefore that infants which cannot believe lie in their damnation: I anſwer that Chriſt there ſpeaketh not of the general guiltineſs wherewith all the poſterity of Adam are enwrapped, but only threatneth the deſpiſers of the goſpel, which do proudly and ſtubbornly refuſe the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infants. Alſo I ſet a contrary reaſon againſt them: that whomſoever Chriſt bleſſeth, he is diſcharged from the curſe of Adam and the wrath of God: ſince therefore it is known that infants are bleſſed of him, it followeth that they are diſcharged from death. Then he falſly cited that which is no where read, that whoſoever is born of the Spirit heareth the voice of the Spirit. Which although we grant to be written, yet ſhall prove nothing elſe but that the faithful are framed to obedience, according as the Spirit worketh in them. But that which is ſpoken of a certain number, it is faulty to draw indifferently to all. 4. Fourthly, he objecteth: becauſe that goeth before which is natural 1 Cor. xv. 46. we muſt tarry ripe time for baptiſm which is ſpiritual. But although I grant that all the poſterity of Adam begotten of the fleſh from the very womb bear their own damnation, yet I deny that that withſtandeth but that God may preſently bring remedy. For neither ſhall Servetus prove that there were many years appointed by God that the ſpiritualneſs of life may begin. As Paul teſtifieth, although they who are born of the faithful are by nature damned: yet by ſupernatural grace they are ſaved. 1 Cor. vii. 14. 5. Then he bringeth forth an allegory, that David going up into the tower of Zion, did lead neither blind men nor lame men with him but ſtrong ſoldiers. 2 Sam. v. 8. But what if I ſet a parable againſt it, wherein God calleth to the heavenly banquet blind men and lame men: Luke xiv. 21. how will Servetus unwind himſelf out of this knot? I aſk alſo whether lame and maimed men had not firſt been ſoldiers with David. But it is ſuperfluous to tarry longer upon this reaſon, which the readers ſhall find by the holy hiſtory to be made of mere falſhood. 6. There followeth another allegory, that the Apoſtles were fiſhers of men, not of little children. Matth. iv. 19. But I aſk, what that ſaying of Chriſt meaneth, that into the net of the goſpel are gathered all kinds of fiſhes. Matth. xiii. 47. But becauſe I like not to play with allegories, I anſwer that when the office of teaching was enjoined to the Apoſtles, yet they were not forbidden from baptizing of infants. Howbeit I would yet know, when the Evangeliſt nameth them Anthropous, men, (in which word is comprehended all mankind without exception) why they ſhould deny infants to be men. 7. Seventhly he alledgeth, that ſince ſpiritual things agree with ſpiritual, 1 Cor. ii. 13. infants who are not ſpiritual, are alſo not meet for baptiſm. But firſt it is plainly evident how wrongfully they wreſt the place of Paul. There is treated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did too much ſtand in their own conceit for vain ſharpneſs of wit, Paul rebuketh their ſluggiſhneſs, for that they were yet to be inſtructed in the firſt introduction of heavenly wiſdom. Who can thereof gather that baptiſm is to be denied to infants, whom being begotten of the fleſh, God doth by free adoption make holy to himſelf? Whereas he ſaith, that they muſt be fed with ſpiritual meat, if they be new men, the ſolution is eaſy, that by baptiſm they are admitted into the flock of Chriſt, and that the ſign of adoption ſufficeth them, till being grown to age they are able to bear ſtrong meat: that therefore the time of examination which God expreſly requireth in the holy ſupper, muſt be tarried for. Afterward he objecteth that Chriſt calleth all his to the holy ſupper. But it is certain enough that he admitteth none, but them that are already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infants whom he vouchſafeth to embrace, do ſtay in a ſeparate and proper degree by themſelves till they grow to age, and yet are not ſtrangers. 8. Whereas he ſaith, that it is monſtrous that a man after that he is born, ſhould not eat: I anſwer that ſouls are otherwiſe fed than by the outward eating of the ſupper: and that therefore Chriſt is nevertheleſs meat to infants, although they abſtain from the ſign. But of baptiſm the caſe is otherwiſe, by which only the gate into the church is opened to them. 9. Again he objecteth that a good ſteward diſtributeth meat to the houſhold in due time. Matth. xxiv. 46. Which although I willingly grant: yet by what right will he appoint unto us the certain time of baptiſm, that he may prove that it is not given to infants out of time. 10. Moreover he bringeth in that commandment of Chriſt to the Apoſtles, that they ſhould make haſte into the harveſt, while the fields wax white. John iv. 35. Verily Chriſt meaneth this only, that the Apoſtles ſeeing the fruit of their labour preſent, ſhould the more cheerfully prepare themſelves to teach. Who ſhall therefore gather that the only time of harveſt is the ripe time for baptiſm? 11. His eleventh reaſon is, that in the firſt church Chriſtians and diſciples were all one: Acts xi. 26. but we ſee now that he fooliſhly reaſoneth from the part to the whole. Diſciples are called men of full age, who had been already thoroughly taught, and had profeſſed Chriſt: as it behoved that the Jews under the law ſhould be the diſciples of Moſes: yet no man ſhall thereof rightly gather, that infants were ſtrangers, whom the Lord hath teſtified to be of his own houſhold. 12. Beſides theſe he he allegeth, that all Christians are brethren, in which number infants are not unto us, so long as we debar them from the supper. But I return to that principle, that none are heirs of the kingdom of heaven, but they that are the members of Christ: then, that the embracing of Christ was a true token of the adoption, whereby infants are joined in common with full grown men, and that they abstaining for a time from the supper withstandeth not but that they pertain to the body of the church. Neither did the thief that was converted on the cross, cease to be brother to the godly, although he never came to the supper. 13. Afterward he addeth, that none is made our brother but by the spirit of adoption, which is given only by the hearing of faith. I answer, that he still falleth back into the same deceitful argument, because he wiredraweth that to infants which was spoken only of grown men. Paul teacheth there that this is God's ordinary manner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, when he stirreth up to them faithful teachers, by whose ministry and labour he reacheth his hand to them. Who dare thereby appoint a law to him, but that he may by some other secret way graff infants into Christ? 14. Where he objecteth that Cornelius was baptized after he had received the holy Ghost: Acts x. 24. how wrongfully he doth out of one example gather a general rule, appeareth by the eunuch and the Samaritans, Acts viii. 27. in whom the Lord kept a contrary order, that baptism went before the gifts of the holy Ghost. 15. The fifteenth reason is more than foolish. He saith that we are by regeneration made gods: and that they be gods to whom the word of God is spoken, John i. 35. which accordeth not to children that be infants. Whereas he feigneth a godhead to the faithful, that is one of his dotages, which it pertaineth not to this present place to examine. But to wrest the place of the Psalm to so contrary a sense, is a point of desperate shamelessness. Christ saith, that kings and magistrates are called of the prophets gods, because they bear an office appointed them of God. But that which concerning the special commandment of government is directed to certain men, this handsome expositor draweth to the doctrine of the gospel, that he may banish infants out of the church. 16. Again he objecteth, that infants cannot be accounted new men, because they are not begotten by the word. But I do now again repeat that which I have often said, that to regenerate us, doctrine is the uncorruptible seed, if we be fit to receive it: but when by reason of age there is not yet in us aptness to learn, God keepeth his decrees of regenerating. 17. Afterward he cometh back to his allegories, that in the law a sheep and a goat were not offered in sacrifice so soon as they came out of the womb. If I listed to draw figures to this purpose, I could readily object against them, that all first begotten things were consecrate to God so soon as they had opened the womb: then that a lamb must be killed at a years age. Exod. xiii. 2. Exod xii. 5. Whereupon followeth that manly strength is not to be tarried for, but rather that the new and yet tender issues are chosen of God for sacrifices. 18. Furthermore he affirmeth that none can come to Christ but they that have been prepared of John. As though John's office were not enduring but for a time. But to omit this truly that same preparation was not in the children whom Christ embraced and blessed, Wherefore let him go with his false principle. 19. At length he calleth for patrons Trismegistus and the Sibylles, to prove that holy washings pertain not but to them that are of grown age. Lo how honourably he thinketh of the baptism of Christ, which he reduceth to the ceremonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwise ministred than pleaseth Trismegistus. But we more esteem the authority of God, whom it hath pleased to make infants holy to himself, and to admit them with the holy sign, the force whereof they did not yet by age understand. Neither do we count it lawful to borrow out of the cleansings of the Gentiles any thing that may change in our baptism the everlasting and inviolable law of God, which he hath stablished concerning circumcision. Last of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawful to baptise infants without understanding, then baptism may irreverently and in sport be ministred to boys when they play. But of this matter let him quarrel with God by whose commandment circumcision was common to infants before that they had attained understanding. Was it therefore a matter of sport, or subject to the follies of children, that they might overthrow the holy ordinance of God? But it is no wonder that these reprobate spirits, as though they were vexed with a phrensy, do thrust in all the grossest absurdities for defence of their errors, because God doth with such giddiness justly take vengeance of their pride and stubbornness. Verily I trust I have made plain with how feeble succours Servetus hath holpen his silly brethren the Anabaptists.

32. Now I think it will be doubtful to no sober man, how The drift of rashly they trouble the church of Christ, that move brawls and contentions for the baptism of infants. But it is profitable to consider, what Satan goeth about with this so great subtilty: even to take away from us the singular fruit of affiance and spiritual joy which is to be gathered hereof, and to diminish as much also the glory of the goodness of God. For how sweet is it to godly minds, to be certified not only by word, but also by sight to be seen with eyes, that they obtain so much favour with the heavenly Father, that he hath also care of their posterity? For here it is to be seen, how he taketh upon him the person of a most provident father of household toward us, which even after our death doth not lay away his carefulness of us, but provideth and foreseeth for our children. Ought we not here after the example of David with all our heart to leap up unto thanksgiving, that by such shew of his goodness, his name may be sanctified? Psal. xlviii. 11. This, verily Satan intendeth, in assailing with so great armies the baptism of infants: namely, that this testifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promise which by it is present before our eyes, may at length by little and little vanish away. Whereupon should grow not only a wicked unthankfulness toward the mercy of God, but also a certain slothfulness in instructing our children to godliness. For by this spur we are not a little pricked forward to bring them up in earnest fear of God and in the keeping of his law, when we consider that even immediately from their birth, he taketh and acknowlegeth them for his children. Wherefore unless we list enviously to darken the bountifulness of God, let us offer to him our children, to whom he giveth a place among them that are of his family and household, that is to say, the members of the church.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the holy supper of Christ; and what it availeth us.

The sacrament of the supper of Christ instituted to testify that our souls are not only once made alive, but continually kept and nourished by Christ as by food.

AFTER that God hath once received us into his family, and not only to take us as his servants but as his children: that he may fulfil the office of a most good father, and careful for his issue he taketh also upon him to nourish us throughout the whole course of our life. And not contented therewith, it pleased him by a pledge given, to assure us of this continual liberality. To this end therefore he hath given his church another sacrament by the hand of his only begotten son, namely a spiritual banket, wherein Christ testifieth himself to be the quickning bread, wherewith our souls are fed to true and blessed immortality. But forasmuch as the knowlege of so great a mystery is very necessary, and according to the greatness thereof, requireth a diligent declaration: and Satan, that he might bereave the church of this inestimable treasure, hath long ago spread mists, and since that time darkness, to obscure the light of it. and then hath stirred strifes and battels that might estrange the minds of the simple from tasting of this holy food, and knit up the sum from the capacity of the unlearned; I will undo those knots, wherewith Satan hath endeavoured to snare the world First, bread and wine are signs, which represent unto us the invisible food, which we receive of the flesh and blood of Christ. For as in baptism God again begetting us doth graff us into the fellowship of his church, and by adoption doth make us his own: so we have said that he performeth the office of a provident father of household, in this that he continually ministreth us meat, that he sustaineth and preserveth us in that life whereunto he hath by his word begotten us. Now the only meat of our soul is Christ, and therefore the heavenly Father calleth us to him, that being refreshed with common partaking of him, we may from time to time gather lively force, until we attain to heavenly immortality. But forasmuch as this mystery of the secret uniting of Christ with the godly is by nature impossible to be comprehended, he giveth the figure and image thereof in visible signs most fit for our small capacity: yea, as it were by earnest and tokens given, he maketh it so assured unto us as if it were seen with our eyes, because this so familiar a similitude entreth even to the grossest minds, that souls are so fed with Christ, as bread and wine do sustain the bodily life. Now therefore we have it declared, to what end this mystical blessing tendeth, namely to assure us, that the body of the Lord was so so once offered for us, that we now eat it, and in eating it do feel in us the effectual working of that only sacrifice that his blood was so once shed for us, that it is unto us continual drink. And so sound the words of the promise there adjoined. Take, this is my body, which is delivered for you. The body therefore which was once offered up for our salvation, we are commanded to take and eat: that when we see our selves to be made partakers of this, we may certainly determine that the power of his death which bringeth life shall be effectual in us. Whereupon also he calleth the cup the covenant in his blood. For after a certain manner it reneweth, or rather continueth the covenant which he hath once established with his blood, so much as pertaineth to the confirming of our faith, so oft as he reacheth unto us that holy blood to be tasted of. Mat. xxvi. 26. and xiv. 17. Luke xxii. 19. 1 Cor. xi. 24.

The exchange which Christ hath made by taking that upon him which was ours, and communicating that which is his to us confirmed by this sacramant.

2. A great fruit verily of affiance and sweetness may godly souls gather of this sacrament, because they have a witness that we are grown together into one body with Christ so that whatsoever is his we may call ours. Hereupon followeth that we may boldly promise unto ourselves, that everlasting life is ours, whereof he is heir: and that the kingdom of heaven, whereunto he is now entered, can no more fall away from us than from him: again, that we cannot now be condemned for our sins, from the guiltiness whereof he hath acquitted us, when he willed them to be imputed to himself as if they were his own. This is the marvellous exchange, which of his immeasurable bountifulness he hath made with us: that he being made with us the son of man, hath made us with him the sons of God: that by his coming down into earth, he hath made us a way to go up into heaven: that putting upon him our mortality, he hath given us his immortality: that taking on him our weakness he hath strengthened us with his power: that taking our poverty to himself, he hath conveyed his riches to us: that taking to him the weight of our unrighteousness, wherewith we were oppressed, he hath clothed us with his righteousness.

Christ truly given and made ours in this sacrament the whole pith whereof in a manner standeth herein, that for us the body and blood of Christ were offered which we receive represented under bread and wine, to teach that they are to the soul the same which these visible creatures are to the body.

3. Of all these things we have so full a witnessing in this sacrament, that we must certainly determine, that Christ is truly given us, as if Christ himself were set present before our eyes, and handled with our hands. For this word can neither lie to us, nor mock us: Take, eat, drink: this is my body, which is delivered for you: this is the blood which is into the forgiveness of sins. Whereas he commandeth to take, he signifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commandeth to eat, he signifieth that he is made one substance with us. Whereas he saith of the body that it is delivered for us: of the blood that it is shed for us: therein he teacheth that both are not so much his as ours: because he took and laid away both, not for his behoof, but to our salvation. And truly it is to be diligently marked, that the chief, and in a manner, whole pith of the sacrament standeth in these words. Which is delivered for you, which is shed for you. For otherwise it should not much profit us, that the body and blood of our Lord are now distributed, unless they had been once given forth for our redemption and salvation. Therefore they are represented under bread and wine, that we should learn that they are not only ours, but also ordained for the nourishment of spiritual life. This is it that we before said, that from the corporal things which are shewed forth in the sacraments, we are by a certain proportional relation guided to spiritual things. So when bread is given us for a sign of the body of Christ, we ought by and by to conceive this similitude: as bread nourisheth, sustaineth, and maintaineth the life of our body: so the body of Christ is the only meat to quicken and give life to our soul. When we see wine set forth for a sign of his blood; we must call to mind what uses wine is of to the body, that we may consider that the same are brought to us spiritually by the blood of Christ: those uses are to cherish, to refresh, to strengthen, to make merry. For if we sufficiently weigh, what the delivering of this holy body, what the shedding of this holy blood, hath profited us: we shall plainly perceive that these things which are spoken of bread and wine, according to such proportional relation do very well accord with them toward us when they are communicated unto us.

The highest consideration in this sacrament is of

4. Therefore the chief parts of the sacrament are not simply and without higher consideration to reach to us the body of Christ:

the promiſe whereby Chriſt hath teſtified his fleſh to be meat and his blood to be drink indeed.

but rather that ſame promiſe, whereby he teſtifieth, that his fleſh is veriily meat, and his blood is drink, with which we are fed into eternal life: whereby he affirmeth himſelf to be the bread of life, of which whoſoever eateth, he ſhall live for ever: to ſeal, I ſay, and confirm that promiſe: and for bringing the ſame to paſs, to ſend us to the croſs of Chriſt, where that promiſe hath been truly performed, and in all points fulfilled. For we do not well and healthfully eat Chriſt but crucified, when we do with lively feeling conceive the effectualneſs of his death. For whereas he calleth himſelf the bread of life, he doth not borrow the name of the ſacrament, as ſome do wrongfully expound it: but becauſe he was given us ſuch of the Father, and performed himſelf ſuch, when being made partaker of our human mortality, he made us partners of his divine immortality: when offering himſelf for ſacrifice, he took our accurſedneſs upon himſelf, that he might fill us with bleſſing: when with his death he devoured and ſwallowed up death: when in his reſurrection he raiſed up this our corruptible fleſh which he had put on, to glory and incorruption.

This ſacrament maketh not Chriſt to be the bread of life, but teſtifieth unto us that he is ſo to ſuch as receive him in the due eſtimation of thoſe myſteries whereby he is received, to receive him to eat his fleſh and to drink his blood an effect of belief and a thing to be diſtinguiſhed from faith.

5. It remaineth that by application all the ſame may come to us. That is done, both by the goſpel, and more clearly by the holy ſupper, where both he offereth himſelf to us with all his good things, and we receive him by faith. Wherefore the ſacrament maketh not that Chriſt firſt beginneth to be the bread of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance that he was made the bread of life, which we continually eat, and when it giveth unto us the taſte and ſavour of that bread, then it maketh us to feel the ſtrength of that bread. For it promiſeth us, that whatſoever Chriſt did or ſuffered, the ſame was done to give life to us. Then, that this giving of life is everlaſting, by which we may without end be nouriſhed, ſuſtained, and preſerved in life. For as Chriſt ſhould not have been to us the bread of life, unleſs he had been born and had died for us, unleſs he had riſen again for us: ſo now he ſhould not be the ſame unleſs the effectualneſs and fruit of his birth, death and reſurrection, were an everlaſting and immortal thing. All which Chriſt hath very well expreſſed in theſe words. The bread which I will give, is my fleſh, which I will give for the life of the world. By which words without doubt he ſignifieth, that his body ſhould therefore be to us for bread, to the ſpiritual life of the ſoul, becauſe it ſhould be given forth to death for our ſalvation: and that it is delivered to us to eat of it, when by faith he maketh us partakers of it. Once therefore he gave it, that he might be made bread, when he gave forth himſelf to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he giveth it, when by the word of the goſpel he offereth it to us to be received, ſo far as it was crucified: where he ſealeth that deliverence with the holy myſtery of the ſupper: where he inwardly fulfilleth that which he outwardly betokeneth. Now herein we muſt beware of two faults, that neither doing too much in abaſing the ſigns, we ſeem to pluck them from their myſteries to which they are in a manner faſt knit: nor that being immeaſurable in advancing the ſame, we ſeem in the mean time ſomewhat to darken the myſteries themſelves. That Chriſt is the bread of life, wherewith the faithful are nouriſhed into eternal ſalvation, there is no man but he granteth, unleſs he be altogether without religion. But this point is not likewiſe agreed upon among all men, what is the manner of partaking of him. For there be that in one word define, that to eat the fleſh of Chriſt and to drink his blood, is nothing elſe but to believe in Chriſt himſelf. But I think that Chriſt meant ſome certainer and higher thing, in that notable ſermon where he commendeth to us the eating of his fleſh, namely, that we are quickened by the true partaking of him: which alſo he therefore expreſſed by the words of eating and drinking, leſt any man ſhould think, that the life which we receive of him is conceived by bare knowlege only. For as not the ſight but the eating of bread ſufficeth the body for nouriſhment; ſo it behoveth that the ſoul be truly and throughly made partaker of Chriſt, that by the power of him it may be quickened into a ſpiritual life. But in the mean time we confeſs that there is no other eating but of faith; as there can no other be imagined. But this is the difference between my words and theirs, that with them to eat is only to believe: but I ſay that the fleſh of Chriſt is eaten with believing, becauſe by faith he is made ours, and I ſay that eating is the fruit and effect of faith. Or if you will have it plainer, with them eating is faith: and I think it rather to follow faith. In words verily the difference is but ſmall:

but in the thing itself, not small. For though the apostle teacheth that Christ dwelleth in our hearts by faith: Eph. iii. 17. yet no man will expound this dwelling to be faith: but all men do perceive there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithful do obtain to have Christ dwelling in them. After this manner the Lord meant, in in calling himself the bread of life, John vi. 51. not only to teach that in the faith of his death and resurrection, salvation is reposed for us: but also that by true partaking of himself it is brought to pass, that his life passeth into us, and becometh ours: like as bread, when it is taken for food, ministreth liveliness to the body.

The meaning of saint Augustine and saint Chrysostome when they speak of the participation of the body of Christ.

6. Neither did Augustine, whom they bring in for their patron, in any other meaning write that we eat by believing, than to shew that this eating is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I also deny not: but yet therewithal I add, that we do by faith embrace Christ, not appearing afar off, but making himself one with us, that he may be our head, and we his members. Yet do not I utterly disallow that manner of speaking: but only I deny it to be a full declaration, if they mean to define what it is to eat the flesh of Christ. Otherwise I see that Augustine hath oft used this form of speech: as when he saith in the third book of christian doctrine, Unless ye eat the flesh of the son of man: this is a figure teaching that we must communicate with the passion of the Lord, and must sweetly and profitably lay up in remembrance that for us his flesh was crucified and wounded. Again when he saith that the three thousand men that were converted at Peter's sermon, Acts ii. 41. did drink the blood of Christ by believing, which they had shed by cruel dealing. (Hom. in Joh. 31. and 40.) But in many other places he honourably setteth out that benefit of faith, that by it our souls are no less refreshed with the communicating of the flesh of Christ, than our bodies are with the bread which they eat. And the same is it which in a certain place Chrysostom writeth, that Christ doth not only by faith, but also really maketh us his body. Hom. 60. For he meaneth not that we do from any other where than from faith, obtain such a benefit: but this only he meaneth to exclude that none when he heareth faith to be named, should conceive a naked imagination. As for them that will have the supper to be only a mark of outward profession, I do now pass them over: because I think that I have sufficiently confuted their error, when I treated of sacraments in general. Only this thing let the readers mark, that when the cup is called the covenant in the blood, Luk. xxii. 20. there is a promise expressed that may be of force to confirm faith. Whereupon followeth, that unless we have respect to God, and embrace that which he offereth, we do not rightly use the holy supper.

They strain the communion of Christ too narrowly who make it nothing but the participation of his spirit only.

7. Moreover they also do not satisfy who acknowlegeing that we have some communion with Christ, when they mean to express it, do make us partakers only of the spirit, without making any mention of flesh and blood. As though all those things were spoken of nothing, that his flesh is verily meat, that his blood is verily drink: that none hath life, but he that eateth that flesh, and drinketh that blood: and such other sayings that belong to the same end. Wherefore if it be certain that the full communicating of Christ proceedeth beyond their description, as it is too narrowly strained: I will now go about to sum up in few words, how large it is, and how far it extendeth it self, before that I speak of the contrary fault of excess. For I shall have a longer disputation with the excessive teachers, who, when according to their own grossness they frame a manner of eating and drinking full of absurdity, do also transfigure Christ stripped out of this flesh into a fantasy: if yet a man may with any words comprehended so great a mystery, which I see that I can not sufficiently comprehend with mind: and therefore I do willingly confess it, that no man should measure the highness thereof by the small proportion of my childishness. But rather I exhort the readers, that they do not restrain the sense of their minds within these two narrow bounds: but endeavour to rise up much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I myself, so oft as I speak of this thing when I have laboured to say all, think that I have yet said but little in respect of the worthiness thereof. And although the mind can do more in thinking than the tongue in expressing: yet with the greatness of the thing, the mind also is surmounted aud overwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but that I must break forth into admiration of that mystery, which neither the mind can suffice to think of, nor the tongue to declare. Yet after such a manner as I can, I will set forth the sum of my sentence: which as I nothing doubt be true, so I trust that it will not be disallowed of godly hearts.

Christ from the beginning the fountain of life, by taking our flesh maketh it of power, being fed on, to be sustenance that nourisheth on to immortality.

8. First of all, we are taught out of the scripture, that Christ was from the beginning that life-bringing word of the Father, the fountain and original of life, from whence all things ever received their having of life. Wherefore John sometimes calleth him the word of life, and sometimes writeth that life was in him: meaning that he even then flowing into all creatures, poured into them the power of breathing and living. Yet the same John addeth afterward, that the life was then and not till then openly shewed, when the Son of God taking upon him our flesh gave himself to be seen with eyes, and felt with hands. For though he did before also spread abroad his power into the creatures: yet because man, being by sin estranged from God, having lost the communion of life, saw on every side death hanging over him: that he might recover hope of immortality, it behoved that he should be received into the communion of that word. For how small a confidence mayest thou conceive thereof if thou hear that the word of God indeed, from which thou art most far removed, containeth in it self the fulness of life, but in thy self and round about thee nothing offereth it self and is present before thine eyes but death? But since that fountain of life began to dwell in our flesh, now it lieth not a far off hidden from us, but presently delivereth it self to be partaken of us. Yea and it maketh the very flesh, wherein it resteth, to be of power to bring life to us, that by partaking thereof we may be fed to immortality. I am (saith he) the bread of life, that am come down from heaven. And the bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. John vi. 48. and 58. In which words he teacheth not only that he is life, in respect that he is the eternal word of God which came down to us from heaven, but that in coming down he poured the same power into the flesh which he did put on, that from thence the communicating of life might flow forth unto us. Hereupon also these things now follow, that his flesh is verily meat, and his blood is verily drink, with which sustenances the faithful are nourished into eternal life. Herein therefore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, that now they find life in their own flesh. For so they do not only with easy passage attain unto it, but have it of it self laid abroad for them and offering it self unto them. Only let them hold open the bosom of their heart that they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtain it.

The flesh of Christ being (tho' not of it self) an unwasted fountain from whence life floweth; he that will live must of necessity be partaker thereof, and have fellowship with it.

9. But although the flesh of Christ have not so great power of it self, that it can give life to us, which both in its first estate was subject to mortality, and now being endued with immortality, liveth not by itself: yet it is rightfully called life-bringing, which is filled with fulness of life to pour it into us. In which meaning I do with Cyril expound that saying of Christ: as the Father hath life in himself, so he hath also given to the Son to have life in himself. John. v. 19. For there he properly speaketh of his gifts, not which he from the beginning possessed with the Father, but with which he was garnished in the same flesh in which he appeared. Therefore he sheweth that in his manhood also dwelleth the fulness of life, that whosoever partaketh of his flesh and blood, may therewithal also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what sort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as out of a fountain water is sometimes drunk, sometimes is drawn, sometimes by furrows, is conveyed to the watering of grounds, which yet of it self doth not overflow into so many uses, but from the very spring itself which with everlasting flowing yieldeth and ministreth unto it from time to time new abundance: so the flesh of Christ is like a rich and unwasted fountain which poureth into us the life, springing from the Godhead into it self. Now who seeth not that the communion of the flesh and blood of Christ is necessary to all that aspire to heavenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the church is the body of Christ and the fulfilling of it: and that he is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by joints maketh increase of the body: that our bodies are the members of Christ. All which things we understand to be impossible to be brought to pass, but that he must wholly cleave to us in spirit and body. But that most near fellowship whereby we are coupled with his flesh, he hath yet set out with a more glorious title, when he said that we are members of his body, and are of his bones and of his flesh. At the last, to declare it to be a matter greater than all words, he concludeth his saying with an exclamation. This is (saith he) a great mystery. Eph. v. 30. Therefore it should be

be a point of extreme madneſs to acknowlege no communion of the faithful when the fleſh and blood of the Lord, which the apoſtle declareth to be ſo great, that he had rather wonder at it than expreſs it.

The body and blood of Chriſt truly given us, and not bare and naked figures thereof in this ſacrament.

10. Let the ſum be, that our ſouls are ſo fed with the fleſh and blood of Chriſt, as bread and wine do maintain and ſuſtain the bodily life. For otherwiſe the proportional relation of the ſign ſhould not agree, unleſs ſouls did find their food in Chriſt, Which cannot be done, unleſs Chriſt do truly grow into one with us, and refreſh us with the eating of his fleſh and drinking of his blood. But although it ſeem incredible, that in ſo great diſtance of places the fleſh of Chriſt reacheth to us that it may be meat to us: let us remember how much the ſecret power of the Spirit ſurmounteth above all our ſenſes, and how fooliſh it is to go about to meaſure his unmeaſurableneſs by our meaſure. That therefore which our mind comprehendeth not, let our faith conceive, that the Spirit truly knitteth in one thoſe things that are ſevered in places. Now that ſame holy communicating of his body and blood, whereby Chriſt poureth his life into us, even as if he had pierced it into our bones and marrows, he in the ſupper alſo teſtifieth and ſealeth: and that not with ſetting before us a vain or void ſign, but bringing forth there the effectual working of his ſpirit whereby he fulfilleth that which he promiſeth. And verily he there offereth and delivereth the thing ſignified to all them that ſit at that ſpiritual banquet: although it be received with fruit of the faithful only, which receive ſo great bountifulneſs with true faith and thankfulneſs of mind. After which manner the Apoſtle ſaid, that the bread which we break is the communion of the body of Chriſt: and that the cup which we hallow with the word and prayers to that purpoſe, is the communion of his blood. 2 Cor x. 16. Neither is there any cauſe why any man ſhould object, that it is a figurative ſpeech, by which the name of the thing ſignified is given to the ſign. I grant verily that the breaking of the bread is a ſign, not the thing it ſelf. But this being admitted, yet we ſhall rightly gather of the deliverance of the ſign, that the thing it ſelf is delivered. For unleſs a man will call God a deceiver, he can never be ſo bold as to ſay that he ſetteth before us an empty ſign. Therefore if by the breaking of bread the Lord doth truly repreſent the partaking of his body, it ought to be out of doubt, that he truly performeth and delivereth it. And this rule, is always to be holden of the godly, that ſo oft as they ſee the ſigns ordained of the Lord, they certainly think and perſuade themſelves that the truth of the thing ſignified is there preſent. For to what purpoſe ſhould the Lord deliver into thy hand the ſign of his body, but to aſſure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be true, that a viſible ſign is given us, to ſeal the gift of an inviſible thing: when we receive the ſign of the body, let us no leſs certainly believe that the body it ſelf alſo is given us.

Chriſt himſelf by faith, even his body and blood truly participated, in this ſacrament.

11. I ſay therefore (which both hath been always received in the church, and all they teach at this day that think right) that the holy myſtery of the ſupper conſiſteth of two things: that is to ſay of the bodily ſigns, which being ſet before our eyes do repreſent unto us inviſible things: according to the capacity of our weakneſs: and of ſpiritual truth, which is by thoſe ſigns both figured and delivered. Of what ſort that is, when I mean to ſhew it familiarly, I uſe to ſet three things: the ſignification, the matter which dependeth on the ſignification, the virtue or effect which followeth of both. The ſignification conſiſteth in the promiſes, which are after a certain manner wrapped together with the ſign. The matter or ſubſtance I call Chriſt with his death and reſurrection. By effect I underſtand the redemption, righteouſneſs, ſanctification and eternal life, and whatſoever other benefits Chriſt bringeth us. Now although all theſe things have reſpect to faith: yet I leave no place to this cavil; as though when I ſay that Chriſt is received by faith, I would have him conceived with underſtanding only and imagination. For the promiſes offer him, not that we ſhould ſtick faſt in the ſight alone and in bare knowlege: but that we ſhould enjoy the true communicating of him. And truly I ſee not how any man may have confidence that he hath redemption and righteouſneſs in the croſs of Chriſt, and life in his death, but principally ſtanding upon the true communion of Chriſt himſelf. For thoſe good things ſhould not come to us unleſs Chriſt firſt made himſelf ours. I ſay therefore, that in the myſtery of the ſupper, by the ſigns of bread and wine Chriſt is truly delivered to us, yea and his body and blood, in which he hath fulfilled all obedience for purchaſing of righteouſneſs to us: namely that firſt we ſhould grow together into one body with him: and then being made partakers of his ſubſtance, we may alſo feel his power in the communicating of all his good things.

A local preſence of the body of Chriſt not needful unto this that we may enjoy the partaking of it which the ſpirit of Chriſt perfoꝛmeth without ſuch groſſneſs.

12. Now I come down to the exceſſive mixtures, which ſuperſtition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with marvellous ſubtilty, that withdrawing the minds of men from heaven, he might fill them with perverſe error, as though Chriſt were faſtned to the element of bread. And firſt we muſt not dream of ſuch a preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, as the craftſmen of the court of Rome have feigned: as though the body of Chriſt were made preſent with preſence of place, to be handled with hands, to be bruiſed with teeth, and ſwallowed with mouth. For this form of recantation Pope Nicholas endited to Berengarius, to be a witneſs of his repentance: namely with words ſo far monſtrous, that the author of the gloſs crieth out that there is danger, if the readers do not wiſely take heed to themſelves, leſt they ſuck out of them an hereſy worſe than was that of Berengarius. In the ſecond diſtinction, in the chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius. But Peter Lombard, although he labour much in excuſing the abſurdity, yet more inclineth to the contrary ſentence. For as we do not doubt that it hath limits according to the perpetual nature of the body of men, and is holden in heaven, into which it was once received, until he return to judgment: ſo to draw it back under theſe corruptible elements or to imagine it preſent every where, we account it to be utterly unlawful. Neither verily is it ſo needful to this that we may enjoy the partaking of it: foraſmuch as the Lord giveth us this benefit by his ſpirit that we be made one with him in body, ſpirit, and ſoul. The bond therefore of this union is the ſpirit of Chriſt, by the uniting whereof we are coupled together, and as it were a certain conduit, by which whatſoever Chriſt himſelf both is and hath, is conveyed to us. (Chryſo. Ser de ſpiritu ſancto.) For if we behold the ſun ſhining forth with his beams upon the earth after a certain manner to caſt forth his ſubſtance unto it to engender, nouriſh, and quicken the fruits thereof: why ſhould the extending of the beams of the ſpirit of Chriſt be inferior to convey the communion of his fleſh and blood into us? Wherefore the ſcripture, when it ſpeaketh of our partaking with Chriſt, referreth the whole virtue thereof to the ſpirit. Yet inſtead of many, one place ſhall be ſufficient. For Paul in the eight chapter to the Romans, ſaith that Chriſt dwelleth in us no otherwiſe than by his ſpirit: whereby yet he taketh not away that communion of his fleſh and blood of which we now ſpeak, but teacheth that the ſpirit alone worketh that we poſſeſs whole Chriſt and have him dwelling in us.

The manner of preſence which the ſchoolmen have deviſed in this ſacrament.

13. The ſchoolmen thought more ſhamefaſtly which were witholden with horror of ſo barbarous ungodlineſs. Yet they alſo themſelves do nothing but mock with ſubtiller deceits. They grant that Chriſt is not contained there by way of circumſcription not after a bodily manner: but afterward they invent a way, which neither themſelves do underſtand, nor can they declare to others: yet it is ſuch as falleth to this point that Chriſt muſt be ſought in the form of bread as they call it. For what is it? when they ſay that the ſubſtance of bread is turned into Chriſt, do they not faſten him to the whiteneſs which they there leave? But (ſay they) he is ſo contained in the ſacrament, that he abideth in heaven: and we determine no other preſence but of habitude. But whatſoever words they bring in, to cloak it with a deceitful colour, this is the end of all that is by conſecration made Chriſt, which before was bread: that from thenceforth Chriſt lieth hid under that colour of bread. Which alſo they are not aſhamed in plain words to expreſs. For theſe be the words of Lombard: (Lib. 4. diſt.) that the body of Chriſt, which in it ſelf is viſible, when the conſecration is ended, lieth hidden and is covered under the form of bread. So the form of that bread is nothing elſe but a viſor, that taketh away the ſight of the fleſh from the eyes. Neither need we many conjectures to find what ſnares they minded to lay with theſe words, ſince the thing it ſelf plainly ſpeaketh it. For it is to be ſeen with how great ſuperſtition in certain ages paſt, not only the common ſort of men, but alſo the very chief of them have been holden, and at this day are holden in Popiſh churches. For having little care of true faith (by which alone we both come into the fellowſhip of Chriſt, and do cleave together with him) ſo that they have a carnal preſence of him, which they have framed beſide the word, they think that they have him preſent enough. Therefore in ſum, we ſee that this hath been gotten by this witty ſubtilty that bread was taken of God.

Tranſubſtantiation deſtitute

14. From hence proceedeth that ſame feigned tranſubſtantiation, for which at this day they fight more earneſtly

earneſtly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the firſt builders of that local preſence could not unwind themſelves from this doubt, how the body of Chriſt ſhould be mingled with the ſubſtance of bread, but that by many abſurdities did thruſt themſelves in place. Therefore they were driven of neceſſity to flee to this invention, that there is made a turning of bread into the body: not that the body is properly made of the bread, but becauſe Chriſt that he might hide himſelf under the form, bringeth the ſubſtance to nothing. But it is marvellous, that they fell to ſo great ignorance, yea ſenſeleſs dulneſs, that not only that ſcripture but alſo the conſent of the old church fighting againſt it, they brought abroad that monſter, I grant indeed that ſome of the old writers ſometimes uſed the name of turning: not for that they would deſtroy the ſubſtance in the outward ſigns, but that they might teach that the bread dedicate to the myſtery differeth far from common bread and is now other. But each where they all plainly declare, that the holy Supper conſiſteth of two parts, an earthly part, and a heavenly: and the earthly part they do without controverſy expound to be bread and wine. Truly whatſoever they bable, it is plain that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defence of antiquity, which they oftentimes preſume to ſet againſt the evident word of God. For it is not ſo long ago ſince it was invented, it was verily unknown not only to thoſe better ages, in which the purer doctrine of religion yet flouriſhed, but alſo even when that ſame pureneſs was much defiled. There is none of the old writers that do not in expreſs words confeſs that the holy ſigns in the ſupper are bread and wine. Although, as we have ſaid, they ſometimes ſet it out with divers titles, to advance the dignity of the myſtery. For whereas they ſay that in the conſecration is made of a ſecret turning, that now it is another thing than bread and wine: I have even now given warning that they do not thereby mean that the things themſelves, are brought to nought, but that they are now to be otherwiſe eſteemed than common meats, which are appointed only to feed the belly: foraſmuch as in them is delivered to us the ſpiritual meat and and drink of the ſoul. This we alſo deny not. If (ſay theſe men) there be a turning, it muſt needs be that there is or one thing made another thing. If they mean that there is ſome thing made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will draw it to that in their own imagination, let them anſwer me what change they think to be made in baptiſm. For herein the fathers alſo do determine a marvellous turning, when they ſay that of a corruptible element is made a ſpiritual waſhing of the ſoul, yet none of them deny that water remaineth. But (ſay they) there is no ſuch thing in baptiſm, as is that in the ſupper. This is my body. As though the queſtion were of thoſe words, which have a meaning plain enough: and not rather of that word of turning, which ought to ſignify no more in the ſupper than in baptiſm. Therefore farewel they with theſe ſnares of ſyllables, whereby they do nothing elſe but bewray their own hungrineſs. For otherwiſe the ſignification would not agree together unleſs the truth which is there figured, had a lively image in the outward ſign. Chriſt's will was by the outward ſign to teſtify that his fleſh is meat. If he did ſet before us only an empty imaginative form of bread not true bread, which were the correlation or ſimilitude which ſhould lead us from the viſible thing to the inviſible? For, that all things may agree together, the ſignification ſhall extend no further, but that we be fed with the form of the fleſh of Chriſt. As, if in baptiſm the form of water ſhould deceive our eyes, it ſhould not be to us a certain pledge of our waſhing: yea by that deceitful ſhew there ſhould be given us an occaſion of wavering. Therefore the nature of the ſacrament is overthrown, unleſs in the manner of ſignifying the earthly ſign anſwer to the heavenly thing. And therefore we loſe the truth of this myſtery, unleſs true bread repreſent to us the true body of Chriſt. I repeat it again: ſince the ſupper is nothing elſe, than a viſible teſtifying of that promiſe which is in the ſixth chapter of John, namely that Chriſt is the bread of life, which came down from heaven: there muſt be viſible bread uſed for a mean whereby that ſame ſpiritual bread may be figured: unleſs we will that we looſe all the fruit which in this behalf God tenderly granteth to ſuſtain our weakneſs. Now by what reaſon ſhould Paul gather, that all we are one body and one bread, 1 Cor. x 17. who do together partake of one bread, if there remained only an imaginative form and not rather a natural truth of bread?

The viſible elements in this ſacrament changed not in reſpect of their nature but of their uſe only.

15. But they could never have been ſo foully beguiled with the deceits of Satan, but becauſe they were already bewitched with this error, that the body of Chriſt incloſed under bread was by the bodily mouth ſent down into the belly. The cauſe of ſo brutiſh imagination was, that conſecration ſignified as much among them as a magical enchantment. But this principle was drawn to them, that bread is a ſacrament to none but to men, to whom the word is directed: like as the water of baptiſm is not changed in itſelf, but ſo ſoon as the promiſe is adjoined, it beginneth to be that to us which it was not before. This ſhall better appear by example of a like ſacrament. The water ſpringing out of the rock in the deſart was to the fathers a token and ſign of the ſame thing, which the wine doth figure to us in the ſupper. Exod. xvii. 6. For Paul teacheth that they drunk the ſame ſpiritual drink. 1 Cor. x. 4. But it was a common watering for the beaſts and cattle of the people. Whereupon it is eaſily gathered, that in earthly elements, when they are applied to a ſpiritual uſe, there is made no other turning but in reſpect of men, inſomuch as they are to them ſeals of the promiſes. Moreover ſince God's purpoſe is (as I often repeat) as it were by handſome chariots to lift us up to himſelf, they do by their frowardneſs wickedly diſappoint the ſame, who do indeed call us to Chriſt, but lurking inviſibly under bread. For it is not poſſible that the mind of man, diſincumbring itſelf from the immeaſurableneſs of places, ſhould attain to Chriſt even above the heavens. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amend with a more hurtful remedy: that abiding in the earth, we ſhould need no heavenly nearneſs of Chriſt. Lo, this is the neceſſity, that compelled them to transfigure the body of Chriſt. In Bernard's time, although a harder manner of ſpeaking was grown in uſe, yet tranſubſtantiation was not then known. And in all ages before that, this ſimilitude did fly about in every man's mouth, that there is with bread and wine a ſpiritual thing joined in this myſtery. Of the words they anſwer as they think, wittily: but bring nothing fit for this preſent cauſe. The rod of Moſes (ſay they) being turned into a ſerpent, although it did get the name of a ſerpent, yet keepeth ſtill the old name, and is called a rod. Exod. iv. 3. and vii. 10. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the bread paſs into a new ſubſtance, it may be abuſively and yet not unaptly called that which it appeareth to the eyes. But what likelihood or nearneſs find they between a clear miracle, and their feigned illuſion, of which no eye in earth is witneſs? The magicians had mocked with deceits, ſo that the Egyptians were perſuaded, that they excelled in divine power to change creatures above the order of nature. Moſes came forth, and driving away all their deceits, ſhewed that the invincible power of God was on his ſide, becauſe his own rod conſumed all the reſt. But forаſmuch as that was a turning diſcernable with eyes, therefore as we have ſaid, it pertaineth nothing to this preſent cauſe: and a little time after, the rod viſiby returned into his own form. Beſide that it is not known, whether that ſudden turning was of ſubſtance or no. Alſo the alluding to the rods of the magicians is to be conſidered, which the prophet therefore would not call ſerpents, leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſignify a turning where none was: becauſe thoſe deceivers had done nothing but caſt a miſt before the eyes of the beholders. What likeneſs herewith have theſe forms of ſpeech. The bread which we break, ſo oft as ye ſhall eat this bread, they communicated in breaking of bread, and ſuch other? 1 Cor. x. 26. and xi. 26. Acts xxiv. It is certain that their eyes were only deceived with the enchantment of the magicians. As concerning Moſes, the matter is more doubtful, by whoſe hand it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a ſerpent, and again of a ſerpent to make a rod, than to clothe angels with fleſhly bodies, and by and by after to unclothe them. If the nature of this myſtery were the ſame or like, there were ſome colour for their ſolution. Let this therefore remain certain, that it is not truly nor fitly promiſed us that in the ſupper the fleſh of Chriſt is truly to us for meat, unleſs the true ſubſtance of the outward ſign agree with it. And (as one error groweth of another) the place of Jeremiah is ſo fooliſhly wreſted to prove tranſubſtantiation, that it wearieth me to rehearſe it. The prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread: meaning that by the cruelty of his enemies, his bread was infected with bitterneſs. Jer. xi. 19. As David with a like figure bewaileth that his meat was corrupted with gall, and his drink with vinegar. Pſal. lxix. 22. Theſe men will have it that the body of Chriſt was by way of allegory faſtened to the croſs. But ſome of the old fathers thought ſo. As though we ought not rather to pardon their ignorance, and to bury their ſhame, than to add ſhameleſſneſs to compel them yet ſtill to fight like enemies with the natural meaning of the prophet.

The error of conſubſtantiation and the cauſe whereof it riſeth.

16. Others, who ſee that the proportional relation of the ſign and the thing ſignified, cannot be overthrown, but that the truth of the myſtery muſt fall, do confeſs that the bread of the ſupper is verily a ſubſtance of an an earthly and corruptible element, and ſuffereth no change in itſelf, but hath under itſelf the body of Chriſt incloſed. If they did ſo declare their meaning, that when the bread is delivered in the myſtery, there is adjoined the delivering of the body, becauſe the truth is inſeparable from the ſign: I would not much ſtrive with them. But becauſe they placing the body in the bread, do feign to it a being every where contrary to the nature thereof, and in adding under the bread, they will have it lie there hidden: it is neceſſary a little while to draw ſuch ſubtleties out of their dens. For my mind is not as of ſet purpoſe to go through with all this point: but only that I may lay the foundations of the diſputation which ſhall by and by follow in place fit for it. They will therefore have the body of Chriſt to be inviſible and immeaſurable, that it may be hid under the bread: becauſe they think they do not otherwiſe communicate with him than if he deſcend into the bread: but they comprehend not the manner of deſcending, whereby he lifteth us upward to himſelf. They lay upon it all the colours that they can: but when they have ſaid all, it ſufficiently appeareth, that they ſtay upon the local preſence of Chriſt. Whence cometh that? even becauſe they can abide to conceive no other partaking of the fleſh and blood, but which conſiſteth either of joining and touching of place, or of ſome groſs encloſing.

The fleſh of Chriſt by ſome, groſly extended as wide as heaven and earth, by others, ſubtilly imagined to be becauſe glorious therefore free from the natural properties of things corporal.

17. And, that they may obſtinately defend the error once raſhly conceived, ſome of them ſtick not to ſay, that the fleſh of Chriſt had never any other meaſurings, but ſo far and wide as heaven and earth is broad. Whereas he was born a child out of the womb, whereas he grew, whereas he was ſpread abroad on the croſs, whereas he was incloſed in the ſepulchre, the ſame was done by a certain diſpenſation, that he might be born and die, and perform the other duties of man. Whereas after his reſurrection he was ſeen in his wonted form of body, whereas he was taken up to heaven, whereas laſt of all alſo after his aſcenſion he was ſeen of Stephen and Paul: it was done by the ſame diſpenſation, that it might appear to the ſight of men that he was made a king in heaven. Acts i. 3, 9. and vii. 55. and ix. 3. What is this elſe, but to raiſe up Marcion out of hell. For no man can doubt that the body of Chriſt was a fantacy or a fantaſtical thing, if he was of ſuch ſtate. Some ſlip away ſomewhat more ſubtilly, with ſaying that this body which is given in the ſacrament is glorious and immortal: and that therefore it is no abſurdity, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no form, under the ſacrament. But I aſk what manner of body Chriſt gave to the diſciples, the day before that he ſuffered? do not the words ſound that he gave the ſame mortal body, which was within a little after to be delivered? He had already before (ſay they) ſhewed his glory to be ſeen to three of the diſciples. Matth. xvii. 2. That is true indeed, but his will was by that brightneſs to give them a taſte of immortality for an hour. In the mean time they ſhall not there find a double body, but that one body which Chriſt did bear, garniſhed with new glory. But when he diſtributed his body at his firſt ſupper, the time was now at hand, when he being ſtriken of God, and humbled ſhould lie without glory as a leprous man: ſo far is it off that he then would ſhew forth the glory of his reſurrection. Iſa. liii. 4. And how great a window is here opened to Marcion, if the body of Chriſt was ſeen in one place mortal and baſe, and in another place was holden immortal and glorious? Howbeit if their opinion take place, the ſame happeneth daily; becauſe they are compelled to confeſs that the body of Chriſt being viſible in itſelf, lieth hid inviſibly under the ſign of bread. And yet they that vomit out ſuch monſtrouſneſs are ſo not aſhamed of their own ſhame, that they do unprovoked, hainouſly rail at us, becauſe we do not ſubſcribe to them.

The body and blood of Chriſt though not faſtened unto, yet ſpiritually delivered in the bread and wine of the holy Euchariſt.

18. Now if they liſt to faſten the body and blood of the Lord to bread and wine: the one ſhall of neceſſity be plucked aſunder from the other. For as the bread is delivered ſeperately from the cup, ſo the body united to the bread muſt needs be divided from the blood incloſed in the cup. For when they affirm that the body is in the bread and the blood in the cup: and the bread and wine are by ſpaces of place diſtant the one from the other: they can by no ſhift eſcape, but that the body muſt be ſevered from the blood. But whereas they are wont to allege, that by accompanying (as they feign) in the body is the blood, and likewiſe in the blood is the body, that verily is too trifling: for as much as the ſigns in which they are encloſed, are ſo ſevered. But if we be lifted up with our eyes and minds to heaven, that we ſeek Chriſt there in the glory of his kingdom: as the ſigns do allure us to him whole, ſo under the ſign of bread, we ſhall be fed with his body, under the ſign of wine we ſhall ſeparately drink his blood, that at length we may enjoy him whole. For although he hath taken away his fleſh from us, and in his body is aſcended up into heaven, yet he ſitteth at the right hand of the Father, that is to ſay, he reigneth in the power, and majeſty, and glory of the Father. This kingdom is neither bounded with any ſpaces of place, nor compaſſed about with any meaſurings, but that Chriſt may ſhew forth his might whereſoever it pleaſeth him both in heaven and in earth: but that he may ſhew himſelf preſent with power and ſtrength: but that he may alway be at hand with them that are his, breathing his life into them, may live in them, ſtrengthen them, quicken them, preſerve them ſafe even as if he were preſent in body: finally, but that he may feed them with his own body, the communion whereof he doth by the power of his ſpirit pour into them. After this manner the body and blood of Chriſt is delivered to us in the ſacrament.

The true manner of Chriſt's preſence, and the ſubſtantial communicating of his body and blood in the Lord's ſupper, made hateful to the world by the unjuſt judgments of men.

19. But we muſt appoint ſuch a preſence of Chriſt in the ſupper, as may neither faſten him to the element of bread, nor ſhut him up in the bread, nor by any means compaſs him in, (for it is plain that all theſe things abate his heavenly glory) finally ſuch as may neither take from him his own meaſure, nor diverſly draw him in many places at once, nor feign to him ſuch an unmeaſurable greatneſs as is ſpread abroad throughout heaven and earth, for theſe things are plainly againſt the truth of the nature of manhood. Let us (I ſay) never ſuffer theſe two exceptions to be taken away from us. The one, that nothing be abated from the glory of Chriſt, which is done, when he is brought under the corruptible elements of this world, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by feigning, applied to his body, that agreeth not with the nature of man: which is done, when it is either ſaid to be infinite, or is ſet in many places at once. But theſe abſurdities being taken away, I willingly receive whatſoever may avail to expreſs the true and ſubſtantial communicating of the body and blood of the Lord, which communicating is delivered to the faithful under the holy ſigns of the ſupper: and ſo that they may be thought not to receive it by imagination only or underſtanding of mind, but to enjoy it indeed to the food of eternal life. Why this ſentence is ſo hateful to the world, and all defence taken away from it by the unjuſt judgments of many, there is no cauſe at all, but for that the devil hath with horrible bewitching madded their minds. Truly that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the ſcriptures: it containeth neither any abſurdity, nor darkneſs, nor doubtfulneſs: it is not againſt true godlineſs and ſound edification: finally, it hath nothing in it, that may offend, ſaving that in certain ages paſt, when that ignorance and barbaroufneſs of ſophiſters reigned in the church, ſo clear light and open truth hath been unworthily oppreſſed. Yet becauſe Satan at this day alſo laboureth by troubleſome ſpirits to ſpot it with all the ſlanders and reproaches that he can, and bendeth himſelf to no other thing with greater endeavour: it is profitable the more diligently to defend and reſcue it.

The words of Chriſt's inſtitution, in word held indeed, perverted, and forſaken by the authors as well of tranſubſtantiation as conſubſtantiation.

20. Now before that we go any further, we muſt treat of the very inſtitution of Chriſt: ſpecially becauſe this is the moſt glorious objection that our adverſaries have, that we depart from the words of Chriſt. Therefore, that we may be diſcharged of the falſe cauſe of malice wherewith they burden us, our fitteſt beginning ſhall be at the expoſition of the words. Three evangeliſts and Paul rehearſe, that Chriſt took bread: when he had given thanks he brake it, gave it to his diſciples and ſaid, take, eat, this is my body which is delivered, or broken for you. Of the cup Matthew and Mark ſay thus: This cup is the blood of the new Teſtament, which ſhall be ſhed for many unto forgiveneſs of ſins. Mat. xxvi. 26. Mark. xiv. 22. But Paul and Luke ſay thus: This cup is the new Teſtament in my blood. Luk. xxii. 17. 1 Cor. ix. 24. The patrons of tranſubſtantiation will have by the pronoun (this) the form of bread to be ſignified, becauſe the conſecration is made in the whole content of the ſentence, and there is no ſubſtance that can be ſhewed. But if they are holden with religious care of the words, becauſe Chriſt teſtified that, that that which he reached into the diſciples hands, was his body: truly this their device, that that which was bread is now the body, is moſt far from the proper meaning of them. That which Chriſt took into his hands and gave the Apoſtles, he affirmeth to be his body: but he took bread: who therefore cannot underſtand that bread is yet ſhewed? and therefore there is no greater abſurdity, than to remove that to the form, which is ſpoken of the bread. Others, when they expound this word (is) for (to be tranſubſtantiate,) do flee to a more forced and violently wreſted gloſs. Therefore there is no cauſe why they ſhould pretend that they are moved with reverence of words. For this was unheard of among all nations and languages, that the word (is) ſhould be taken in this ſenſe, namely for to be turned into another thing. As for them that leave bread in the ſupper, and affirm that there is the body of Chriſt, they much differ among themſelves. They who ſpeak more modeſtly, although they preciſely exact the letter. This is my body, yet afterward ſwerve from their preciſeneſs, and ſay that it is as much in effect as that the body of Chriſt is with bread, in bread, and under bread. Of the matter itſelf which they affirm, we have already touched ſomewhat, and we ſhall by and by have occaſion yet to ſpeak more. Now I diſpute only of the words, by which they ſay they are reſtrained that they cannot admit bread to be called the body becauſe it is a ſign of the body. But if they ſhun all figures, why do they leap away from the plain ſhewing of Chriſt, to their own manners of ſpeaking far differing from it? For there is great difference between this that bread is the body, and this that the body is with bread. But becauſe they ſaw it to be impoſſible, that this ſimple propoſition might ſtand, that bread is the body: they have attempted to eſcape away by thoſe forms of ſpeech, as it were by crooked turnings. Some more bold ſtick not to affirm that even in proper ſpeaking, bread is the body, and by this means they truly prove themſelves to be literal men. If it be objected, that therefore the bread is Chriſt, and is God: this verily they will deny, becauſe it is not expreſſed in the words of Chriſt. But they ſhall nothing prevail by denying it: foraſmuch as all do agree that whole Chriſt is offered us in the ſupper. But it is an intollerable blaſphemy, that it be without figure ſpoken of a frail and corruptible element, that it is Chriſt. Now I aſk of them, whether theſe two propoſitions be both of one effect, Chriſt is the ſon of God, and bread is the body of Chriſt. If they grant that they are diverſe, (which we will force them to grant whether they will or no) then let them anſwer whence cometh the difference. I think they will bring no other but that the bread is after the ſacramental manner called the body. Whereupon followeth, that Chriſt's words are not ſubject to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by grammar. Alſo I aſk of the preciſe and ſtiff requirers of the letter, where Luke and Paul do call the cup the teſtament in the blood, Luk. xxii. 10. 1 Cor. ix. 25. whether they do not expreſs the ſame thing which they did in the firſt part, where they call bread the body. Truly the ſame religion was in the one part of the myſtery that was in the other: and becauſe ſhortneſs is dark, longer ſpeech doth better open the meaning. So oft therefore as they ſhall affirm by one word, that the bread is the body: I will out of more words bring a fit expoſition, that it is the teſtament in the body. For why? Shall we need to ſeek a more faithful or ſurer expoſitor than Paul and Luke? Neither yet do I tend hereunto, to diminiſh any thing of that communicating of the body of Chriſt which I have confeſſed: only my purpoſe is to confute that fooliſh waywardneſs, whereby they do ſo hatefully brawl about words. I underſtand, by the authority of Paul and Luke, that the bread is the body of Chriſt, becauſe it is the covenant in in the body. If they fight againſt this, they have war not with me, but with the ſpirit of God. Howſoever they cry out that they are touched with reverence of the words of Chriſt, whereby they do not figuratively underſtand thoſe things that are plainly ſpoken: yet this is not a pretence rightful enough, why they ſhould ſo refuſe all the reaſons which we object to the contrary. In the mean time, as I have already given warning, it is convenient to learn, what manner of thing this is, the teſtament in the body and blood of Chriſt: becauſe the covenant eſtabliſhed with the ſacrifice of death, ſhould otherwiſe not profit us, unleſs there were adjoined that ſecret communicating whereby we grow into one with Chriſt.

Figurative ſpeech uſual, and unto ſigns the names of things ſignified given when ſacramental myſteries are treated of: which

21. It remaineth therefore that for the affinity which the things ſignified have with their ſigns, we confeſs that the ſelf ſame name of the thing was given to the ſign: figuratively indeed, but not without a moſt fit proportional agreement. I leave allegories and parables, leſt any man ſhould quarrel that I ſeek

ſtarting holes, and wander out of the preſent purpoſe. I ſay that this is a ſpeech by figure of tranſnomination which is commonly uſed in the ſcripture, when myſteries are treated of. For neither can you otherwiſe underſtand that which is ſaid: that circumciſion is a covenant: that the Lamb is the paſſover: that the ſacrifices of the law are expiations: finally that the rock, out of which water flowed in the deſart, was Chriſt, unleſs you take it to be ſpoken by way of transferring of names. Neither are names transferred only from the higher name to the lower? but contrariwiſe the name of the viſible ſign is alſo given to the thing ſignified: as when it is ſaid that God appeared to Moſes in the buſh: Exod. iii. 2. when the ark of the covenant is called God, and the face of God: Pſal. lxxxiv. 8. and xlii. 3. and the dove is called the holy Ghoſt. Mat. iii. 16. For though the ſign differ in ſubſtance from the thing ſignified: becauſe this is ſpiritual and heavenly, and that is corporal and viſible: yet becauſe it doth not only figure the thing which it is holily appointed to repreſent, as a naked and empty token, but doth alſo truly deliver it indeed: why may not the name of the thing rightly accord with it? If ſigns deviſed by men, which are rather images of things abſent, than marks of things preſent, which ſelf ſame abſent things, they do oftentimes deceitfully ſhadow, are yet ſometimes garniſhed with the titles of the things: then thoſe things that are ordained of God, do by much greater reaſon borrow the name of thoſe things, of which they always both bear a ſure and not deceitful ſignification, and have the truth adjoined with them. There is therefore ſo great likeneſs and nearneſs of the one to the other, that it is eaſy to draw their names to and fro. Therefore let our adverſaries ceaſe to heap unſavoury ſcoffings againſt us, in calling us Tropiſts, becauſe we expound the ſacramental manner of ſpeaking after the common uſe of the ſcripture. For whereas the ſacraments agree together in many things: in this transferring of names, they have all a certain community together. As therefore the Apoſtle teacheth, that the ſtone out of which ſpiritual drink did ſpring to the Iſraelites, was Chriſt, 1 Cor. x. 4. becauſe it was a viſible ſign, under which that ſpiritual drink was truly indeed, but not diſcernably to the eye perceived: ſo bread is at this day called the body of Chriſt, foraſmuch as it is a ſign whereby the Lord offereth to us the true eating of his body. Neither did Auguſtine otherwiſe think or ſpeak leſt any man ſhould deſpiſe this as a new invention. (Epiſt. 23. ad Boniſac.) If (ſaith he) the ſacraments had not a certain likeneſs of thoſe things whereof they are ſacraments, they ſhould not be ſacraments at all. And of this likeneſs oftentimes they take the names of the things themſelves. As therefore after a certain manner the ſacrament of the body of Chriſt, is the body of Chriſt: the ſacrament of the blood of Chriſt, is the blood of Chriſt: ſo the ſacrament of faith is faith. There be in him many like places, which it were ſuperfluous to heap together, ſince that one ſufficeth: ſaving that the readers muſt be warned that the holy man teacheth the ſame thing in the epiſtle to Euodius. But it is a trifling ſhift to ſay, that where Auguſtine teacheth, that when tranferring is often and commonly uſed in myſteries, he maketh no mention of the ſupper: becauſe if this ſhift were received, we might not reaſon from the generalty to the ſpecialty, neither were this a good argument: every feeling creature hath power of moving, therefore an ox and an horſe have power of moving. Howbeit long diſputation hereof is in another place ended by the words of the ſame holy man, where he ſaith, that Chriſt ſticked not to call it his body, when he gave the ſign of his body. Againſt Adimantus the Manichean, in the twelfth chapter, and in another place, upon the third pſalm. Marvellous (ſaith he) is the patience of Chriſt, that he received Judas to the banquet, wherein he committed and delivered to his diſciples the figure of his body and blood.

The force of the ſubſtantive verb in the words of conſecration.

22. But if ſome preciſe man, being blind at all the reſt, do ſtand only upon this word (this is) as though it ſevered this myſtery from all other, the ſolution is eaſy. They ſay that the vehemence of the ſubſtantive verb (is) is ſo great that it admitteth no figure. Which if we grant to them: even in the words of Paul is read the ſubſtantive verb, where he calleth bread the communicating of the body of Chriſt. 1 Cor. x. 16. But the communicating is another thing than the body it ſelf. Yea commonly where ſacraments are treated of, we find the ſame word uſed. As: this ſhall be to you a covenant with me. Gen xvii. 13. This lamb ſhall be to you a paſſover. Exod. xii. 43. To rehearſe no more: when Paul ſaith that the rock was Chriſt, 1 Cor. x. 4. why do they take take the ſubſtantive verb in that place to be of leſs vehemence than in the ſpeech of Chriſt? Let them alſo anſwer, where John ſaith, the holy Ghoſt was not yet, becauſe Jeſus was not yet glorified, John xvii. 39. of what force the ſubſtantive verb is in that place. For if they abide faſtened to their rule, the eternal eſſence of the holy Ghoſt ſhall be deſtroyed, as though it took beginning at the aſcention of Chriſt. Finally, let them anſwer, what meaneth that ſaying of Paul, that baptiſm is the waſhing of regeneration and renewing, Tit. iii. 5. when it is evidently unprofitable to many. But nothing is ſtronger to confute them, than that ſaying of Paul, that the church is Chriſt. 1 Cor. xi. 12. For bringing a ſimilitude of the body of man, he addeth, ſo is Chriſt: in which place he underſtandeth the only begotten ſon of God, not in himſelf, but in his members. Hereby I think I have obtained that to ſound witted and uncorrupted men the ſlanders of our enemies, are loathſome, when they ſpread abroad, that we withdraw credit from the words of Chriſt: which we do no leſs obediently embrace than they, and do weigh them with more godly reverence. Yea their negligent careleſſneſs ſheweth that they do not greatly care what Chriſt meant, ſo that it give them a buckler to defend their obſtinacy: like as our earneſt ſearching ought to be a witneſs how much we eſteem the authority of Chriſt. They odiouſly ſpread abroad, that natural ſenſe of man withholdeth us from believing that which Chriſt hath uttered with his own holy mouth: but how maliciouſly they burden us with this ſlander, I have a great part already made plain, and hereafter it ſhall more clearly appear. Therefore nothing withholdeth us from believing Chriſt when he ſpeaketh, nor from obeying ſo ſoon as he doth but with a beck will this or that. Only this is the queſtion, whether it be unlawful to enquire of the natural meaning.

The words and ſyllables of Chriſt's ſpeech not ſo preciſely to be ſtood upon, that all expoſition be rejected which being ſound and ſober bringeth light, but no diſcredit unto the ſpeaker.

23. Theſe good maſters, that they may ſeem well lettered, do forbid men to depart be it never ſo little from the letter. But I on the other ſide, when the ſcripture nameth God a warlike man, becauſe I ſee that without figurative tranſlation it is too rough a manner of ſpeaking, do not doubt that it is a compariſon taken from men. And truly upon no other pretence in the old time the Anthropomorphites troubled the true teaching fathers, but that catching faſt hold of theſe ſayings, the eyes of God do ſee, it went up to his ears, his hand ſtretched out, the earth his footſtool, they cried out that God had his body taken from him, which the ſcripture aſſigneth unto him. If this law be received, outrageous barbarouſneſs ſhall overwhelm the whole light of faith. For what monſters of abſurdities may not frantic men pick out, if it be granted them to allege every ſmall title to eſtabliſh their opinions? That which they object, that it is not likely, that when Chriſt prepared for his Apoſtles a ſingular comfort in adverſities, he did then ſpeak in a riddle or darkly, maketh of our ſide. For if it had not come in the minds of the Apoſtles that bread was figuratively called the body, becauſe it was the ſign of the body, they had without doubt been troubled with ſo monſtrous a thing. Almoſt at the ſame moment John reporteth that they did ſtick in perplexity at every the leaſt difficulties. They who ſtrive among themſelves, how Chriſt will go to the Father: and do move queſtion, how he will go out of the world: they who underſtand nothing of thoſe things that are ſpoken concerning the heavenly Father, till they ſee him: how would they have been ſo eaſy to believe that which all reaſon refuſeth, that Chriſt ſitteth at the table in their ſight, and is incloſed inviſible under bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bread without doubting, teſtified their conſent, hereby appeareth that they took Chriſt's words in the ſame ſenſe that we do, becauſe they remembred that which ought not to ſeem ſtrange in myſteries, that the name of the thing ſignified is transferred to the ſign. Therefore it was to the diſciples, as it is to us, a certain and clear comfort, entangled with no riddle. Neither is their any other cauſe why ſome ſhould depart from our expoſition, but becauſe the inchantment of the devil hath blinded them, namely that they ſhould feign darkneſs to themſelves, where the expoſition of an apt figure offereth itſelf. Moreover if we preciſely ſtand upon the words, Chriſt ſhould wrongfully have ſpoken in one place ſeverally another thing concerning the bread than he ſpeaketh of the cup. He calleth the bread his body, he calleth the wine his blood: either it ſhall be a confuſed vain repetition, or it ſhall be ſuch a ſeparation as ſhall divide the body from the blood. Yea it ſhall as truly be ſaid of the cup, this is my body, as of the bread it ſelf, and it may likewiſe interchangeably be ſaid, that the bread is the blood, if they anſwer that we muſt conſider to what what end or uſe the ſigns were ordained: I grant it indeed: but in the mean time they ſhall not extricate themſelves, but that their error muſt draw this abſurdity with it, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body. Now I know not what this meaneth, when they grant the bread and the body to be divers things, yet do affirm that the one is ſpoken of the other properly and without any figure: as, if a man ſhould ſay that a garment is indeed a thing differing from a man, and yet that it is properly called a man. In the mean while as though their victory conſiſted in obſtinacy and railing, they ſay that Chriſt is accuſed of lying, if an expoſition be ſought of the words. Now it ſhall be eaſy for us to ſhew to the readers how unjuſt wrong theſe catchers of ſyllables do to us, when they fill the ſimple with this opinion, that we withdraw credit from the words of Chriſt, which we have proved to be furiouſly perverted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by us.

The unmeaſurable power of God not at all diminiſhed by them who refuſe the doctrine of conſubſtantiation.

24. But the ſlander of this lie cannot be utterly purged, till another crime be wiped away. For they ſpread abroad, that we are ſo addicted to natural reaſon, that we give no more to the power of God, than the order of nature ſuffereth and common ſenſe teacheth. From ſo malicious ſlanders I appeal to the very doctrine itſelf which I have declared: which doth clearly enough ſhew, that I do not meaſure this myſtery by the proportion of man's reaſon, nor make it ſubject to the laws of nature. I beſeech you, have we learned out of natural philoſophy, that Chriſt doth ſo from heaven feed our ſouls and bodies with his fleſh, as our bodies are nouriſhed with bread and wine? Whence cometh this power to fleſh, that it may give life? All men will ſay that it is not done naturally. It will no more pleaſe man's reaſon, that the fleſh of Chriſt reacheth to us, that it may be food unto us. Finally whoſoever hath taſted of our doctrine, ſhall be raviſhed into admiration of the ſecret power of God. But theſe good men that are ſo zealous of it, forge to themſelves a miracle, which being taken away, God himſelf vaniſheth with his power. I deſire to have the readers once again warned, that they diligently weigh what our doctrine bringeth, whether it depend upon common ſenſe, or with the wings of faith, ſurmounting the world, climbeth up beyond it into the heavens. We ſay that Chriſt as well with the outward ſign as with his ſpirit, deſcended to us, that he may truly quicken our ſouls with the ſubſtance of his fleſh and of his blood. In theſe few words he that perceiveth not to be contained many miracles, is more than ſenſeleſs: foraſmuch as there is nothing more beſide nature, than that ſouls ſhould borrow ſpiritual and heavenly life, of the fleſh which took her beginning of the earth, and which was ſubject to death. Nothing is more incredible, than that things diſtant and aſunder by the whole ſpace of heaven and earth, ſhould in ſo great diſtance of places not only be conjoined, but alſo united, that ſouls may receive food of the fleſh of Chriſt. Therefore let wayward men ceaſe to procure hatred to us, by a filthy ſlander, as though we did enviouſly reſtrain any thing of the immeaſurable power of God. For they do either too fooliſhly err, or too maliciouſly lie. For it is not here in queſtion what God could, but what he would. We affirm that to be done which pleaſed him. But it pleaſed him, that Chriſt ſhould be made like to his brethren in all things, except ſin. Heb. iv. 15. What manner of thing is our fleſh? Is it not ſuch as conſiſteth of the certain meaſure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is ſeen? And why (ſay they) may not God make, that the ſelf ſame fleſh may occupy many and divers places, may be contained in one place, may be without meaſure and form? Thou mad man, why requireſt thou of the power of God to make fleſh at the ſame time to be and not to be fleſh? Like as if thou ſhouldeſt inſtantly require him to make at the ſame time the light to be both light and darkneſs. But he willeth light to be light, darkneſs to be darkneſs, fleſh to be fleſh. He ſhall indeed when it pleaſeth him, turn darkneſs into light, and light into darkneſs, but when thou requireſt that light and darkneſs may not differ, what doeſt thou elſe but pervert the order of the wiſdom of God? Therefore fleſh muſt be fleſh: and Spirit Spirit, every thing in ſuch law and condition as God hath created it. But ſuch is the condition of fleſh, that it muſt be in one yea and that a certain place, and conſiſt of her meaſure and of her form. With this condition Chriſt took fleſh upon him, to which (as Auguſtine witneſſeth) he hath given indeed incorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and truth. (Ep. ad Dard.)

They that make Chriſt to lurk inviſible under bread, are neither thereunto

25. They anſwer, that they have the word, whereby the will of God is made plain: namely if it be granted them to baniſh out of the church the gift of expoſition, which may bring light led by the words of Christ, nor assisted ther einby God's Almightiness.

light to the word, I grant that they have the word: but such as in old time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God having a body: such as Marcion and the Manichees had, when they feigned the body of Christ to be either heavenly or fantastical. For they alleged for testimonies, The first Adam was of the earth earthly, the second Adam is of heaven, heavenly: 1 Cor. xv. 47. again, Christ abased himself, taking upon him the form of a servant, and was found in likeness as a man. Phil. ii. 7. But the gross eaters think that there is no power of God, unless with the monster forged in their brains, the whole order of nature be overthrown: which is rather to limit God, when we covet with our feigned inventions to prove what he can do. For out of what word have they taken that the body of Christ is visible in heaven, but lurketh invisible in earth under innumberable little pieces of bread? They will say that necessity requireth this that the body of Christ should be given in the supper. Verily because it pleased them to gather a fleshly eating out of the words of Christ: they being carried away by their own prejudice were driven of necessity to coin this subtlety, which the whole scripture crieth out against. But that any thing is by us diminished of the power of God, is so false that by our doctrine the praise of it is very honourably set out. But forasmuch as they always accuse, us, that we defraud God of his honour, when we refuse that which according to common sense is hard to be believed, although it have been promised by the mouth of Christ: I make again the same answer that I made even now, that in the mysteries of faith we do not ask counsel of common sense, but with quiet willingness to learn, and with the spirit of meekness, which James commendeth, we receive the doctrine come from heaven. Jam. i. 21. But in that when they perniciously err, I deny not that we follow a profitable moderation. They hearing the words of Christ, This is my body, imagine a miracle most far from his mind. But when out of this feigned invention arise foul absurdities, because they have already with headlong haste put snares upon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomless depth of the almightiness of God, that by this mean they may quench the light of truth. Hereupon cometh that proud preciseness: we will not know how Christ lieth hid under the bread, holding ourselves contented with this saying of his, This is my body. But we, as we do in the whole scripture, do with no less obedience than care, study to obtain a sound understanding of this place: neither do we with preposterous heat rashly and without choice catch hold of that which first presenteth itself into our minds: but using diligent study upon it, we embrace the meaning which the spirit of God ministreth: and standing thereupon we do from aloft despise whatsoever earthly wisdom is set against it. Yea we hold our minds captive that they may not be bold so much as with one little word to carp against it: and do humble them, that they may not dare to rise up against it. Hereupon sprung up the exposition of the words of Christ, which to be by the continual usage of the scripture common to all sacraments, all they that have been thought but meanly exercised therein, do know. Neither do we, after the example of the holy virgin, think it lawful for us, in a hard matter to enquire how it may be done. Luke i. 34.

Christ proved by scripture not to be on earth according to the presence of the flesh, but only by majesty, providence and grace.

26. But because nothing shall more avail to confirm the faith of the godly, than when they have learned that the doctrine which we have taught is taken out of the word of God, and standeth upon the authority thereof: I will make this also evident with as great briefness as I can. The body of Christ, since the time that it rose again, not Aristotle but the Holy Ghost teacheth to be limited, and that it is comprehended in heaven until the last day. Neither am I ignorant that they boldly mock out those places that are alleged for this purpose. So oft as Christ saith that he will depart, leaving the world, John. xiv. 22. and 28. they answer that that departing is nothing else but a changing of mortal estate. But after this manner, Christ should not set the Holy Ghost in this place to supply (as they call it) the want of his absence: forasmuch as he doth not succeed into this place, nor Christ himself doth descend again out of the heavenly glory to take upon him the state of mortal life. Truly the coming of the Holy Ghost, and the ascending of Christ are things set as contrary: therefore it cannot be that Christ should according to the flesh dwell with us after the same manner that he sendeth his spirit. Moreover he in plain words expresseth, that he will not be always with his disciples in the world. Mat. xxvi. 11. This saying also they think that they do sufficiently wipe away, as though Christ said that he will not always be poor and miserable or subject to the neceſſities of this frail life. But the circumſtance of the place crieth plainly to the contrary, becauſe there it is not treated of poverty and need, or of the miſerable ſtate of earthly life, but of worſhip and honour. The anointing pleaſed not the diſciples, becauſe they thought it to be a ſuperfluous and unprofitable coſt, and near unto riotous exceſs, therefore they had rather that the price thereof which they thought to be ill waſted, had been beſtowed upon the poor. Chriſt anſwereth that he ſhall not always be preſent that he may be worſhipped with ſuch honour. And no otherwiſe did Auguſtine expound it, (Tract. in Joh. 50.) whoſe words are theſe which are nothing doubtful. When Chriſt ſaid, ye ſhall not always have me, he ſpake of the preſence of his body. For according to his majeſty, according to his providence, according to his unſpeakable and inviſible grace, this was fulfilled which he ſaid, behold, I am with you even to the ending of the world. Mat. xxviii. 10. But according to the fleſh which the word took unto him, according to this that he was born of the virgin, according to this that he was taken of the Jews, that he was faſtened to the tree, that he was taken down from the croſs, that he was wrapped in linen cloaths, that he was laid in the grave, that he was manifeſtly ſhewed in the reſurrection, this was fulfilled, ye ſhall not always have me with you. Why ſo? Becauſe he was converſant according to the preſence of his body forty days with his diſciples, and while they accompanied him in ſeeing, not in following, he aſcended. He is not here: for he ſitteth there at the right hand of the Father. And yet he is here: becauſe he is not gone away in preſence of majeſty. Otherwiſe according to the preſence of majeſty we have Chriſt always: and according to the preſence of the fleſh it is rightly ſaid, But me ye ſhall not always have. For according to the preſence of the fleſh, the church had him a few days: now ſhe holdeth him by faith, but ſeeth him not with eyes. Where (that I may note this alſo briefly) he maketh him preſent to us three ways, by majeſty, providence, and unſpeakable grace, under which I comprehend this marvellous communion of his body and blood: if ſo that we underſtand it to be done by the power of the holy Ghoſt, not by that feigned encloſing of his body under the element. For our Lord hath teſtified, that he hath fleſh and bones which may be felt and ſeen. And to go away and aſcend do not ſignify to make a ſhew of one aſcending and going away, but to do indeed that which the words ſound. Shall we then (will ſome man ſay) aſſign to Chriſt ſome certain coaſt of heaven? But I anſwer with Auguſtine that this is a moſt curious and ſuperfluous queſtion, if ſo that yet we believe that he is in heaven. (Lib. de fide ſym. cap. 16.)

Aſcending ſophiſtically expounded to be nothing elſe but conveyance out of ſight.

27. But what doth the name of aſcending ſo oft repeated mean? doth it not ſignify a removing from one place to another? They deny it: becauſe after their opinion, by height is only ſignified majeſty of empire. But what meaneth the very manner of aſcending? was he not in ſight of his diſciples looking on, lifted up on high Act. i. 9.? Do not the evangeliſts plainly declare that he was taken up into the heavens? Mark. xvi. 1, 6. Theſe witty ſophiſters do anſwer that with a cloud ſet between him and them he was conveyed out of their ſight, that the faithful might learn that from thence forth he ſhould not be viſible in the world. As though, to make credit of his inviſible preſence, he ought not rather to vaniſh away in a moment, or as though the cloud ought not rather to compaſs him before that he ſtirred his foot. But when he is carried up on high into the air, and with a cloud caſt underneath him, teacheth that he is no more to be ſought in the earth: we ſafely gather, that now he hath his dwelling place in the heavens, as Paul alſo affirmeth, Phil. iii. 10. and from thence he biddeth us to look for him. After this manner the angels warned the diſciples, that they in vain gazed up into heaven: becauſe Jeſus who is taken up into heaven, ſhall ſo come as they have ſeen him go up. Here alſo the adverſaries of ſound doctrine ſtart away with a pleaſant ſhift as they think, ſaying that he ſhall then come viſible, who never went out of the earth but that he abideth inviſible with them that are his. As though the angels did there ſignify a double preſence, and do not ſimply make the diſciples witneſſes of his going up ſeeing it with their eyes, that no doubting might remain: even as if they had ſaid: he in your ſight beholding it, being taken up into heaven, that claimed to himſelf the heavenly empire: it remaineth that ye patiently abide in expectation, till he come again the Judge of the world: becauſe he is now entred into heaven, not that he may alone poſſeſs it, but that he may gather together with him you and all the godly.

Auguſtine wreſted and abuſed by the maintainers of con-

28, But foraſmuch as the defenders of this baſtard doctrine are not aſhamed to garniſh it with the conſenting voices of the old writers and eſpecially of Auguſtine:

Subſtantiation.

tine: I will in few words declare how perverſely they go about it. For whereas their teſtimonies have been gathered together of learned and godly men, I will not do a thing already done: let him that will, ſeek them out of their works. I will not heap together, neither out of Auguſtine himſelf, all that might make to the purpoſe: but will be content to ſhew by a few that he is without controverſy whole on our ſide. As for this that our adverſaries, to wreſt him from us, do allege that it is commonly read in his books, that the fleſh and blood of Chriſt is diſtributed in the ſupper, namely the ſacrifice once offered on the croſs: (Ad Bonifac. Epiſt. 25.) it is but trifling: ſince he alſo calleth it either thankſgiving, or the ſacrament of the body. But in what ſenſe he uſeth the words of fleſh and blood, we need not to ſeek with long compaſſing about: foraſmuch as he declareth himſelf, ſaying that ſacraments take their names of the likeneſs of the things which they ſignify: and that therefore after a certain manner the ſacrament of the body is the body. Wherewith accordeth another place which is well enough known, the Lord ſticked not to ſay, This is my body, when he gave the ſign of it. (Contra Adama.) Again they object, that Auguſtine writeth expreſly, that the body of Chriſt falleth to the ground, and entreth into the mouth: even in the ſame ſenſe, that he affirmeth it to be conſumed, becauſe he joineth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrary, which he ſaith, that when the myſtery is ended the bread is conſumed: (Mani. Lib. 12.) becauſe he had a little before ſaid: ſince theſe things are known to men, foraſmuch as they are done by men, they may have honour as things: but as marvellous things, they may not. (Lib. 5. de trin. c.) And to no other end tendeth that which our adverſaries do too unadviſedly draw to themſelves: that Chriſt did (after a certain manner) bear himſelf in his own hands, when he reacheth the myſtical bread to the diſciples. For by enterlacing this adverb of likeneſs (after a certain manner) he ſufficiently declareth, that he was not truly nor really incloſed under the bread. And no wonder: ſince in another place he plainly affirmeth that bodies, if ſpaces of places be taken from them, ſhall be no where, they ſhall not be at all. (In Pſalm. 33.) It is a poor cavil, to ſay that in that place it is not ſpoken of the ſupper, in which God uttereth ſpecial power: becauſe the queſtion was moved concerning the fleſh of Chriſt, and the holy man of ſet purpoſe anſwering ſaith Chriſt gave immortality to his fleſh, but took not nature from it. After this form it is not to be thought that he is each where ſpread abroad: for we muſt beware that we do not ſo affirm the Godhead of the man, that we take away the truth of the body. And it followeth not, that which is in God muſt be each where as GOD is. There is a reaſon by and by added: for one perſon is God and man, and both are one Chriſt: each where, by this that he is God: in heaven, by this that he is man. (Epiſt. ad Dardan.) What a negligence had it been, not to except the myſtery of the ſupper being a thing ſo earneſt and weighty, if there had been in it any thing againſt the doctrine which he treated of. And yet if a man do heedfully read that which followeth within a little after, he ſhall find that under that general doctrine, the ſupper is alſo comprehended, that Chriſt the only begotten Son of God and the ſame the Son of man, is each where whole preſent as God: that he is in the temple of God (that is in the church) God as it were there dwelling, and in ſome certain place of heaven by reaſon of the meaſure of his true body. We ſee how, to the uniting of Chriſt with the church, he doth not draw his body out of heaven: which ſurely he would have done, if the body of Chriſt were not truly meat to us unleſs it were incloſed under bread. In another place defining how the faithful do now poſſeſs Chriſt. Thou haſt him (ſaith he) by the ſign of the croſs, by the ſacrament of baptiſm by the meat and drink of the altar. (Tract. 50. in Joh.) How rightly he reckoneth a ſuperſtitious uſage among the ſigns of the preſence of Chriſt, I do not now diſpute but he that compareth the preſence of the fleſh to the ſign of the croſs, ſufficiently ſheweth that he feigneth not a two bodied Chriſt, that the ſame He, may lurk hidden under the bread, who ſitteth viſible in heaven. If this need plainer declaration, it is by and by after added in the ſame place, that according to the preſence of majeſty, we always have Chriſt: that according to the preſence of the fleſh,, it is rightly ſaid, Me ye ſhall not always have. Mat. xxvi. 11. They anſwer, that this is alſo added, that according to an unſpeakable and inviſible grace, it is fulfilled which is ſaid of him, I am with you, even unto the end of the world. Mat. xxviii. 20. But that is nothing for their advantage: becauſe this is at length reſtrained to his majeſty, which is ever in compariſon ſet againſt the body, and his fleſh by expreſs name is made different from his grace and power. As in another place the ſame compariſon of contraries is read in him, that Chriſt by bodily preſence left the diſciples, that by ſpiritual preſence he may be ſtill with them: where it is plain that the ſubſtance of the fleſh is diſtinguiſhed from the power of the ſpirit, which conjoineth us with Chriſt, though we be otherwiſe far ſevered by diſtance of places. The ſame manner of ſpeaking he oftentimes uſeth, when he ſaith: he is to comeagain to the quick and the dead with bodily preſence, according to the rule of faith and ſound doctrine. For with ſpiritual preſence he was alſo to come to them, and to abide with the whole church in the world until the ending of the world. Therefore this ſpeech is directed to the believers whom he had already begun to ſave with bodily preſence, and whom he was to leave with bodily abſence: that he m'ght with his father ſave them with ſpiritual preſence. To take bodily for viſible is but trifling: ſince he ſetteth alſo the body in compariſon againſt the divine power: and adding (to ſave with the father) he clearly expreſſeth that he doth pour abroad his grace from heaven to us by his ſpirit.

The body of Chriſt by glory not made inviſible, which fanſy concerning Chriſt hath no manner of ground in ſcripture.

29. And ſince they put ſo much confidence in this lurking hole of inviſible preſence, go to, let us ſee how well they hide themſelves in it. Firſt, they ſhall not bring forth one ſyllable out of the ſcriptures, whereby they may prove that Chriſt is inviſible: but that they take that for confeſſed which no man that hath his ſound judgment will grant them, that the body of Chriſt cannot otherwiſe be given in the ſupper but being covered with the viſor of bread. And this is the point about which they ſtrive with us, ſo far is it off from having the place of a principle. And when they ſo bable, they are compelled to make a double body of Chriſt: becauſe after their opinion it is in itſelf viſible in heaven, but inviſible in the ſupper after a ſpecial manner of diſpenſation. But how trimly this agreeth, it is eaſy to judge both by other places of ſcripture, and by the witneſs of Peter. Peter ſaith, that Chriſt muſt be holden or contained in heaven, till he come again. Acts iii. 21. Theſe men teach that he is every where, but without form. They take exception and ſay that it is unjuſt dealing, to make the nature of a glorified body ſubject to the laws of common nature. But this anſwer draweth with it that doting error of Servetus, (which is worthily to be abhorred of all the godly) that the body was ſwallowed up of the Godhead. I do not ſay that they think ſo. But if this be reckoned among the qualities of a glorified body, to fill all things after an inviſible manner, it is evident that the bodily ſubſtance is deſtroyed, and that there is left no difference of the Godhead and the nature of man. Again, if the body of Chriſt be of ſo many faſhions and divers, that it is ſeen in one place, and is inviſible in another: where is the very nature of a body which conſiſteth of his meaſured proportions? and where is unity? Much more rightly doth Tertullian ſay, who affirmeth that the body of Chriſt was a true and natural body, becauſe in the myſtery of the ſupper the figure of it is ſet before us for a pledge and aſſurance of the ſpiritual life. And verily Chriſt ſaid of his glorified body, ſee and feel, for a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones. Luke xxiv. 39. Lo by Chriſt's own mouth the truth of the fleſh is proved, becauſe it can be felt and ſeen: take away theſe things, then it ſhall ceaſe to be fleſh. They ſtill flee to their den of diſpenſation which they have framed to themſelves. But it is our part ſo to embrace that which Chriſt abſolutely pronounceth, that that which he meaneth to affirm may be of force with us without exception. He proveth himſelf to be no ſpirit, becauſe he is viſible in his fleſh. Let that be taken away which he claimeth as proper to the nature of his body: muſt they not be fain to coin a new definition of a body? Now wherever they turn themſelves about, their feigned diſpenſation hath no place in that place of Paul where he ſaith, that we look for a ſaviour from heaven who ſhall faſhion our vile body like unto his glorious body. Phil. iii. 21. For we may not hope for a like faſhioning in thoſe qualities which they feign to Chriſt, that every one ſhould have an inviſible and immeaſurable body. Neither ſhall there be found any man ſo dull witted whom they may make to believe ſo great an abſurdity. Let them not therefore aſcribe this gift to Chriſt's glorified body, to be at once in many places, and to be contained in no ſpace. Finally, let them either openly deny the reſurrection of the fleſh, or let them grant that Chriſt being clothed with heavenly glory, did not put off his fleſh, who ſhall make us in our fleſh, fellows and partners of the ſame glory, when we ſhall have the reſurrection common with him. For what doth the ſcripture teach more plainly, than that as Chriſt did put on our true fleſh when he was born of the virgin, and ſuffered in our true fleſh when he ſatisfied for us: ſo he received again alſo the ſame true fleſh in riſing again, and carried it up to heaven? For this is to us the hope of our reſurrection and aſcending into heaven, that Chriſt is riſen again and aſcended; and (as Tertullian ſaith) he carried the earneſt of our reſurrection into the heavens with him. Now how weak and frail ſhould that hope be, unleſs this our real fleſh had been raiſed up with Chriſt and entered into the kingdom of heaven? But this is the proper truth of a body, to be contained in ſpace, to conſiſt of its meaſured proportions, to have its form. Therefore away with this fooliſh device, which doth doth faſten both the minds of men and Chriſt to the bread. For to what purpoſe ſerveth the ſecret preſence under bread, but that they who deſire to have Chriſt united to them, may reſt in that ſign? But the Lord himſelf willed us to withdraw not only our eyes, but all our ſenſes from the earth, forbidding himſelf to be touched of the women until he had gone up to his Father. When he ſeeth Mary with godly zeal of reverence to make haſte to kiſs his feet, Joh. xx. 17. there is no cauſe why he ſhould diſallow and forbid this touching till he ſhould be taken up into heaven, but becauſe he will be ſought no where elſe. Whereas they object that he was afterwards ſeen of Steven, Acts vii. 53. the ſolution is eaſy. For neither was it therefore neceſſary that Chriſt ſhould change place, who could give to the eyes of his ſervant ſuch clearneſs of ſight as might pierce through the heavens. The ſame alſo is to be ſaid of Paul, Acts ix. 4. Whereas they object that Chriſt came out of the ſepulchre it being ſhut, Mat. xxviii. 6. and entered in among the diſciples the doors being ſhut, John xx. 19. that maketh never a whit more for the maintenance of this error. For as the water like a faſt pavement made a way to Chriſt walking upon the lake: Mat. xiv. 25. ſo it is no wonder, if at his coming the hardneſs of the ſtone yielded itſelf. Howbeit it is more probable, that by his commandment the ſtone was removed, and by and by after paſſage given him returned into its place. And to enter the doors being ſhut, is not as much in effect as to pierce through the whole ſubſtance, but by divine power to open an entry for himſelf, that he ſuddenly ſtood among the diſciples, verily after a marvellous manner, when the doors were faſt locked. That which they allege out of Luke, that Chriſt ſuddenly vaniſhed away from the eyes of the diſciples with whom he went to Emaus, Luke xxiv. 31. profiteth them nothing, and maketh for us. For, that he might take away the ſight of himſelf from them, he was not made inviſible, but only went out of ſight. As when he went in journey together with them (as the ſame Luke witneſſeth, chap. xxiv. 16.) he did not put on a new face, that he might not be known, but held their eyes. But theſe fellows do not only transform Chriſt, that he may be converſant on earth, but in divers places they make him divers and unlike himſelf. Finally, in ſo trifling they do not by one word indeed, but by a circumſtance, make of the fleſh of Chriſt a ſpirit: and not contented therewith, they put upon it altogether contrary qualities. Whereupon of neceſſity followeth that it is double.

30. Now although we grant them that which they prat of the inviſible preſence, the unmeaſurableneſs ſhall not be yet proved, without which they ſhall in vain attempt to incloſe Chriſt under bread, unleſs the body of Chriſt may be every where at once, without any compaſs of place, it ſhall not be likely that he lieth hidden under bread in the ſupper. By which neceſſity they brought in the monſtrous being every where. But it is ſhewed by ſtrong and plain witneſſes of ſcripture, that it was limited about by the meaſure of the body of a man: and then that by his aſcending he hath made it plain that he is not in all places, but that when he paſſeth into one place he leaveth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promiſe which they allege, to be drawn to the body, I am with you unto the end of the world, Mat. xxviii. 20. Firſt the continual union cannot ſtand, unleſs Chriſt dwell in us corporally without the uſe of the ſupper. Therefore there is no juſt cauſe why they ſhould ſo ſharply brawl about the words of Chriſt, that they may in the ſupper incloſe Chriſt under bread. Again the text itſelf proveth, that Chriſt ſpeaketh nothing leſs than of his fleſh, but promiſeth to his diſciples invincible help, whereby he may defend and ſuſtain them againſt all the aſſaults of Satan and the world. For when he enjoined them a hard charge: leſt they ſhould doubt to take it in hand, or ſhould fearfully execute it, he ſtrengtheneth them with aſſiance of his preſence: as if he had ſaid, that his ſuccour ſhould not fail them, which ſhould be impoſſible to be overcome. Unleſs they liſted to confound all things ought they not to make diſtinction of the manner of preſence. And verily ſome had rather with great ſhame to utter their ignorance, than to yield never ſo little of their error. I ſpeak not of the Papiſts: whoſe doctrine is more tolerable, or at the leaſt more ſhamefaſt. But contentiouſneſs ſo carrieth ſome away, that they ſay that by reaſon of the natures united in Chriſt, whereſoever the Godhead of Chriſt is, there is alſo his fleſh, which cannot be ſeparated from his Godhead. As though that ſame uniting have compounded of thoſe two natures, I wot not what mean thing which was neither God nor man. So indeed did

Though the inviſibilitie of the body of Chriſt were granted, yet the unmeaſurableneſs thereof, which being denied taketh away the preſence of Chriſt in or under the bread, was both condemned in the hereſy of Eutyches, and hath in ſcripture no colour of proof.

Eutyches, and after him Servetus. But it is plainly gathered out of the ſcripture, that the one only perſon of Chriſt doth ſo conſiſt of two natures, that either of them hath ſtill her own property remaining ſafe. And that Eutyches was rightfully condemned, they will be aſhamed to deny: it is a wonder that they mark not the cauſe of his condemning, that taking away the difference between the natures, enforcing the unity of perſon, he made of God man, and of man God. What madneſs therefore is it, rather to mingle heaven and earth together, than not to draw the body of Chriſt out of the heavenly ſanctuary? For whereas they bring for themſelves theſe teſtimonies, None is gone up to heaven but he that is come down the ſon of man who is in heaven. John. iii. 13. Again, the Son who is the boſom of the Father, he ſhall declare him: John. i. 18. it is a point of like ſenſeleſs dulneſs, to deſpiſe the communicating of properties which was in old time not without cauſe invented of the holy fathers. Truly, when the Lord of glory is ſaid to be crucified, 1 Cor. ii. 8. Paul doth not mean that he ſuffered any thing in his Godhead: but becauſe the ſame Chriſt, who being an abject and deſpiſed in the fleſh did ſuffer, was both God and Lord of glory. After this manner alſo the Son of man was in heaven: becauſe the ſelf ſame Chriſt, who according to the fleſh did dwell the Son of man in earth, was God in heaven. In which ſort he is ſaid to have deſcended from the ſaid place according to his Godhead: not that the Godhead did forſake heaven to hide itſelf in the priſon of the body, but becauſe although it filled all things, yet in the very manhood of Chriſt it dwelt bodily, that is to ſay naturally, and after a certain unſpeakable manner. It is a common diſtinction in ſchools, which I am not aſhamed to rehearſe: that although whole Chriſt be every where, yet not the whole that is in him is every where. And I would to God the ſchoolmen themſelves had well weighed the import of this ſaying: for ſo ſhould the unſavoury invention of the fleſhly preſence of Chriſt have been met withal. Therefore our mediator, ſince he is whole every where, is always at hand with his, and in the ſupper after a ſpecial manner maketh himſelf preſent: but yet ſo that whole he is preſent, not the whole that he is: becauſe, as it is ſaid, in his fleſh he is contained in heaven till he appear to judgment.

Chriſt preſent in the ſupper though he deſcend not to preſent his body

31. But they are far deceived, who conceive no preſence of the fleſh of Chriſt in the ſupper, unleſs it be made preſent in bread. For ſo they leave nothing to the ſecret working of the ſpirit, which inviſible in bread, uniteth Chriſt himſelf unto us. they think not Chriſt preſent, unleſs he come down to us. As though if he did lift us up to him, we ſhould not as well enjoy his preſence. Therefore the queſtion is only of the manner: becauſe they place Chriſt in the bread, but we think it not lawful for us to pluck him out of heaven. Let the readers judge which is the righteſt. Only let this cavil be driven away, that Chriſt is taken away from his ſupper, unleſs he be hidden under the cover of bread. For ſince this myſtery is heavenly, there is no need to draw Chriſt into the earth, that he may be joined to us.

The manner of the preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament incomprehenſible, inexplicable

32. Now if any man do aſk me of the manner, I will not be aſhamed to confeſs, that it is a higher ſecret than that it can be either comprehended with my wit, or uttered with my words: and, to ſpeak it more plainly, I rather feel it, than I can underſtand it. Therefore I do herein without controverſy embrace the truth of God, in which I may ſafely reſt. He pronounceth that his fleſh is the meat of my ſoul, and his blood is the drink. With ſuch food I offer my ſoul to him to be fed. In his holy ſupper he commandeth me under the ſigns of bread and wine to take, eat, and drink his body and blood. I doubt not but that both he doth truly deliver them, and I do receive them. Only I refuſe the abſurdities, which appear to be either unworthy of the heavenly majeſty of Chriſt, or diſagreeing from the truth of his nature of manhood: foraſmuch as they muſt alſo fight with the word of God, which alſo teacheth that Chriſt was ſo taken up into the glory of the heavenly kingdom that it lifteth him above all eſtate of the world, Luk. xxiv. 26. and no leſs diligently ſetteth forth in his human nature thoſe things that are properly belonging to his true manhood. Neither ought this to ſeem incredible, or not conſonant to reaſon, becauſe as the whole kingdom of Chriſt is ſpiritual, ſo whatſoever he doth with his church, ought not to be reduced to the reaſon of this world. Or, that I may uſe the words of Auguſtine, this myſtery, as others are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heaven. (Iren. lib. 4. ca. 34.) Such (I ſay) is the preſence of the body, as the nature of the ſacrament requireth: which we ſay here to excel with ſo great force, and great effectualneſs, that it not only bringeth to our minds undoubted truſt of eternal life, but alſo aſſureth us of the immortality of our fleſh.

For

For it is now quickened of his immortal flesh, and after a certain manner communicateth of his immortality. They who are carried above this with their excessive speeches do nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plain truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would have him here a while to consider with me, that we now speak of a sacrament, all the parts whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we do no less daintily and plentifully feed faith with this partaking of the body which we have declared, than they that pluck Christ himself out of heaven. In the mean time I plainly confess, that I refuse that mixture of the flesh of Christ with our soul, or the pouring out of it such as they teach: because it sufficeth us, that Christ doth out of the substance of his flesh breathe life into our souls, yea doth pour into us his own life, although the very flesh of Christ doth not enter into us. Moreover there is no doubt that the proportion of faith, whereby Paul willeth us to examine all exposition of scripture, Rom. xii. 3. doth in this behalf very well agree with me. As for them that speak against so evident a truth, let them look after what rule of faith they fashion themselves. He that doth not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. 2 John. 7. These men, altho' they cloke it, or mark it not, do spoil him of his flesh.

Our communicating of Christ in the sacrament spiritual not carnal, such as receiveth Christ himself not the effects of his grace only, otherwise sacramental than Lombard, and after him others, have dreamed, who think his flesh eaten without taste, without faith.

33. Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowlege none unless they devour the flesh of Christ under bread. But there is no small wrong done to the Holy Ghost, unless we believe that it is brought to pass by his incomprehensible power, that we communicate with the flesh and blood of Christ. Yea if the force of the mystery, such as it is taught of us, and as it was known to the old church from four hundred years ago, were weighed according to the unworthiness of it, there was enough and more whereupon we might be satisfied: the gate had been shut against many foul errors, out of which have been kindled many horrible dissentions wherewith both in old time and in our age the church hath been miserably vexed, while curious men do enforce an excessive manner of presence, which the scripture never sheweth. And they turmoil about a thing foolishly and rashly conceived, as if the enclosing of Christ under bread were (as the proverb is) the prow and poup of godliness. It principally behoved to know, how the body of Christ, as it was once delivered for us, is made ours: how we are made partakers of his blood that was shed: because this is to possess whole Christ crucified, that we may enjoy all his good things. Now these things, in which was so great importance, being omitted yea neglected and and in a manner buried, this only crabbed question pleaseth them, how the body of Christ lieth hid under bread or under the form of bread. They fasly spread abroad that whatsoever we teach concerning spiritual eating, is contrary to the true and real eating, as they call it: because we have respect to nothing but to the manner, which among them is carnal, while they enclose Christ in bread: but to us it is spiritual, because the secret power of the spirit is the bond of our union with Christ. No truer is that other objection, that we touch only the fruit or effect which the faithful take of the eating of the flesh of Christ. For we have said before, that Christ himself is the substance of the supper: and that thereupon followeth the effect, that by the sacrifice of his death we are cleansed from sins, by his blood we are washed, by his resurrection we are raised up into hope of the heavenly life. But the foolish imagination whereof Lombard was the author, hath perverted their minds, while they think that the eating of the flesh of Christ is the sacrament. For this saith he: the sacrament and not the thing are the forms of bread and wine: the sacrament and the thing, are the flesh and blood of Christ: the thing and the sacrament, is the mystical flesh. (Lib. 4. Dist. 8.) Again within a little after. The thing signified and contained, is the proper flesh of Christ: the thing signified and not contained, is his mystical body. Whereas he maketh difference between the flesh of Christ, and the effectual power of nourishing, wherewith it is endued, I agree: but whereas he feigneth it to be a sacrament, yea and contained under bread, it is an error not to be suffered. Hereupon hath grown the false exposition of sacramental eating, because they have thought that wicked men also and evil doers do eat the flesh of Christ, how much soever they are strangers from him. But the flesh of Christ, it self in the mystery of the supper is no less a spiritual thing than eternal salvation. Whereupon we gather, that whosoever are void of the spirit of Christ, can no more eat the flesh of Christ, than they can drink wine wherewherewith is joined no taſte. Truly Chriſt is too hainouſly torn in ſunder, when that dead body and which hath no lively ſtrength, is given forth in common to unbelievers: and his expreſs words are directly againſt it. Whoſoever eateth my fleſh and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him. John vi. 56. They anſwer that in that place is not treated of the ſacramental eating: which I grant, ſo that they will not now and then ſtumble againſt the ſame ſtone, ſaying that the fleſh it ſelf is eaten without fruit. But I would know of them, how long they hold it when they have eaten it. Here, in my judgement, they ſhall have no way to get out. But they object, that nothing can be withdrawn or fail of the promiſes of God by the unthankfulneſs of men. I grant indeed, and I ſay that the force of the myſtery remaineth whole, howſoever wicked men do, as much as in them lieth, endeavour to make it void. Yet it is one thing to be offered, and another thing to be received. Chriſt reacheth this ſpiritual meat and offereth this ſpiritual drink to all men, ſome do greedily eat of it, ſome do lothingly refuſe it: ſhall theſe men refuſing make the meat and the drink to looſe their nature? They will ſay that their opinion is aſſiſted by this ſimilitude, namely, that the fleſh of Chriſt, though it be unſavoury, is nevertheleſs his fleſh. But I deny that it can be eaten without the taſte of faith: or (if we liſt rather to ſpeak as Auguſtine doth) I ſay that men bear away no more of this ſacrament, than they gather with the veſſel of faith. So nothing abated from the ſacrament, yea the truth and effectualneſs thereof remaineth undiminiſhed, although the wicked depart empty from the outward partaking of it. If they again object that this word, This is my body, is diminiſhed, if the wicked receive corruptible bread and nothing elſe, we have a ſolution ready, that God will not be known true in the receiving it ſelf, but in the ſtedfaſtneſs of his own goodneſs, when he is ready to give, yea liberally offereth to the unworthy that which they refuſe. And this is the fulneſs of the ſacrament, which the whole world cannot break, that the fleſh and blood of Chriſt is no leſs given to the unworthy than to the choſen faithful ones of God: but therewithal it is true, that as water lighting upon a hard ſtone, falleth away, becauſe there is no entry open into the ſtone: ſo the wicked do with their hardneſs drive back the grace of God that it cannot pierce into them. Moreover, that Chriſt ſhould be received without faith, is no more agreeing with reaſon, than ſeed to bud in the fire. Whereas they aſk, how Chriſt is come to damnation to ſome, unleſs they receive him unworthily, it is a very cold queſtion: foraſmuch as we no where read, that men do procure death to themſelves by unworthily receiving Chriſt, but rather by refuſing him. Neither doth Chriſt's parable help them, where he ſaith that ſeed groweth up among thorns, and afterward being choaked is marred: Mat. xiii. 7. becauſe he there treateth, of what value the faith is which endureth but for a time, which they do not think to be neceſſary to the eating of Chriſt's fleſh and drinking of his blood, that in this behalf do make Judas equal with Peter. But rather by the ſame parable their error is confuted, where Chriſt ſaith that ſome ſeed falleth in the high way, other-ſome upon ſtones, and neither of them taketh root. Whereupon followeth that to the unbelievers their own hardneſs is a let that Chriſt attaineth not to them. Whoſoever deſireth to have our ſalvation aſſiſted by this myſtery, ſhall find nothing fitter, than that the faithful being led to the very fountain, ſhould draw life out of the Son of God. But the dignity of it is honourably enough ſet out, when we keep in mind that it is a help whereby we are graffed into the body of Chriſt, or being graffed do more and more grow together, till he do fully make himſelf one with us in the heavenly life. they object that Paul ought not to have made them guilty of the body and blood of Chriſt, 1 Cor. xi. 29. unleſs they were partakers of them. But I anſwer that they are not therefore condemned becauſe they have eaten them, but only becauſe they have prophaned the myſtery, in treading under feet the pledge of the holy union with God, which they ought reverently to receive.

34. Now becauſe Auguſtine among the old writers chiefly hath affirmed that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the ſacraments, nor is the grace which they figure made void by the infidelity or naughtineſs of men: it ſhall be profitable to prove clearly by his own words, how unfitly and perverſly they do draw that to this preſent cauſe, who caſt the body of Chriſt to dogs to eat. The ſacramental eating, after their opinion, whereby the wicked receive the body and blood of Chriſt without the power of the Spirit, or any effect of grace. Auguſtine contrariwiſe weighing wiſely thoſe words. He that eateth my fleſh, and drinketh my blood, ſhall not die for ever, ſaith: Namely the power of the ſacrament, not only the viſible ſacrament: and verily within, not without: he that eateth it with heart, not he that preſſeth it with tooth. (Hom. in Joh. 26.) Whereupon at length he concludeth that the ſacrament of this thing thing, that is to say, of the unity of the body and blood of Christ, is set before men in the supper of the Lord, to some unto life, to some unto destruction: but the thing it self whereof it is a sacrament, to all men unto life, to none unto destruction, whosoever be partakers of it. John vi. 50. That none should here cavil, that the thing is called not the body, but the grace of the Spirit which may be severed from the body, the contrary comparison between these two words of addition visible and invisible driveth away all these mists: for under the first of them cannot be comprehended the body of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the unbelievers do communicate only of the visible sign. And that all doubting may be better taken away, after that he had said that this bread requireth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth: Moses and Aaron and Phineas, and many other that did eat, manna, pleased God, Exod. xvi. 14. Why so? because the spiritual meat they spiritually understood, spiritually hungred, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually filled. For we also at this day have received spiritual meat: but the sacrament is one thing, and the power of the sacrament is another. A little after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth not, without doubt neither eateth spiritually his flesh, nor drinketh his blood, though carnally and visibly he presseth with his teeth the sign of the body and blood. We hear again that the visible sign is set in comparison as contrary to spiritual eating. Whereby that error is confuted, that the body of Christ invisible is indeed eaten sacramentally, tho' not spiritually. We hear also that nothing is granted to prophane and unclean men beside the visible receiving of the sign. Hereupon cometh his famous saying, that the other disciples did eat the bread the Lord: but Judas did eat the bread of the Lord: (Hom. in Joh. 59.) wherein he plainly excludeth the unbelievers from the partaking of the body and blood. Neither tendeth it to any other end which he saith in another place: (Hom. 62.) what marvellest thou, if to Judas was given the bread of Christ, by which he might be made bond to the devil: when thou seest on the contrary side that to Paul was given the angel of the devil, by whom he might be made perfect in Christ? 2 Cor. xii. 7. he saith verily in another place, (Lib. 5. de bap. cont. Dona) that the bread of the supper was the body of Christ to them to whom Paul said, he that eateth unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself: 1 Cor. xi. 29. and that they have not therefore nothing, because they have received naughtily. But in what sense, he declareth more fully in another place. For taking in hand purposely to define how the wicked and evil doers, who profess the Christian faith with mouth but with deeds do deny it, do eat the body of Christ, (and that against the opinion of some who thought that they did not eat sacramentally only but in very deed.) But neither (saith he) ought it to be said that they eat the body of Christ, because they are not to be reckoned among the members of Christ. For (to speak nothing of the rest) they cannot together be the members of Christ, and the members of a harlot. Finally, where himself saith, he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him, John vi. 56. he sheweth that it is not sacramentally but in very deed to eat the body of Christ. For this is to abide in Christ, that Christ may abide in him. For he so said this as though he had said, he that abideth not in me, and in whom I abide not, let him not say or think that he doth eat my body, or drink my blood. Let the readers weigh the things set as contraries in the comparison to eat, sacramentally, and in very deed: and there shall remain no doubt. He confirmeth the same, no less plainly in these words: prepare not your jaws, but your heart. Hereupon is this supper commended. Lo we believe in Christ, when we receive by faith: in receiving we know what to think. we receive a little and are fatted in heart. Therefore not that which is seen, but that which is believed, doth feed. Here also that which the wicked receive, he restraineth to the visible sign: and teacheth that Christ is no otherwise received than by faith. So also in another place; (Cont. Faust. lib. 13. cap. 16.) pronouncing expressly that the good and the evil do communicate together in the signs he excludeth the evil from the true eating of the flesh of Christ. For if they received the thing itself, he would not utterly have left that unspoken which was more fit for his matter. Also in another place, (Ser. 2. de verb. Apost.) treating of the eating and the fruit thereof, he concludeth thus: then shall the body and blood of Christ be life to every man, if that which in the sacrament is visibly received, be in the truth itself spiritually eaten, spiritually drunk. Therefore whosoever make unbelievers partakers of the flesh and blood of Christ, that they may agree with Augustin, let them shew us the visible body of Christ forasmuch as, by his judgment, the whole truth is spiritual. And it is certainly gathered out of his words, that the ſacramental eating, when unbelief cloſeth up the entry to truth, is as much in effect as viſible or outward eating. If the body of Chriſt might be eaten truly and yet not ſpiritually, what ſhould that mean which he ſaith in another place: (In Pſal. xcviii.) Ye ſhall not eat this body which ye ſee, and drink the blood which they ſhall ſhed that ſhall crucify me. I have commanded a certain ſacrament unto you, being ſpiritually underſtood it ſhall quicken you. Verily he would not deny but that the ſame body which Chriſt offered for ſacrifice, is delivered in the ſupper: but he did ſet out the manner of eating: namely that being received into heavenly glory, by the ſecret power of the Spirit, it breatheth life into us. I grant indeed that there is oftentimes found in him this manner of ſpeaking, that the body of Chriſt is eaten of the unbelievers: but he expoundeth himſelf, adding, in ſacrament. And in another place he deſcribeth ſpiritual eating, in which our bitings conſume not grace. And leaſt mine adverſaries ſhould ſay, that I fight with them by a heap of places, I would know of them how they can unwind themſelves from one ſaying of his, where he ſaith that ſacraments do work in the elect only that which they figure. Truly they dare not deny but that the bread in the ſupper figureth the body of Chriſt. Whereupon followeth that the reprobate are debarred from the partaking of it. That Cyril alſo thought no otherwiſe, theſe words do declare. (In 6. Joan. cap. 17.) As if a man upon molten wax do pour other wax, he wholly tempered the one wax with the other: ſo it is neceſſary if any man receive the fleſh and blood of the Lord that he be joined with him that Chriſt may be found in him and he in Chriſt. By theſe words, I think it is evident, that they are bereaved of the true and real eating, that do but ſacramentally eat the body of Chriſt, which cannot be ſevered from his power: and that therefore faileth not the faith of the promiſes of God, which ceaſeth not to rain from heaven, although the ſtones and rocks conceive not the liquor of the rain.

Adoration of Chriſt in the ſacrament unwarranted.

35. This knowlege ſhall alſo eaſily draw us away from the carnal worſhipping, which ſome have with perverſe raſhneſs erected in the ſacrament: becauſe they reaſoned with themſelves in this manner: if it be the body, then both the ſoul and the Godhead are together with the body, which now cannot be ſeparated: therefore Chriſt is there to be worſhipped. Firſt, if their accompanying which they pretend be denied them, what will they do? For how much ſoever they cry out upon an abſurdity, if the body be ſevered from the ſoul and the Godhead: yet what ſound witted and ſober man can perſuade himſelf that the body of Chriſt is Chriſt: they think themſelves indeed ſufficient to prove it with their logical arguments. But ſince Chriſt ſpeaketh diſtinctly of his body and blood, but deſcribeth not the manner of preſence: how will they of a doubtful thing gather certainly that which they would? What then? If their conſciences chance to be exerciſed with any more grievous feeling, ſhall not they by and by with their logical arguments be diſſolved and melt? namely when they ſhall ſee themſelves deſtitute of the certain word of God, upon which alone our ſouls do ſtand faſt, when they are called to account, and without which they faint at every firſt moment: when they ſhall call to mind that the doctrine and examples of the Apoſtles are againſt them, and that themſelves alone are to themſelves the authors of it. To ſuch motions ſhall be added other not ſmall prickings. What? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worſhip God in this form, where nothing was preſcribed unto us? When it concerned the true worſhip of God, ought they with ſo great lightneſs to have attempted that of which there is no where read any one word? But if they had, with ſuch humbleneſs as they ought, holden all their thoughts under the word of God, they would truly have hearkened to that which he ſaid, take, eat, drink, and would have obeyed this commandment, wherein he biddeth the ſacrament to be received, not to be worſhipped. But they who, as it is commanded of God, do receive it without worſhipping, are aſſured that they do not ſwerve from God's commandment: than which aſſuredneſs there is nothing better when we take any work in hand. They have the example of the Apoſtles, whom we read not to have fallen down flat and worſhipped it, but even as they were ſitting to have received it and eaten it. They have the uſe of the apoſtolic church, wherein Luke reporteth that the faithful did communicate not in worſhipping but in the breaking of bread. Acts ii. 4. They have the Apoſtles doctrine, wherewith Paul inſtructed the church of the Corinthians, profeſſing that he had received of the Lord that which he delivered. 1 Cor. xi.

Adoration of the ſacrament of Chriſt's body ſo-

36. And theſe things verily tend to this end, that the godly reader ſhould weigh how perilous perſtitious, condemned in effect by the council of Nice, by the uſe of the old church and by ſcripture.

lous it is in ſo high matters to wander from the ſimple word of God to the dreams of our own brain. But thoſe things that are above ſaid, ought to deliver us from all doubt in this behalf. For that godly ſouls may therein rightly take hold of Chriſt they muſt needs be lifted up to heaven. If this be the office of a ſacrament, to help the mind of man which otherwiſe is weak, that it may riſe upward to reach the height of ſpiritual myſteries: then they who are holden down in the outward ſign do ſtray from the right way of ſeeking Chriſt. What then? Shall we deny that it is a ſuperſtitious worſhipping, when men do throw themſelves down before bread, to worſhip Chriſt therein? Doubtleſs the Nicene ſynod meant to meet with this miſchief, when it forbad us to be humbly attentive to the ſigns ſet before us. (Surſum corda.) And for no other cauſe was it in old time ordained, that before the conſecration the people ſhould with a loud voice be put in mind to have their hearts lifted upward. The ſcripture itſelf alſo, beſide that it diligently declareth unto us the aſcention of Chriſt, whereby he conveyed away the preſence of his body from our ſight and converſation: to ſhake away from us all carnal thinking of him, ſo oft as it maketh mention of him, commandeth us to have our minds raiſed upward, and to ſeek him in heaven ſitting at the right hand of the Father. Col. iii. 2. According to this rule he was rather to be ſpiritually worſhipped in heavenly glory, than this ſo perillous a kind of worſhipping to be deviſed, full of carnal and groſs opinion of God. Wherefore they that have invented the worſhipping of the ſacrament, have not only dreamed it of themſelves beſide the ſcripture, in which no mention of it can be ſhewed (which yet ſhould not have been overpaſſed if it had been acceptable to God:) But alſo all the ſcripture crying out againſt it, they have framed to themſelves a God after the will of their own luſt, leaving the living God. For what is idolatry, if this be not, to worſhip the gifts inſtead of the giver himſelf? Wherein they have doubly offended: for both the honour taken from God was conveyed to a creature: and he himſelf alſo diſhonoured in the defiling and prophaning of his benefit, when of his holy ſacrament is made a curſed idol. But let us contrariwiſe, leſt we fall into the ſame pit, throughly ſettle our ears, eyes, hearts, minds, and tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the ſchool of the holy Ghoſt, the beſt ſchool-maſter, in which ſuch profit is attained, that nothing need more to be gotten from any where elſe, but we willingly ought to be ignorant of whatſoever is not taught in it.

Chriſt in the ſacrament offered and given by promiſe unto them not who behold and adore, but who eat and give thanks: this ſacrament being inſtituted for the participation of Chriſt by faith and the profeſſion of our grateful remembrance as two ſpecial uſes.

37. But now (as ſuperſtition, when it hath once paſſed the right bounds, maketh no end of ſinning) they fell a great way further. For they have deviſed ceremonies altogether foreign to the inſtitution of the ſupper, to to this end only, that they might give divine honours to the ſign. we yield, ſay they, this worſhip to Chriſt. Firſt, if this were done in the ſupper, I would ſay that that worſhipping only is lawful, which reſteth not in the ſign, but is directed to Chriſt ſitting in heaven. But now by what pretence do they boaſt that they worſhip Chriſt in that bread: when they have no promiſe thereof? They conſecrate an hoſt, as they call it, which they may carry about in pomp, which they may ſhew forth in a common gazing to be looked upon, worſhipped and called upon I aſk by what power they think to be rightly conſecrate. Verily they will bring forth thoſe words, This is my body. But I will object to the contrary, that it was therewithal ſaid, Take and eat, Neither will I do that of nothing. For when a promiſe is joined to a commandment, I ſay, that the promiſe is ſo contained under the commandment, that being ſeparated it becomes no promiſe at all. This ſhall be made plainer by a like example. God gave a commandment, when he ſaid, call upon me: he added a promiſe, I will hear thee, Pſal. l. 15. If any man calling upon Peter and Paul, do glory upon this promiſe, will not all men cry out, that he doth wrongfully? And what other thing I pray, do they who leaving the commandment concerning eating, do catch hold of a maimed promiſe, This is my body, to abuſe it to ſtrange ceremonies from the inſtitution of Chriſt? Let us therefore remember that this promiſe is given to them who keep the commandment joined with it: but that they are deſtitute of all the word, who remove the ſacrament to any other way. We have heretofore treated how the myſtery of the holy ſupper ſerveth our faith before God. But foraſmuch as the Lord doth here not only bring into our remembrance ſo great largeneſs of his bounty, as we have before ſhewed, but doth as it were from hand to hand bring it forth, and ſtirreth us to acknowlege it: he doth therewithal warn us that we be not unthankful to ſo plentiful liberality: but rather that we would publiſh it with ſuch praiſes as it is meet, and advance it with thankſgiving. Therefore when he delivered the inſtitution of the ſacrament it ſelf to the apoſtles, he taught them that they ſhould do it in remembrance of him. Luk. xxii. 19. Which Paul expoundeth, to declare the Lord's death. 1 Cor. xi. 26. That is, publicly and altogether with one mouth openly to confeſs, that all our affiance of life and ſalvation is repoſed in the death of the Lord: that we may glorify him with our confeſſion, and may by our example exhort others to give glory to him. Here again it appeareth whereunto the aim of this ſacrament is directed, namely to exerciſe us in the remembrance of the death of Chriſt. For, this that we are commanded to declare the Lord's death till he come to judge, is nothing elſe but that we ſhould publiſh that with confeſſion of mouth, which our faith hath acknowleged in the ſacrament, that is, that the death of Chriſt is our life. This is the ſecond uſe of the ſacrament, which pertaineth to outward confeſſion.

A third uſe of this ſacrament in ſtirring up unto unity and love.

38. Thirdly, the Lord alſo willed it to be to us inſtead of an exhortation, than which no other can more vehemently encourage and enflame us both to pureneſs and holineſs of life, and alſo to charity, peace and agreement. For the Lord doth therein ſo communicate his body to us, that he is made throughly one with us, and we with him. Now ſince he hath but one body, whereof he maketh us all partakers, it is neceſſary that all we alſo be by ſuch partaking made one body. Which unity the bread which is delivered in the ſacrament, repreſenteth: which as it is made of many grains in ſuch ſort mingled together that one cannot be diſcerned from another: after the ſame manner we alſo ought to be conjoined and knit together with ſo great agreement of minds, that no diſagreement or diviſion come between us. This I had rather to be expreſſed with Paul's words. The cup of bleſſing (ſaith he) which we bleſs is the communicating of the blood of Chriſt: and the bread of bleſſing which we break, is the partaking of the body of of Chriſt, therefore we all are one body that partake of one bread. 1 Cor. x. 16. We ſhall have very well profited in the ſacrament, if this thought ſo ſhall be imprinted and ingraven in our minds, that none of the brethren can be hurt, deſpiſed, refuſed, abuſed, or any wiſe be offended by us, but that therewithal we do in ſo doing hurt, deſpiſe, and abuſe Chriſt with our injurious dealings: that we cannot diſagree with our brethren but that we muſt therewithal diſagree with Chriſt: that Chriſt cannot be loved of us, but that he muſt be loved in our brethren: that what care we have of our own body, ſuch alſo we ought to have of our brethren which are members of our body: as no part of our body is touched with any feeling of grief, which is not ſpread abroad into all the other parts, ſo we muſt not ſuffer our brother to be grieved with any evil whereof we ſhould not alſo be touched with compaſſion. Therefore Auguſtine not without cauſe ſo oft calleth this ſacrament that bond of charity. For what ſharper ſpur could be put to us, to ſtir up mutual charity among us, than when Chriſt giving himſelf to us, doth not only allure us with his own example, that we ſhould mutually dedicate and deliver our ſelves one to another: but in ſo much as he maketh himſelf common to all, he maketh all us alſo one in himſelf?

This ſacrament ſevered from the word nothing but a dumb ſhew.

39. But hereby is that very well confirmed which I have ſaid in another place, that the true miniſtration of the ſacrament ſtandeth not without the word. For whatſoever profit cometh to us of the ſupper, requireth the word: whether we be to be confirmed in faith, or to be exerciſed in confeſſion, or to be ſtirred up to duty, prayer is needful. Therefore nothing can be more diſorderly done in the ſupper, than if it be turned to a dumb action: it hath been done under the tyranny of the Pope. For they would have the whole force of conſecration to depend upon the intent of the Prieſt, as though this nothing pertained to the people, to whom it moſt of all behoved that the myſtery ſhould be declared. But thereupon hath grown this error, that they marked not that thoſe promiſes wherewith the conſecration is made, are directed not to the elements themſelves, but to them that receive them. But Chriſt ſpeaketh not to the bread, that it may be made his body, but commandeth his diſciples to eat, and promiſeth to them the communicating of his body and blood. And no other order doth Paul teach than that together with the bread and the cup, the promiſes ſhould be offered to the faithful. Thus it is truly. We ought not to imagine any magical inchantment, that it be ſufficient to have mumbled up the words, as though the elements ments did hear them: but let us understand that those words are a lively preaching, which may edify the hearers, which may inwardly pierce into their minds, which may be imprinted and settled in their hearts. which may shew forth effectualness in the fulfilling of that which it promiseth; by these reasons it clearly appeareth that the laying up of the sacrament, which many do earnestly require, that it may be extraordinarily distributed to the sick, is unprofitable: for either they shall receive it without rehearsing of the institution of Christ, or the minister shall together with the sign join the true declaration of the mystery. In silence is abuse and fault. If the promises be rehearsed, and the mystery declared, that they who shall receive it may receive it with profit, there is no cause why we should doubt that this is the true consecration. To what end then will that other consecration come, the force whereof cometh not so far as to the sick men? But they that do so, have the example of the old church. I grant: but in so great a matter, and in which we err not without great danger nothing is safer than to follow the truth it self.

The danger of unworthily receiving this sacrament.

40. Now as we see that this holy bread of the supper of the Lord is spiritual meat, no less sweet and delicate than healthful to the godly worshippers of God, by the taste whereof they feel that Christ is their life, whom it raiseth up to thanksgiving, to whom it is an exhortation to mutual charity among themselves: so on the other side it is turned into a most noisome poison to all them whose faith it doth not nourish and confirm, and whom it doth not stir up to confession of praise and to charity. For as bodily meat, when it findeth a stomach possessed with evil humours, being it self also thereby made evil and corrupted doth rather hurt than nourish: so this spiritual meat, if it light upon a soul defiled with malice and naughtiness, throweth it down headlong with greater fall: verily not by the fault of the meat it self, but because to defiled and unbelieving men nothing is clean, Tit. i. 15. though otherwise it be never so much sanctified by the blessing of the Lord. For (as Paul saith) they that eat and drink unworthily are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, and do eat and drink judgment to themselves, not discerning the body of the Lord. 2 Cor. xi. 29. For such kind of men as without any sparkle of faith, without any zeal of charity, do thrust themselves forth like swine to take the supper of the Lord, do not discern the body of the Lord. For in so much as they do not believe that that body is their life, they do as much as in them lieth dishonour it, spoiling it of all the dignity thereof, and finally in so receiving it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeing from their brethren, they dare mingle the holy sign of the body of Christ with their disagreements, it is no thanks to them that the body of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limb by limb torn in pieces. And so not unworthily they are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, which they do with ungodliness full of sacrilege so foully defile. Therefore by this unworthy eating, they take to themselves damnation. For whereas they have no faith reposed in Christ, yet receiving the sacrament they profess that there is salvation for them no where else than in him, and do foreswear all other affiance. Wherefore they themselves are accusers to themselves, they themselves pronounce witness against themselves, and they themselves seal their own damnation. Again when they being with hatred and evil will divided and drawn in sunder from their brethren, that is from the members of Christ, have no part in Christ: yet they do testify that this is the only salvation to communicate with Christ, and to be made one with him. For this cause Paul commandeth, that a man prove himself, before that he eat of this bread or drink of this cup. 1 Cor. xi. 21. Whereby (as I expound it) he meant that every man should descend into himself, and weigh with himself, whether he do with inward affiance of heart rest upon the salvation which Christ hath purchased: whether he acknowlege it with confession of mouth: then whether he do with desirous endeavour of innocency and holiness aspire to the following of Christ: whether after his example he be ready to give himself to his brethren, and to communicate himself to them with whom he hath Christ common to him: whether, as he himself is acconnted of Christ, he do likewise on his behalf take all his brethren for members of his own body: whether he covet to cherish, defend and help them as his own members. Not for that these duties both of faith and charity can now be perfect in us: but because we ought to endeavour this, and with all our desires to long toward it, that we may daily more and more encrease our faith begun.

Consciences tormented by that worthiness of receiving which is taught in the church of Rome.

41. Commonly when they go about to prepare men to such worthiness of eating, they have in a cruel manner tormented and vexed poor consciences: and yet they brought never a whit of all those things that might serve to the purpoſe. They ſaid that thoſe did eat worthily who were in a ſtate of grace. To be in a ſtate of grace they expounded to be pure and cleanſed from all ſin. By which doctrine all the men that ever have at any time been or now are in the earth, were debarred from the uſe of this ſacrament. For if we go about thus to fetch our worthineſs from ourſelves, we are utterly undone: only deſpair and damnable ruin abideth us. Though we endeavour with our whole ſtrength, we ſhall not the more prevail, but that then at leſt we ſhall be moſt unworthy, when we have moſt of all laboured about ſeeking of worthineſs. To heal this ſore, they have deviſed a way to attain worthineſs: that, as much as in us lieth, making examination, and requiring of ourſelves account of all our actions, we ſhould with contrition. confeſſion, and ſatisfaction cleanſe our unworthineſs, which way of cleanſing, what manner of thing it is, we have already ſhewed there where was a more convenient place to ſpeak of it. So much as ſerveth for our preſent purpoſe, I ſay that theſe are two vaniſhing comforts to diſmaid and diſcouraged conſciences, and ſuch as are ſtruck with horror of their ſin. For if the Lord by ſpecial forbidding admitteth none to the partaking of the ſupper but the righteous and innocent; there needeth no ſmall attention that may make a man aſſured of his own righteouſneſs which he heareth to be required of God. But whereby is this aſſuredneſs confirmed unto us, that they are diſcharged before God, who have done ſo much as in them lay? But although it were ſo, yet when ſhall it be that a man may be bold to aſſure himſelf that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certain aſſurance of our worthineſs, the entry ſhall always remain ſhut by that horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eat and drink judgment to themſelves, who eat and drink unworthily.

The medicinable virtue of this ſacrament unto men weakened with the conſciouſneſs of their own unworthineſs.

42. Now it is eaſy to judge what manner of doctrine this is which reigneth in the papacy, and from what author it proceeded, which with the outragious rigour thereof, bereaveth and ſpoileth miſerable ſinners and ſuch as are tormented with fear and ſorrow of the comfort of this ſacrament in which yet all the ſweet delicates of the goſpel were ſet before them. Surely the devil could by no readier way deſtroy men, than by making them ſo ſenſeleſs, that they could not perceive the taſte and ſavour of ſuch food, wherewith it was the will of the moſt good heavenly Father to feed them. Leſt therefore we run into ſuch a headlong precipice, let us remember that this holy banquet is medicine to the ſick, comfort to ſinners, a liberal gift to the poor: which brings no profit to the healthy, righteous, and rich, if any ſuch could be found. For whereas in it Chriſt is given us for meat: we underſtand that without him we pine, ſtarve, and faint, like as famine deſtroyeth the lively ſtrength of the body. Again, whereas he is given us for life: we underſtand that without him we are in ourſelves utterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthineſs both the only and beſt that we can bring to God, if we offer to him our own vileneſs, and (as I may ſo call it) unworthineſs, that of his mercy he may make us worthy of him: if we deſpair in ourſelves, that we may be comforted in him: if we humble ourſelves, that we may be exalted in him: if we accuſe ourſelves, that we may be juſtified of him: moreover if we aſpire to that unity which he commendeth to us in his ſupper: and as he maketh us all one in himſelf, ſo if we wiſh to us all altogether one ſoul, one heart, one tongue. If we have theſe things thoroughly well weighed and conſidered, ſuch thoughts although they ſhake us yet ſhall never overthrow us. As how ſhould we being needy and naked of all good things, we defiled with filthineſs of ſins, we half dead, eat the body of the Lord worthily? We will rather think that we being poor come to the libeberal giver, we ſick to the phyſician, we ſinners to the author of righteouſneſs, finally, we dead men to him that giveth life: that that worthineſs which is commanded of God, conſiſteth chiefly of faith, which repoſeth all things in Chriſt and nothing in us: and next of charity, and the ſelf ſame charity which is enough to offer imperfect to God, that he may increaſe it to better, foraſmuch as it cannot be given perfect. Some other agreeing with us in this, that the worthineſs itſelf conſiſteth in faith and charity: yet in the meaſure of worthineſs have gone far out of the way, requiring a perfection of faith, whereunto nothing may be added, and a charity equal with that which Chriſt hath ſhewed toward us. But hereby they do no otherwiſe than thoſe before, drive all men away from coming to this holy ſupper. For if their ſentence ſhould take place, no man ſhould receive but unworthily, foraſmuch as all without exception ſhould be holden guilty and convicted of their imperfection. And truly it were a point of too amazing ſtupidity, I will not ſay fooliſhneſs, to require ſuch perfection in the ſacrament, as may make the ſacrament void and ſuperfluous:

fluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weak and feeble to awake, to ſtir up, to prick forward and exerciſe the affection of faith and charity, and to correct the default of either of them.

The liberty granted unto men and their wanton folly ſhewed in ceremonies annexed to the adminiſtration of this ſacrament.

43. But ſo much as concerneth the outward form of action, whether the faithful receive it in their hand or no, whether they divide it, or every one eat that which is given him: whether they put again the cup in the hand of the deacon, or deliver it to the next: whether the bread be leavened, or unleavened: whether the wine be red or white: it maketh no matter. Theſe things are indifferent and left to the liberty of the church. Howbeit it is certain, that the uſage of the old church was, that every one ſhould take it into his hand. And Chriſt ſaid, Divide it among you. Luke xxii. 17. The hiſtories report that it was leavened and common bread before the time of Alexander biſhop of Rome who firſt delighted in unleavened bread: but for what reaſon I ſee not, unleſs it were with a new ſight to draw the eyes of the common people to wondering at it, rather than to inſtruct their minds with good religion. I adjure all them that are touched with any thought but light zeal of godlineſs, to tell whether they do not evidently ſee both how much more brightly the glory of God ſhineth herein, and how much more abundant ſweetneſs of ſpiritual comfort cometh to the faithful, than in theſe cold and play-like trifles, which are of no other uſe but to deceive the ſenſe of the amazed people. This they call the holding of the people in religion, when being made fooliſh and ſenſeleſs with ſuperſtition it is drawn whither they liſt. If any man will defend ſuch invention by antiquity, I myſelf am not ignorant how ancient is the uſe of chreſme and blowing in baptiſm: how nigh to the age of the apoſtles the ſupper of the Lord was infected with fooliſh inventions: but this verily is the frowardneſs of man's boldneſs, who cannot withhold itſelf but that it muſt always play and be wanton in the myſteries of God. But let us remember that God doth ſo highly eſteem the obedience of his word, that he willeth us in it to judge both his angels and the whole world. Now bidding farewel to ſo great a heap of ceremonies: it might thus have been moſt comelily miniſtred, if it were oft and at leaſt every week ſet before the church, but that firſt they ſhould begin with public prayers: then a ſermon ſhould be made; then the miniſter having bread and wine ſet upon the table, ſhould rehearſe the inſtitution of the ſupper; and then ſhould declare the promiſes, that are in it left unto us? and therewithal ſhould excommunicate all them that by the Lord's forbidding are debarred from it, afterward they ſhould pray that with what liberality the Lord hath given us this holy food, he would inſtruct and frame us alſo with the ſame faith and thankfulneſs of mind to receive it, and that foraſmuch as we are not of ourſelves, he would of his mercy make us worthy of ſuch a banquet: that then either pſalms ſhould be ſung, or ſomewhat read, and the faithful ſhould in ſeemly order communicate of the holy banquet, the miniſters breaking the bread and giving it to the people: that when the ſupper is ended, exhortation ſhould be made to pure faith and confeſſion of faith, to charity, and to manners meet for Chriſtians: laſt of all that giving of thanks ſhould be rehearſed, and praiſes be ſung to God: which being ended the congregation ſhould be let go in peace.

The often receiving of this ſacrament.

44. Theſe things that we have hitherto ſpoken of this ſacrament, do largely ſhew, that it was not therefore ordained, that it ſhould be received once a-year, and that ſuperficially for manner's ſake (as now commonly the cuſtom is) but that it ſhould be in often uſe to all Chriſtians that with often remembrance they ſhould repeat the paſſion of Chriſt: by which remembrance they might ſuſtain and ſtrengthen their faith, and exhort themſelves to ſing confeſſion of praiſe to God, and to publiſh his goodneſs: finally, by which they might nouriſh mutual charity, and teſtify it among themſelves, whereof they ſaw the knot in the unity of the body of Chriſt. For ſo oft as we communicate of the ſign of the body of the Lord, we do as by a token given and received, interchangeably bind ourſelves one to another unto all duties of love, that none of us do any thing whereby he may offend his brother, nor omit any thing whereby he may help him, when need requireth and ability alloweth. That ſuch was the uſe of the apoſtolic church, Luke rehearſeth in the Acts, when he ſaith, that the faithful were continuing in the doctrine of the apoſtles, in communicating, in breaking of bread, and in prayers. Acts ii. 42. So was it altogether meet to be done, that there ſhould be no aſſembly of the church without the word, prayers, partaking of the ſupper, and alms. That this order was alſo inſtitute among the Corinthians we may alſo ſufficiently gather of Paul, and it is certain that in many ages afterward it was in uſe. For thereupon came thoſe old canons which they father upon Anacletus and Calixtus, that when the conſecration is done, all ſhould communicate, that will not be without the doors of the church. And it is read in thoſe old canons, which they call the canons of the Apoſtles: that they who continue not unto the end, and do not receive the holy communion, muſt be corrected as men that move unquietneſs to the church. Alſo in the council at Antioch, it was decreed that they who enter into the church, and hear the ſcriptures, and do abſtain from the communion, ſhould be removed from the church, till they have amended this fault. Which altho' in the firſt council at Toletum it was either ſomewhat qualified, or at leaſt ſet forth in milder words, yet is there alſo decreed, that they, who when they have heard the ſermon, are found never to communicate, ſhould be warned: if after warning they abſtain, they ſhould be debarred from it.

all

The firſt beginnings of ſlackneſs to communicate.

45. Verily by theſe ordinances the holy men meant to retain and maintain the often uſe of the communion, which often uſe they had received from the Apoſtles themſelves, which they ſaw to be moſt wholſome for the faithful, and by little and little by the negligence of the common people to grow out of uſe, Auguſtine teſtifieth of his own time. (In 6. cap. Johan. tract. 26.) The ſacrament (ſaith he) of this thing, of the unity of the Lord's body, is ſomewhere daily, ſomewhere by certain diſtances of there received at the table, to ſome unto life, to the days, prepared unto the Lord's table, and is otherſome unto deſtruction. And in the firſt Epiſtle to Januarius: ſome do daily communicate of the body and blood of the Lord: ſome receive it at certain days: in ſome places there is no day let paſs wherein it is not offered: in ſome other places only upon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in ſome other places never but on the Sunday. But foraſmuch as the common people were (as we have ſaid) ſomewhat ſlack, the holy men did call earneſtly upon them with ſharp rebukings leaſt, they ſhould ſeem to wink at ſuch ſlothfulneſs. Such an example is in Chryſoſtome upon the Epiſtle to the Epheſians. (In cap. 1. Hom. 16. 12.) It is not ſaid unto him that diſhonoureth the banquet: wherefore didſt thou ſit down? but wherefore didſt thou come in? Whoſoever is not partaker of the myſteries, he is wicked and ſhameleſs for that he ſtandeth here preſent. I beſeech you if any be called to a banquet, waſheth his hands, ſitteth down, ſeemeth to prepare himſelf to eat, and then doth taſte of nothing: ſhall he not ſhame both the banquet, and the maker of the banquet? So thou ſtanding among them that with prayer do prepare themſelves to receive the holy meat, haſt even in this that thou haſt not gone away, confeſſed that thou art one of the number of them, at the laſt thou doſt not partake: had it not been better that thou hadſt not been preſent? Thou wilt ſay, I am unworthy. Therefore neither waſt thou worthy of the communion of prayer, which is a preparing to the receiving of the holy myſtery.

The cuſtom of yearly once receiving, perverſe.

46. And truly this cuſtom which commandeth to communicate yearly only is a moſt certain invention of the devil, by whoſe miniſtry ſoever it was brought in. They ſay that Zepherinus was author of that decree, which it is not likely to have been ſuch as we now have it. For he by his ordinance did peradventure not after the worſt manner provide for the church, as the times then were. For it is no doubt but that then the holy ſupper was ſet before the faithful ſo oft as they came together in aſſembly, neither is it any doubt but that a good part of them did communicate. But when it ſcarcely at any time happened that all did communicate together, and whereas it was neceſſary that they who were mingled with prophane men and idolaters, ſhould by ſome outward ſign teſtify their faith: the holy man for order and policies ſake, appointed that day, wherein the whole people of Chriſtians ſhould by partaking of the Lord's ſupper utter a confeſſion of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus being otherwiſe good hath been evil wreſted of them that came after, when a certain law was made of one communicating yearly: whereby it is come to paſs that almoſt all men when they have once communicate, as though they had ſufficiently diſcharged themſelves for all the reſt of the year, ſleep ſoundly on both ears. It ought to have been far otherwiſe done. Every week at the leaſt, the Lord's table ſhould be ſet before the aſſembly of the Chriſtians: the promiſes ſhould be declared, which might feed us ſpiritually at it: none ſhould indeed be compelled by neceſſity, but all ſhould be exhorted and pricked forward: the ſluggiſhneſs alſo of the ſlothful ſhould be rebuked. All ſhould by heaps, as hungry men, come together to ſuch dainties. Not without rightful cauſe therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the devil this cuſtom was thruſt in, which when it appointeth one certain day of the year, maketh men ſlothful for all the reſt of the year. We ſee indeed indeed that this perverſe abuſe was crept in even in the time of Chryſoſtome: but we may alſo therewithal ſee how much it diſpleaſed him. For he complaineth with grievous words in the ſame place which I even now alleged, that there is ſo great inequality of this matter, that often in ſometimes of the year they came not even when they were clean, but at Eaſter they came even when they were unclean. Then he crieth out: O cuſtom, O preſumption. Then in vain is the daily offering uſed: in vain we ſtand at the altar: there is none that partaketh together with us. So far is it off that he allowed it by his authority adjoined to it.

An ordinance to take away half this ſacrament from the people.

47. Out of the ſame ſhop proceeded alſo another ordinance, which hath ſtoln away or violently taken away the half of the ſupper from the better number of the people of God, namely the ſign of the blood, which being denied to lay and profane men (for with ſuch titles forſooth they ſet out God's inheritance) became a peculiar poſſeſſion to ſhaven and anointed men. It is the commandment of the eternal God, that all ſhould drink: which commandment man dare diſcontinue and repel with a new and contrary law, commanding that not all ſhould drink. And that theſe lawmakers ſhould not ſeem to fight without reaſon againſt their God, they pretend perils that might happen if this holy cup were commonly given to all: as though thoſe dangers had not been foreſeen and marked of the eternal wiſdom of God. And then ſubtilly forſooth they reaſon, that the one is enough for both. For if (ſay they) it be the body, it is whole Chriſt, which cannot now be ſevered from his body. Therefore by accompanying the body containeth the blood. Lo how our wit agreeth with God, when it hath never ſo little begun with looſe rains to be wanton and wild. The Lord ſhewing bread ſaith, that it is his body: when he ſheweth the cup, he calleth it his blood. The boldneſs of man's reaſon crieth out contrariwiſe, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body: as though the Lord had for no cauſe ſevered his body from his blood both in words and in ſigns: or as though it had ever been heard ſpoken that the body or blood of Chriſt is called God and man. Verily if he had meant to ſignify his whole ſelf, he might have ſaid it is I: as he is wont to ſpeak in the ſcriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my blood. But he willing to help our weakneſs, did ſet the cup ſeperate from the bread, to teach that he ſufficeth no leſs for drink than for meat. Now let one part be taken away, then we ſhall find but the one half of the nouriſhments in him. Therefore, altho' it be true which they pretend, that the blood is in the bread by way of accompanying, and again, the body in the cup, yet they defraud godly ſouls of the confirmation of faith which Chriſt delivereth us as neceſſary. Therefore bidding their ſubtilties farewel, we muſt hold faſt the profit which is by the ordinance of Chriſt in the two earneſts.

Cavillous allegations for defence of the half communion.

48. I know indeed that the miniſters of Satan do here cavil, as it is an ordinary thing with them to make mockery of the ſcriptures. Firſt they allege, that of one bare doing ought not to be gathered a rule whereby the church ſhould be bound to perpetual obſerving. But they lie when they ſay that it was but a bare doing; for Chriſt did not only deliver the cup, but alſo did inſtitute that his Apoſtles ſhould in time to come do the ſame. For they are the words of a commander, drink ye all of this cup. And Paul ſo rehearſeth that it was a deed, that he alſo commendeth it for a certain rule. Another ſtarting hole is, that the Apoſtles alone were received of Chriſt to the partaking of this ſupper whom he had already choſen and taken into the order of the ſacrificing prieſts. But I would have them anſwer me to five queſtions. from which they ſhall not be able to eſcape, but that they ſhall be eaſily convinced of their lies. Firſt, by what oracle have they this ſolution revealed, being ſo ſtrange from the word of God? The ſcripture reckoneth twelve that ſate with Jeſus: but it doth not ſo obſcure the dignity of Chriſt that it calleth them ſacrificing prieſts, of which name we will ſpeak hereafter in place fit for it. Though he gave it then to the twelve, yet he commanded that they ſhould do the ſame, namely, that they ſhould ſo diſtribute it among them. Secondly, why in that better age, from the Apoſtles almoſt a thouſand years, were all without exception made partakers of both the ſigns? was the old church ignorant what gueſts Chriſt had received to the ſupper? It were a point of moſt deſperate ſhameleſſneſs, here to ſtick and dallying granting it to be true. There remain the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, there remain the books of the old writers, which miniſter evident teſtimonies of this matter. The fleſh (ſaith Tertullian) is fed with the body and blood of Chriſt, that the ſoul may be fatted with feeding upon God. (Lib. de reſurrect. carnis.) How ſaid Ambroſe to Theodosius) wilt thou receive with such hands the holy body of the Lord? With what boldness wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of the precious blood? (Theod. lib. 3. ca. 8. Eucharistia.) And Jerom saith: The priests who make the thanksgiving, and do distribute the blood of the Lord to the people. (Hier. in 2 Mal.) Chrysostom, not as in the old law the priest did eat part, and the people part: but one body is set before all, and one cup. Those things that pertain to the thanksgiving are all common between the priest and the people. (Chrys. in 2. Cor. cap. 8. Eucharistia.) The self same thing doth Augustine testify in many places.

The custom of ministring the cup to the people not abrogated as long as there continued any drop of pureness in the church.

49. But why dispute I about a thing most known? Let all the Greek and Latin writers be read over: such testimonies shall each where offer themselves. Neither was this custom grown out of use, while there remained one drop of pureness in the church. Gregory, whom you may rightly say to have been the last bishop of Rome, teacheth that it was kept in his time. What is the blood of the lamb, ye have now learned, not by hearing, but by drinking. His blood is poured into the mouths of the faithful. Yea it yet endured four hundred years after his death, when all things were grown out of kind. For neither was that taken only for an usage, but also for an inviolable law. For then was in force the reverence of God's institution, and they doubted not that it was sacrilege, to sever those things which the Lord had conjoined. For thus saith Gelasius. (De consecr. dist. 2. cap. comper.) We have found, that some receiving only the portion of the holy body, do abstain from the cup. Let them without doubt, because they seem to be bound with I wot not what superstition, either receive the sacraments whole, or be debarred from them whole. For the dividing of this mystery is not committed without great sacrilege. Those reasons of Cyprian were heard, which truly ought to move a Christian mind. (Ser. 5. de lap.) How (saith he) do we teach or provoke them to shed their blood in the confessing of Christ, if we deny his blood to them that shall fight? Or how do we make them fit for the cup of martyrdom: if we do not first in the church by the right of communion admit them to drink the cup of the Lord? Whereas the canonists do restrain that decree of Gelasius to the priests, that is so childish a cavil that it need not to be confuted.

Three other reasons why the people should communicate in both kinds.

50. Thirdly, why did he simply say of the bread, that they should eat: but of the cup, that they should all drink? even as if he had meant of set purpose to meet with the craft of Satan. Fourthly, if (as they would have it) the Lord vouchsafed to admit to his supper only sacrificing priests, what man ever durst call to the partaking of it, strangers whom the Lord had excluded? yea and to be partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their hands, without any commandment of him who only could give it. Yea upon confidence of what warrant do they use at this day to distribute to the common people the sign of the body of Christ, if they have neither commandment nor example of the Lord? Fifthly, did Paul lie, when he said to the Corinthians, that he had received of the Lord that which he had delivered to them? For afterward he declareth the thing that he delivered, that all without difference should communicate of both the signs. If Paul received of the Lord, that all should be admitted without difference: let them look of whom they have received who do drive away almost all the people of God: because they cannot now pretend God to be the author of it, with whom there is not yea and nay. And yet still for cloaking of such abominations they dare pretend the name of the church, and with such pretence defend it. As though either these Antichrists were the church, which so easily tread under foot, scatter abroad, and destroy the doctrine and institution of Christ: or the Apostolic church were not the church, in which the whole force of religion flourished.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the popiſh maſs, by which ſacrilege the ſupper of Chriſt hath not only been profaned, but alſo brought to nought.

The ſacrifice of the maſs being held to be a ſacrifice propitiatory, is nothing but a mere profanation of the ſupper of the Lord.

WITH theſe and like inventions Satan hath labboured as by an overſpreading of darkneſs to obſcure and defile the holy ſupper of Chriſt, that at leaſt the pureneſs of it ſhould not be kept ſtill in the church. But the head of horrible abomination was when he advanced a ſign, by which it might not only be darkened and perverted, but being utterly blotted and aboliſhed ſhould vaniſh and fall out of the remembrance of men: namely when he blinded almoſt the whole world with a moſt peſtilent error that they ſhould believe that the maſs is a ſacrifice and oblation to obtain the forgiveneſs of ſins. How at the beginning the founder ſort of the ſchoolmen took this doctrine, I regard not: farewel they with their crabbed ſubtilties: which howſoever they may be defended with caviling, yet are therefore to be refuſed of all good men, becauſe they do nothing elſe but ſpread much darkneſs over the brightneſs of the ſupper. Therefore bidding them farewel, let the readers underſtand that I here match in fight with that opinion, wherewith the Romiſh Antichriſt and his prophets have infected the whole world, namely that the maſs is a work whereby the ſacrificing prieſt who offereth up Chriſt, and the other that do partake at the ſame oblation, do deſerve the favour of God: or that it is a cleanſing ſacrifice, whereby they reconcile God to themſelves. Neither hath this been received only in common opinion of the people, but the very action itſelf is ſo framed, that it is a kind of pacifying wherewith ſatisfaction is made to God for the purging of the quick and dead. The words alſo which they uſe, do expreſs the ſame: and no other thing may we gather of the daily uſe of it. I know how deep root this peſtilence hath taken, under how great ſeeming of goodneſs it lurketh, how it beareth in ſhew the name of Chriſt, how in the one name of maſs many believe that they comprehend the whole ſum of faith. But when it ſhall be by the word of God moſt clearly proved, that this maſs, how much ſoever it be coloured and glorious, yet ſhamefully diſhonoureth Chriſt, burieth and oppreſſeth his croſs, putteth his death in forgetfulneſs, taketh away the fruit that cometh thereof unto us, doth weaken and deſtroy the ſacrament wherein was left the memory of his death: ſhall there then be any ſo deep roots, which this moſt ſtrong ax, I mean the word of God, ſhall not cut down and overthrow? Is there any face ſo beautiful, that this light cannot bewray the evil which lurketh under it?

Chriſt diſhonoured by the ſacrifice of the maſs.

2. Let us therefore ſhew that which hath been ſet in the firſt place, that in it is intolerable blaſphemy and diſhonour done to Chriſt. For he was conſecrate of his Father a prieſt and biſhop, not for a time as we read that they were ordained in the old teſtament, whoſe life being mortal their prieſthood alſo could not be immortal: for which cauſe alſo there needed ſucceſſors that ſhould from time to time be put in the place of them that died. But in place of Chriſt, who is immortal, there needeth no vicar to be ſet after him. Therefore he was ordained of the Father a Prieſt for ever, according to the order of Melchizedech, that he ſhould execute an everlaſting prieſthood. Heb. v. 5. and 7. 17. and ix. 11, 12. Pſal. cx. 14. This myſtery had been long before figured in Melchizedech, whom when the ſcripture had once brought in for the prieſt of the living God, it never afterward made mention of him, as though he had had no end of his life. Gen. xiv. 18. After this point of likeneſs, Chriſt was called a prieſt according to his order. Now they that do daily ſacrifice, muſt needs appoint prieſts to make the oblations whom they muſt appoint as it were ſucceſſors and vicars inſtead of Chriſt. By which putting inſtead of him, they do not only ſpoil Chriſt of his honour, and pluck from him the prerogative of eternal prieſthood, but alſo labour to thruſt him down from the right hand of his Father, on which he cannot ſit immortal, but that he muſt therewithal remain the eternal prieſt. Neither let them ſay for themſelves that their petty ſacrificers are not put in place of Chriſt as if he were dead, but only are helpers of his eternal prieſthood, which ceaſeth not therefore to continue. For they are more ſtrongly holden faſt with the words of the Apoſtle, than that they may ſo eſcape: namely, that there were many other prieſts made, becauſe they were by death hindered to continue. Heb. vii. 13. Therefore there is but one that is not hindered by death, and he needeth no companions. Yet, ſuch is their frowardneſs, they arm themſelves with the example of Melchezedech to defend their wickedneſs. For, becauſe it is ſaid that he offered bread and wine, they gather that he was a foreſhewing of their maſs: as though the likeneſs between him and Chriſt were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is ſo empty and trifling that it needeth no confutation. Melchizedech gave bread and wine to Abraham and his companions, to refreſh them being weary after their journey and battle. What is this to a ſacrifice? Moſes praiſeth the gentleneſs of the holy king: theſe fellows unſeaſonably coin a myſtery whereof no mention is made. Yet they deceitfully paint their error with another colour, becauſe it followeth by and by after, and he was the prieſt of the higheſt God. I anſwer, that they wrongfully draw to the bread and wine that which the Apoſtle referreth to the bleſſing. Therefore when he was the prieſt of God he bleſſed Abraham. Whereupon the ſame Apoſtle (than whom we need to ſeek no better expoſitor) gathereth his excellency, becauſe the leſſer is bleſſed of the greater. Heb. vii. 7. But if the oblation of Melchizedech were a figure of the ſacrifice of the maſs, would the Apoſtle, I pray you, who ſearcheth out all even the leaſt things, have forgotten ſo earneſt and weighty a thing? Now (howſoever they triſle) they ſhall in vain go about to overthrow the reaſon which the Apoſtle himſelf bringeth, that the right and honour of ſacrificing prieſthood ceaſeth among mortal men, becauſe Chriſt who is immortal, is the only and perpetual ſacrificing prieſt.

The croſs of Chriſt thereby buried and oppreſſed.

3. Another virtue of the maſs was, that it oppreſſeth and burieth the croſs and paſſion of Chriſt. This verily is moſt certain, that the croſs of Chriſt is overthrown ſo ſoon as the altar is ſet up. For if he offered himſelf for a ſacrifice upon the croſs, that he might ſanctify us for ever, and purchaſe to us eternal redemption: undoubtedly the force and effectualneſs of that ſacrifice continueth without any end. Otherwiſe we ſhould think nothing more honourably of Chriſt, than of oxen and calves which were ſacrificed under the law: the offerings whereof are proved ineffectual and weak by this that they were oft renewed. Wherefore either we muſt confeſs, that the ſacrifice of Chriſt, which he fulfilled upon the croſs, wanted the force of eternal cleanſing, or that Chriſt hath made an end of all with one ſacrifice once for ever. This is it that the Apoſtle ſaith, that this chief biſhop Chriſt once appeared by offering up of himſelf before the ending of the world, to the driving away of ſin. Again, that we are ſanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the body of Jeſus Chriſt once. Again, that Chriſt with one oblation for ever hath made perfect them that are ſanctified: whereunto he adjoined a notable ſentence, that forgiveneſs of ſins being once purchaſed, there remaineth no more any oblation. Heb. ix. 26. and x. 10. This alſo Chriſt ſignified by his laſt ſaying and uttered among his laſt gaſpings, when he ſaid, it is finiſhed. John xix. 19. We are wont to note the laſt ſayings of men when they are a dying, for oracles. Chriſt dying teſtifieth that by his own ſacrifice is perfited and fulfilled whatſoever was for our ſalvation. Shall it be lawful for us daily to patch innumerable ſacrifices to ſuch a ſacrifice, (the perfection whereof he hath ſo ſhiningly ſet forth) as though it were unperfect? When the holy word of God not only affirmeth, but alſo crieth out, and proteſteth, that this ſacrifice was once fully done that the force thereof remaineth everlaſting: whoſo require another ſacrifice, do they not accuſe this of imperfection and weakneſs? But as for the maſs, which hath been delivered in ſuch ſort that there may every day be made a hundred thouſand ſacrifices, to what end tendeth it, but that the paſſion of Chriſt whereby he offered him an only ſacrificed oblation to the Father, ſhould lie buried and drowned? Who, unleſs he be blind, cannot ſee that it was the boldneſs of Satan, who wreſtled againſt ſo open and clear a truth? Neither am I ignorant with what deceits that father of lying uſeth to colour this his fraud, ſaying that there are not ſundry nor divers ſacrifices, but that one ſelf ſame ſacrifice is repeated. But ſuch ſmokes are eaſily blown away. For in the whole diſcourſe the Apoſtle laboureth to prove: not only that there are no other ſacrifices, but that that one ſacrifice was once offered up, and ſhall no more be repeated. The ſubtiller men do yet ſlip out at a narrower hole, ſaying, that it is not a repeating but an applying. But this ſophiſtical argument alſo is no leſs eaſily confuted. For neither did Chriſt once offer up himſelf with this condition: that his ſacrifice ſhould be daily confirmed with new oblations: but that by the preaching of the goſpel goſpel, and miniſtring of the holy ſupper, the fruit thereof ſhould be communicated unto us. So Paul ſaith that Chriſt our paſſover was offered up, and biddeth us to eat of him. 1 Cor. v. 7. This (I ſay) is the mean whereby the ſacrifice of the croſs is rightly applied to us, when it is communicated to us to take the uſe of it, and we with true faith receive it.

The weak ſupporters of the maſs.

4. But it is worth the labour to hear, with what other foundation beſide theſe they uphold the ſacrifice of the maſs. For they draw to this purpoſe the prophecy of Malachy, whereby the Lord promiſeth that the time ſhall come when throughout the whole world there ſhall be offered to his name incenſe and a clean ſacrifice Mal. i. 8. As though it were a new or unwonted thing among the prophets, when they ſpeak of the calling of the Gentiles to expreſs by the outward ceremony of the law the ſpiritual worſhipping of God, to which they exhort them, that they might the more familiarly declare to the men of their age, that the Gentiles ſhould be called into the true fellowſhip of religion. Like as alſo they are wont altogether to deſcribe by figures of their law, the truth that was delivered by the goſpel. So they ſet for turning to the Lord, aſcending into Jeruſalem: for the worſhipping of God, the offering of all kinds of gifts; for larger knowlege of him which was to be given to the faithful in the kingdom of Chriſt, dreams and viſions. Joel ii. 28. That therefore which they allege, is like unto another prophecy of Iſaiah, where the prophet fortelleth of three altars to be ſet up in Aſſyria, Egypt, and Judea Iſa. xix. 21. For firſt I aſk, whether they do not grant that the fulfilling of this prophecy is in the kingdom of Chriſt. Secondly, where are theſe altars, or when were they ſet up. Thirdly, whether they think that to every ſeveral kingdom is appointed a ſeveral temple, ſuch as was that at Jeruſalem. Theſe things if they weigh, I think they will confeſs, that the prophet under figures agreeable with his time, prophecieth of the ſpiritual worſhip of God to be ſpread abroad into the whole world. Which we give to them for a ſolution. But of this thing ſince there do every where examples commonly offer themſelves, I will not buſy myſelf in longer rehearſal of them. Howbeit herein alſo they are miſerably deceived, that they acknowlege no ſacrifice but of the maſs, whereas indeed the faithful do now ſacrifice to the Lord, and do offer a clean offering, of which ſhall be ſpoken by and by.

By the ſacrifice of the maſs, the memory of the death of Chriſt blotted out.

5. Now I come down to the third office of the maſs, where I muſt declare how it blotteth out the true and only death of Chriſt, and ſhaketh it out of the remembrance of men. For as among men the ſtrength of a teſtament dependeth upon the death of the teſtator: ſo alſo our Lord hath with his death confirmed the teſtament whereby he hath given us forgiveneſs of ſins and eternal righteouſneſs. They that dare vary or make new any thing in this teſtament, do deny his death, and hold it as it were of no force. But what is the maſs, but a new and altogether different teſtament? For why? Doth not every different maſs promiſe new forgiveneſs of ſins, new purchaſing of righteouſneſs: ſo that now there are ſo many teſtaments, as there are maſſes? Let Chriſt therefore come again, and with another death confirm this teſtament, or rather with infinite deaths confirm innumerable teſtaments of maſſes. Have not I therefore ſaid true at the beginning, that the only and true death of Chriſt is blotted out by maſſes? Yea what ſhall we ſay of this that the maſs directly tendeth to this end, that if it were poſſible, Chriſt ſhould be ſlain again? For where is a teſtament (ſaith the Apoſtle) there of neceſſity muſt be the death of the teſtator. Heb. ix. 16. The maſs ſheweth itſelf to be a new teſtament of Chriſt: therefore it requireth his death. Moreover the hoſt which is offered, muſt neceſſarily be ſlain and ſacrificed. If Chriſt in every different maſs be ſacrificed, then he muſt at every moment be in a thouſand places cruelly ſlain. This is not mine but the Apoſtles argument, if he had needed to offer himſelf oft, he muſt oft have died ſince the beginning of the world. I know that they have an anſwer in readineſs, whereby alſo they charge us with ſlander. For they ſay that that is objected againſt them which they never thought, nor yet can. And we know, that the death and life of Chriſt is not in their hand. We look not whether they go about to kill him: only our purpoſe is to ſhew, what manner of abſurdity followeth of their ungodly and wicked doctrine. Which thing I prove by the Apoſtles own mouth. Though they cry out to the contrary a hundred times, that this ſacrifice is unbloody; I will deny that it hangeth upon the will of men, that ſacrifices ſhould change their nature, for by this mean the holy and inviolable ordinance of God should fail. Whereupon followeth that this is a sure principle of the Apostle, that there is required shedding of blood, that washing may not be wanting.

The death of Christ made unfruitful by the sacrifice of the mass.

6. Now is the fourth office of the mass to be treated, namely to take away from us the fruit that came to us of the death of Christ, while it maketh us not to acknowlege it and think upon it. For who can call to mind that he is redeemed by the death of Christ when he seeth a new redemption in the mass? Who can trust that sins are forgiven him: when he seeth a new forgiveness? Neither shall he escape that shall say, that we do for no other cause obtain forgiveness of sins in the mass, but because it is already purchased by the death of Christ. For he bringeth nothing else than as if he should boast, that Christ hath redeemed us with this condition that we should redeem ourselves. For such doctrine hath been spread by the ministers of Satan, and such at this day they maintain with cryings out with sword and fire, that we when in the mass we offer up Christ to his father, by this work of offering do obtain forgiveness of sins, and are made partakers of the passion of Christ. What now remaineth to the passion of Christ, but to be an example of redemption, whereby we may learn to be our own redeemers? Christ himself, when in the supper he sealeth the confidence of pardon, doth not bid his disciples to stick in that doing, but sendeth them away to the sacrifice of his death: signifying that the supper is a monument or memorial (as the common speech is) whereby they may learn that the satisfactory cleansing sacrifice, by which the Father was to be appeased, must have been offered but once. For neither is it enough to know that Christ is the only sacrifice, unless the only sacrificing be joined with it, that our faith may be fastened to his cross.

The sacrament of that holy supper thereby defaced, and destroyed.

7. Now I come to the conclusion, namely that the holy supper, in which the Lord had left the remembrance of his passion graven and expressed, is by the setting up of the mass, taken away, defaced, and destroyed. For the supper itself is the gift of God, which was to be received with thanksgiving. The sacrifice of the mass is feigned to pay a price to God, which he may receive for satisfaction. How much difference there is between to give and to receive, so much doth the sacrifice differ from the sacrament of the supper. And this truly is the most wretched unthankfulness of man, that where the largeness of God's bounty ought to have been acknowleged, and thanks to be given, therein he maketh God his debtor. The sacrament promised, that by the death of Christ we are not only once restored into life, but are continually quickened, because then all the parts of our salvation were fulfilled. The sacrifice of the mass singeth a far other song, that Christ must be daily sacrificed, that he may somewhat profit us. The supper should have been distributed in the common assembly of the church, that it might inform us of the communion whereby we all cleave together in Christ Jesus. The sacrifice of the mass dissolveth and plucketh in sunder this community. For after that the error grew in force, that there must be sacrificers that should sacrifice for the people, the supper of the Lord as though it were posted over to them, ceased to be communicated to the congregation of the faithful according to the commandment of the Lord. An entry was made open to private masses, which might rather resemble a certain excommunication, than that same community ordained of the Lord, when that petty sacrificer willing seperately by himself to devour his sacrifice, doth sever himself from the whole people of the faithful. I call it private mass (least any man be deceived) wheresoever there is no partaking of the Lord's supper among the faithful, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

Private masses wicked abuses.

8. And whence the very name of mass first sprung, I could never certainly judge: saving that it seemeth to me likely that it was taken of the offerings that were given. Whereupon the old writers use it commonly in the plural number. But to leave striving about the name, I say that private masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked prophaning of the holy supper. For what hath the Lord commanded us? not to take, and divide it among us? What manner of observing of the commandment doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the communion of the body and blood 1 Cor. x. 16.? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what likeness is there? But that same one man doth it in the name of the whole church. By what commandment? Is not this openly to mock God, when one man privately taketh to himself that which ought not to have been done

but

but among many? But becauſe the words of Chriſt and Paul are plain enough, we may briefly conclude, that whereſoever is not breaking of bread to the communion of the faithful, there is not the ſupper of the Lord, but a falſe and wrongful counterfeiting of the ſupper. But a falſe counterfeiting is a corrupting. Now the corrupting of ſo great a myſtery is not without wickedneſs, Therefore in private maſſes is a wicked abuſe. And (as one fault in religion from time to time breadth another) after that that manner of offering without communion was once crept in, by little and little they began in every corner of churches to make innumerable maſſes, and diverſly to draw the people hither and thither, who ſhould have come together into one aſſembly, that they might acknowlege the myſtery of their own unity. Now let them go and deny it to be idolatry, that in their maſſes they ſhew forth bread to be worſhipped inſtead of Chriſt. For in vain they boaſt of thoſe promiſes of the preſence of Chriſt, which howſoever they be underſtood, verily were not given to this purpoſe, that wicked and prophane men ſo oft as they will, and to whatſoever abuſe they liſt, may make the body of Chriſt: but that the faithful, when with religious obſervation they do in celebrating of the ſupper follow the commandment of Chriſt, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

No commandment in ſcripture to warrant maſſing ſacrificers.

9. Beſide that, this perverſeneſs was unknown to the purer church. For howſoever the more ſhameleſs ſort among our adverſaries do here go about to diſguiſe the matter with falſe colours, yet it is moſt ſure that all antiquity is againſt them, as we have afore proved in other things, and it may more certainly be judged by the continual reading of old writers. But ere I make an end of ſpeaking of it, I aſk our maſſing doctors, ſince they know that obedience is more eſteemed of God than oblations, and that he more requireth that his voice be hearkened to, than that ſacrifices be offered: 1 Sam. xvi. 22. how they believe that this manner of ſacrificing is acceptable to God, whereof they have no certain commandment, and which they ſee not to be allowed by any one ſyllable of the ſcripture. Moreover when they hear the apoſtle ſay, that no man taketh to himſelf the name and honour of ſacrificing prieſthood, but he that is called as Aaron was: yea and that Chriſt himſelf did not thruſt in himſelf, but obeyed the calling of his Father: either they muſt bring forth God the author and ordainer of their ſacrificing prieſthood, or they muſt confeſs that the honour is not of God, into which they have with wicked raſhneſs broken in uncalled. But they cannot ſhew one title of a letter that maintaineth their ſacrificing prieſthood. Why therefore ſhall not their ſacrifices vaniſh away which cannot be offered without a prieſt?

Such ſacrifice never allowed by old writers as the church of Rome hath deviſed in the maſs.

10. If any man do thruſt in ſhort ſentences of the old writers gathered here and there, and do by their authority labour to prove that the ſacrifice which is done in the ſupper is far otherwiſe to be underſtood than we do expound it: let him be briefly anſwered thus: if the queſtion be of allowing the forged device of ſacrifice, ſuch as the Papiſts have feigned in the maſs, the old writers do never ſpeak in defence of ſuch ſacrilege. They do indeed uſe the word ſacrifice: but there withal they expound, that they mean nothing elſe but the remembrance of that true and only ſacrifice, which Chriſt our only ſacrificing prieſt (as they each where report of him) made on the croſs. The Hebrews (ſaith Auguſtine Lib 20. contra Fauſt c. 18.) in the ſacrifices of beaſts which they offered to God, did celebrate a prophecy of the ſacrifice to come, which Chriſt offered: the Chriſtians do with the holy oblation and partaking of the body of Chriſt celebrate a remembrance of the ſacrifice already made. Here verily he teacheth altogether the ſame thing, which is written in more words in the book of faith to Peter the deacon, whoſoever be the author of it. The words are theſe, Believe moſt ſtedfaſtly and doubt not at all, that the only begotten himſelf, being made fleſh for us, offered himſelf for us a ſacrifice and oblation to God into a ſavour of ſweetneſs: to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt in the time of the Old Teſtament beaſts were ſacrificed: and to whom now with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt (with whom he hath one Godhead) the holy church throughout the whole world ceaſeth not to offer the ſacrifice of bread and wine. For in thoſe fleſhly ſacrifices was a figuring of the fleſh of Chriſt which he ſhould offer for our ſins, and of his blood which he ſhould ſhed to the forgiveneſs of ſins. But in this ſacrifice is thankſgiving and rehearſal of the fleſh of Chriſt which he offered for us, and of his blood which the ſame he hath ſhed for us. Whereupon Auguſtine himſelf in many places expoundeth it to be nothing elſe but a ſacrifice of praiſe. (Cont. adverſ. legis.) Finally, you ſhall commonly find in him, that the ſupper of the Lord is for no other reaſon called a ſacrifice, but becauſe it it is the remembrance, image, and witness of that singular, true, and only sacrifice wherewith Christ hath cleansed us. Also there is a notable place in his fourth book of his Trinity the xxiv. chapter, where after that he hath discoursed of the only sacrifice, he thus concludeth: because in a sacrifice four things are considered, to whom it is offered, and of whom, what is offered, and for whom. The same he himself the one and true mediator reconciling us to God by the sacrifice of peace, remaineth one with him to whom he offered: maketh them one in him for whom he offered: is one himself who offered and, the thing which he offered. To the same effect also speaketh Chrysostom. But they so challenge the honour of sacrificing priesthood to Christ, that Augustine testifieth it to be the voice of Antichrist if any man make a bishop intercessor between God and men. (Lib. 1. cont. Parm. cap. 8.)

Christ after a sort offered because his offering as it were painted out by this mystery: in celebration whereof the fathers not simply to be allowed, though not to be condemned of ungodliness neither.

11. Yet do we not deny but that the offering up of Christ is there so shewed in us, that the spectacle of the cross is in a manner set before our eyes: as the apostle saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galatians, when the preaching of the cross was set before them. But forasmuch as I see that those old fathers also wrested this remembrance another way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lord, (because their supper contained I wot not what repeated or at least renewed form of sacrificing) the safest way for godly hearts shall be to rest in the pure and simple ordinance of God: whose also the supper is therefore called, because in it his authority alone ought to be in force. Truly since I find that they have kept a godly and true sense of this whole mystery, and I do not perceive that they meant to abate any thing were it never so little from the only sacrifice of the Lord. I cannot condemn them of ungodliness: yet I think that they cannot be excused, but that they have offended somewhat in the manner of the celebration. For they counterfeited the Jewish manner of sacrificing more nearly than either Christ had ordained, or the nature of the gospel did bear. Therefore that same overthwart appliance to heavenly things is the only thing wherein a man may worthily blame them, for that being not contented with the simple and natural institution of Christ, they swerved to the shadows of the law. Gal. iii. 1.

The difference between the sacrifices of Moses and our thanksgiving

12. If a man do diligently weigh, that this difference is put by the word of the Lord between the sacrifices of Moses, and our thanksgiving, that whereas those did represent to the Jewish people the same effectualness of the death of Christ, which is at this day delivered to us in the supper, but the manner of representing was divers. For in those, the Levitical priests were commanded to figure that which Christ should perform it: there was brought a sacrifice which should be instead of Christ himself: there was an altar whereupon it should be offered: finally all things were so done, that there was set before their eyes an image of the sacrifice which was to be offered to God for a satisfactory cleansing. But since the time that the sacrifice is ended the Lord hath appointed to us another order: namely, that it should convey to the faithful people the fruit of the sacrifice offered to him by the son. Therefore he hath given us a table whereat we should eat, not an altar whereupon sacrifice should be offered: he hath not consecrated priests to sacrifice, but ministers to distribute the holy banquet. How much more high and holy the mystery is, so much more religiously and with greater reverence it is meet to be handled. Therefore there is no way safer, than putting away all boldness of man's understanding, to stick fast in that alone which the scripture teacheth. And truly if we consider that it is the supper of the Lord and not of men, there is no cause why we should suffer ourselves to be removed one hair breadth from it by any authority of men or prescription of years. Therefore when the apostle minded to cleanse it from all faults which had already crept into the church of the Corinthians, he useth the readiest way thereunto, that is, he calleth it back to the only institution of it, from whence he sheweth that a perpetual rule ought to be fetched. 1 Cor. xi. 20.

The name of sacrifice, two kinds thereof in the law, in the gospel, two other thereunto answerable.

13. Now lest any wrangler should stir us up strife by reason of the names of sacrifice and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet briefly what in the whole discourse I have meant by a sacrifice, and what by a sacrificing priest. Whoso stretch the word sacrifice to all holy ceremonies and doings of religion, I see not by what reason they do it. We do know that by the continual use of the scripture a sacrifice is called that which the Greeks call sometime Thusia, sometimes Prosphora, someſometimes telete. Which being generally taken comprehendeth whatſoever is in any wiſe offered to God. Wherefore we muſt make diſtinction: but yet ſo that this diſtinction may have a ſupernal appliance of ſimilitude from the ſacrifices of the law of Moſes: under the ſhadows whereof the Lord willed to repreſent to his people the whole truth of ſacrifices. Of thoſe although there were divers forms, yet they may all be referred to two ſorts For either there was oblation made for ſin after a certain manner of ſatisfaction, whereby guiltineſs was redeemed before God: or it was a ſign of the worſhipping of God, and a teſtifying of religion: ſometimes inſtead of ſupplication, to crave the favour of God ſometimes inſtead of thankſgiving, to teſtify thankfulneſs of mind for benefits received: ſometimes only for an exerciſe of godlineſs, to renew the eſtabliſhing of the covenant, to which latter ſort pertained burnt offerings, drink offerings, oblations, firſt fruits, and peace offerings. Wherefore let us alſo divide ours into two kinds: and for teaching's ſake let us call the one the ſacrifice of worſhip and of godly devotion, becauſe it conſiſteth in the honouring and worſhipping of God, which the faithful both owe and yield unto him: or, if you will, the ſacrifice of thankſgiving: foraſmuch as it is given to God of none but of them that being loaden with immeaſurable benefits, do render to him themſelves with all their doings. The other may be called propitiatory or of expiation. The ſacrifice of expiation is that which tendeth to appeaſe the wrath of God, to ſatisfy his judgment, and ſo to waſh and wipe away ſins: whereby the ſinner cleanſed from the filthy ſpots of them, and reſtored into purity of righteouſneſs, may return into favour with God himſelf. So in the law thoſe were called ſacrifices that were offered for the purging of ſins: Exod. xxix. 3. not for that they were ſufficient to recover the favour of God, or to put away iniquity: but for that they ſhadowed out ſuch a true ſacrifice which at length was fully done by Chriſt alone: and by him alone, becauſe it could be done by no other: and once, becauſe the effectualneſs and force of that one ſacrifice which Chriſt hath fully done, is eternal, as he himſelf hath teſtified with his own mouth, when he ſaid that it was finiſhed and fulfilled: John xix. 30. that is to ſay, that whatſoever was neceſſary to the reconciling of the Father's favour; to the obtaining of the forgiveneſs of ſins, to righteouſneſs and to ſalvation, all the ſame was performed and fulfilled with his only oblation, and there ſo nothing wanted thereof, that there was afterward no place left to any other ſacrifice.

14. Wherefore I determine, that it is a moſt wicked reproach, and blaſphemy not to be ſuffered, as well againſt Chriſt as againſt the ſacrifice which he hath fully done by his death upon the croſs for us, if any man by renewing an oblation think to purchaſe the pardon of ſins, to appeaſe God, and to obtain righteouſneſs. But what is elſe done by maſſing, but that by deſerving of new oblation we may be made partakers of the paſſion of Chriſt. And that there might be no meaſure of madding, they thought it but a ſmall thing to ſay that there is made indifferently a common ſacrifice for the whole church, unleſs they further ſaid that it is in their choiſe to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to every one whoſoever he were that would buy for himſelf ſuch ware with ready money. Now becauſe they could not reach to the price that Judas had, yet that they might in ſome mark reſemble their author, they kept the likeneſs of number. Judas ſold him for thirty ſilver pence: theſe fellows ſell him after the French account, for thirty brazen pence: † but Judas ſold him once, theſe fellows ſell him as oft as they can find a buyer. In this ſenſe alſo we deny that they are ſacrificing prieſts, that is to ſay, they that with ſuch an oblation are mediators to God for the people, they that appeaſing, may purchaſe the ſatisfactory purging of ſins. For Chriſt is the only biſhop and ſacrificing prieſt of the New Teſtament, into whom all prieſthoods are removed, and in whom they are ſhut up and ended. And if the ſcripture had made no mention of the eternal prieſthood of Chriſt: yet foraſmuch as God, ſince that he hath taken away thoſe old prieſthoods, hath ordained none, the apoſtle's argument remaineth invincible, that no man taketh honour to himſelf, but he that is called of God. Heb. v. 4. By what affiance therefore dare theſe robbers of God, that boaſt themſelves for the butchers of Chriſt, call themſelves the ſacrificing prieſts of the living God?

In the ſacrifice of the maſs Chriſt blaſphemed and ſold, the ſacrificer himſelf not authoriſed.

15. Plato hath an excellent place in his ſecond book of commonweal. Where when he treateth of the old manners of maſs and the groſſneſs thereof condemned even by Plato himſelf.

expiation, and laugheth to ſcorn the fooliſh confidence of evil men and wicked doers, who thought that their wicked doings were by theſe as by coverings hidden that the gods could not ſee them, and did, as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by covenant, more careleſly follow their own luſts: he ſeemeth throughly to touch the manner of ſatisfactory purging of the maſs, ſuch as is at this day in the world. To beguile and undermine another man, all men know to be unlawful. To grieve widows with wrongful dealings, to rob the fatherleſs, to trouble the poor, by evil crafty means to catch other mens goods to themſelves, with forſwearings and deceits to enter forceably into any man's poſſeſſions, to oppreſs any man with violence and tyrannous fear, all men confeſs to be wicked. How therefore dare ſo many commonly do all theſe things, as though they ſhould freely be bold to do them? Truly, if we rightly weigh it, no other cauſe doth ſo much encourage them, but becauſe they have confidence, that by the ſacrifice of a maſs, as by payment of full price for recompence, they ſhall ſatisfy God, or at the leaſt that this is an eaſy way to compound with him. Then Plato proceedeth further to ſcorn their groſs blockiſhneſs, who think that by ſuch ſatisfactory cleanſings thoſe pains are redeemed that otherwiſe they ſhould ſuffer in hell. And whereto ſerve at this day the yearly obits, and the greater part of maſſes, but that they who throughout all their life have been moſt cruel tyrants, or moſt ravenous robbers, or given forth to all miſchievous doings, ſhould as though they were redeemed by this price, eſcape the fire of purgatory?

The ſacrifices of praiſe and thankſgiving.

16. Under the other kind of ſacrifice, which we have called the ſacrifice of thankſgiving, are contained all the dutiful works of charity, which when we extend to our brethren, we honour the Lord himſelf in his members: then, all our prayers, praiſings, givings of thanks, and whatſoever we do to the worſhipping of God. All which things finally do depend upon the greater ſacrifice, whereby we are in ſoul and body hallowed to be a holy temple to the Lord. For neither is it enough, if our outward doings be applied to the obeying of him: but firſt ourſelves, and then all that is ours ought to be conſecrate and dedicate to him: that whatſoever is in us, may ſerve his glory, and may ſavour of zealous endeavour to advance it. This kind of ſacrifice tendeth nothing at all to appeaſe the wrath of God, nothing at all to obtain forgiveneſs of ſins, nothing at all to deſerve righteouſneſs: but is occupied only in magnifying and extolling of God. For it cannot be pleaſant and acceptable to God, but at their hands, whom by forgiveneſs of ſins already received he hath by other means reconciled to himſelf, and therefore acquitted them from guiltineſs. But it is ſo neceſſary for the church, that it cannot be away from it. Therefore it ſhall be everlaſting, ſo long as the people of God ſhall continue, as we have before already ſhewed out of the prophet: for in that meaning I will take this prophecy, for from the riſing of the ſun to the going down thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in every place incenſe ſhall be offered to my name, and a pure offering: becauſe my name is terrible among the Gentiles, ſaith the Lord: ſo far is it off, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth us to offer our bodies a living ſacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, a reaſonable worſhip. Rom. xii. 1. Where he ſpake very forcibly, when he added that this is our reaſonable worſhipping: for he meant the ſpiritual manner of worſhipping of God, which he did ſecretly ſet in compariſon againſt the carnal ſacrifices of the law of Moſes. So liberal doing of good and communicating, are called ſacrifices by which God is pleaſed. Heb. xiii. 6. So the liberality of the Philippians, whereby they had relieved the poverty of Paul, is called a ſacrifice of ſweet ſmelling. So all the good works of the faithful are called ſpiritual ſacrifices. Philip. iv. 18.

Prayer and other good duties termed ſacrifices by the prophets, and chriſtians in reſpect thereof prieſts.

17. And why do I ſeek ſo many examples? For commonly this manner of ſpeaking is often found in the ſcriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holden under the outward ſchooling of the law, yet the prophets did ſufficiently expreſs, that under thoſe carnal ſacrifices was the truth, which the chriſtian church hath common with the nation of the Jews. After which manner David prayed, that his prayer might as incenſe aſcend into the ſight of God. Pſal. cxli. 2. And Hoſea called giving of thanks, the calves, of lips, Hoſeah xiv. 3. which in another place David calleth the ſacrifices of praiſe. Pſal. li. 21. Whom the apoſtle himſelf following, calleth them alſo the ſacrifices of praiſe, and expoundeth them the fruits of lips confeſſing to his name. Heb. xiii. 15. This kind kind of ſacrifice the ſupper of the Lord cannot want: wherein when we declare his death and render thankſgiving, we do nothing but offer the ſacrifice of praiſe. Of this office of ſacrificing, all we Chriſtians are called a kingly prieſthood: 1 Pet. ii. 9. becauſe by Chriſt we offer to God that ſacrifice of praiſe of which the apoſtle ſpeaketh, the fruit of lips that confeſs to his name. For neither do we with our gifts appear in the ſight of God without an interceſſor. Chriſt is he, who being the Mediator coming between, we offer us and ours to the Father. He is our biſhop, who being entred into the ſanctuary of heaven, hath opened the entry to us, He is the altar, upon which we lay our gifts, that in him we may be bold all that we are bold. It is he (I ſay) that hath made us a kingdom and prieſts to the Father.

18. What remaineth, but that the blind may ſee, the deaf may hear, children themſelves may underſtand this abomination of the maſs? which being offered in a golden cup, hath made drunk the kings and peoples of the earth from the higheſt to the loweſt, Rev. i. 6. hath ſo ſtriken them with drowſineſs and giddineſs, that being become more ſenſeleſs than brute beaſts, they have ſet the whole ſhip of their ſafty only in this deadly devouring gulf. Truly Satan never did exert himſelf with a ſtronger engine than this to aſſail and vanquiſh the kingdom of Chriſt. This is the Helen, † for whom the enemies of the truth fight at this day with ſo great rage, ſo great furiouſneſs, ſo great cruelty: and a Helen indeed, with whom they ſo defile themſelves with ſpiritual whoredom, which is the moſt curſed of all. I do not here ſo much as once touch with my little finger thoſe groſs abuſes wherewith they might colour the unholy pureneſs of their holy maſs: how filthy marketings they uſe, how unhoneſt gains they make with their maſſings, with how great ravening they fill their covetouſneſs. Only I do point unto, and that with few and plain words, what manner of thing is even the very holieſt holineſs of the maſs, for which it hath deſerved in certain ages paſt to be ſo honourable and to be had in ſo great reverence. For, to have theſe ſo great myſteries ſet out according to their worthineſs, requireth a greater work: and I am unwilling to mingle herewith thoſe filthy uncleanneſſes that commonly ſhew themſelves before the eyes and faces of all men, that all men may underſtand, that the maſs taken in her moſt picked pureneſs, and wherewith it may be ſet out to the beſt ſhew, without her appendances, from the root to the top ſwarmeth full of all kind of wickedneſs, blaſphemy, idolatry, and ſacrilege

No ſacrament in the church but only baptiſm, and the Lord's ſupper.

19. The readers now have in a manner almoſt all thoſe things gathered into an abridgement, which we have thought neceſſary to be known concerning theſe two ſacraments: the uſe of which hath been delivered to the Chriſtian church from the beginning of the New Teſtament, to continue to the very end of the world: namely, that baptiſm ſhould be as it were a certain entry into it, and an admiſſion into faith: and the ſupper ſhould be as it were a continual food, wherewith Chriſt ſpiritually feedeth the family of his faithful. Wherefore as there is but one God, one faith, one Chriſt, one church, his body: ſo there is but one baptiſm, and is not oft miniſtred again. But the ſupper is from time to time diſtributed, that they who have been once received into the church, may underſtand that they are continually fed with Chriſt. Beſide theſe two as there is no other ſacrament ordained of God, ſo neither ought the church of the faithful to acknowlege any other. For that, it is not a thing that lieth in the choiſe of man to raiſe and ſet up new ſacraments, he ſhall eaſily underſtand that remembreth that which hath been here before plainly enough declared, that is, that ſacraments are appointed of God to this end, that they ſhould inſtruct us of ſome promiſe of his, and teſtify to us his good will toward us: and he alſo that calleth to mind, that none hath been God's counſellor, Iſa. xl. 13. Rom. xi. 34. that might promiſe us any certainty of his will, or aſſure us, and bring us out of care, what affection he beareth toward us, what he will give, or what he will deny us. For therewith is alſo determined, that no man can ſet forth a ſign to be a teſtimony of any will or promiſe of his: it is he himſelf alone, that can by a ſign given teſtify to us of himſelf. I will ſpeak it more briefly, and peradventure more groſly, but more plainly, a ſacrament can never be without promiſe of ſalvation. All men gathered on a heap together can of themſelves promiſe nothing of our ſalvation. Therefore neither can they of themſelves ſet forth or ſet up a ſacrament.

The divers ſacraments of the Jews, and our different caſe from theirs.

20. Therefore let the Chriſtian church be contented with theſe two, and let her not only not admit or acknowlege any third for the preſent time, but alſo not deſire or look for any to the end of the world. For whereas certain diverſe ſacraments, beſides thoſe their ordinary ones, were given to the Jews according to the diverſe courſe of times, as manna, water ſpringing out of the rock, the braſen ſerpent and ſuch others, Exod. xvi. 13. and xvii. 6. 1 Cor. x. 3. Numb. xxi. 8. they were by this change put in mind that they ſhould not ſtay upon ſuch figures whoſe ſtate was not very ſtedfaſt: but that they ſhould look for ſome better thing from God, which ſhould continue without any decaying, and without any end. But we are in a far other caſe, to whom Chriſt is openly ſhewed, John iii. 14.: in whom all the treaſures of knowlege and wiſdom are hidden with ſo great abundance and plenty, that either to hope for or look for any new increaſe to theſe treaſures, is verily to move God to wrath, and to provoke him againſt us, Col. ii. 3. We muſt hunger for, ſeek, look upon, learn, and throughly learn Chriſt alone, until that great day ſhall appear, wherein the Lord ſhall openly ſhew to the full the glory of his kingdom, and himſelf ſuch as he is, to be beholden of us. And for this reaſon this our age is in the ſcriptures ſignified by the laſt hour, the laſt days the laſt times, that no man ſhould deceive himſelf with vain looking for any new doctrine of revelation. For many times and in many ſorts he ſpake before of his prophets, in theſe laſt days the heavenly Father hath ſpoken in his beloved, Son, who only can manifeſtly ſhew the Father. 1 John iii. 2. 1 John ii. 18. 1 Pet. i. 20. Heb. i. 2. and indeed he hath manifeſtly ſhewed him to the full, ſo much as behoveth us, while we now behold him by a glaſs, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. As therefore this is now taken away from men that they cannot make new ſacraments in the church of God: ſo it were to be wiſhed, that as little as were poſſible of man's invention might be mingled with thoſe ſacraments that are of God. For like as when water is poured in, the wine departeth and is delayed: and as with leaven ſcattered among it, the whole lump of leaven waxeth ſowre: ſo the pureneſs of the myſteries of God is nothing elſe but defiled when man addeth any thing of his own. And yet we ſee how far the ſacraments are ſwerved out of kind from their natural pureneſs, as they are handled at this day. There is each where too much of pomps, ceremonies and geſturings: but of the word of God in the mean time there is neither any conſideration or mention, without which even the ſacraments themſelves are not ſacraments. Yea, and the very ceremonies that are ordained of God, in ſo great a rout cannot once lift up their head, but ly as it were oppreſſed. How little is that ſeen in baptiſm, which only ought there to have ſhined and been looked upon, as we have in another place rightfully complained, even baptiſm itſelf? As for the ſupper, it is utterly buried, ſince that it hath been turned into the maſs ſaving that it is ſeen once every year but in a mangled and half torn faſhion.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the five falſly named ſacraments: where is declared, that the other five which have been hitherto commonly taken for ſacraments, are not ſacraments: and then is ſhewed what manner of things they are.

A ſacrament defined to be a viſible ſign of inviſible grace, and this applied in the ſchool of Rome to five others beſides thoſe two before handled.

OUR former diſcourſe concerning ſacraments might have obtained this with the ſober and willing to learn, that they ſhould not over curiouſly proceed any further, nor ſhould without the word of God embrace any other ſacraments beſide thoſe two wich they knew to be ordained of the Lord. But foraſmuch as that opinion of the ſeven ſacraments, being commonly uſed in all mens talk, having wandered through all ſchools and preachings, hath by very antiquity gathered roots, and is yet ſtill ſettled in the minds of men: I thought that I ſhould do a thing worth the labour, if I ſhould ſeverally and more nearly ſearch thoſe other five that are commonly numbered among the true and natural ſacraments of the Lord, and wiping away all deceitful colour, ſhould ſet them forth to be ſeen of the ſimple ple such as they are, and how falsely they have been hitherto taken for sacraments. First, I here protest to all the godly, that I do not take in hand this contention about the name for any desire of striving, but that I am by weighty causes led to fight against the abuse of it. I am not ignorant that Christians are lords, as of words, so of all things also, and therefore may at their will apply words to things, so that a godly sense be kept, although there be some unproperness in the speaking. All this I grant: although it were better that the words should be made subject to things, than things to the words. But in the name of sacrament there is another consideration. For they who make seven sacraments, do therewithal give to them all this definition, that they are visible forms of invisible grace: they make them altogether vessels of the Holy Ghost: instruments of giving of righteousness, causes of the obtaining of grace. Yea, and the master of the sentences himself denieth that the sacraments of the law of Moses are properly called by this name, because they did not deliver indeed the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to be suffered, that those signs which the Lord hath hallowed with his own mouth, which he hath garnished with excellent promises, should not be accounted for sacraments: and in the mean time this honour should be conveyed away to those usages which men either have devised of themselves, or at least do observe without express commandment of God? Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abstain from the wrongful using of this word, which doth afterward engender false opinions and full of absurdity. Extreme anointing (say they) is a figure and cause of invisible grace, because it is a sacrament: if we ought in no wise to grant that which they gather upon it, then truly we must resist them in the name itself, lest thereby we admit that it may give occasion to such an error. Again, when they would prove it to be a sacrament they add to this cause, for that it consisteth of the outward sign and the word. If we find neither commandment nor promise of it, what can we do else but cry out against them?

In no man's power but in God's alone to institute sacraments.

2. Now appeareth that we brawl not about the word, but do move a controversy not superfluous concerning the thing itself. Therefore this we must strongly hold fast, which we have with invincible reason before confirmed, that the power to institute a sacrament is in the hand of none but of God only. For a sacrament ought with a certain promise to raise up and comfort the consciences of the faithful: who could never receive this certainty from man. A sacrament ought to to be to us a witnessing of the good will of God toward us, whereof none of all men or angels can be witness, forasmuch as none hath been of God's council. Therefore it is he alone which doth with right authority testify of himself to us by his word. A sacrament is a seal, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily things and elements of this world, unless they be by the power of God framed and appointed thereunto. Therefore man cannot ordain a sacrament, because this is not in the power of man, to make that so great mysteries of God should ly hidden under so base things. The word of God must go before, which may make a sacrament to be a sacrament, as Augustine very well teacheth, (Hom. in Joan 80.) Moreover it is profitable that there be kept some difference between the sacrament and other ceremonies, unless we will fall into many absurdities. The apostles prayed kneeling: therefore men shall not kneel without a sacrament, Acts xix. 40. and 10. 3, 6. It is said that the disciples prayed toward the east: therefore the looking into the east shall be a sacrament. Paul willeth men in every place to lift up pure hands, and it is rehearsed that holy men oftentimes prayed with their hands lifted up, then let the lifting up of hands also be made a sacrament, 1 Tim. ii. 8. Finally let all the greatest of the saints turn into sacraments. Howbeit I would not also much pass upon these things, if so that they were not joined with those other greater disadvantages.

3. If they press us with the authority of the old church, I say that they pretend a false colour. For this number of seven is no where found among the ecclesiastical writers: neither is it certain at what time it first crept in. I grant indeed that sometimes they are very free in using the name of a sacrament: but what mean they thereby? even all ceremonies and outward rites, and all exercises of godliness. But when they speak of those signs that ought to be wit-

Although the word sacrament be in the fathers largely applied by St. Augustine speaking of those principal mysteries which Christ hath left unto his church, doth mention only baptism and the celebrating of the

neſſes of the grace of God toward us, they are contented with theſe two, baptiſm, and the ſupper. Leſt any man ſhould think that I falſely boaſt of this, I will here rehearſe a few teſtimonies of Auguſtine. To Januarius he ſaith. (Epiſt. 118.) Firſt I would have thee to hold faſt that which is the chief point of this diſputation, that our Lord Chriſt (as he himſelf ſaith in the goſpel) hath made us ſubject to a light yoke and a light burden. Wherefore he hath bound together the fellowſhip of the new people with ſacraments very few in number, very eaſy in obſerving, very excellent in ſignification. As are baptiſm hallowed in the name of the Trinity, and the communicating of the body and blood of the Lord, and whatſoever elſe is ſet forth in the canonical ſcriptures. Again, in his book of Chriſtian doctrine. (Lib. 3. cap. 9.) Since the Lord's reſurrection, the Lord himſelf and the doctrine of the Apoſtles hath delivered certain few ſigns inſtead of many, and thoſe moſt eaſy to be done, moſt reverend in underſtanding, moſt pure in obſerving: as is baptiſm and the celebrating of the body and blood of the Lord. Why doth he here make no mention of the holy number, that is, of the number of ſeven? It is likely that he would not have paſſed it over, if it had been at that time ordained in the church, eſpecially ſince he is otherwiſe in obſerving of numbers more curious than need were? Yea, when he nameth baptiſm and the ſupper, and ſpeaketh nothing of the reſt: doth he not ſufficiently ſignify that theſe two myſteries do excel in ſingular dignity, and that the other ceremonies do reſt beneath in a lower degree? Wherefore I ſay that theſe ſacramentary doctors are deſtitute not only of the word of the Lord, but alſo of the conſent of the old church, how much ſoever they glory of this pretence. But now let us come down to the ſpecial things themſelves.

Of Confirmation.

The cauſe and manner of ancient confirmation, with the opinions of Leo and Jerom concerning it.

4. This was the manner in old time; that the children of Chriſtians, when they were grown to age of diſcretion ſhould be brought before the biſhop: that they ſhould fulfil that duty which was required of thoſe that being grown in years did offer themſelves to baptiſm. For theſe ſat among thoſe that were to be catechiſed, till being fully inſtructed in the myſteries of the faith, they could make a confeſſion of their faith before the biſhop and the people. Therefore they that were baptiſed being infants, becauſe they had not then made confeſſion of their faith before the church, were about the end of their childhood or in the beginning of their years of diſcretion preſented again by their parents, and were examined of the biſhop according to the form of the catechiſm, which they had then certain and common. And that this doing, which otherwiſe ought worthily to be grave and holy, might have the more reverence and dignity, there was added alſo the ceremony of laying on of hands. So that ſame child, his faith being allowed, was let go with ſolemn bleſſing. The old writers do oft make mention of this manner. Leo the Pope writeth: (Epi. 39.) If any return from heretics, let him not be baptiſed again (but whom he wanted among the heretics) let the virtue of the ſpirit be given him by the biſhop's laying on of his hands. Here our adverſaries will cry out, that it is rightfully called a ſacrament, in which the Holy Ghoſt is given, but Leo himſelf doth in another place declare what he meaneth by thoſe words: (Epi. 77.) Whoſo (ſaith he) is baptiſed among heretics, let him not be rebaptiſed, but with calling upon the holy Ghoſt, let him be confirmed with laying on of hands: becauſe he received only the form of baptiſm without ſanctifying. Jerom alſo maketh mention of it, writing againſt the Luciferians. But although I do not deny that Jerom ſomewhat erreth therein, for that he ſaith that it is an obſervation of the Apoſtles: yet he is moſt far from theſe mens follies, and the very ſame alſo he qualifieth, when he addeth, that this bleſſing is given to the biſhops only, rather in honour of their prieſthood than by the neceſſity of law. Therefore ſuch laying on of hands, which is done ſimply inſtead of bleſſing, I praiſe, and would that it were at this day reſtored to the pure uſe thereof.

For confirmation as at this day they uſe it in the church of Rome, there is in the word of God no warrant.

5. But the later age having in a manner blotted out the thing it ſelf, hath ſet I know not what feigned confirmation for a ſacrament of God. They have feigned that the virtue of confirmation is, to give the holy Ghoſt to the encreaſe of grace, which in baptiſm was given to innocency: to ſtrengthen them to battle, which in baptiſm were new begotten to life. This confirmation is celebrate with anointing, and and with this form of words, I ſign thee with the ſign of the holy croſs, and confirm thee with the chreſm of ſalvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghoſt. All this is gaily and trimly done. But where is the word of God, that may promiſe here the preſence of the holy Ghoſt? They cannot bring forth one title. Whereby then will they certify us, that their chreſm is the veſſel of the holy Ghoſt? We ſee oil, that it is a thick and fat liquor and nothing elſe. Let the word (ſaith Auguſtine) be added to the element, and there ſhall be made a ſacrament. Let them (I ſay) bring forth this word, if they will have us in the oil to look upon any thing but the oil. If they did acknowlege themſelves miniſters of the ſacraments, as they ought, we needed to ſtrive no longer. This is the firſt law of a miniſter, that he do nothing without commandment. Go to, let them bring forth any commandment of this point of miniſtry, and I will not ſpeak one word more. If they have no commandment, they cannot excuſe their boldneſs full of ſacrilege. After this manner the Lord aſked the Phariſees, whether the baptiſm of John were from heaven or from men: if they had anſwered, from men, then he had made them confeſs that it was trifling and vain: if from heaven, then were they compelled to acknowlege the doctrine of John. Therefore leaſt they ſhould too much ſlander John, they durſt not confeſs that it was from men. Mat. xii. 25. If therefore confirmation be from men, it is proved to be vain and trifling: if they will perſuade us that it is from heaven, let them prove it.

Impoſition of hands uſed by the Apoſtles, no preſident for popiſh confirmation.

6. They do indeed defend themſelves with the example of the Apoſtles, whom they think to have done nothing raſhly. This is well indeed: neither would we blame them, if they ſhewed themſelves followers of the Apoſtles. But what did the Apoſtles? Luke reporteth in the Acts, that the Apoſtles which were at Jeruſalem, when they heard that Samaria had received the word of God, ſent thither Peter and John: they prayed for the Samaritans, that they might receive the holy Ghoſt, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptized only in the name of Jeſus: when they had prayed, they laid their hands upon them: Acts viii. 21. by which laying on, the Samaritans received the holy Ghoſt. And of this laying on of hands he divers times maketh mention. I hear what the Apoſtles did: that is, they faithfully executed their miniſtery. The Lord willed that thoſe viſible and wonderful graces of the holy Ghoſt, which he then poured out upon his people, ſhould be miniſtred and diſtributed of his Apoſtles by the laying on of hands. But under this laying on of hands: I think there was not contained any higher myſtery: but I expound it, that they adjoined ſuch a ceremony, that by the very outward action they might ſignify, that they commended and as it were offered to God him upon whom they laid their hands. If this miniſtry which the apoſtles then executed, were yet ſtil remaining in the church, the laying on of hands alſo ought to be kept. But ſince that ſame grace hath ceaſed to be given, whereto ſerveth the laying on of hands? Truly the holy Ghoſt is yet preſent with the people of God without whom being guider and director, the church of God cannot ſtand. For we have the eternal promiſe, and which ſhall ever ſtand in force, by which Chriſt calleth to himſelf them that thirſt, that they may drink living waters. John vii. 37. But thoſe miracles of powers, and manifeſt workings, which were diſtributed by the laying on of hands, have ceaſed, neither behoved it that they ſhould be but for a time. For it behoved that the preaching of the goſpel while it was new, ſhould be glorioufly ſet forth and magnified, with unheard of and unwonted miracles. From which when the Lord ceaſed, he did not by and by forſake his church, but taught that the royalty of his kingdom and the dignity of his word was excellently enough diſcloſed. In what point therefore will theſe ſtage-players ſay that they follow the apoſtles? They ſhould have done it with laying on of hands, that the evident power of the Holy Ghoſt might by and by ſhew forth itſelf. This they bring not to paſs: why therefore do they boaſt that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which we read indeed that the apoſtles uſed, but altogether to another end?

7. This hath like reaſon as if a man ſhould teach that the breathing wherewith the Lord breathed upon his diſciples, John xx. 22. is a ſacrament whereby the Holy Ghoſt is given. But whereas the Lord did this once, he did not alſo will that we ſhould do the ſame. After the ſame manner alſo the apoſtles laid on their hands, during the time that it pleaſed the Lord that the viſible graces of the Holy Ghoſt ſhould be diſtributed at their prayers: not that they who come after, ſhould only player-like and without the thing indeed counterfeit an empty and cold ſign, as theſe apes do. But if they prove that in laying on of hands they low the apoſtles, (wherein they have no like thing with the apoſtles, ſaving I wot not what overthwart wrongful counterfeiting) yet whence cometh their oil which they call the oil of ſalvation? Who taught them to ſeek a ſalvation in oil? Who taught them to give to it the power of ſtrengthening? Did Paul, who draweth us far away from elements of the of the world, who condemneth nothing more than the ſticking to ſuch petty obſervations? Gal. iv. 9. Col. ii. 20. But this I boldly pronounce not of myſelf, but from the Lord: whoſo call oil the oil of ſalvation, they renounce the ſalvation that is in Chriſt, they deny Chriſt, they have no part in the kingdom of God. For oil is for the belly, and the belly for oil, the Lord ſhall deſtroy both. For all theſe weak elements, which decay with the very uſe, belong nothing to the kingdom of God, which is ſpiritual, and ſhall never decay. What then will ſome men ſay: do you meaſure with the ſame meaſure, the water wherewith we are baptized, and the bread and wine under which the ſupper of the Lord is given? I anſwer, that in ſacraments given of God, two things are to be looked unto: the ſubſtance of the bodily thing which is ſet before us, and the form that is by the word of God printed in it, wherein lieth the whole ſtrength. In reſpect therefore that the bread, wine and water that are in the ſacraments offered to our ſight, do keep their own ſubſtance, this ſaying of Paul always hath place, Meat for the belly, and the belly for meats; but God ſhall deſtroy them both. 1 Cor. vi. 13. For they paſs and vaniſh away with the faſhion of this world. But in reſpect that they are ſanctified by the word of God, that they may be ſacraments, they do not hold us in the fleſh, but do truly and ſpiritually teach us.

With derogation from baptiſm, force given unto confirmation which doth not belong unto it.

8. But let us yet more nearly look into it, how many monſters this fat liquor foſtereth and feedeth. Theſe anointers ſay, that the Holy Ghoſt is given in baptiſm to innocency: in confirmation to increaſe of grace: that in baptiſm, we are new begotten into life: in confirmation we are prepared to battle. And they are ſo paſt ſhame, that they deny that baptiſm can well be done without confirmation. O wickedneſs! are we not therefore in baptiſm buried together with Chriſt, being made partakers of his death, that we may be alſo partners of his reſurrection? But this fellowſhip with the death and life of Chriſt Paul expoundeth to be the mortifying of our fleſh, and quickening of our ſpirit: for that our old man is crucified, that we may walk in newneſs of life. Rom. vi. 4. What is it to be armed to battle if this be not? If they counted it a matter of nothing to tread under feet the word of God; why did they not at leaſt reverence the church, to whom they will in every point ſeem to be obedient? But what can be brought forth more ſtrong againſt their doctrine, than that decree of the Milevitane council? Whoſo ſaith that baptiſm is given only for the forgiveneſs of ſins, and not for a help of grace to come, let him be accurſed. But whereas Luke, in the place which we have alleged, ſaith that they were baptized in the name of Jeſus Chriſt, who had not received the Holy Ghoſt, Acts viii. 26. he doth not ſimply deny they were endowed with any gift of the Holy Ghoſt, who believed in Chriſt with the heart, and confeſſed him with the mouth; but meaneth of that receiving of the Holy Ghoſt, whereby the open powers and viſible graces were received. So it is ſaid that the apoſtles received the Spirit on the day of Pentecoſt, Acts ii. 4. whereas it had been long before ſaid unto them of Chriſt, it is not you that ſpeak, but the Spirit of my Father which ſpeaketh in you. Behold all ye that are of God, the malicious and poiſonous deceit of ſatan. That thing which was truly given in baptiſm, he lyingly ſaith to be given in his confirmation, that he may by ſtealth lead you unawares from baptiſm. Who can now doubt that this is the doctrine of ſatan, which cutting away from baptiſm the promiſes properly belonging to baptiſm, doth convey away and remove them to another thing? It is found (I ſay) upon what manner of foundation this godly anointing ſtandeth. The word of God is, that all they who are baptized in Chriſt have put on Chriſt with his gifts, Gal. iii. 27. The word of the anointers is, that they received in baptiſm no promiſe, by which they may be armed in battles. That is the voice of truth, therefore this muſt be the voice of lying. Therefore I can more truly define this confirmation than they have hitherto defined it: namely, that it is a notable ſlander of baptiſm, which darkeneth, yea aboliſheth the uſe thereof: that it is a falſe promiſe of the devil, which draweth us away from the word of God. Or if you will, it is oil defiled with the lying of the devil, which as it were by overſpreading of darkneſs deceiveth the eyes of the ſimple.

Chriſtianity imagined imperfect without confirmation and but

9. They add furthermore, that believers ought after baptiſm to receive the holy Ghoſt by laying on of hands, that they may be found full Chriſtians: becauſe he half Chriſtianity. he ſhall never be a Chriſtian, that is not chreſmed with the biſhop's confirmation. Theſe are their own ſayings word for word. But I had thought that whatſoever things pertained to Chriſtianity, were all ſet forth in writing and comprehended in ſcriptures. Now as I perceive the true form of religion is to be ſought and learned from elſewhere than out of the ſcriptures. Therefore the whole wiſdom of God, the heavenly truth, the whole doctrine of Chriſt, doth but begin Chriſtians, and oil maketh them perfect. By this ſentence are damed all the apoſtles, and ſo many martyrs, whom it is moſt certain to have never been chreſmed: foraſmuch as the oil was not yet made, which being poured upon them, they might fulfil all the parts of Chriſtianity, or rather might be made Chriſtians which yet were none. But though I hold my peace, they do largely confute themſelves. For how many of the number of their own people do they anoint after baptiſm? why therefore do they ſuffer ſuch half Chriſtians in their flock, whoſe imperfection might eaſily be helped? Why do they with ſuch careleſs negligence ſuffer them to omit that which was not lawful to be omitted without grievous offence? Why do they not more ſeverely call upon the keeping of a thing ſo neceſſary, and without which ſalvation cannot be obtained, unleſs peradventure ſome be prevented by death? Verily, when they ſo freely ſuffer to be deſpiſed, they ſecretly confeſs that it is not of ſo great value as they boaſt it.

Confirmation preferred before baptiſm in worthineſs, becauſe adminiſtred by a biſhop.

10. Laſt of all they determine that this holy anointing is to be had in greater reverence than baptiſm: becauſe this anointing is peculiarly miniſtred by the hands of the chief biſhops, but baptiſm is commonly diſtributed by every prieſt. What may a man here ſay. but that they are utterly mad, who ſo flatter their own inventions, that in compariſon of them they careleſly deſpiſe the holy ordinances of God? O mouth that robbeſt God, dareſt thou ſet a fat liquor only defiled with the ſtink of thine own breath, and enchanted with murmuring ſound of words, againſt the ſacrament of Chriſt, and to compare it with water hallowed with the word of God? But thy wickedneſs accounted this but a ſmall matter, unleſs thou didſt alſo prefer it above the ſame. Theſe are the anſwers of the holy ſee, theſe are the oracles of the apoſtolic treſtle. But ſome of them, even in their own opinion, begun ſomewhat to qualify this unbridled madneſs. It is (ſay they) to be worſhipped with greater reverence: peradventure not for the greater virtue and profit that it giveth; but becauſe it is given of the worthier men, and is made in the worthier part of the body, that is, in the forehead; or becauſe it bringeth a greater increaſe of virtues, although baptiſm avail more to forgiveneſs. But in the firſt reaſon do they not bewray themſelves to be Donatiſts, who meaſure the virtue of the ſacrament by the worthineſs of the miniſter. But I will admit that confirmation be called the worthier by reaſon of the worthineſs of the biſhop's hand. But if a man aſk of them, from whence ſo great prerogative hath been given to biſhops, what reaſon will they bring beſide their own luſt? The apoſtles alone uſed that power, who alone diſtributed the Holy Ghoſt. Are the biſhops alone apoſtles? Yea are they apoſtles at all? But let us alſo grant them that: why do they not by the ſame argument affirm, that biſhops alone ought to touch the ſacrament of the blood in the ſupper of the Lord: which they therefore deny to lay men, becauſe the Lord gave it to the apoſtles alone? If to the apoſtles alone, why do they not conclude; therefore to the biſhops alone? But in that place they make the apoſtles ſimple prieſts: but now the giddineſs of their head carrieth them another way, ſuddenly to create them biſhops. Finally, Ananias was no apoſtle, to whom yet Paul was ſent in order to receive his ſight, be baptiſed, and be filled with the Holy Ghoſt. Acts ix. 17. I will add this alſo to the heap. If by the law of God this was the proper office of biſhops, why have they been ſo bold to give it away to common prieſts? as we read in a certain epiſtle of Gregory.

Confirmation the worthier becauſe in it the fore, in baptiſm the hinder part of the head is anointed.

11. As for their other reaſon, how trifling, fond, and fooliſh is it, to call their confirmation more worthy than the baptiſm of God, becauſe in it the forehead is anointed with oil, and in baptiſm the hinder part of the head, as though haptiſm were done with the oil and not with the water? I call all the godly to witneſs, whether theſe loſels do not endeavour themſelves to this end only, to corrupt the pureneſs of the ſacraments, with their leaven. I have already ſpoken this in another place, that in the ſacraments, that which is of God, ſcarcely glimmereth through at holes, among the heap of mens inventions. If any man did not believe me therein, let him now at leaſt believe his own maſters. Lo paſſing over the water, and making no account of it, they highly eſteem the oil only in baptiſm. We therefore on the contrary ſide do ſay, that in baptiſm the forehead alſo is dipped in water. In compariſon of this we eſteem not your oil worth one piece of dung, whether it be in baptiſm or confirmation. If any allege that it is ſold for more: by this adding of price, the goodneſs (if any were in it) is corrupted: ſo much leſs may they commend a moſt filthy deceit by theft. In the third reaſon they bewray their own ungodlineſs, while they prat that in confirmation there is given a greater increaſe of virtues than in baptiſm. By the laying on of hands the apoſtles diſtributed the viſible graces of the Spirit. In what things do theſe mens fat liquor ſhew itſelf fruitful? But away with theſe qualifiers, that cover one ſacrilege with many ſacrileges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to break in ſunder, than to labour ſo much in undoing it.

Confirmation not eſtabliſhed by conſent of antiquity, and if it were, yet not proved thereby a ſacrament.

12. But now when they ſee themſelves deſtitute of the word of God and probable reaſon, they pretend as they are wont, that it is a moſt ancient obſervation and eſtabliſhed by conſent of many ages. Although that were true, yet they win nothing thereby. A ſacrament is not from the earth, but from heaven; not from men, but from God alone. They muſt prove God to be the author of their confirmation, if they will have it taken for a ſacrament. But why do they object antiquity, whereas the old writers, when they mind to ſpeak properly, do no where reckon more ſacraments than two? If a fortreſs of our faith were to be fought from men, we have an invincible tower, that the old fathers never acknowleged thoſe for ſacraments which theſe men do lyingly feign to the ſacraments. The old writers ſpeak of the laying on of hands: but do they call it a ſacrament? Auguſtine plainly affirmeth that it is no other thing than prayer. (Liber. 2. de bap. contra. Donat. c. 16.) Neither let them here bark againſt me with their ſtinking diſtinctions, that Auguſtine meant that, not of the laying on of hands uſed to confirmation, but which was uſed to healing or reconciliation, the book remaineth and is abroad in the hands of men. If I wreſt it to any other ſenſe than Auguſtine himſelf wrote it, I give them leave after their ordinary manner to oppreſs me, not only with railing, but alſo with ſpitting at me. For he ſpeaketh of them that returned from ſchiſm to the unity of the church. He denieth that they needed to be rebaptiſed: for he ſaith, that the laying on of hands ſufficeth, that by the bond of peace the Lord may give them the Holy Ghoſt. But foraſmuch as it might ſeem an abſurdity, that the laying on of hands ſhould be repeated rather than baptiſm: he ſheweth a difference. For (ſaith he) what other thing is the laying on of hands, than prayer upon a man? And that this is the meaning appeareth by another place, where he ſaith: Hand is laid upon heretics amended, for the coupling of charity, which is the greateſt gift of the Holy Ghoſt, without which whatſoever holy things are in man they avail not to ſalvation. Lib. 5. c. 23.

13. But I would to God we did keep ſtill the manner which I have ſaid to have been in the old time, before that this untimely delivered image of a ſacrament was born: not that it ſhould be a confirmation as they feign, which cannot once be named without injury to baptiſm: but a catechiſing, whereby children or they that were near to the age of diſcretion did declare an account of their faith before the church. But it ſhould be the beſt manner of catechiſing, if a form were written to that uſe, containing and familiarly ſetting out a ſum in a manner of all the articles of our religion, in which the whole church of the faithful ought without controverſy to agree: that a child being ten years old ſhould offer himſelf to the church to declare a confeſſion of his faith, ſhould be examined of every article, and anſwer to every one: if he were ignorant of any thing, or did not underſtand it, he might be taught. So ſhould he before the church witneſſing and beholding it, profeſs the only, true, and pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithful doth with one mind worſhip the one God. If this diſcipline were at this day in force, truly the ſlothfulneſs of ſome parents would be whetted, who do careleſly neglect the inſtruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to them, which then without open ſhame they could not omit: there ſhould be among Chriſtian people a greater conſent of faith, and not ſo great ignorance and rudeneſs of many: ſome ſhould not be ſo raſhly carried away with new and ſtrange doctrines: finally, all ſhould have as it were a certain orderly inſtruction of Chriſtian learning.

Of Penance.

The ancient laying on of hands by the biſhop and clergy after penance.

14. In the next place they ſet penance, of which they treat ſo confuſedly and diſorderedly, that conſciences can bear away no ſure or ſound thing of their doctrine.

nance, holy and healthful for the church.

We have already in another place declared at large what we have learned out of the ſcripture concerning repentance, and then what they alſo teach of it. Now we have this only to touch, what reaſon they had that raiſed up the opinion, which hath heretofore reigned in churches and ſchools, that it is a ſacrament. But firſt I will briefly ſay ſomewhat of the uſage of the old church, the pretence whereof they have abuſed to ſtabliſh their feigned invention. This order they kept in public penance, that they who had fully done ſatisfactions enjoined them, were reconciled with ſolemn laying on of hands. That was the ſign of abſolution, whereby both the ſinner himſelf was raiſed up before God with truſt of pardon and the church was admoniſhed gently to receive him into favour, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This Cyprian oftentimes calleth, to give peace. (Epi. li. 1. c. 2.) That this doing might be of great dignity, and have more commendation among the people, it was ordained that the biſhop's authority ſhould always be uſed for the mean herein. From hence came that decree of the ſecond council at Carthage: Be it not lawful to a prieſt at the maſs publicly to reconcile a penitent. And another decree of the council at Arauſium, Let thoſe who in time of their penance depart out of this life, be admitted to the communion without the laying on of hands uſed in the reconciling: if they recover of their ſickneſs let them ſtand in the degree of penitents, and when the time is fully expired, let them receive of the biſhop the laying on of hands uſed in reconciling. Again, the decree of the third council at Carthage. (Cap. 33.) Let not the prieſt without the authority of the biſhop, reconcile a penitent. All theſe tended to this end, that the ſeverity which they would have to be uſed in that behalf, ſhould not with too much lenity grow to decay. Therefore they willed the biſhop to be judge of it, which was likely that he would be more circumſpect in the examination thereof. Howbeit Cyprian in a certain place ſheweth, that not only the biſhop, but alſo the whole clergy laid their hands on him. For thus he ſaith, (Decret. 26. quæſt. 6.) At the full time they do penance, then they come to the communion, and by the laying on of hands of the biſhop and the clergy they receive power to partake of the communion. Afterward in proceſs of time it came to this point, that beſide public penance they uſed this ceremony alſo in private abſolutions. Hereupon came that diſtinction in Gratian between public and private reconciliation. I judge that ſame old uſage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to have been holy and healthful for the church, and I would that it were at this day reſtored. As for this latter, although I dare not diſallow it, or ſpeak more ſharply againſt it, yet I think it to be leſs neceſſary. Howſoever it be, yet we ſee that the laying on of hands in penance is a ceremony ordained of men, not of God, which is to be ſet among mean things and outward exerciſes: and thoſe verily which are not to be deſpiſed, but which ought to be in a lower degree than thoſe that are commended unto us by the word of the Lord.

Devices and ſhifts to make penance a ſacrament.

15. But the Romaniſts and ſchoolmen, (who have an ordinary cuſtom to corrupt all things with wrong expounding them) do here very carefully labour in finding out a ſacrament. Neither ought it to ſeem any wonder, for they ſeek a knot in a ruſh. But where they have it beſt, they leave a thing entangled in ſuſpence, uncertain, and confounded and troubled with diverſity of opinions. They ſay therefore that the outward penance is a ſacrament, and if it be ſo, that it ought to be taken for a ſign of the inward penance, that is, of the contrition of heart, which ſhall be the thing of the ſacrament: or that they both together are a ſacrament, not two ſacraments, but one full one. But, that the outward penance is only the ſacrament: the inward is both the thing and the ſacrament: and that forgiveneſs of ſins is called the thing and not the ſacrament. Let them who keep in remembrance the definition of a ſacrament which we have above ſet, examine thereby that which theſe men call a ſacrament, and they ſhall find that it is not an outward ceremony ordained of the Lord for the confirming of our faith. If they cavil that my definition is not a law which they need to obey: let them hear Auguſtine, whom they feign that they eſteem as moſt holy. Viſible ſacraments (ſaith he) were ordained for carnal mens ſake, that by degrees of ſacraments they may be conveyed from thoſe things that are ſeen with eyes to thoſe things that are underſtood. (Lib. 3. quæ. vet. teſtam.) What like thing do either they themſelves ſee, or can they ſhew to others in that which they call the ſacrament of penance? The ſame Auguſtine ſaith in another place: (Sermone de bap. infant.) It is therefore called a ſacrament, becauſe in it one thing is ſeen, and another thing is to be underſtood. That which is ſeen hath a bodily form, that which is underſtood hath a ſpiritual fruit. Neither doth theſe things in any wiſe agree with the ſacrament of penance ſuch as they feign it, where there is no bodily form that may repreſent a ſpiritual fruit.

Abſolution after penance though not a ſacrament, yet rather a ſament than penance it ſelf.

16. And, to kill theſe beaſts upon their own fighting place, if there be any ſacrament here to be ſought, may it be not be much more plauſably ſaid that the abſolution of the prieſt is a ſacrament, than penance either inward oroutward? for it might readily be ſaid, that it is a ceremony to aſſure our faith of the forgiveneſs of ſins, and hath a promiſe of the keys as they call it, whatſoever ye ſhall bind or looſe upon earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in heaven. But ſome man would have objected, that the moſt part of them that are abſolved of the prieſts obtain no ſuch thing by ſuch abſolution, whereas by their doctrine the ſacraments of the new law ought to work indeed that which they figure. This were but to be lauged at. For, as in the ſupper, they make a double eating, a ſacramental eating, which is equally common to good and to evil, and a ſpiritual eating which is only proper to the good: why might they not alſo feign that abſolution is received two ways? Yet conld I not hitherto underſtand what they meant with this their doctrine, which we have already taught how far it diſagreeth from the truth of God, when we purpoſely treated of that argument. Here my mind is only to ſhew, that this doubt withſtandeth not, but that they may call the abſolution of the prieſt a ſacrament. For they might anſwer by the mouth of Auguſtine that ſanctification is without the viſible ſacrament, and the viſible ſacrament without inward ſanctification. (Lib. 3. quæ. vet. Teſtament.) Again, that the ſacraments do work in the elect only that which they figure. (De bap. par. Liber 5. de bap. contr. Donat.) Again, that ſome do put on Chriſt ſo far as to the partaking of the ſacrament, otherſome to ſanctification: the one, the good and evil equally do. this other the good only. Truly they have more than childiſhly erred and be blinded in the clear ſun, who labouring with great hardneſs, yet eſpied not a thing ſo plain and open to every man.

Reaſons why penance can be no ſacrament.

17. Yet leſt they ſhould wax too proud, in what part ſoever they ſet the ſacrament. I deny that it ought rightfully to be taken for a ſacrament. Firſt, becauſe there is no ſpecial promiſe to it, which is the only ſubſtance of a ſacrament. Again, becauſe whatſoever ceremony is here ſhewed forth, it is the mere invention of men: whereas we have already proved that the ceremonies of ſacraments cannot be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lie and deceit which they have invented of the ſacrament of penance. This feigned ſacrament they have garniſhed with a meet commendation, calling it a ſecond boord after ſhipwreck, becauſe if a man have by ſinning marred the garment of innocency which he received in baptiſm, he may by penance repair it. But it is the ſaying of Jerom. (Lib. 4. Sent. diſt. 14. cap. 1. De peni. diſt. 1. cap. 2.) Whoſe ſoever it be, it cannot be excuſed but that it is utterly wicked if it be expounded after their meaning. As though baptiſm be blotted out by ſin, and is not rather to be called to remembrance of every ſinner, ſo oft as he thinketh of the forgiveneſs of ſin, that he may thereby gather up himſelf, and recover courage, and ſtrengthen his faith? that he ſhall obtain the forgiveneſs of ſins which is promiſed him in baptiſm. But that which Jerom hath ſpoken hardly and unproperly, that by penance baptiſm is repaired) from which they fall away that deſerve to be excommunicate from the church) theſe good expoſitors draw to their wickedneſs. Therefore you ſhall moſt fitly ſpeak, if you call baptiſm the ſacrament of penance, ſince it is given for a confirmation of grace, and ſeal of confidence, to them that purpoſe repentance. And leaſt you ſhould think this to be our device, beſide this that it agreeth with the words of the ſcripture, it appeareth that it was in the old church commonly ſpoken like a moſt certain principle. For in the book of faith to Peter, which is ſaid to be Auguſtine's, it is called the ſacrament of faith and penance. (Decr. 15. quæ. 1 cap. firmiſſime.) And why flee we to uncertain ſayings? As though we could require any thing more plain, than that which the evangeliſt reciteth: that John preached the baptiſm of repentance unto forgiveneſs of ſins? Mark i. 4. Luk. iii. 3.

Of extreme unction, as they call it.

The anointing of the ſick which was uſed in the time of the apoſtles, no ſuch matter as popiſh extreme unction.

18. The third feigned ſacrament is extreme unction, which is not done but of the prieſt, and that in extremes (ſo they term it) and with oyl conſecrate of the biſhop, and with this form: by this holy anointing, and by his moſt kind mercy, God pardon thee, whatſoever thou haſt offended by ſeeing, by hearing, by ſmelling, feeling, taſting. They feign that there be two virtues of it, the forgiveneſs of ſins, and eaſe of bodily ſickneſs if it be ſo expedient: if not, the ſalvation of the ſoul. They ſay that the inſtituton of it is ſet of James, whoſe words are theſe: is any ſick among you? Let him bring in the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith ſhall ſave the ſick man, and the Lord ſhall raiſe him up: and if he be in ſins, they ſhall be forgiven him. Jam. v. 14. Of the ſame ſort is this anointing, of which we have above ſhewed that the other laying on of hands is, namely a player-like hypocriſy, whereby without reaſon and without fruit they would reſemble the apoſtles. Mark rehearſeth Mark vi. 13. that the apoſtles at their firſt ſending, according to the commandment which they have received of the Lord, raiſed up dead men, caſt out devils, cleanſed leprous men, healed the ſick, and that in healing of the ſick they uſed oil. They anointed (ſaith he) many ſick men with oil, and they were healed. Hereunto James had reſpect, when he commanded the elders to be called together to anoint the ſick. man. That under ſuch ceremonies is contained no higher myſtery, they ſhall eaſily judge whomark how great liberty the Lord and his apoſtles uſed in in theſe outward things. The Lord going about to reſtore ſight to the blind man, made clay of duſt and ſpittle, ſome he healed with touchings, otherſome with his word. John ix. 6. Mat. ix. 29. Luk. xviii. 42. After the ſame manner the apoſtles healed ſome diſeaſes with the word only, ſome with touching, other ſome with anointing. Act. iii. 6. and v. 16. and xix. 12. But it is likely that this anointing was not (as all other things alſo were not) cauſeleſly put in uſe, I grant: yet not that it ſhould be a mean of healing, but only a ſign, that ths dulneſs of the unſkilful might be put in mind from whence ſo great power proceeded, to this end that they ſhould not give the praiſe thereof to the apoſtles. And that the Holy Ghoſt and his gifts are ſignified by oil it is a common and uſual thing. Pſal. xlv. 8. But that ſame grace of healing is vaniſhed away, like as alſo the other miracles, which the Lord willed to be ſhewed for a time, whereby he might make the new preaching of the goſpel marvellous for ever. Therefore though we grant never ſo much, that anointing was a ſacrament of thoſe powers which were then miniſtred by the hands of the apoſtles, it now nothing pertaineth to us to whom the miniſtration of ſuch powers is not committed.

Extreme anointing a forceleſs and unwarranted ceremony.

19. And by what greater reaſon do they make a ſacrament of this anointing, than of all other ſigns that are rehearſed to us in the ſcripture? Why do they not appoint ſome Siloam to ſwim in, whereinto at certain ordinary recourſes of time ſick men may plunge themſelves John ix. 7.? That (ſay they) ſhould be done in vain. Truly no more in vain than anointing. Why do they not lie along upon dead men, becauſe Paul raiſed up a dead child with lying upon him Act. xx. 10.? Why is not clay made of ſpittle and duſt, a ſacrament? But the other were but ſingular examples: but this is given of James for a commandment. Verily James ſpake for the ſame time, when the church yet ſtill enjoyed ſuch bleſſing of God. They affirm indeed that there is yet ſtill the ſame force in their anointing: but we find it otherwiſe by experience. Let no man now marvel, how they have with ſuch boldneſs mocked ſouls, which they know to be ſenſeleſs and blind when they are ſpoiled of the word of God, that is, of their life and light: ſince they are nothing aſhamed to go about to mock the living and feeling ſenſes of the body. Therefore they make themſelves worthy to be ſcorned, while they boaſt that they are endued with the grace of healings. The Lord verily is preſent with his in all ages, and ſo oft as need is he helpeth their ſickneſſes no leſs than in old time: but he doth not ſo utter thoſe manifeſt powers, nor diſtributeth miracles by the hands of the apoſtles: becauſe this gift both was but for a time, and alſo is partly fallen away by the unthankfulneſs of men.

Extreme anointing hath neither ordinance of God to be grounded on, nor promiſe of grace annexed.

20. Therefore as not without cauſe the apoſtles have by the ſign of oil openly teſtified, that the grace of healings committed to them was not their own power, but the power of the Holy Ghoſt: ſo on the other ſide they are wrong doers to the Holy Ghoſt, which make a ſtinking oil and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would ſay that all oil is the power of the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe it is called by that name in ſcripture: that every dove is the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe he appeared in that form. Mat. iii. 16. John. i. 22. But theſe things, let them look too. So much as for this preſent is enough for us, we do moſt certainly perceive that their anointing is no ſacrament: which is neither a ceremony ordained of God, nor hath any promiſe. For when we require theſe two things in a ſacrament, that it be a ceremony ordained of God, and that it have a promiſe of God: we do therewithal require that the ſame ceremony be given to us, and that the promiſe belong unto us. For no man doth affirm that circumciſion is now a sacrament of the christian church, although it both was an ordinance of God, and had a promise knit unto it: because it was neither commanded to us, nor the promise which was adjoined to it was given to us with the same condition. That the promise which they proudly boast of in their anointing, is not given to us, we have evidently shewed, and they themselves declare by experience. The ceremony ought not to have been used, but of them that were endued with the grace of healings, not of these butchers that have more skill of slaying and murthering than of healing.

If St. James did command anointing as a thing to continue in the church, yet not anointing at such unseasonable time, by such persons with such oil, in such persuasion, as the church of Rome, useth.

21. Howbeit although they obtain this, that that which James commandeth concerning anointing, agreeth with this age (which they are most far from) yet even so they shall not have much prevailed in proving of their unction wherewith they have hitherto anointed us. James willeth that all sick men be anointed: these men infect with their fat liquor, not sick men, but corps half dead, when the life lyeth already labouring at the top of their lips, or (as they themselves term it) in extremes. If they have in their sacrament a present medicine, whereby they may either ease the sharpness of diseases, or at least may bring some comfort to the soul, they are too cruel that do never heal in time. James willeth that the sick man be anointed of the elders of the church; Jam. v. 14. these men allow no anointer but the petty sacrificing priest. Whereas they expound in James presbyteros the elders to be priests, and foolishly say that the plural number is there set for comeliness sake: that is but trifling: as though the churches at that time abounded with swarms of sacrificing priests, that they might go in along pompous shew to carry a pageant of holy oil. When James simply biddeth that sick men be anointed, I understand by it no other anointing but of common oil: and no other is found in Mark's rehearsal. These men vouchsafe to have no other oil, but that which is hallowed of the bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, enchanted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times saluted in this manner: thrice hail, holy oil: thrice hail, holy chresm: thrice hail, holy balm. Out of whom have they sucked such conjurations? James saith: that when the sick man is anointed with oil, and prayer hath been pronounced over him, if he be in sins they shall be forgiven him: namely, that the guiltiness being taken away, they may obtain release of the pain: not meaning that sins are put away with fat liquor, but that the prayers of the faithful whereby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vain. These men do wickedly lie, that by their holy, that is to say, abominable anointing, sins are forgiven. Lo how gaily they shall prevail, when they have been at large suffered to abuse the testimony of James at their pleasure. And least we should need to labour long in proof hereof, their own chronicles do discharge us of this difficulty. For they report that Pope Innocentius who in Augustin's time governed the church of Rome, ordained that not only priests, but also all christians should use oil to anoint for their necessity and others. Author hereof is Sigebert in his chronicles.

Of ecclesiastical orders.

In their sacrament of orders seven petty sacraments contained or as some of them do think more.

22. The fourth place in their register hath the sacrament of order, but the same so fruitful, that it breedeth out of it self seven little sacraments, But this is very worthy to be laughed at, that whereas they affirm that there be seven sacraments, when they go about to rehearse them, they reckon up thirteen. Neither can they allege for themselves, that they are but one sacrament, because they tend all to one priesthood, and are as it were certain degrees unto it. For since it is evident that in every one of them are several ceremonies, and they themselves say that there be divers graces: no man can doubt but that they ought to be called seven sacraments if their opinions be received. And why strive we about it as though it were a thing doubtful, forasmuch as they themselves do plainly and severally declare seven? But first we will briefly knit up by the way, how many and how unsavoury absurdities they thrust in unto us, when they go about to commend to us their orders instead of sacraments: and then we will see whether the ceremony which churches use in ordering of ministers, ought to be called a sacrament at all. They make therefore seven ecclesiastical orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a sacrament. Those be door-keepers, readers, exorcists, acoluthes or followers, subdeacons, deacons, priest: And seven they say that they be, for the sevenfold grace of the Holy Ghost, wherewith they ought to be endued that are promoted unto them. But it is increased and more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Now the number it ſelf is hallowed with a wrongful expounding of the ſcripture, when they think that they have read in Iſaiah ſeven virtues of the Holy Ghoſt, Iſa. xi. 2. whereas both indeed Iſaiah there rehearſeth but ſix, and alſo the prophet meant not to comprehend them all in that place: for he is elſewhere as well called the ſpirit of life, of ſanctification, of adoption of the children, as he is in that place called the ſpirit of wiſdom, of underſtanding, of counſel, of ſtrength, of knowlege, and of the fear of the Lord. Ezek. i. 10. Rom. xiv. and viii. 15. Howbeit ſome more ſubtle men make not ſeven orders, but nine, after the likeneſs (as they ſay) of the church triumphing. But among them alſo there is ſtrife. becauſe ſome would have the ſhaving of the clergy to be the firſt order of all, and biſhopric the laſt: otherſome excluding ſhaving altogether, reckon archbiſhopric among the orders. ‡ Iſidor otherwiſe divideth them. For he maketh pſalmiſts and readers to be divers: he appointeth the pſalmiſts for ſongs, and the readers to the reading of the ſcriptures, wherewith the people may be inſtructed. (Iſidor. lib. 7. Diſt. 21. & diſt. 33. cap. Lect. & cap. Oſtiarius.) And this diſtinction is kept by the canons. In ſo great diverſity what will they have us to follow or flee? Shall we ſay that there be ſeven orders? So teacheth the maſter of the ſchool: but the moſt illuminate doctors do otherwiſe determine. Again they alſo diſagree among themſelves. Moreover the moſt ſacred canons call us another way. Thus forſooth do men agree, when they diſpute of godly matters without the word of God.

and

Chriſt led through the ſeven orders.

23. But this exceedeth all folly, that in every one of theſe they make Chriſt fellow with them. Firſt (ſay they) he executed the office of door-keeper, when he did with a whip made of cords, drive the buyers and ſellers out of the temple. John ii. 15. He ſignifieth himſelf to be a door-keeper, when he ſaith, I am the door. John x. 7. He took upon him the office of reader, when he read Iſaiah in the ſynogogue. Luke iv. 17. He did the office of an exorciſt, when touching the tongue and ears of the deaf and dumb man, he reſtored to him his hearing. Mark xvi. 33. He teſtified himſelf to be an acoluth or follower in theſe words. He that followeth me walketh not in darkneſs. John viii. 13. He executed the office of ſubdeacon, when being girded with a linen cloth he waſhed the diſciples feet. John xiii. 4. He did bear the perſon of a deacon, when he diſtributed his body and blood in the ſupper. Mat. xxvi. 26. He fulfilled the office of prieſt, when he offered himſelf upon the croſs a ſacrifice to his Father. Mat. xxvii. 50. Eph. v. 2. Theſe things cannot ſo be heard without laughing, that I wonder that they were written without laughing, if yet they were men that wrote them. But moſt notable is their ſubtilty wherewith they play the philoſophers about the name of acoluth, calling him a Ceroferar, a taper-bearer with a word (as I think) of ſorcery, truly ſuch a one as was never heard of in all nations and languages, whereas acoluthos in Greek ſimply ſignifieth a follower. Howbeit if I ſhould earneſtly tarry in confuting theſe men, I ſhould myſelf alſo worthily be laughed at, they are ſo trifling and real mockeries.

Men conſecrated in the church of Rome to execute certain mean duties, as if they could not lawfully be done but by hallowed men, and yet men unhallowed and unconſecrated ſuffered to do them.

24. But that they may not be able yet ſtill with falſe colours to deceive even very ſilly women, their vanity is by the way to be uttered. They create with great pomp and ſolemnity their readers, pſalmiſts, door-keepers, acoluthes, to execute thoſe offices, whereunto they appoint very children, or thoſe whom they call lay-men. For who for the moſt part lighteth the candles, who poureth wine and water into the cruet, but a child or ſome baſe fellow of the laity, that maketh his gain thereof? Do not the ſame men ſing, do they not ſhut and open the church doors? For who ever ſaw in their temples an acoluth, or door-keeper executing his office? But rather he that when he was a boy did the office of an acoluth, when he is once admitted into the order of acoluthes, ceaſeth to be that which he beginneth to be called, that they may ſeem to will of purpoſe to caſt off the office when they take upon them the title. Behold why they have need to be conſecrate by ſacraments, and to receive the Holy Ghoſt, namely, that they may do nothing. If they allege for excuſe, that this is the frowardneſs of times, that they forſake and neglect their miniſtries: let them therewithal confeſs that there is at this day in the church no uſe nor fruit of their holy orders, which they marvelouſly advance, and that their whole church is full of curſe: becauſe it ſuffereth tapers and cruets to be handled of children dren and prophane men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are conſecrated acoluthes: and becauſe it committeth the ſongs to children, who ought not to be heard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their exorciſts, to what end do they conſecrate them? I hear that the Jews had their exorciſts: Act. xix. 13. but I ſee that they were ſo called of the exorciſms or conjurations which they uſed. Of theſe counterfeit exorciſts who ever heard it ſpoken, that they ſhewed an example of their profeſſion? It is feigned that they have power given them to lay their hands upon mad men, them that are to be catechiſed, and men poſſeſſed with devils: but they cannot perſuade the devils that they have ſuch power, becauſe the devils do not only not yield to their commandments, but alſo uſe commanding authority over them. For a man can ſcarcely find every tenth of them, that is not led with an evil ſpirit. Therefore whatſoever things they bable concerning their petty orders, they are patched together of fooliſh and unſavoury lies. Of the old acoluthes, and door-keepers, and readers, we have ſpoken in another place, when we declared the order of the church. Our purpoſe here is only to fight againſt that new found invention of the ſevenfold ſacrament in eccleſiaſtical orders. Of which there is no where any thing read, but among theſe fooliſh praters the ſorboniſts and canoniſts.

Razor of the crown miniſtred in token of ſpiritual king like dignity, and ſcepter to that purpoſe abuſed.

25. Now let us conſider of the ceremonies which they uſe about it. Firſt whomſoever they receive into their order of ſoldiers, they do with one common ſign enter them into clergy. For they ſhave them in the crown, that the crown may betoken kingly dignity, becauſe clerks ought to be kings, that they may rule themſelves and others. For Peter ſpeaketh thus of them, ye are a choſen kind, a kingly prieſthood, a holy nation, a people of purchaſe. 1 Pet. ii. 9. But it was ſacrilege to take to themſelves alone that which is given to the whole church, and proudly to glory of the title which they had taken from the faithful. Peter ſpeaketh to the whole church: theſe fellows wreſt it to a few ſhaven men: as though it were ſaid to them alone: be ye holy: as though they alone were purchaſed by the blood of Chriſt: as though they alone were by Chriſt made a kingdom and prieſthood to God. Then they aſſign alſo other reaſons: the top of their head is made bare, that their mind may be declared to be free unto the Lord, which with open face may behold the glory of God. Or that they may be taught that the faults of their mouth and their eyes muſt be cut off. Or the ſhaving of their head is the putting away of temporal things, and the hairy compaſs about the crown are the remnants of goods that are retained for their ſuſtenance. All in ſigns: becauſe forſooth the vail of the temple is not yet cut in ſunder. Therefore being perſuaded that they have gaily diſcharged their duties, becauſe they have figured ſuch things by their crown, of the very things indeed they perform nothing at all. How long will they mock us with ſuch falſe colours and deceits? The clergy by ſhaving off a few hairs do ſignify that they have caſt away the abundance of temporal goods, that they behold the glory of God, that they have mortified the luſt of the ears and eyes: but there is no kind of men more ravening, more ſenſeleſly dull, more luſtful. Why do they not rather truly perform holineſs, than with falſe and lying ſigns counterfeit a ſhew of it?

In ſcripture no preſident of the popiſh razor miniſtred unto clerks at the firſt recite of their clergy.

26. Moreover when they ſay that the crown of the clergy hath the beginning and reaſon from the Nazarites: what other thing do they allege than that their myſteries are ſprung out of the Jewiſh ceremonies, or rather that they are mere Jewiſhneſs? But whereas they further ſay, that Priſcilla, Aquila, and Paul himſelf, taking a vow upon them did ſhave their heads, that they might purified: Act. xviii. 18. they bewray their groſs ignorance. For it is no where read of Priſcilla: and of Aquila alſo it is doubtful: for that ſame ſhaving may as well be referred to Paul as to Aquila. But, that we may not leave to them that which they require, that they have an example of Paul: the ſimpler muſt note, that Paul did never ſhave his head for any ſanctification, but only to ſerve the weakneſs of his brethren. I am wont to call ſuch vows the vows of charity not of godlineſs: that is to ſay, not taken in hand for any ſervice of God, but to bear with the rudeneſs of the weak: as he himſelf ſaith, that he was made a Jew to the Jews, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 10. Therefore he did this, and the ſame but once, and for a ſhort time, that he might for a time faſhion himſelf to the Jews. Theſe men when they will without any uſe counterfeit the purifying of the Nazarites, Num. vi. 18. what do they elſe but raiſe up another Jewiſhneſs, when they wrongfully covet to follow the old Jewiſhneſs? With the ſame religiouſneſs was that decretal epiſtle made, which according to the apoſtle, forbiddeth biddeth clerks that they ſhould not ſuffer their hair to grow, but ſhave it round like a bowl. (Cap. prohibemus. Diſt. 25.) As though the apoſtle, when he teacheth what is comely for all men, 1 Cor. xi. 4. were careful for the round ſhaving of the clergy. Hereby let the readers conſider, of what force and worthineſs are thoſe other myſteries that follow, into which there is ſuch an entry.

The firſt occaſion of ſhearing in the clergy in the delivery of keys unto doorkeepers, the bible unto readers, the forms of exorciſm unto exorciſts, of tapers and cruet unto acoluthes.

27. Whence the ſhearing of clerks took beginning, appeareth ſufficiently even by Auguſtine alone. (Aug de ope. monac. in fine. Item in Retract.) Whereas at that time none ſuffered their hair to grow, but nice men, and ſuch as coveted a ſmoothneſs and trimneſs not meet enough for men it ſeemed to be a point of no good example, if that were permitted to the clergy. Therefore clerks were commanded either to ſhear their head or to ſhave it, that they ſhould not bear any ſhew of woman-like triming. But this was ſo common that certain monks, that they might the more ſet out their holineſs with notable and ſeveral attire from other men, did let their hair grow long. But afterward when the faſhion turned to wearing of hair, and certain nations were added to Chriſtendom which always uſed to wear long hair, as France, Germany, and England: it is likely that clerks did every where ſhear their heads, leſt they ſhould ſeem to covet the gayneſs of hair. At the laſt in a corrupter age, when all old ordinances were either perverted or gone out of kind into ſuperſtition, becauſe they ſaw no cauſe in the ſhearing of the clergy (for they had retained nothing but a fooliſh counterfeiting) they fled to a myſtery, which now they ſuperſtitiouſly thruſt in unto us for the approving of their ſacrament. The door-keepers at their conſecration receive the keys of the church, whereby they may underſtand that the keeping of it is committed to them. The readers receive the holy bible. The exorciſts the forms of exorſms, which they ſhould uſe over mad men and them that are to be catechiſed. The acoluthes receive their tapers and cruet. Lo theſe are the ceremonies wherein (if God will) there is ſo much ſecret power, that they may be not only tokens, but all cauſes of inviſible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will have them taken among the ſacraments. But to make an end in few words, I ſay it is an abſurdity that in their ſchools and canons they make theſe leſſer orders ſacraments: whereas even by their own confeſſion that teach this, they were unknown to the primitive church, and deviſed many years after, For ſacraments, ſince they contain the promiſe of God, cannot be ordained of angels, nor of men, but of God alone, whoſe office alone it is to give promiſe.

The order of prieſthood injurious to Chriſt.

28. There remain three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, ſubdeaconry (as they call it) was removed into that number ſince that the rout of the ſmaller ones began to grow. But becauſe they ſeem to have a teſtimony for theſe out of the word of God, they do peculiarly for honour's ſake, call them holy orders. But now it is to be ſeen, how crookedly they abuſe the ordinances of God to their pretence. We will begin at the order of the prieſthood or the ſacrificer's office. For by theſe two names they ſignify one thing, and ſo they call them to whom they ſay that it pertaineth to offer upon the altar the ſacrifice of the body and blood of Chriſt, to pronounce prayers, and to bleſs the gifts of God. Therefore at their conſecration they receive the patine with the hoſts, for tokens of power given to them, to offer acceptable ſacrifices to God. And their hands are annointed: by which ſign they are taught, that they have power given them to conſecrate. But of the ceremonies we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Of the thing itſelf I ſay: it ſo hath no title of the word of God which they pretend, that they could not more wickedly corrupt the order ſet by God. Firſt, verily this ought to ſtand for a thing confeſſed (which we have affirmed in treating of the popiſh maſs) that they are all wrong-doers to Chriſt, who call themſelves ſacrificing prieſts, or offer a ſacrifice of appeaſement. He was appointed and conſecrate of the Father a prieſt with an oath, according to the order of Melchizedek, without any end, without any ſucceſſor, Pſal. cx. 2. He once offered a ſacrifice of eternal ſatisfactory cleanſing, and reconciliation: and now alſo being entered into the ſanctuary of heaven, he maketh interceſſion for us, Heb. v. 6. and vii. 3. In him we are all ſacrificing prieſts, but to praiſes and thankſgivings of thanks, finally to offer us and ours to God. It was his ſingular office alone, with his offering to appeaſe God, and to purge ſins. When theſe men take that upon them, what remaineth, but that their ſacrificing prieſthood is ungodly and full of ſacrilege? Truly they are too wicked when they dare garniſh it with the name of a ſacrament. As touching the true office of prieſthood, which is commended to us by the mouth of Chriſt, I willingly account it in that degree. For therein is a ceremony, firſt taken out of the ſcriptures, then ſuch a one as Paul teſtifieth not to be vain or ſuperfluous, but a faithful ſign of ſpiritual grace. (1 Tim. iv. 14) But whereas I have not ſet it for a third in the number of ſacraments I did it becauſe it is not ordinary and common among all the faithful, but a ſpecial rite for one certain office But ſince this honour is given to the Chriſtian miniſtery, there is cauſe therefore why the popiſh ſacrificers ſhould be proud. For Chriſt commanded diſtributers of his goſpel and myſteries to be ordained, not ſacrificers to be conſecrated. (Matth. xxviii. 19.) He gave them commandment to preach the goſpel and to feed the flock, not to offer ſacrifices (Mark xvi. 15.) He promiſed them the grace of the Holy Ghoſt, not to make ſatisfactory purging of ſins, but rightly to execute and to maintain the government of the church, John xxi. 15.

Blowing and giving the Holy Ghoſt in ordaining of prieſts.

29. The ceremonies agree very well with the thing itſelf. Our Lord when he ſent forth the apoſtles to preach the goſpel, did blow upon them. By which ſign he repreſented the power of the Holy Ghoſt which he gave unto them, John xx. 22. This blowing theſe good men have retained, and as though they did put forth the Holy Ghoſt out at their throat, they wiſper over their ſilly prieſts that they make, receive the Holy Ghoſt. So leave they nothing which they do overthwartly counterfeit: I will not ſay like players (who uſe their geſturings neither without art nor without ſignification) but like apes, which counterfeit every thing wantonly and without any choiſe. We keep (ſay they) the example of the Lord. But the Lord did many things which he willed not to be examples to us. The Lord ſaid to the diſciples, Receive the Holy Ghoſt, John xx. 22. He ſaid alſo to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth, John xi. 42. He ſaid to the man ſick of the palſy, Riſe, and walk, Mat. ix. 5. John v. 8. Why do not they ſay the ſame to all dead men and ſick of the palſy? He ſhewed a proof of his divine power, when in blowing upon the apoſtles he filled them with the the grace of the Holy Ghoſt. If they go about to do the ſame thing, they enviouſly counterfeit God, and do in a manner challenge him to ſtrive with them: but they are far from the effect, and do nothing with this fooliſh geſturing but mock Chriſt. Verily they are ſo ſhameleſs, that they dare affirm that they give the Holy Ghoſt. But how true that is, experience teacheth, which crieth out that ſo many as are conſecrated prieſts are of horſes made aſſes of fools made mad men. Neither yet do I ſtrive with them for that: only I condemn the ceremony itſelf, which ought not to have been drawn to be an example, foraſmuch as it was uſed of Chriſt for a ſingular ſign of one miracle: ſo far is it off, that the excuſe of following his example ought to defend them.

Unction of prieſts to the imitation of ſons of Aaron.

30. But of whom received they the anointing? They anſwer that they received it of the ſons of Aaron, from whom their order alſo took beginning, (Lib. 4. Sent. diſt. 24. cap. 8. & in can. diſt. 21. cap. 1.) Therefore they had rather always to defend themſelves with wrongful examples, than to confeſs that themſelves had deviſed that which they uſe without cauſe. But in the mean time they conſider not, that while they profeſs themſelves the ſucceſſors of the ſons of Aaron, they are wrong doers of the prieſthood of Chriſt, which alone was ſhadowed and figured by all the old ſacrificing prieſthoods. In him therefore they all contained and fulfiled, in him they ceaſed, as we have ſometimes already repeated, and the epiſtle to the Hebrews without help of any gloſſes teſtifieth. But if they be ſo much delighted with the ceremonies of Moſes, why do they not haſtily take oxen, calves, and lambs to make ſacrifices? They have indeed a good part of the old tabernacle and of the whole Jewiſh manner of worſhiping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they do not ſacrifice calves and oxen. who cannot ſee, that this obſervation of anointing is much more hurtful than circumciſion, eſpecially when there is adjoined ſuperſtition and phariſaical opinion of the worthineſs of the work? For the Jews did ſet in circumciſion, truſt of righteouſneſs: theſe men do ſet in anointing, ſpiritual graces. Therefore while they covet to be counterfiters of the Levites, they are made apoſtates from Chriſt, and do put themſelves from the owce of paſtors.

No reaſon why the church of

31. This is (if God will) the holy oil that printeth the mark that cannot be razed out. As though

Rome' ſhould in the making of her prieſts, uſe the ceremonies of anointing more than the reſt, which were uſed in the making of Levitical prieſts: the laying on of hands idle in that action which no commandment of God doth warrant.

though oil could not be wiped away with duſt and ſalt, or if it ſtick faſter, with ſope. But this mark is ſpiritual. What hath oil to do with the ſoul? Have they forgotten that which they oft chant to us out of Auguſtine, that if the word be taken from the water, it ſhall be nothing but water, and that it hath this from the word that it is a ſacrament? What word will they ſhew in their fat liquor? Will they ſhew the commandment that was given to Moſes, concerning the anointing of the ſons ſons of Aaron? But there is alſo commandment given, of the coat, the ephod, the hat, the crown of holineſs, with which Aaron was to be garniſhed, and of the coats, girdles, and miters, wherewith the ſons of Aaron were to be clothed. There is commandment given, to kill a calf, and burn the fat of him for incenſe, to cut rams and burn them, to ſanctify their ears and garments with the blood of another ram, and innumerable other obſervations, which being paſſed over, I marvel why the only anointing of oil pleaſeth them. But if they love to be ſprinkled, why are they rather ſprinkled with oil than with blood? Forſooth they go about a witty thing, to make one religion of Chriſtianity, Jewiſhneſs, and Paganiſm, as it were of patches ſewed together. Therefore their anointing ſtinketh which is without the ſalt, that is, the word of God. There remaineth laying on of hands, which as I grant in true and lawful orderings to be a ſacrament, ſo I deny that it hath any part in this play, where they neither obey the commandment of Chriſt, nor have reſpect to the end whereunto the promiſe ought to lead us. If they will not have the ſign denied them, they muſt apply it to the thing itſelf, whereunto it is appointed.

The order of deaconry.

32. About the order alſo of deaconry I would not ſtrive with them, if that ſame miniſtry which was in the apoſtle's time and in the purer church, were reſtored to the uncorrupted ſtate thereof. But what like thing have they whom thoſe men feign to be deacons? I ſpeak not of the men (leſt they ſhould complain that the doctrine is wrongfully weighed by the faults of the men) but I affirm that for thoſe whom they deliver us by their doctrine, they unworthily fetch teſtimony from the example of them whom the apoſtolic church ordained deacons. They ſay that it pertaineth to their deacons to ſtand by the prieſts, to miniſter in all things that are done in the ſacraments, namely in baptiſm, in the chreſme, in the patine, in the chalice: to bring in the offerings and lay them upon the altar, to make ready the Lord's table, and to cover it: to carry the croſs, to pronounce and ſing the goſpel and epiſtle to the people. Is here any one word of the true miniſtery of deacons? Now let us here the inſtituting of them. Upon the deacon that is ordered, the biſhop alone layeth his hand. He layeth a prayer book and a ſtoale upon his left ſhoulder, that he may underſtand that he hath received the light yoke of the Lord, whereby he may ſubdue to the fear of God thoſe things that pertain to the left ſide. He giveth him the text of the goſpel, that he may perceive himſelf to be a publiſher of it. And what belongeth theſe things to deacons? They do even like as if a man would ſay that he ordained them apoſtles whom he appointed only to burn frankincenſe, to trim the images, to ſweep the churches, to catch mice, to drive away dogs. Who could ſuffer ſuch kind of men to be called apoſtles, and to be compared with the very apoſtles of Chriſt? Therefore let them not hereafter lyingly ſay that thoſe are deacons, whom they inſtitute only for their interlude-like plays. Yea, and by the very name itſelf they ſufficiently declare what manner of office they have. For they call them Levites, and will have their order and beginning referred to the children of Levi. Which I give them leave to do, ſo that they do not afterward garniſh them with the feathers of others.

The order of ſubdeaconry and the trifling uſe thereof.

33. Of ſubdeacons to what purpoſe is it to ſpeak? For whereas indeed they were in old time appointed for care of the poor, they aſſign to them I wot not what trifling buſineſs, as to bring the chalice with the patine, the little cruet with water, and the towel to the altar, to pour water to waſh hands, &c. Now whereas they ſpeak of receiving and bringing in of offerings, they mean thoſe which they devour as abandoned to their holy uſe. With this office very well agreeth the form of their conſecrating. That he receive of the biſhop, the patine and the chalice: of the archdeacon, the cruet with water, the manual, and ſuch other baggage. Within theſe trifles they require to have us confeſs that the Holy Ghoſt is incloſed. What godly man can abide to grant this? But, to make once an end, we may determine the ſame of them that we do of the reſt. Neither need we to repeat further theſe things that are above declared. This may be enough to teach the ſober and willing to learn (whom I have taken in hand to inſtruct) that there is no ſacrament of God but where is ſhewed a ceremony joined with a promiſe: or rather verily but where is a promiſe ſeen in a ceremony. Here is not found one ſyllable of any certain promiſe: therefore it were in vain to ſeek a ceremony to confirm the promiſe. Again of thoſe ceremonies that they uſe, it, it is not read that any one is inſtitue of God. Therefore here can be no ſacrament.

Matrimony not thereby proved a ſacrament becauſe it reſembleth our conjoining with Chriſt.

34. The laſt is matrimony, which as all men confeſs to be ordained of God, ſo no man until the time of Gregory ever ſaw that it was given for a ſacrament. And what ſober man would ever have thought it? It is a good and holy ordinance of God ſo tillage, carpentry, ſhoe-makers craft, barbers craft, are lawful ordinances of God, and yet they are no ſacraments. For there is not only this required in a ſacrament, that it be the work of God, but that it be an outward ceremony appointed of God to confirm a promiſe. That there is no ſuch thing in matrimony, very children alſo can judge. But (ſay they) it is a ſign of the holy thing, that is of the ſpiritual conjoining of Chriſt with the church. If by this word (ſign,) they underſtand a token ſet before us of God to this end to raiſe up the aſſuredneſs of our faith, they are far beſide the truth. If they ſimply take a ſign for that which is brought to expreſs a ſimilitude, I will ſhew how wittily they reaſon. Paul ſaith, as one ſtar differeth from another ſtar in brightneſs, ſo ſhall be the reſurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 42. Lo here is one ſacrament. Chriſt ſaith, The kingdom of heaven is like a grain of muſtard ſeed, Mat. xiii. 31. Lo here is the ſecond. Again, The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, chap. iii. 3. Lo here is the third. Iſaiah ſaith, Behold, the Lord ſhall feed his flock as a ſhepherd, Iſaiah xl. 11. Lo here the fourth. In another place, The Lord ſhall go forth as a giant, chap. xlii. 13. Lo here is the fifth. Finally what end or meaſure ſhall there be? There is nothing but by this mean it ſhall be a ſacrament. How many parables and ſimilitudes are in the ſcripture, ſo many ſacraments there ſhall be. Yea, and theft ſhall be a ſacrament becauſe it is written, the day of the Lord is like a thief, 1 Theſ. v. 2. Who can abide theſe ſophiſters prating ſo fooliſhly? I grant indeed that ſo oft as we ſee a vine, it is very good to call to remembrance that which Chriſt ſaith, I am a vine, ye are branches, my Father is the vine-dreſſer, John xv. 1. So oft as a ſhepherd with his flock cometh toward us, it is good alſo that this come to our mind, I am a good ſhepherd, my ſheep hear my voice, John x. 11. But if any man add ſuch ſimilitudes to the number of ſacraments, he is meet to be ſent to Antycira ‡.

St. Paul's words wreſted to prove matrimony a ſacrament.

35. But they ſtill lay forth the words of Paul, in which he giveth to matrimony the name of a ſacrament: he that loveth his wife loveth himſelf. No man ever hated his own fleſh, but nouriſheth it and cheriſheth it, even as Chriſt doth the church, Eph. v. 29: becauſe we are members of his body, of his fleſh and of his bones. For this a man ſhall leave his father and mother, and ſhall cleave to his wife, and they ſhall be two in one fleſh. This is a great ſacrament: but I ſay in Chriſt and in the church. But ſo to handle the ſcriptures, is to mingle heaven and earth together. Paul, to ſhew to married men what ſingular love they ought to bear to their wives ſetteth forth Chriſt to them for an example. For as he poured forth the bowels of his kindneſs, upon the church which he had eſpouſed to himſelf: ſo ought every man to be affectioned toward his own wife. It followeth after, he that loveth his wife loveth himſelf, as Chriſt loved the church. Now to teach how Chriſt loved the church as himſelf, yea, how he made himſelf one with his ſpouſe the church, he applieth to him thoſe things which Moſes reporteth that Adam ſpake of himſelf. For when Eve was brought into his ſight, whom he knew to have been ſhapen out of his ſide: This woman (ſaith he) is a bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh, Gen. iii. 23. Paul teſtifieth that all this was ſpiritually fulfilled in Chriſt and us, when he ſaith that we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones yea, yea, and one fleſh with him. At length he addeth a concluding ſentence, this is a great myſtery. And leſt any man ſhould be deceived with the double ſignifying of the words, he expreſſeth that he ſpeaketh not of the fleſhly conjoining of man and woman, but of the ſpiritual marriage of Chriſt and the church. And truly it is indeed a great myſtery, that Chriſt ſuffered a rib to be taken from himſelf, whereof we might be ſhapen: that is to ſay, when he was ſtrong, he willed to be weak, that we might be ſtrengthned with his ſtrength: that now we may not ourſelves live, but he may live in us, Gal. ii 20.

The church of Rome abſurd and repugnant to herſelf in making matrimony a ſacrament.

36. The name of ſacrament deceived them. But was it rightful that the whole church ſhould ſuffer the puniſhment of their ignorance? Paul ſaid myſtery: which word when the tranſlator might have left being not unuſed with Latin ears, or might have tranſlated it a ſecret: he choſe rather to put in the word ſacrament, yet in no other ſenſe than Paul had in Greek called it a myſtery. Now let them go and with crying out rail againſt the ſkill of tongues, by ignorance whereof they have ſo long moſt foully been blind in an eaſy matter, and ſuch as offereth itſelf to be perceived of every man. But why do they in this one place ſo earneſtly ſtick upon this little word ſacrament, and ſome other times do paſs it over unregarded? For alſo in the firſt epiſtle to Timothy the tranſlator hath uſed it, 1 Tim. iii. 9. and in the ſelf ſame epiſtle to the Epheſians, Epheſ. i. 9. in every place for myſtery. But let this ſlipping be pardoned them: at leſt the liars ought to have had a good remembrance. For, when they have once ſet out matrimony with title of a ſacrament, afterward to call it uncleanneſs, defilling and fleſhly filthineſs, how giddy lightneſs is this? how great an abſurdity is it to debar prieſts from a ſacrament? If they deny that they debar them from the ſacrament, but from the luſt of copulation: they eſcape not ſo away from me. For, they teach that the copulation itſelf is a part of the ſacrament, and that by it alone is figured the uniting that we have with Chriſt in conformity of nature: becauſe man and women are not made one but by carnal copulation. Howbeit ſome of them have here found two ſacraments: the one of God and the ſoul, in the betrothed man and woman: the other of Chriſt and the church, in the huſband and the wife. Howſoever it be, yet copulation is a ſacrament, from which it is unlawful that any Chriſtian ſhould be debarred: unleſs peradventure the ſacraments of Chriſtians do ſo ill agree, that they cannot ſtand together. There is alſo another abſurdity in their doctrines. They affirm that in the ſacrament is given the grace of the Holy Ghoſt: they teach that copulation is a ſacrament: and they deny that at copulation the Holy Ghoſt is at any time preſent.

The ſundry bad ordinances, practices and dealings of the court of Rome, grounded on this opinion that matrimony is a ſacrament.

37. And, becauſe they would not ſimply mock the church, how long a row of errors, lies, deceits, and wickedneſſes have they knit to one error? ſo that a man may ſay, that they did nothing but ſeek a den of abominations, when they made of matrimony a ſacrament. For when they once obtained this they drew to themſelves the hearing of cauſes of matrimony: for it was a ſpiritual matter which prophane judges might not meddle with. Then they made laws, whereby they ſtabliſhed their tyranny, but thoſe partly manifeſtly wicked againſt God, and partly moſt unjuſt toward men. As are theſe: that marriages made between young perſons without conſent of their parents, ſhould remain of force and ſtabliſhed, that the marriages be not lawful between the kinsfolks to the ſeventh degree: and if any ſuch be made, that they be divorced. And the very degrees they feign againſt the laws of all nations, and againſt the civil government of Moſes. That it be not lawful for a man that hath put away an adultereſs, to marry another. That ſpiritual kinsfolks may not be coupled in marriage. That there be no marriages celebrated, from Septuageſime to the utas of Eaſter, in three weeks before mid-ſummer, nor from Advent to Twelftide. And innumerable other ſuch things, which it were long to rehearſe. At length we muſt creep out of their mire, wherein our talk hath now tarried longer than I would. Yet I think I have ſomewhat profited that I have partly plucked the lion's ſkins from theſe aſſes.

CHAP. XX.

Of civil government.

Magiſtracy not taken away by the liberty which is promiſed in the goſpel.

NOW whereas we have above ſet two kinds of government in man, and whereas we have ſpoken enough of the one kind which conſiſteth in the ſoul or in the inward man, and hath reſpect to eternal life: this place requireth that we ſpeak ſomewhat alſo of the other, which pertaineth only to the civil and outward righteouſneſs of manners. For the courſe of this matter ſeemeth to be ſevered from the ſpiritual doctrine, which I took in hand to treat of: yet the preceding ſhall ſhew that I do rightfully join them together, yea that I am of neceſſity compelled to do it: ſpecially ſince on the other ſide, mad and barbarous men do furiouſly go about this order eſtabliſhed by God: and on the other ſide the flatterers of princes, advancing their power without meaſure, ſtick not to ſet it againſt the empire of God himſelf. Unleſs both theſe miſchiefs be oppoſed withal, the pureneſs of faith ſhall be loſt. Beſide that it is not a little for our behoof, to know how lovingly God hath in this behalf provided for mankind, that there may flouriſh in us a greater deſire of godlineſs to witneſs our thankfulneſs. Firſt, ere we enter into the thing itſelf, we muſt hold faſt that diſtinction which we have above ſet, leſt (as it commonly happeneth to many) we unwiſely mingle theſe two things together, which have altogether divers conſideration. For when they hear that liberty is promiſed by the goſpel, which acknowlegeth among them no king and no magiſtrate, but hath regard to Chriſt alone: they think that they can take no fruit of their liberty, ſo long as they ſee any power to have pre-eminency over them. Therefore they think that nothing ſhall be ſafe, unleſs the whole world be reformed into a new faſhion: where may neither be judgments, nor laws, nor magiſtrates, nor any ſuch thing which they think to withſtand their liberty. But whoſoever can put difference between the body and the ſoul, between this preſent and tranſitory life, and that life to come and eternal: he ſhall not hardly underſtand that the ſpiritual kingdom of Chriſt, and the civil government are things far aſunder. Since therefore that is a Jewiſh vanity, to ſeek and incloſe the kingdom of Chriſt, under the elements of this world: let us rather thinking as the ſcripture plainly teacheth, that it is a ſpiritual fruit, which is gathered of the benefit of Chriſt, remember to keep within the bonds thereof this whole liberty which is promiſed and offered us in him. For what is the cauſe why the ſame apoſtle who biddeth us to ſtand, and not be made ſubject to the yoke of bondage, Gal. v. 1. in another place forbiddeth bond-ſervants to be careful of their ſtate: 1 Cor. vii. 21. but becauſe ſpiritual liberty may very well agree with civil bondage? In which ſenſe alſo theſe his ſayings are to be taken: In the kingdom of God there is neither Jew, nor Greek, nor male, nor female, nor bond, nor free. Gal. iii. 28. Again, There is neither Jew, nor Greek, circumciſion, uncircumciſion, barbarian, Scythian, bond, or free: but Chriſt is all in all. Col. iii. 11. Whereby he ſignifieth, that it maketh no matter in what eſtate thou be among men, nor under the laws of what nation thou liveſt: foraſmuch as in theſe things conſiſteth not the kingdom of Chriſt.

The uſe of civil government amongſt Chriſtians.

2. Yet doth not this diſtinction tend hereunto, that we ſhould think that the whole order of policy is an unclean thing, nor pertaining at all to Chriſtian men. So indeed do the phrantic men, that are delighted with unbridled licentiouſneſs, cry out and boaſt. For ſince we are dead by Chriſt to the elements of the world, and being removed into the kingdom of God do ſit among the heavenly ones: they think that it is unworthy for us, and far beneath our excellence, to be occupied with theſe prophane and unclean ears that are buſied about affairs not pertaining to a Chriſtian man. To what purpoſe (ſay they) are laws without judgments and judgment ſeats? But what hath a Chriſtian man to do with judgments themſelves? yea if it be not lawful to kill, whereto ſerve laws and judgments among us? But as we have even now given warning, that this kind of government is ſeperate from that ſpiritual and inward kingdom of Chriſt: ſo is it alſo to be known that they nothing diſagree together. For the civil government doth now begin in us upon earth certain beginnings of the heavenly kingdom, and in this mortal and vaniſhing life, doth as it were enter upon an immortal and incorruptible bleſſedneſs: but the intent of his ſpiritual government is, ſo long as we ſhall live among men men, to cheriſh and maintain the outward worſhipping of God, to defend the ſound doctrine of godlineſs and the ſtate of the church, to frame our life to the fellowſhip of men, to faſhion our manners to civil righteouſneſs, to procure us into friendſhip one with another, to nouriſh common peace and quietneſs: all which I grant to be ſuperfluous, if the kingdom of God, ſuch as it is now among us do deſtroy this preſent life. But if the will of God be ſo, that we while we long toward the heavenly country, ſhould be wayfareing from home upon the earth: and ſince the uſe of ſuch wayfareing needeth ſuch helps: they who take them from man, do take from him his very nature of man. For whereas they allege that there is ſo great perfection in the church of God, that her own moderate government ſufficeth it for a law: they themſelves do fooliſhly imagine that perfection which can never be found in the common fellowſhip of men. For ſince of naughty men the pride is ſo great, and the wickedneſs ſo obſtinate, as cannot be reſtrained with great ſharpneſs of laws: what think we that they will do, if they ſee unpuniſhed liberty lie open to their lewdneſs, which cannot even with force be ſufficiently compelled not to do evil.

Religion by civil policy maintained.

3. But of the order of policy, there ſhall be another fitter place to treat. Now our meaning is to have this only underſtood, that to think to drive it away, is outragious barbarouſneſs, the uſe whereof is no leſs among men, than of bread, water, the ſun, and air, but the dignity much more excellent. For it tendeth not only hereunto (which is the only commodity of all thoſe things) that men may breath, eat, drink and be cheriſhed (although indeed it comprehendeth all theſe things, while it maketh that they live together) yet I ſay, it tendeth not hereunto only: but alſo that idolatry, ſacrileges againſt the name of God, blaſphemies againſt his truth, and other offences of religion may not riſe up and be ſcattered among the people, that common quiet be not troubled, that every man may keep his own ſafe and unappaired, that men may uſe their affairs together without hurt, that honeſty and modeſty be kept among them: finally that among Chriſtians may be a common ſhew of religion, and among men may be man-like civility. Neither let any man be moved, for that I do now refer the care of ſtabliſhing of religion to the policy of men, which I ſeemed before to have ſet without the judgment of men. For I do no more here, than I did before, give men leave after their own will to make laws concerning religion and the worſhipping of God, when I allow the order of policy, which endeavoureth hereunto, that the true religion which is contained in the law of God, be not openly and with public ſacrileges freely broken and defiled. But the readers being holden by the very plainneſs of order, ſhall better underſtand what is to be thought of the whole kind of civil government, if we ſeverally treat of the parts thereof. There are three parts of it: the magiſtrate who is the governor and keeper of the laws: the laws according to which he governeth: the people, who are governed by the laws, and obey the magiſtrate. Therefore let us firſt conſider of the office of the magiſtrate, whether it be a lawful vocation and allowed of God, what manner of office he hath, and how great is his power, then with what laws a Chriſtian civil ſtate is to be ordered: then laſt of all, what profit of the laws cometh to the people, what reverence is due to the magiſtrate.

The magiſtrate's office allowed of God.

4. The Lord hath not only teſtified that the office of magiſtrates is allowed and acceptable to him, but alſo ſetting out the dignity thereof with moſt honourable titles, he hath marvelouſly commended it unto us. That I may rehearſe a few of them. Whereas whoſoever be in place of magiſtrates are named gods, let no man think that in that naming is ſmall importance. For thereby is ſignified that they have commandment from God, that they are furniſhed with the authority of God, do altogether bear the perſon of God, whoſe ſtead they do after a certain manner ſupply. This is not my cavillation, but the expoſition of Chriſt. If the ſcripture (ſaith he) called them gods to whom the word of God was given: John x. 35. What is this elſe, but that God hath committed his buſineſs to them, that they ſhould ſerve in his office, and (as Moſes and Jehoſhaphat ſaid to their judges whom they appointed in every ſeveral city of Judah) that they ſhould ſit in judgment, not for man but for God? Deut. i. 16. 1 Chron. xix. 6. To the ſame purpoſe maketh this that the wiſdom of God affirmeth by the mouth of Solomon, Prov. viii. 15. that it is his work, that kings reign, and counſellors decree righteous things, that princes bear principality, and all the judges of the earth execute judgment. For this is all one in effect as if it had been ſaid, that it cometh not to paſs by the

the perverſneſs of men, that the government of all things in earth is in the hand of kings and other rulers, but by the providence and holy ordinance of God, to whom it ſo ſeemed good to order the matters of men: for as much as he is both preſent and preſident among them in making of laws and in executing uprightneſs of judgments. Which Paul alſo plainly teacheth, Rom. xii. 8. when he reckoneth governments among the gifts of God, which being diverſly diſtributed according to the diverſity of grace, ought to be employed of the ſervants of Chriſt to the edification of the church. For although he there properly ſpeaketh of a council of grave men, who in the primitive church were appointed that they ſhould have the rule of ordering the public diſcipline (which office in the epiſtle to the Corinthians he calleth government, 1 Cor. xii. 28.) yet for as much as we ſee that the end of civil power cometh to the ſame point, it is no doubt but that he commendeth unto us all kind of juſt government. But he ſpeaketh more plainly, where he purpoſely maketh a full diſcourſe of that matter. For both he ſheweth that power is the ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they that are ordained of God: and that the princes themſelves are the miniſters of God, to the well doers unto praiſe: to the evil, revengers unto wrath. Rom. xiii. 1. Hereunto may be added alſo the examples of holy men: of which ſome have poſſeſſed kingdoms, as David, Joſias, Ezekias: otherſome lordſhips, as Joſeph and Daniel: otherſome, civil governments in a free people, as Moſes, Joſhuah, and the Judges: whoſe offices the Lord hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought now to doubt that the civil power is a vocation not only holy and lawful before God, but alſo the moſt holy, and the moſt honeſt of all other in the whole life of men.

The office of the civil magiſtrate no leſs allowable in the ſight of God and needful for men under Chriſt than it was before.

5 They who covet to bring in a ſtate without rulers, take exception and ſay that although in old time there were kings and judges over the rude people, yet at this day that ſervile kind of governing agreeth not with the perfection which Chriſt hath brought with his goſpel. Wherein they bewray not only their ignorance, but alſo their deviliſh pride, while they take upon themſelves perfection, of which not ſo much as the hundredeth part is ſeen in them. But what manner of men ſoever they be, it is eaſy to confute it: becauſe where David exhorteth all kings and rulers to kiſs the Son of God, he doth not bid them, giving over their authority, to take themſelves to a private life, but to ſubmit the power that they bear to Chriſt, that he alone may have pre-eminence above all. Likewiſe Iſaiah, when he promiſeth that kings ſhall be foſter-fathers of the church, and queens ſhall be nurſes, Iſa. xlix. 23. he doth not deſpoſe them from their honour: but rather doth by an honourable title make them defenders to the godly worſhippers of God. For, that prophecy pertaineth to the coming of Chriſt. I do purpoſely paſs over many teſtimonies which do each where offer themſelves, and eſpecially in the Pſalms wherein all governors have their right maintained. But moſt clear of all is the place of Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 2. where admoniſhing Timothy that in the common aſſembly, prayers muſt be made for kings, he by and by addeth a reaſon, that we may under them lead a quiet life with all godlineſs and honeſty: in which words he committeth the ſtate of the church to their defence and ſafe-guarding.

The benefit which magiſtrates themſelves may take by conſidering that they are appointed miniſters of the righteouſneſs of God.

6. Which conſideration ought continually to buſy the magiſtrates themſelves, for as much as it may put a great ſpur to them whereby they may be pricked forward to their duty, and bring them a ſingular comfort whereby they may mitigate the hardneſs of their office, which truly are both many and great. For with how great an endeavour of uprightneſs, wiſdom, mildneſs, continency and innocency, ought they to charge themſelves, who know themſelves to be appointed miniſters of the righteouſneſs of God? By what affiance ſhall they admit unjuſtice to their judgment ſeat, which they hear to be the throne of the living God? By what boldneſs ſhall they pronounce a wrongful ſentence with that mouth, which they underſtand to be appointed an inſtrument for the truth of God? With what conſcience ſhall they ſubſcribe to wicked decrees with the hand which they know to be ordained to write the acts of God? In a ſum, if they remember that they are the vicegerents of God, they muſt watch with all care, earneſtneſs, and diligence, that they may repreſent in themſelves unto men a certain image of the providence, preſervation, goodneſs, good will, and righteouſneſs of God. And they muſt continually ſet this before before their eyes, that if all they be accurſed, that do execute in deceit the work of the vengeance of God, Jer. xlviii. 11. they are much more grievouſly accurſed, that uſe themſelves deceitfully in a rightful vocation. Therefore when Moſes and Jehoſhaphat minded to exhort their judges to their duty, they had nothing more effectual to move their minds withal, than that which we have before rehearſed, look what ye do. For ye ſit in judgment not for man but for God: namely, he which is near to you in the cauſe of judgment. Now therefore let the fear of the Lord be upon you. Look and be diligent: becauſe there is no perverſeneſs with the Lord our God. Deut. i. 16. 2 Chron. xix. 6. And in another place it is ſaid, God ſtood in the aſſembly of the gods, and ſitteth judge in the midſt of the gods, Pſal. lxxxii. 1. that they may be encouraged to their duty when they hear that they are the deputies of God, to whom they muſt one day yield account of the government of their charge. And worthily this admonition ought to be of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not only wrong doers to men whom they wickedly vex, but alſo ſlanderers to God himſelf, whoſe holy judgments they defile. Again they have alſo whereupon they may ſingularly comfort themſelves, when they conſider with themſelves that they are not buſied in prophane affairs, and ſuch as are not fit for the ſervant of God, but in a moſt holy office, namely foraſmuch as they are the deputies of God.

Revilers of magiſtrates, are railers at God: the rule of kings not taken away becauſe the Apoſtles were by Chriſt forbidden to rule as kings.

7. As for them that are not moved with ſo many teſtimonies of ſcripture from being bold to rail at this holy miniſtry, as a thing diſagreeing with Chriſtian religion and godlineſs: what do they elſe but rail at God himſelf, the diſhonour of whom cannot but be joined with the reproach of his miniſtry? And verily they do not refuſe the magiſtrates, but do caſt away God, that he ſhould not reign over them. For if the Lord ſaid this truly of the people of Iſrael: becauſe they had refuſed the government of Samuel: why ſhall it be leſs truly ſaid at this day of them that give themſelves leave to rage againſt all governments ordained of God? But ſince the Lord ſaid to the diſciples, that the kings of nations bear rule over them, but that among them it is not ſo, where he that is the firſt muſt be made the leaſt: by this ſaying it is forbidden to all Chriſtians that they ſhould not take kingdoms or government upon them. O handſome expoſitors! There roſe a ſtrife among the diſciples which of them excelled other: the Lord, to ſuppreſs this vain ambition, taught them that their miniſtry is not like unto kingdoms, in which one man hath pre-eminence above the reſt. I beſeech you, what doth this compariſon make to the diſhonour of kingly dignity? yea what doth it prove at all, but that the miniſtry of an Apoſtle is not the office of a king? Moreover although among the magiſtrates themſelves there are divers forms, yet there is no difference in this behalf but that we ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul alſo doth comprehend them altogether, Rom. xiii. 1. when he ſaith, that there is no power but of God: and that which beſt liked him of all, is commended with notable teſtimony above the other, namely the power of one: which becauſe it bringeth with it a common bondage of all (except that one man to whoſe will it maketh all things ſubject) in old time could leſs be allowed of noble and the excellent ſort of natures. But the ſcripture to meet with their unjuſt judgments, expreſsly by name affirmeth, that it is the providence of God's wiſdom that kings do reign, and peculiarly commandeth the king to be honoured. Prov. viii. 15. 1 Pet. ii. 17.

Divers kinds of civil government, and the lawfulneſs of each kind.

8. And truly it were very vain that it ſhould be diſputed of private men which ſhould be the beſt ſtate of policy in the place where they live: for whom it is not lawful to conſult of the framing of any common weal. And alſo the ſame could not be ſimply determined without raſhneſs, foraſmuch as a great part of the order of this queſtion conſiſteth in circumſtances. And if thou compare alſo the ſtates themſelves together without circumſtances, it ſhall not be eaſy to diſcern, which of them overweigheth the other in profitableneſs, they match ſo equally together. There is an eaſy way to fall from kingdom into tyranny: but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefeſt men to the faction of a few: but moſt eaſy of all from the peoples government, to ſedition. Truly if thoſe three forms of governments which the philoſophers ſet out, to be conſidered in themſelves I will not deny that either the government of the chiefeſt men, or a ſtate tempered of it and common government far excelleth all other, not of it ſelf, but becauſe it moſt ſeldom chanceth that kings ſo temper themſelves that their will never ſwerveth from that which is juſt and right: again, that they be furniſhed with ſo great ſharpneſs of judgment and wiſdom that every one of them ſeeth ſo much as is ſufficient. Therefore the fault or default of men maketh, that it is ſafer and more tolerable that many ſhould have the government, that they may mutually one help another, one teach and admoniſh another, and if any advance himſelf higher than is meet, there may be overſeers and maſters to reſtrain his wilfulneſs. This both hath always been approved by experience, and the Lord alſo hath confirmed it with his authority, when he ordained among the Iſraelites a government of the beſt men very near unto common government, at ſuch time as he minded to have them in beſt eſtate, till he brought forth an image of Chriſt in David. And as I willingly grant that no kind of government is more bleſſed than this, where liberty is framed to ſuch a moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly ſtabliſhed to continuance: ſo I count them alſo moſt bleſſed, that may enjoy this ſtate: and if they ſtoutly and conſtantly travel in preſerving and retaining it, I grant that they do nothing againſt their duty. Yea and the magiſtrates ought with moſt great diligence to bend themſelves hereunto, that they ſuffer not the liberty of the people, of which they are appointed governors, to be in any part miniſhed, much leſs to be diſſolved: if they be negligent and little careful therein, they are falſe faith-breakers in their office, and betrayers of their country. But if they would bring this kind to themſelves, to whom the Lord hath appointed another form of government, ſo that thereby they are moved to deſire a change, the very thinking thereof ſhall not only be fooliſh and ſuperfluous, but alſo hurtful. But as if thou bend not thine eyes only to one city, but look about or behold the whole world together, or at leaſt ſpread abroad thy light into farther diſtances of countries, without doubt thou ſhalt find that this is not unprofitably appointed by the providence of God, that divers countries ſhould be ruled by divers kinds of government. For the elements hang together but by an unequal temperature, ſo countries alſo are with their certain inequality very well kept in order. Howbeit all theſe things alſo are ſpoken in vain to them whom the will of the Lord ſhall ſatisfy. For if it be his pleaſure to ſet kings over kingdoms, ſenates, or officers over free cities, whomſoever he maketh rulers in the places where we are converſant, it is our duty to ſhew ourſelves yielding and obedient unto them.

The office of the magiſtrate reaching unto both the tables of the law.

9. Now the office of magiſtrates is in this place to be declared by the way, of what ſort it is deſcribed by the word of God, and in what things it conſiſteth. If the ſcripture did not teach, that it extendeth to both the tables of the law, we might learn it out of the prophane writers. For none hath treated of the duty of magiſtrates, of making of laws, and of public weal, that hath not begun at religion and the worſhipping of God. And ſo have they all confeſſed, that no policy can be happily framed, unleſs the firſt care be of godlineſs, and that thoſe laws are prepoſterous which neglecting the right of God, do provide only for men. Since therefore with all the philoſophers religion hath the firſt place, and ſince the ſame hath always been obſerved by the univerſal conſent of all nations, let Chriſtian princes and magiſtrates be aſhamed of their ſlothfulneſs, if they endeavour not themſelves to this care. And we have already ſhewed, that this duty is ſpecially enjoined them of God: as it is meet that they ſhould employ their labour to defend and maintain his honour, whoſe vicegerents they are, by whoſe benefit they govern. For this cauſe alſo chiefly are the holy kings praiſed in ſcripture, for that they reſtored the worſhip of God being corrupted or overthrown, or took care of religion, that it might flouriſh pure and ſafe under them. But contrariwiſe the holy hiſtory reckoneth ſtates without governors, among faults, ſaying, that there was no king in Iſrael, and that therefore every man did what pleaſed himſelf. Judges xxii. 25. Whereby their folly is confuted, who would have them neglecting the care of God, only to apply themſelves to be judges of law among men. As though God appointed governors in his name to decide controverſies, and omitted that which was of much weightier importance, that he himſelf ſhould be worſhipped according to the preſcribed rule of his law. But a deſire to innovate all things without puniſhment moveth troubleſome men to this point, that they wiſh all revengers of the breach of peace to be taken away. As for ſo much as pertaineth to the ſecond table, Jeremiah warneth kings, to do judgment and righteouſneſs, to deliver the forcibly oppreſſed from the hand of the falſe accuſer, not to grieve the ſtranger and widow, not to do wrong, and not to ſhed innocent blood. Jer. xxii. 1. To the ſame purpoſe maketh the exhortation which is read in the lxxxii. Pſalm, Pſalm, that they ſhould render right to the poor and needy, acquit the poor and needy, deliver the poor and needy from the hand of the oppreſſor. And Moſes giveth charge to the princes whom he had ſent in his ſtead: Let them hear the cauſe of their brethren, and judge between a man and his brother and a ſtranger, and not know faces in judgment, let them hear as well the little as the great, and be not afraid of any man: becauſe it is the judgment of God. Deut. i. 16. and xvii. 16. But I ſpeak not of theſe things; that kings ſhould not get to themſelves multitudes of horſes, nor caſt their minds to covetouſneſs, not to be liſted up above their brethren: that they may be continually buſied in ſtudying upon the law of the Lord all the days of their life: that judges ſwerve not to the one ſide, nor receive gifts: becauſe in declaring here the office of magiſtrates, my purpoſe is not ſo much to inſtruct the magiſtrates themſelves, as to teach others what magiſtrates be, and to what end they are ſet of God. We ſee therefore that they are ordained, defenders and avengers of innocency, honeſty and quietneſs, whoſe only endeavour ſhould be to provide for the common ſafety and peace of all men. Of which virtues David profeſſeth that he will be an examplar, when he ſhall be advanced to the royal ſeat: Pſal. ci. that is, that he will not conſent to any evil doings, but abhor wicked men, ſlanderers, and proud men, and get to himſelf from each where honeſt and faithful men. But ſince they cannot perform this, unleſs they defend good men from the wrongs of the evil, let them help the good with ſuccour and defence, let them alſo be armed with power, whereby they may ſeverally ſuppreſs open and wicked men, by whoſe lewdneſs the common quiet is troubled or vexed. For we throughly find this by experience which Solon ſaid, that commonweals conſiſt of reward and puniſhment, and that when thoſe are taken away, the whole diſcipline of cities faileth and is diſſolved. For the care of equity and juſtice waxeth cold in the minds of many unleſs there be due honour ready for virtue: neither can the wilfulneſs of wicked men be reſtrained but by ſeverity and chaſtiſement of pains. And theſe two parts the prophet comprehendeth, when he biddeth kings and other governors to do judgment and righteouſneſs, Jer. xxi. 12. and xxii. 3. Righteouſneſs is, to take into charge of tuition, to embrace, to defend, to revenge, to deliver the innocent. Judgment is, to withſtand the boldneſs of wicked men, to repreſs their violence, to puniſh their offences.

10. But here as it ſeemeth, doth ariſe a high and hard queſtion. If by the law of God all Chriſtians are forbidden to kill, and the prophet propheſyeth of the holy mount of God, that is, the church, that in it they ſhall not afflict nor hurt: how many magiſtrates are together both godly and blood ſhedders? But if we underſtand, that the magiſtrate in executing of puniſhments, doth nothing of himſelf, but execute the very judgments of God, we ſhall not be cumbred with this doubt. Exod. xx. 13. Deut. v. 17. The law of the Lord forbiddeth to kill: Mat. v. 21. leſt manſlaughter ſhould be unpuniſhed, the Lawmaker himſelf giveth to the miniſters the ſword in their hand, which they ſhould draw forth againſt all man-ſlayers. Iſa. xi. 9. and xlv. 25. To afflict and to hurt is not the doing of the godly: but this is not to hurt nor to afflict, but the Lord's commandment to revenge the afflictions of the godly. I would to God that this were always preſent before our minds, that nothing is here done by the raſhneſs of man, but all things by the authority of God that commandeth, which going before us, we never ſwerve out of the right way. Unleſs perhaps there be a bridle put upon the righteouſneſs of God, that it may not puniſh wicked doings. But if it be not lawful to appoint any law to it, why ſhall we cavil againſt the miniſters of it? They bear not the ſword in vain, ſaith Paul: for they are the miniſters of God to wrath, revengers to evil doers. Rom. xiii. 4. Therefore if princes and other rulers know that nothing ſhall be more acceptable to God than their obedience, let them apply this miniſtry, if they deſire to ſhew their godlineſs, righteouſneſs, and uncorruptneſs allowable to God. With this affection was Moſes led, when knowing himſelf appointed by the power of the Lord to be the deliverer of his people, he laid his hands upon the Egyptian. Exod. ii. 12. Acts vii. 28. Again, when by ſlaying of three thouſand men in one day, he took vengeance of the ſacrilege of the people. Exod. xxxii. 27. David alſo when nigh to the end of his life he gave commandment to Solomon his ſon to ſlay Joab and Shemei. 1 King. xv. Whereupon he alſo rehearſeth this among the virtues of a king, to ſlay the wicked of the land, that all workers of wickedneſs may be driven out of the city of God. To which purpoſe alſo pertaineth the praiſe that is given to Solomon. Thou haſt loved righteouſneſs and haſt hated wickedneſs. How doth that mild and gentle nature of Moſes burn out into ſo great cruelty, that being ſprinkled and embrued with the blood of his brethren, he runneth throughout the camp to new ſlaughters? How doth David, a man of ſo great gentleneſs in all his life, among his laſt breathings make that bloody teſtament, that his ſon ſhould not bring the hoar hair of Joab and Shemei in peace to the grave? but they both, when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, ſo ſanctified with cruel dealing their hands which they had defiled with ſparing. It is an abomination with kings, ſaith Solomon, to do iniquity, becauſe his throne is eſtabliſhed in righteouſneſs. Prov. xvi. 12. Again, The king who ſitteth in the throne of judgment ſpreadeth his eyes upon every evil man. Prov. xx. 8. Again, A wiſe king ſcattereth the wicked, and turneth them upon the wheel. Prov. xx. 26. Again, Take away the droſs from the ſilver, and there ſhall come forth a veſſel to the melter; take away the wicked man from the ſight of the king, and his throne ſhall be faſt ſet in righteouſneſs. Prov. xxv. 4. Again, He that juſtifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lord. Prov. xvii. 2, 5. Again, A rebellious man purchaſeth evil to himſelf, and a cruel meſſenger is ſet unto him. Prov. xvii. 11. Again, Whoſo ſaith to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him peoples and nations do curſe. Prov. xiv. 24. Now if their true righteouſneſs be, with drawn ſword to purſue guilty and wicked men: let them put up their ſword and hold their hands pure from blood, while in the mean time deſperate men do reign with murders and ſlaughters: then they ſhall make themſelves guilty of moſt great wickedneſs, ſo much leſs ſhall they get thereby the praiſe of godlineſs and righteouſneſs. Only let there be no preciſe and cruel rigorouſneſs, and that judgment ſeat which may worthily be called the rock of accuſed men. For I am not he that either favour extreme cruelty, or do think, that righteous judgment can be pronounced, but while clemency, the beſt and ſureſt counſellor of kings, as Solomon affirmeth, the preſerver of the king's throne is aſſiſtant, which a certain man in old time truly ſaid to be the principal gift of princes. Yet a magiſtrate muſt take heed to both, that he do neither with rigorouſneſs of mind, wound rather than heal, or by ſuperſtitious affection of clemency fall into a moſt cruel gentleneſs, if with ſoft and looſe tenderneſs he be diſſolute to the deſtruction of many men. For this was in old time not without cauſe commonly ſpoken under the empire of Nero, that it is indeed evil to live under a prince under whom nothing is lawful, but much worſe under whom all things are lawful.

The lawfulneſs of wars juſtly taken in hand.

11. But ſince ſometimes kings and peoples muſt of neceſſity take ſword in hand to execute ſuch public vengeance, by this reaſon we may alſo judge that the wars are lawful which are ſo taken in hand. For if there be power delivered them, whereby they may maintain quiet to their dominion, whereby they may keep down the ſeditious ſtirs of unquiet men, whereby they may help the forceably oppreſſed, whereby they may puniſh evil doings: can they at fitter ſeaſons utter it, than to ſuppreſs his rage who troubleth both privately the reſt of every man, and the common qnlet of all men, who ſeditiouſly maketh uproars, who committeth violent oppreſſions and hainous evil doings? If they ought to be preſervers and defenders of the laws, they muſt alſo overthrow the enterprizes of all them by whoſe wicked doing the diſcipline of laws is corrupted. Yea if they worthily puniſh thoſe thieves whoſe injuries have extended only to a few: ſhall they ſuffer a whole country to be without puniſhment vexed and waſted with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the baſeſt of the commonalty, that invadeth anothers country into which he hath no right, and ſpoileth it like an enemy: all are alike to be taken and puniſhed for robbers. This therefore both natural equity, and the rule of duty teacheth that princes are armed not only to reſtrain private duties with judicial puniſhments, but alſo to defend with war the dominions committed to their charge, if at any time they are enemy-like aſſailed. And ſuch wars the holy Ghoſt by many teſtimonies of ſcripture declareth to be lawful.

War not forbidden Chriſtians in the goſpel.

12. If it be objected againſt me, that in the New Teſtament is neither witneſs nor example which teacheth that war is a thing lawful for Chriſtians: firſt I anſwer, that the ſame rule of making war which was in old time remaineth alſo at this day, and that on the contrary ſide there is no cauſe that may dabar magiſtrates from defending of their ſubjects. Secondly, that an expreſs declaration of theſe matters is not to be ſought in the writings of the Apoſtles, where their purpoſe is not to frame a civil ſtate but to eſtabliſh the ſpiritual kingdom of Chriſt. Laſt of all, I ſay that in them alſo is ſhewed by the way, that Chriſt hath by his coming changed nothing in this behalf. For if Chriſtian doctrine (that I may ſpeak in Auguſtine's own words words (August. Epist. 5. ad Marcel.) condemned all wars, this should rather have been said to soldiers when they asked counsel of salvation, that they should cast away their weapons, and utterly withdraw themselves from the war. But it was said to them: strike no man, do no man wrong, let your wages suffice you. Whom he taught that their wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriors. But all magistrates ought here to take great heed, that they nothing at all follow their own desires: but rather, if they must punish let them not be born away with a headlong angriness, let them not be violently carried with hatred, let them not broil with unappeasable rigour, yea let them (as Augustine saith) pity common nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armour against the enemy, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seek occasion thereof, nor take it being offered unless they be driven to it by extreme necessity. For if we ought to perform much more than that heathen man required, which would have war to seem a seeking of peace: truly we ought first to attempt all things before we ought to try the matter by war. Finally, in both kinds let them not suffer themselves to be carried with any private affection, but be led only with common feeling. Otherwise they do very ill abuse their power, which is given them, not for their own commodity, but for others benefit and ministry. Moreover of the same rightful rule of making of war hangeth the order both of garrisons, and leagues, and other civil fortifications. Garrisons I call those that are placed in towns to defend the borders of the country: leagues, which are made with princes adjoining for this covenant that if any trouble happen in their hands they may mutually help them, and join their forces in common together to suppress the common enemies of mankind: civil fortification, whose use is in the art of war.

The lawfulness of tributes and taxes with the duty of princes in that respect.

13. This also I will last of all add, that tributes and taxes are the lawful revenues of princes, which they may chiefly employ to sustain the common charges of their office: which yet they may likewise use to their private royalty which is after a certain manner conjoined with honour of the princely state that they bear. As we see that David, Hezekias, Josias, Jehoshaphat, and other holy kings, and Joseph also and Daniel, according to the state of the person that they did bear, were without offence of godliness sumptuous of the common charge, and we read in Ezekiel that there was a very large portion of land assigned to the kings. Where although he paint out the spiritual kingdom of Christ, yet he fetcheth the examplar of his similitude from the lawful kingdom of men. But yet so that princes again on their behalfs should remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their own private coffers, as the treasuries of the whole people (for so Paul testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrong prodigally waste or spoil: or rather that it is the very blood of the people, which not to spare, is most cruel unnaturalness: and let them think, that their impositions, and subsidies, and other kinds of tributes, are nothing but the supports of public necessity, wherewith to weary the poor commonality without cause is tyrannical extortion. These things do not encourage princes to wasteful expence and riot, (as verily there is no need to add a firebrand to their lusts that are of themselves too much already kindled) but since it much behoveth that they should with pure conscience before God be bold to do all that they are bound to do, least with wicked boldness they come into the despising of God, they must be taught how much is lawful for them. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for private men, that they should not rashly and stubbornly give themselves leave to grudge at any expences of princes, although they exceed common and civil measure.

A false and foolish opinion, that a state cannot be well ordered by the common laws of nations except the civil laws of Moses be observed.

14. Next to the magistrate in civil states are laws, the most strong sinews of commonwealths or (as Cicero calleth them according to Plato) the souls, without which the magistrate cannot stand, as they again without the magistrate have no lively force. Therefore nothing could be more truly said, than that the law is a dumb magistrate, and that the magistrate is a living law. But whereas I promised to speak, with what laws a Christian civil state ought to be ordered, there is no cause why any man should look for a long discourse of the best kind of laws, which both should be infinite and pertained not to this present purpose and place: yet in a few words, as it were by the way, I will touch what laws it may use godlily before God, and be rightfully governed by them among men. Which thing I had rather to have utterly passed over with silence, if I did not understand that many do herein perilously err. For there are some that deny that a common weal is well ordered, which neglecting the civil laws of Moses, is governed by the common laws of nations. How dangerous and troublesome this sentence is, let other men consider, it shall be enough for me to have shewed that it is false and foolish. That common division is to be kept, which divideth the whole law of God published into moral, ceremonial, and judicial laws: and all the parts are to be severally considered, that we may know what of them pertaineth to us, and what not. Neither in the mean time let any man be cumbered with this doubt, that judicials and ceremonials also pertain to the moral laws. For although the old writers who have taught this division, were not ignorant that these two later parts had their use about manners, yet because they might be changed and abrogate, the morals remaining safe they did not call them moral. They called that first part peculiarly by that name, without which cannot stand the true holiness of manners, and the unchangeable rule of living rightly.

Men of all ages bound to the moral law of Moses, the ceremonial given for a time, judicial instituted of God for them not for all men to be governed by.

15. Therefore the moral law (that I may first begin thereat) since it is contained in two chief points, of which the one commandeth simply to worship God with pure faith and godliness, and the other to embrace men with unfeigned love, is the true and eternal rule of righteousness prescribed to the men of all ages and times that will be willing to frame their life to the will of God. For this is his eternal and unchangeable will, that he himself should be worshipped of us all, and that we should mutually love one another. The ceremonial law was the schooling of the Jews, wherewith it pleased the Lord to exercise the certain childhood of that people, till that time of fulness came, wherein he would to the full manifestly shew his wisdom to the earth, and deliver the truth of those things which then were shadowed with figures. The judicial law given to them for an order of civil state, gave certain rules of equity and righteousness, by which they might behave themselves harmlessly and quietly together, And as that exercise of ceremonies properly pertained indeed to the doctrine of godliness (namely which kept the church of the Jews in the worship and religion of God) yet it might be distinguished from godliness it self: so this form of judicial orders (although it tended to no other end, but how the self-same charity might best be kept which is commanded by the eternal law of God) yet had a certain thing differing from the very commandment of loving. As therefore the ceremonies might be abrogate, godliness remaining safe and undestroyed: so these judicial ordinances also being taken away, the perpetual duties and commandments of charity may continue. If this be true, verily there is liberty left to every nation to make such laws as they shall foresee to be profitable for them: which yet must be framed after the perpetual rule of charity, that they may indeed vary in form, but have the same reason. For I think that those barbarous and savage laws, as were those that gave honour to thieves, that allowed common copulations, and other both much more filthy and more against reason, are not to be taken for laws: for as much as they are not only against all righteousness, but also against natural gentleness and kindness of men.

The diversity of laws, and the necessity that they should be divers, as times and places and occasions differ.

16. This which I have said shall be plain, if in all laws we behold these two things as we ought, the making and the equity of the law, upon the reason whereof the making it self is founded and stayeth. Equity, because it is natural, can be but one of all laws: and therefore one law, according to the kind of matter, ought to be the propounded end to all laws. As for making of laws, because they have certain circumstances upon which they partly hang, if so that they tend all together to one mark of equity, tho' it be divers it maketh no matter. Now since it is certain that the law of God which we call moral is nothing else but a testimony of the natural law, and of that conscience which is engraven of God in the minds of men, the whole rule of this equity whereof we now speak is set forth therein. Therefore it alone also must be both the mark and rule and end of all laws. Whatsoever laws shall be framed after that rule, directed to that mark, and limited in that end, there is no cause why we should disallow them, howsoever they otherways differ from the Jewish law of one from another. The law of God forbiddeth to steal. What pain was appointed for thefts in the civil state of the Jews, is to be seen in Exodus xxii. 1. The most ancient laws of other nations punished theft with recompence of double: the laws that followed afterward, made difference between manifeſt theft and not manifeſt. Some proceeded to baniſhment, ſome to whipping, ſome at laſt to the puniſhment of death. Falſe witneſs was amongſt the Jews puniſhed with recompence of equal pain, in ſome places only with great ſhame, in ſome places with hanging, in other ſome with the croſs. Manſlaughter all laws univerſally do revenge with blood, yet with divers kinds of death. Againſt adulterers in ſome places were ordained ſeverer pains, in ſome places lighter. Yet we ſee how with ſuch diverſity all tend to the ſame end. For with one mouth they altogther pronounce puniſhment againſt all the offences which have been condemned by the eternal law of God, as manſlaughters, thefts, adultery, falſe witneſſings: but in the manner of puniſhment they agree not. Neither is the ſame needful, nor yet expedient. There is ſome country, which unleſs it ſhew rigour with horrible examples againſt manſlayers, ſhould immediately be deſtroyed with murders and robberies. There is ſometime that requireth the ſharpneſs of pains to be increaſed. If there ariſe any trouble in a common wealth, the evils that are wont to grow thereof muſt be amended with new ordinances. In time of war all humanity would in the noiſe of armour fall away, unleſs there were caſt into men an unwonted fear of puniſhments. In barrenneſs, in peſtilence, unleſs greater ſeverity be uſed, all things will come to ruin. Some nation is more bent to ſome certain vice, unleſs it be more ſharply ſuppreſſed. How malicious and envious ſhall it be againſt the public profit, that ſhall be offended with ſuch diverſity which is moſt fit to hold faſt the obſerving of the law of God? For, that which ſome ſay, that the law of God given by Moſes is diſhonoured, when it being abrogate, new are preferred above it, is moſt vain. For neither are other preferred above it, when they are more allowed, not in ſimple compariſon, but in reſpect of the ſtate of the times, place, and nation: neither is that abrogate which was never made for us. For the Lord gave not the law by the hand of Moſes, which ſhould be publiſhed unto all nations, and flouriſh every where: but when he had received the nation of the Jews into his faith, defence, aud protection, he willed to be a lawmaker peculiarly to them, and like a wiſe lawgiver, he had in making of his laws a certain ſingular conſideration of them.

What profit chriſtians receive by laws, judicial orders and magiſtrates.

17. Now remaineth that we conſider that which we have ſet in the laſt place, what profit of laws, judicial orders, and magiſtrates, cometh to the common fellowſhip of chriſtians. Where with alſo is coupled another queſtion, how much private men ought to yield to magiſtrates, and how far their obedience ought to proceed. Many thought the office of magiſtrates to be ſuperfluous among chriſtians, becauſe forſooth they cannot godlily crave their aid, namely ſince they are forbidden to revenge, to ſue in the law, and to have any controverſy. But whereas Paul contrariwiſe plainly teſtifieth, that he is the miniſter of God to us for good: we thereby underſtand, that he is ſo ordained of God, that we being defended by his hand and ſuccours againſt the maliciouſneſs and injuries of miſchievous men, may live a quiet and peaceable life. As he is in vain given us of the Lord for defence, unleſs it be lawful for us to uſe ſuch benefit: it ſufficiently appeareth that he may alſo without ungodlineſs be called upon and ſued unto. But here I muſt have to do with two kinds of men. For there be many men that boil with ſo great rage of quarrelling at the law, that they never have quiet with themſelves unleſs they have ſtrife with others. And their controverſies they exerciſe with deadly ſharpneſs of hatred, and with mad greedineſs to revenge and hurt, and do purſue them with unappeaſable ſtiffneſs even to the very deſtruction of their adverſary. In the mean time, that they may not be thought to do any thing but rightfully, they defend ſuch perverſeneſs with colour of law. But though it be granted thee to go to law with thy brother, yet thou mayſt not by and by hate him, nor be carried againſt him with furious deſire to hurt him, nor ſtubbornly to purſue him.

A rule according whereunto both plaintiffs and defendants may uſe the help of the magiſtrate in a queſtion of their right well and lawfully

18. Let this therefore be ſaid to ſuch men, that the uſe of laws is lawful, if a man do rightfully uſe it. And that the right uſe both for the plaintiff to ſue, and for the defendant to defend, as if the defendant being ſummoned do appear at an appointed day, and doth with ſuch exception as he can, defend his cauſe without bitterneſs, but only with this affection to defend that which is his own by law: and if the plaintiff being unworthily oppreſſed either in his perſon or his goods, do reſort to the defence of the magiſtrate, make his complaint, and require that which is equity and conſcience, but far from all greedy will to hurt or revenge, far from ſharpneſs and hatred, far from burning heat of contention, but rather ready to yield of his own and to ſuffer any thing, than to be carried with an enemy like mind againſt his adverſary. Contrariwiſe when being filled with malice of mind, corrupted with envy, kindled with wrath, breathing out revenge, or finally ſo enflamed with the heat of the contention, they give over any part of charity, the whole proceeding even of a moſt juſt cauſe cannot but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all chriſtians, that a controverſy though it be never ſo righteous, can never be rightly purſued of any man, unleſs he bear as good will and love to his adverſary, as if the matter which is in the controverſy were already concluded and ended by compoſition. Some man will here peradventure ſay, that ſuch moderation is ſo never uſed in going to law, that it ſhould be like a miracle if any ſuch were found. I grant indeed, as the manners of theſe times be, that there is ſeldom ſeen an example of a good contender in law, yet the thing itſelf being defiled with addition of no evil, ceaſeth not to be good and pure. But when we hear that the help of the magiſtrate is a holy gift of God, we muſt ſo much the more diligently take heed, that it be not defiled by our fault.

All contending at law not preciſely to be condemned.

19. As for them that preciſely condemn all contendings at law, let them underſtand that they do therewithal deſpiſe the holy ordinance of God, and a gift of that kind of gifts which may be clean to the clean: unleſs peradventure they will accuſe Paul of wicked doing, who did both put away from himſelf the ſlanders of his accuſers with declaring alſo their deceit and maliciouſneſs, and in judgment claimed for himſelf the prerogative of the city of Rome, and when need was he appealed from an unrighteous governor to the emperor's judgment ſeat. Act. xxii. 1. and xxiv. 12. and xxv. 10. Neither withſtandeth it, that all chriſtians are forbidden to deſire revenge, Mat. v. 19. which we alſo do drive far away from chriſtian judgment ſeats. For, if the contention be about a common caſe, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent ſimplicity, commit his cauſe to the judge as to a common defender, thinking nothing leſs than to render mutual recompence of evil, which is the affection of revenge: or if any matter of life and death, or any greater criminal action be commenced, we require that the accuſer be ſuch a one, as cometh into the court being taken with no boiling heat of revenge, and touched with no diſpleaſure of private injury, but only having in mind to withſtand the enterpriſes of a miſchievous man, that they may not hurt the commonweal. But if thou take away a revenging mind, there is no offence done againſt that commandment whereby revenge is forbidden to chriſtians. But they are not only forbidden to deſire revenge, but they are alſo commanded to wait for the hand of the Lord, who promiſeth, that he will be a preſent revenger for the oppreſſed and afflicted: but they do prevent all revenge of the heavenly defender, who require help at the magiſtrate's hand either for themſelves or others. Not ſo. For we muſt think that the magiſtrate's revenge is not the revenge of man, but of God, which (as Paul ſaith) he extendeth and exerciſeth by the miniſtry of man for our good. Rom. xiii. 4.

The patience which Chriſtians are enjoined to uſe is not let but that they may alſo uſe the magiſtrates againſt the injuries of unjuſt men.

20. And no more do we diſagree with the words of Chriſt, by which he forbiddeth to reſiſt evil, and commandeth to turn the right cheek to him that hath given a blow on the left, and to ſuffer him to take away thy cloak that taketh away thy coat. He willeth indeed there that the minds of his ſhould ſo much abhore deſire of recompenſing like for like, that they ſhould ſooner ſuffer double injury to be done to themſelves, than to deſire to requite it: from which patience neither do we alſo lead them away. For Chriſtians truly ought to be a kind of men made to bear reproaches and injuries, open to the malice, deceits, and mockages, of naughty men: and not that only but alſo they muſt be bearers of all thoſe evils, that is to ſay, ſo framed with all their hearts, that having received one diſpleaſure they make themſelves ready for another, promiſing to themſelves, nothing in their whole life but the bearing of a continual croſs. In the mean time alſo they muſt do good to them that do them wrong, and wiſh well to thoſe that curſe them, and (which is their only victory) ſtrive to overcome evil with good. Being ſo minded they will not ſeek eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as the Phariſees taught their diſciples to deſire revenge, but (as we are taught of Chriſt) they will ſo ſuffer their body to be mangled, and their goods to be maliciouſly taken from them, that they will forgive, and of their own accord pardon thoſe evils ſo ſoon as they are done to them. Yet this evenneſs and moderation of minds ſhall not withſtand, but that the friendſhip toward their enemies remaining ſafe they may uſe the help of the magiſtrates ſtrate to the preſerving of their goods, or for zeal of public intereſt may ſue a guilty and peſtilent man to be puniſhed, whom they know that he cannot be amended but by death. For Auguſtine truly expoundeth that all theſe commandments tend to this end, that a righteous and godly man ſhould be ready to bear patiently the malice of them whom he ſeeketh to have made good men, that rather the number of the good may increaſe, not that he ſhould with like malice add himſelf alſo to the number of the evil: then, that they more pertain to the preparation of the heart, which is inwardly, than to the work which is done openly: that in ſecret may be kept patience of mind with good will, but openly that may be done which we ſee may be profitable to them to whom we ought to bear good will.

All contendings at law not condemned by the Apoſtle.

21. But this which is wont to be objected, that contendings in law are altogether condemned of Paul, is alſo falſe: it may eaſily be perceived by his words, that there was an unmeaſurable rage of ſtriving at law in the church of the Corinthians: ſo far forth that they did make the goſpel of Chriſt and the whole religion which they profeſſed, open to the cavillations and evil ſpeakings of the wicked. This is the firſt thing that Paul blameth in them, that by their intemperance of contentions, they brought the goſpel in ſlander among the unbelievers. And then this point alſo, that in ſuch ſort they ſtrived among themſelves brethren with brethren. For they were ſo far from bearing of wrongs, that they greedily gaped one for another's goods, provoked one another, and being unprovoked did hurt. Therefore he inveigheth againſt that rage of contending, and not ſimply againſt all controverſies. But he pronounceth that it is a fault or a weakneſs, that they did not rather ſuffer loſs of their goods than to ſtrive even to contentions for the preſerving of them: namely when they were ſo eaſily moved with every damage, and for moſt ſmall cauſes did run to the court of law and to controverſies, he ſaith that this is a proof that they were of a mind too ready to anger, and not well framed to patience. Chriſtians verily ought to do this, that they had alway rather to yield of their own right than to go to law, from whence they can ſcarcely get out again but with a mind too much moved and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man ſeeth that without loſs of charity he may defend his own, the loſs whereof ſhould be a ſore hinderance unto him: if he do ſo he offendeth nothing againſt this ſaying of Paul. Finally (as we have taught in the beginning) charity ſhall give every man beſt counſel, without which whatſoever controverſies are taken in hand, and beyond which whatſoever do proceed, we hold it out of controverſy that they are unjuſt and wicked.

The reverend eſtimation which ſubjects ought to have of their magiſtrates.

22. The firſt duty of ſubjects toward their magiſtrates is, to think moſt honourably of their office, namely which they acknowlege to be a juriſdiction committed of God, and therefore to eſteem them and reverence them as the miniſters and deputies of God. For a man may find ſome, who yield themſelves very obedient to their magiſtrates, and would not that there were not ſome whom they ſhould obey, becauſe they ſo know it to be expedient for the common benefit: but of the magiſtrates themſelves they think no otherwiſe than of certain neceſſary evils. But Peter requireth ſomewhat more of us, when he commandeth that the king be honoured, 1 Pet. ii. 17. and Solomon, when he commandeth God and the king to be feared: Prov. xxiv. 21. for Peter under the word of honouring containeth a ſincere and well deeming eſtimation: and Solomon joining the king with God, ſheweth that he is full of a certain holy reverence and dignity. This is alſo a notable commendation in Paul, that we obey not only for wrath but for conſcience. Whereby he meaneth that ſubjects ought to be led not only with fear of princes and rulers to be holden in their ſubjection (as they are wont to yield to their armed enemy, who ſee that vengeance ſhall readily be taken upon them if they reſiſt) but becauſe the obediences that are ſhewed to them are ſhewed to God himſelf, for as much as their power is of God. I ſpeak not of the men, as if the viſor of dignity did cover fooliſhneſs, or ſluggiſhneſs, or cruelties, or wicked manners, and full of miſchievous doing: but I ſay that the decree it ſelf is worthy of honour and reverence: that whoſoever are rulers may be eſteemed with us, and have reverence, in reſpect of their being rulers.

The obedience which we owe unto magiſtrates in our outward actions.

23. Of this then alſo followeth another thing: that with minds bent to the honouring of them, they declare their obedience in proof to them: whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to pay tribute, or to take in hand public offices and charges that serve for common defence, or to do any other of their commandments. Let every soul (saith Paul) be subject to the higher powers. For he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. The same Paul writeth to Titus: warn them that they be subject to rulers and powers, that they obey the magistrates, that they be ready to every good work. And Peter saith, be ye subject to every human creature (or, rather as I translate it, ordinance) for the Lord's sake, either to the king as supreme or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment indeed of evil doers, but to the praise of well-doers. Moreover that they should testify that they do not feign subjection, but are sincerely and heartily subject, Paul addeth that they should commend to God the safety and prosperity of them under whom they live. I exhort (saith he) that there be made prayers, beseechings, intercessions, thanksgivings for all men, for kings and all that are set in superiority, that we may live a peaceable and quiet life with all godliness and honesty. Neither let any men here deceive himself. For since the magistrate cannot be resisted, but that God himself must also be resisted: although it may be thought that an unarmed magistrate may freely be despised, yet God is armed who will strongly take vengeance on the despising of himself. Moreover under this obedience I contain moderation, which private men ought to bind themselves to keep in cases touching the public state, that they do not of their own head intermedle in public business, or rashly break into the office of the magistrate, and enterprize nothing publicly. If any thing shall in a public ordinance be behoveful to be amended, let not themselves raise uproars, nor put their hands to the doing of it, which they all ought to have fast bound in this behalf: but let them commit it to the judgment of the magistrate, whose hand alone is herein at liberty. I mean, that they presume to do nothing uncommanded. For when the commandment of the ruler is adjoined, then are they also furnished with public authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellors of a king, his ears and eyes: so not unfitly a man may call them the hands of that prince, whom by his commandment he setteth in authority for the doing of things.

The evil dealings of magistrates the cause why men think they may withdraw both reverence and obedience from them.

24. Now for as much as we have hitherto described a magistrate such as is indeed thee same that he is called, namely, the father of the country, and (as the poet calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousness, the revenger of innocency: he is worthily to be judged a mad man, that alloweth not such a government. But whereas this is in a manner the experience of all ages, that of princes some being careless of all things, to the foreseeing whereof they ought to have been heedfully bent, do without all care slothfully wallow in delights: othersome addicted to their gain, do set out to sale all laws, privileges, judgments, and grants: othersome spoil the poor commonalty of money which they may after waste upon mad prodigal expendings: othersome exercise mere robberies, in pillaging of houses, defiling of virgins and matrons, murdering of innocents: many cannot be persuaded that such should be acknowleged for princes, whose authority they ought to obey so far as they may. For in so great hainous unworthiness among actions so much contrary to the duty not only of a magistrate, but also of a man, they behold no form of the image of God, which ought to shine in a magistrate: when they see no token of that minister of God, who was given for praise to the good, and for vengeance to the evil: so neither do they also acknowlege such a governor, whose dignity and authority the scripture commendeth unto us. And truly this feeling of affection hath always been naturally planted in the minds of men, no less to hate and abhore tyrants, than to love and honour lawful kings.

Subjection due from us even to those magistrates who towards us neglect their duty and abuse their authority.

25. But if we look to the word of God, it will lead us further, that we be subject not only to the government of those princes who execute their office toward us well and with such faithfulness as they ought, but also of all them, who by what mean soever it be, have the dominion in possession although they perform nothing less than that which pertaineth to the duty of princes. For though the Lord testifieth that the magistracy is a special great gift of his liberality for preserving of the safety of men, and appointeth to magistrates themselves their bounds: yet he doth therewithal declare, that of what sort soever they be, they have not their authority but from him: that those indeed who rule for benefit o the commonweal, are true examplars and patterns of his bountifulneſs: that they that rule unjuſtly and wilfully, are raiſed up by him to puniſh the wickedneſs of the people: that all equally have that majeſty wherewith he hath furniſhed a lawful power. I will proceed no further, till I have added ſome certain teſtimonies of that point. Yet we need not much to labour to prove that a wicked king is the wrath of God upon the earth, for as much as I think that no man will ſay the contrary, and otherwiſe there ſhould be no more ſaid of a king than of a common robber that violently taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murderer that ſeeketh to kill thee, whereas the ſcripture reckoneth all ſuch calamities among the curſes of God. But let us rather tarry upon proving that which doth not ſo eaſily ſettle in the minds of men: that in a moſt naughty man, and moſt unworthy of all honour if ſo that he have the public power in poſſeſſion, remaineth that noble and divine power which the Lord hath by his word given to the miniſters of his righteouſneſs and judgment, and therefore that he ought of his ſubjects to be had in as great reverence and eſtimation, ſo much as pertaineth to public obedience, as they would have the beſt king if he were given them.

The providence of God in diſpoſing kingdoms and uſing the ſervice of wicked kings.

26. Firſt, I would have the readers to perceive and diligently to mark that providence and ſingular doings of God, which is in the ſcripture not without cauſe ſo oft rehearſed unto us, in diſtributing of kingdoms and making kings whom it pleaſeth him. In Daniel, it is ſaid: the Lord changeth times and courſes of times, he caſteth away and maketh kings. Again: that the living may know that the higheſt is mighty in the kingdom of men, and he ſhall give it to whom he will. With which manner of ſentences whereas the whole ſcripture aboundeth, yet that ſame prophecy of Daniel eſpecially ſwarmeth full. Now what manner of king was Nebuchadnezzar, he that conquered Jeruſalem, it is ſufficiently known, namely a ſtrong invader and deſtroyer of others. Yet in Ezekiel the Lord affirmeth that he gave him the land of Egypt for the ſervice that he had done to him in waſting of it. And Daniel ſaid to him. Thou king art king of kings, to whom the king of heavens hath given a mighty and ſtrong, and glorious kingdom: to thee, I ſay, he hath given it, and all the lands where dwell the children of men, and the beaſts of the wood and fowls of the air: he hath delivered them into thy hand, and hath made thee to bear rule over them. Again he ſaid to his ſon Belſhazzer: the higheſt God hath given to Nebuchadnezzar thy father kingdom and royalty, honour and glory: and by reaſon of the royalty that he gave him, all peoples, tribes, and languages were trembling and fearful at his ſight. When we hear that a king is ordained of God, let us therefore call to remembrance thoſe heavenly warnings concerning the honour and fearing of a king: then we ſhall not doubt to account, a moſt wicked tyrant in the ſame place wherein the Lord hath vouchſafed to ſet him: Samuel when he gave warning to the people of Iſrael, what manner of things they ſhould ſuffer at the hands of their kings, ſaid: this ſhall be the right of the king that ſhall reign over you; he ſhall take your ſons and put them to his chariot, to make them his horſemen, and to plow his land, and reap his crop, and to make inſtruments of war. He ſhall take your daughters, that they may be his dreſſers of ointments, his cooks and bakers. Your lands, your vineyards, and your beſt olive plants, he ſhall take away and give to his bond-ſervants. He ſhall take tythes of your ſeeds and vineyards, and ſhall give them to his eunuchs and bond-ſervants. He ſhall take away your bond-men, your bond-women and your aſſes, and ſet them to his work. Yea and he ſhall take tythes of your flocks, and ye ſhall be his bond-ſervants. Verily kings ſhould not have done this of right, whom the law did very well inſtruct to all continence: but it was called a right over the people which it behoved them of neceſſity to obey, and they might not reſiſt it: as if Samuel had ſaid. The wilfulneſs of kings ſhall run to ſuch licentiouſneſs, which it ſhall not be your part to reſiſt, to whom this only thing ſhall be left, to obey their commandments and hearken to their word.

The Jews commanded of God to yield honour unto a proud and cruel king.

27. But chiefly there is in Jeremiah a notable paſſage and worthy to be remembred, which although it be ſomewhat long, yet I will be content to rehearſe, becauſe it moſt plainly determineth this whole queſtion. I have made the earth and men, ſaith the Lord, and the living creatures that are one over the face of the earth in my great ſtrength and ſtretched out arm, and I will deliver it to him whom it pleaſeth in mine eyes. And now therefore I have given all theſe lands into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar my ſervant, and all nations and great kings ſhall ſerve him, till the time ſhall come of that land. And it ſhall be as a nation and a kingdom that hath not ſerved the king of Babel. I will viſit that nation in ſword, famine, and peſtilence. Wherefore ſerve ye the king of Babel and live. Jer. xxvii. 5. We ſee with how great obedience the Lord willed that cruel and proud tyrant to be honoured, for no other reaſon but becauſe he poſſeſſed the kingdom. And the ſame was by the heavenly decree, that he was ſet in the throne of the kingdom, and taken up into kingly majeſty, which it was unlawful to violate. If we have this continually before our minds and eyes, that even the worſt of kings are ordained by the ſame decree by which the authority of kings is eſtabliſhed, theſe ſeditious thoughts ſhall never come into our mind, that a king is to be handled according to his deſervings, and that it is not meet that we ſhould ſhew ourſelves ſubjects to him that doth not on his behalf ſhew himſelf a king unto us.

The reaſons why the people of Iſrael were commanded to honour evil kings, do as effectually bind us to the like duty.

28. In vain ſhall any man object that this was a peculiar commandment to the Iſraelites For it is to be noted with what reaſon the Lord confirmeth it. I have given (ſaith he) the kingdom to Nebuchadnezzar: wherefore ſerve ye him and live. To whomſoever therefore it ſhall be certain that the kingdom is given, let us not doubt that he is to be obeyed. And ſo ſoon as the Lord advanceth any man to the royal eſtate, he therein declareth his will to us that he will have him reign. For thereof are general teſtimonies of the ſcripture. Solomon in Prov. xxviii. 2. Many princes are becauſe of the wickedneſs of the people. Again Job xii. 18. He taketh away ſubjection from kings, and girdeth them again with the girdle. But this being confeſſed, there remaineth nothing but that we muſt ſerve and live. There is alſo in Jeremiah the prophet another commandment of the Lord, wherein he commanded his people to ſeek the peace of Babylon, whether they had been led away captive, and to pray to him for it, becauſe in the peace of it ſhould be their peace. Jer. xxix. 7. Behold the Iſraelites being ſpoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houſes, led away into exile, and caſt into miſerable bondage, are commanded to pray for the ſafety of the conqueror: not as in other places we are commanded to pray for our perſecutors: but that the kingdom may be preſerved to himſelf and quiet, that they themſelves may alſo live proſperouſly under him. So David being already appointed king by the ordinance of God, and anointed with his holy oil, when he was without any his deſerving unworthily perſecuted of Saul, yet the head of him that laid wait for his life, he eſteemed holy which the Lord hath hallowed with the honour of kingdom. Far be it from me (ſaith he) that I ſhould before the Lord do this thing to my lord the anointed of the Lord, that I ſhould lay my hand upon him: becauſe he is the anointed of the Lord. 1 Sam. xxiv. 7. Again, my ſoul hath ſpared thee, and I have ſaid, I will not lay my hand upon my lord, becauſe he is the anointed of the Lord. Again, who ſhall lay his hand upon the anointed of the Lord and ſhall be innocent? So ſure as the Lord liveth, unleſs the Lord ſtrike him, or his day be come that he die, or he go down into battle: far be it from me that I ſhould lay my hand upon the anointed of the Lord. 1 Sam. xxvi. 9.

If princes break their duties, we may not therefore tranſgreſs ours.

29. Finally we owe this affection of reverence yea and devotion to all our rulers, of what ſort ſoever they be, which I do therefore the oftener repeat, that we may learn not to ſearch what the men themſelves are, but take this for ſufficient, that by the will of the Lord they bear that perſonage in which the Lord himſelf hath imprinted and engraved an inviolable majeſty. But (thou wilt ſay) rulers owe mutual duties to their ſubjects. That I have already confeſſed. But if thou thereupon concludeſt, that obediences are to be rendered to none but to juſt governors, thou art a fooliſh reaſoner. For, huſbands alſo are bound to their wives, and parents to their children with mutual duties, Eph. vi. 1. Eph. v. 26. 1 Pet. iii. 7. Let parents and huſbands depart from their duty: let parents ſhew themſelves ſo harſh and ſurly to their children, whom they are forbidden to provoke to anger, that with their peeviſhneſs they do unmeaſurably weary them: let the huſbands moſt deſpitefully uſe their wives, whom they are commanded to love, and to ſpare them as weak veſſels: ſhall yet therefore either children be leſs obedient to their parents, or wives to their huſbands? but they are ſubject both to evil parents and huſbands and ſuch as do not their duty. Yea, whereas all ought rather to endeavour themſelves not to look behind them to the bag hanging at their back, that is, not to enquire one of anothers duties, but every man ſet before him him that which is his own duty: this ought chiefly to have place among those that are under the power of other. Wherefore if we be unmercifully tormented of a cruel prince, if we be ravenously spoiled of a covetous or riotous prince, if we be neglected of a slothful prince, finally if we be vexed for ungodlinesses sake of a wicked and ungodly prince: let us first call to mind the remembrance of our sins, which undoubtedly are chastised with such scourges of the Lord. Thereby humility shall bridle our impatience. Let us then also call to mind this thought, that it pertaineth not to us to remedy such evils: but this only is left for us, that we crave the help of the Lord in whose hands are the hearts of kings, and the bowings of kingdoms. He is the God that shall stand in the assembly of gods, and shall in the midst judge the gods, Psal. lxxxii. 1. from whose face all kings shall fall, and be broken, and all the judges of the earth that shall have not kissed his anointed, Psal. ii. 10. that have written unjust laws to oppress the poor in judgment, and do violence to the cause of the humble, to make widows a prey, and rob the fatherless. Isa. x. 1.

The provident care of God to deliver his people from their rulers tyranny.

30. And here both his marvellous goodness, and power, and providence sheweth itself: for sometime of his servants he raiseth up open revengers, and furnisheth them with his commandment, to take vengeance of their unjust government, and to deliver his people many ways oppressed out of miserable distress: sometimes he directeth to the same end the rage of men that intend and go about another thing. So he delivered the people of Israel out of the tyranny of Pharaoh by Moses: Exod. iii. 7. and out of the violence of Chusam king of Syria, by Othoniel: and out of other thraldoms, by other kings or judges. Judg. iii. 9, &c. So he tamed the pride of Tyrus, by the Egyptians: the insolence of the Egyptians, by the Assyrians: the fierceness of the Assyrians by the Chaldees: the boldness of Babylon, by the Medians, and by the Persians when Cyrus had subdued the Medians. And the unthankfulness of the kings of Judah and Israel, and their wicked obstinacy toward his so many benefits, he did beat down and bring to distress sometimes by the Assyrians, sometimes by the Babylonians, although not all after one manner. For the first sort of men when they were by the lawful calling of God sent to do such acts: in taking armour against kings, they did not violate that majesty which is planted in kings by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heaven they subdued the lesser power with the greater: like as it is lawful for kings to punish their lords under them. But these latter sort, although they were directed by the hand of God whether it pleased him, and they unwittingly did work, yet purposed in their mind nothing but mischief.

The revenge of unbridled government belongeth not to private men.

31. But howsoever the very doings of men are judged, yet the Lord did as well execute his work by them, when he did break the bloody sceptres of proud kings, and overthrew their intollerable governments. Let princes hear and be afraid. But we in the mean time must take great heed, that we do not despise or offend that authority of magistrates full of reverend majesty, which God hath stablished with most weighty decrees, although it remain with most unworthy men, and which do with their wickedness, so much as in them is, defile it. For though the correcting of unbridled government be the revengement of the Lord, let us not by and by think that it is committed to us, to whom there is given no other commandment but to obey and suffer. I speak always of private men. For if there be at this time any magistrates for the behalf of the people, (such as in old time were the Ephori, that were set against the kings of Lacedemonia, or the tribunes of the people, against the Roman consuls: or the Demarchi, against the senate of Athens: and the same were also which peradventure, as things are now, the three estates have in every realm, when they hold their principal assemblies) I do not so forbid them according to their office to withstand the outraging licentiousness of kings: that I affirm that if they wink at kings wilfully raging over and treading down the poor commonalty, their dissembling is not without wicked breach of faith, because they deceitfully betray the liberty of the people, whereof they know themselves to be appointed protectors by the ordinance of God.

The duty which we owe unto kings must not lead us from our obedience to the King of kings.

32. But in that obedience which we have determined to be due to the authorities of governors, that is alway to be excepted, yea, chiefly to be observed, that it do not lead us away from obeying of him, to whose will the desires of all kings ought to be ſubject, to whoſe decrees all their commandments ought to yield, to whoſe majeſty their ſcepters ought to be ſubmitted. And truly how diſorderly were it, for the ſatisfying of men to run into his diſpleaſure for whom men themſelves are obeyed? The Lord therefore is the King of kings, who when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to be heard alone for altogether and above all: next to him we are ſubject to thoſe men that are ſet over us: but no otherwiſe than in him. If they command any thing againſt him, let it have no place, and let no account be made of it: neither let us herein any thing ſtay upon all that dignity wherewith the magiſtrates excel, to which there is no wrong done, when it is brought into order of ſubjection in compariſon of that ſingular and truly ſovereign power of God. After this reaſon Daniel denieth that he had any thing offended againſt the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: becauſe the king had paſſed his bounds, and had not only been an evil doer to men, but in lifting up his horns againſt God he had taken away power from himſelf. Dan. vi. 22. On the other ſide the Iſraelites are condemned becauſe they were too much obedient to the wicked commandment of the king. For when Jeroboam had made golden calves, they forſaking the temple of God, did for his pleaſure turn to new ſuperſtitions. 1 King xii. 30. With like lightneſs their poſterity inclined themſelves to the ordinances of their kings. With this the prophet ſharply reproacheth them, that they embraced the commandments of the king: ſo far is it off, that the pretence of humility may deſerve praiſe wherewith the flatterers of the court do cover themſelves and deceive the ſimple, while they ſay that it is not lawful for them to refuſe any thing that is commanded them of their prince: as though God had reſigned his right to mortal men, giving them the rule of mankind: or as though the earthly power were diminiſhed when it is made ſubject to the author of it, before whom even the heavenly powers do humbly tremble for fear. I know how great and how preſent peril hangeth over this conſtancy, becauſe kings do moſt unpleaſantly ſuffer themſelves to be deſpiſed, whoſe diſpleaſure (ſaith Solomon) is the meſſenger of death. But ſince this decree is proclaimed by the heavenly herald Peter: that we ought to obey God rather than men, Acts v. 29. let us comfort ourſelves with this thought, that we then perform that obedience which the Lord requireth, when we ſuffer any thing rather whatſoever it be, than ſwerve from godlineſs. And that our courage ſhould not faint, Paul putteth alſo another ſpur to us: 1 Cor. vii. 13. That we were therefore redeemed of Chriſt with ſo great a price as our redemption coſt him, that we ſhould not yield ourſelves in thraldom to obey the perverſe deſires of men, but much leſs ſhould be bound to ungodlineſs.

Of the matters treated of in this book, diſpoſed in form of common places, wherein is briefly rehearſed the ſum of the doctrine concerning every point taught in the book before at large, collected by the author.

The firſt number ſignifieth the book, the ſecond the chapter, the third the ſection.

Acoluthes.

AColuthes in the old church. Book 4. chap. 4. ſection 1. 9. and chap. 19. ſect. 22, 23.

Adam's fall.

The fall of Adam proceeded not of intemperance, of gluttony, but of infidelity: for he deſpiſing the word and truth of God, turned out of the way to the lies of Satan: which infidelity opened the gate to ambition and ride, whereunto was adjoined unthankſulneſs: and ambition was the mother of diſobedience. 2. 1. 4.

By the fall of Adam ſince other creatures have been after a ſort deformed, it is no more wonder, that all mankind was corrupted, that is to ſay, ſwerved out of kind from his firſt original, and made ſubject to curſe. This the old doctors called original ſin, but yet did not ſo plainly ſet forth this point of doctrine as was convenient. In the mean time it is proved by reaſons and teſtimonies of ſcripture, that Pelagius foully erred when he ſaid that by imitation only, not by propagation, ſin paſſed from the firſt man into all his poſterity. 2. 1. 5, 6.

And though the peſtilence of ſin do principally abide in the ſoul, yet it doth not therefore pertain to the diſcuſſing of this doctrine, to diſpute whether the ſoul of the child cometh of the engend'ring ſubſtance of the father: foraſmuch as the cauſe of the infection is not in the ſubſtance of the fleſh or of the ſoul, but becauſe it was ordained of God, that thoſe gifts which he at the firſt had given to man, man ſhould have and loſe them for him and his. Finally it maketh not againſt this doctrine, that the children of the faithful are ſanctified. 2. 1. 7.

That by the fall of Adam the natural gifts in man were corrupted and the ſupernatural were taken away, is a ſaying that many have uſed, but few have underſtood. 2. 2. 4, 16. which ſaying is expounded. 2. 2. 12. that is to ſay, that the ſupernatural gifts, faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, deſirous endeavour of holineſs and righteouſneſs were taken away, but are reſtored by Chriſt: and that the natural gifts, namely the underſtanding mind, and the heart are corrupted, becauſe the ſoundneſs of underſtanding and the uprightneſs of heart were both taken away: alſo that reaſon in man was not utterly blotted out, but partly weakened and partly corrupted: and ſo will, becauſe it cannot be ſevered from the nature of man, was not utterly deſtroyed, but made ſubject to corrupt deſires. 2. 2. 12.

It is proved by the teſtimonies of Auguſtine and of the ſcripture, that God not only foreſaw or ſuffered, but alſo by his will diſpoſed the fall of the firſt man, and in him the whole of his poſterity. 3. 23. 7, 8.

Angels.

Angels are creatures of God although Moſes do not expreſs them in the hiſtory of the creation. 1. 14. 3.

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, foraſmuch as the ſcripture (which we ought to follow for our rule) declareth nothing thereof. 1. 14. 4.

Why the heavenly ſpirits are called angels, armies, virtues, principalities, powers, dominions, thrones, gods. 1. 14. 5.

Concerning angels the ſcripture teacheth ſo much as is available for our comfort and for the confirming of our faith, namely that they are diſtributers and miniſters of God's bountifulneſs toward us, and the ſame by divers ways. 1. 14. 6, 9.

Not only one angel hath ſeparate care of every one of us, but they all with one conſent do watch for our ſafety: and therefore it is ſuperfluous to enquire, whether every man have his ſeveral angel aſſigned to be his keeper. 1. 14. 7.

of the number and degrees of angels, it is curiouſneſs to enquire, and raſhneſs to determine: and why whereas they are ſpirits, the ſcripture painteth them with wings under cherubim and ſeraphim. 1. 14. 8.

Againſt the Sadducees and ſuch other fantaſtical men, it is proved by ſundry teſtimonies of the ſcripture, that angels are not qualities or inſpirations without ſubſtance, but very ſpirits indeed. 1. 14. 9.

That ſuperſtition is herein to be avoided, and that we give not to angels thoſe things that belong only to God and Chriſt. 1. 14. 10.

For avoiding of this peril, we muſt conſider that whereas God uſeth their ſervice, he doth it not of need, as though he could not be without them, but for the comfort of our weakneſs. 1. 14. 11. And therefore whatſoever is ſaid of the miniſtry of angels, ought to be referred to this end, that overcoming all diſtruſt, our truſt in God ſhould be thereby the more ſtrongly eſtabliſhed, and not that they ſhould lead us away from God. 1. 14. 12.

That the angels alſo were created after the likeneſs of God. 1. 15. 3.

Of the aſcending of Chriſt into heaven.

Although Chriſt in his riſing again began more fully to ſhew forth his glory and power: yet in his aſcending into heaven he firſt truly began his kingdom, becauſe he then poured out greater abundance of his ſpirit, more royally advanced his reign, and ſhewed greater power both in helping them that are his, and in overthrowing his enemies. And yet that he is ſo abſent according to the preſence of his fleſh, that he is always every where according to the preſence of his majeſty, and with the faithful according to his unſpeakable and inviſible grace. 2. 16. 14.

Baptiſm.

THe definition of baptiſm. The firſt end thereof is to ſerve our faith before God, the other end, to ſerve our confeſſion before men. It bringeth to our faith three things, firſt that it is a ſign of our cleanſing, aſſuring us that all our ſins are done away. 4. 15. 1. which is proved by teſtimonies of the ſcripture, and that it is not the water that cleanſeth us, by the blood of Chriſt. ſect. 2.

The efficacy of baptiſm is not reſtricted to the time paſt: but we are by it waſhed and cleanſed once for all our life: and yet that we may not hereof take a liberty to ſin from thence forward. 4. 15. 3.

The power of the keys (as they call it) that is to ſay, the miniſtery of the church, by which the forgiveneſs of ſins is daily preached unto us, is not to be ſevered from baptiſm. 4. 15. 4.

The ſecond fruit of faith by baptiſm, is that it ſheweth to us our mortifying in Chriſt, and a new life in him. 4. 15. 5.

The third fruit is, that it teſtifieth that we are ſo united to Chriſt, that we are partakers of all his good things. For which cauſe Chriſt is called the proper object of baptiſm, and the apoſtles baptiſed into the name of Chriſt, in whom we do ſo obtain the matter both of our cleanſing and of our regeneration, as we obtain the cauſe thereof in the Father, and the effect in the Holy Ghoſt. 4. 15. 6.

It is proved that the baptiſm was all one which was miniſtred of John and of the apoſtles, although ſome of the old doctors thought otherwiſe. 4. 15. 7. and that it maketh not to the contrary, that more abundant graces of the Spirit are poured out, ſince the reſurrection of Chriſt. But yet there is in baptiſm a difference to be made of the perſon of Chriſt from John, and from the apoſtles and other miniſters. 4. 15. 8.

Both our mortifying and our cleanſing were as by a ſhaddow ſignified among the people of Iſrael, by the paſſage through the ſea, and the comfortable calling of the cloud. 4. 15. 9.

It is falſe which ſome have taught, that by baptiſm we are reſtored to the ſame righteouſneſs and pureneſs of nature which Adam had at the beginning. And there is ſhewed that in the children of God do remain yet ſome remains of ſin, although the ſame reign not in them: which doth whet their endeavours, and doth not give them occaſion to flatter themſelves. 4. 15. 10, 11. the ſame is proved by Paul. ſect. 12.

How baptiſm ſerveth our confeſſion before men. 4. 15. 13.

What is the order to uſe baptiſm, both for confirmation of our faith, and for a confeſſion before men. Where it is ſhewed that the graces of God are not incloſed in the the ſacrament, ſo as they are given to us by the virtue thereof. 4. 15. 14, 15.

Baptiſm is nothing increaſed by the worthineſs of him that doth miniſter it, nor diminiſhed by his unworthineſs againſt the Donatiſts, and our Catabaptiſts who require a rebaptiſing, becauſe we have been baptiſed in the kingdom of the pope. 4. 15. 16. their arguments are confuted. ſect. 17, 18.

Baptiſm is a continual ſacrament of repentance for all our life, ſo that we need no other ſacrament of penance. 4. 19. 17.

Of the conjuring of the water, the wax candle, the chreſme the blowing, the ſpittle and many ſuch other trifles added to the ſimple ceremony of Chriſt: and the order of purely miniſtring it in the church is ſhewed. 4. 15. 19.

It is ſhewed that to miniſter baptiſm pertaineth to the miniſters of the church and not to private men, much leſs to women: and the contrary objections are confuted. 4. 15. 20, 21, 22.

Baptiſm of infants.

The baptiſing of infants doth very well agree with Chriſt's inſtitution, and with the nature of the ſign. 4. 16. &c.

Baptiſm ſucceeded in the place of circumciſion, wherein they agree, and wherein they differ. 4. 16. 3, 4.

Infants are not to be debarred from baptiſm, ſince the Lord doth make them partakers of the thing ſignified in baptiſm. 4. 16. 5. and that the Lord doth regenerate infants. ſect. 17, 18, 19.

Since it is certain that the ſame covenant, which it pleaſed God to make with Abraham is ſealed in infants with the outward ſacrament, therefore ought baptiſm alſo to have place among them. 4. 16. 6.

Baptiſing of infants is well proved by this that Chriſt embraced children and laid his hands upon them. 4. 16. 17.

A confutation of certain arguments of the enemies of infants baptiſm. 4. 16. 8, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29.

There cometh great fruit by the baptiſing of infants, both to the faithful parents and to the children. 4. 16. 9. Which fruit Satan laboureth by the Anabaptiſts to take from us. 4. 16. 32.

A confutation of the adverſaries arguments ſaying, that there are other things ſignified in baptiſm than there are in circumciſion: that our covenant differeth from the old covenant that others are called children at this day than were at that time. 4 16. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

A confutaition of their other feigned differences between circumciſion and baptiſm. ſect. 16. Alſo of this objection, that baptiſm is a ſacrament of repentance and of faith: neither of which can be in tender infancy. 4. 16. 20, 21.

In them of ripe age, faith and underſtanding ought to go before baptiſm: but in infants the baptiſm of the faithful goeth before underſtanding. 4, 16. 24.

A confutation of their error, who condemn to eternal death all that are not baptiſed. 4. 16. 26.

This, that Chriſt was not baptiſed till his age of 30. years, was for a good cauſe, and maketh nothing for the enemies of infants baptiſm. 4. 16. 29.

Bearing of the croſs.

It behoveth that we deny our ſelves, that we may bear the croſs, becauſe it is God's will to exerciſe all his under the croſs, beginning at Chriſt his firſt begotten Son. Which fellowſhip with Chriſt doth already give us great ground of patience and comfort. 3. 8. 1.

It is for many cauſes neceſſary for us to lead our life under a continual croſs: firſt to beat down our arrogancy and truſt of our own ſtrength. And this remedy even the moſt holy do need, as is proved by the example of David. 3. 8. 2. Hereby our truſt in God is confirmed, and our hope increaſed. ſect. 3.

Secondly, that our patience may be tried, and we may be framed to obedience. 3. 8. 4. Which is moſt needful for us, ſince the wantonneſs of our fleſh is ſo great to make us ſhake off the yoke of God when he doth once handle us gently. ſect. 5.

Sometimes alſo to puniſh our offences committed: wherein they acknowlege that he doth the office of a good father toward us, but contrarywiſe the unfaithful are oftentimes made more obſtinate. 3. 8. 6.

A ſingular comfort when we ſuffer either ſhame or loſs, or any other calamity for righteouſneſs: which croſs moſt properly belong to the faithful. 3. 8. 7.

How neceſſary it is for the faithful, in the bitterneſs of afflictions, to be furniſhed with this thought, that God loveth them, but is angry with their faults. 3. 4. 34.

Biſhops.

The name of biſhop in the old church was given to ſome one in every ſeparate company of miniſters, for politic order and not that they ſhould bear a lordly rule over one another. 4. 4. 2.

It was the office as well of the biſhop as of other [illegible] to preach and miniſter the ſacraments. [illegible]

The old church did commonly obſerve [illegible] appointed by the apoſtles in calling of [illegible] 4. 4. 10, 11, [illegible]

Calling.

OF the effectual or inward calling, which is a ſure teſtimony of election, and dependeth upon the free mercy of God only. 3. 24. 1, 2.

Againſt them who in predeſtination do make man a worker with God. Alſo againſt them that hang election upon that which followeth election. 3. 24. 3.

The certainty of our election is to be known by the word and calling of God, and we ought not to pierce into the eternal counſel of God. 3. 24. 4.

The Father hath choſen us only in Chriſt, in him therefore let us hold the ſtedfaſt ground of our election. 3. 24. 5. and ſo, that thereof alſo we may conceive a ſure confidence of perſeverance to the end. 3.24.6,7,8,9.

Two kinds of calling univerſal, and ſpecial. 3.24.8.

It is proved by divers examples and teſtimonies of ſcripture, that the elect before their calling do differ nothing from other men, and that it is falſe which ſome men do dream, that there is a certain ſeed of election planted in their hearts even from their nativity. 3. 24. 10, 11.

It is ſhewed at large that as God doth by the effects of his calling toward the elect, make perfect the [illegible] to which he had by his eternal counſel appointed them: ſo he hath his judgments againſt the reprobate, whereby he putteth his purpoſe concerning them in execution, and maketh way for his predeſtination. 3. 24. 12, 13, 14, &c.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals firſt began and how they have ſo ſuddenly ſtarted up to ſo great honour. 4.7.30.

Ceremonies.

The old ceremonies are taken away, as touching their uſe only, but not as touching their effect, for we have the ſame effect at this day moſt evidently and effectually in Chriſt. And this doth nothing diminiſh their holineſs, as it is proved. 2. 7. 16. and being weighed by themſelves and without Chriſt, they are worthily called of Paul handwritings againſt us. 2 7. 17.

The ordinances concerning ceremonies in the pope's law, do command obſervation for the moſt part unprofitable, and ſometimes alſo fooliſh although they have a great ſhew of wiſdom; moreover they oppreſs conſciences with their infinite multitude. 4. 10. 11. 12, 13.

The popiſh ceremonies cannot be executed by this colour, that they are ordained for the inſtruction of the ignorant as the ceremonies of the law were; becauſe there appeareth in this point a manifeſt difference between us and the people before Chriſt. 4. 10. 14.

The popiſh ceremonies are believed to be ſacrifices cleanſing ſins, and deſerving eternal life; they are without doctrine, and are ſnares to catch money. 4.10.15.

Charity toward our neighbour.

It is proved againſt the Sorboniſts that charity is the love of our neighbour and not of ourſelves. 2.8 54.

Under the name of neighbour is contained every man, be he never ſo much a ſtranger to us, and our enemy, 2. 8. 55. and therefore the ſchoolmen are condemned of ignorance who of the commandments of God, not to deſire revenge, and to love our enemies, have made counſels, to the neceſſary keeping whereof monks alone do bind themſelves; and it is proved that the old doctors of the church, yea, and Gregory himſelf thought otherwiſe. 2. 8. 56, 57.

We have need of patience, that we be not weary of doing good to one another. And we ought not to have reſpect to the unworthineſs or other qualities of men which might withdraw us, but to God who ſo commandeth us. 3. 7. 6.

To the fulfilling of all the parts of charity, it is not enough if we perform all the dutiful deeds of charity, but we muſt do it with a ſincere affection of heart. Wherein the chief point is, that we take upon ourſelves the perſon of him whom we ſee to need our help. So ſhall we avoid diſdainful pride and other corruptings of charity. 3. 7. 7.

Chriſt and the apoſtles in rehearſing the ſum of the law do ſometimes leave out the firſt table: not for that it more availeth to the ſum of righteouſneſs to live innocently with men, than to honour God with godlineſs; but becauſe unfeigned charity is the proof of true godlineſs. 2. 8. 52, 53.

A confutation of the Phariſees of our time, who hold that we are juſtified by charity, becauſe Paul ſaith, that charity is greater than faith and hope. 3. 18. 8.

An expoſition of the tenth commandment, wherein (as in the former commandments) is forbidden not only all purpoſe to hurt our neighbour, but alſo all luſt or deſire againſt charity. 2. 8. 49, 58.

God doth for good cauſe and worthily require of us ſo great ferventneſs and uprightneſs of love. 2. 8. 50.

An expoſition of the ſixth commandment, wherein not only the ſlaughter or hatred of our neighbour is forbidden us, but alſo the preſerving of his life is commanded us, becauſe man is both our fleſh and the image of God. 2. 7. 39. 40.

Church.

The church the mother of the faithful. 4. 1. 1, 4, 5.

An expoſition of this article of the creed, I believe the holy church. 4. 1. 2, 3.

The holineſs of the church is not yet perfected. 4. 8. 12.

Of the inviſible church; and of the viſible church, the ſigns whereof are the pure preaching of the word and miniſtration of ſacraments. 4. 8. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Whereſoever thoſe ſigns are, we ought not to depart from that fellowſhip. 4. 8. 12.

There may ſome fault creep in, either in doctrine or in miniſtration of ſacraments, for the which yet we ought not to caſt off the communion of that church, and much leſs for the imperfection of life and corruptneſs of manners. And herein the Anabaptiſts are reproved. 4. 1. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

The church is no otherwiſe holy, but that it always hath many faults, and yet it ceaſeth not to be the church, as it is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture and the experience of all ages. 4. 1. 17, 18, 19.

See miniſtry of the church.

Churches power as touching articles of faith.

It is proved by the example of the apoſtles and prophets, and of Chriſt himſelf, that whatſoever authority the church hath, is properly not given to men, but to the word, the miniſtration whereof is committed to them; and therefore it was never lawful for the church to teach any other thing, than that which ſhe received of the Lord. 4. 8. 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, 9.

Chriſt hath ever taught his church; yet he hath uſed divers manners of teaching according to the diverſity of times, ere the law was written, in the time of the law and the prophets, and laſt of all ſince that he himſelf was openly ſhewed in the fleſh. 4. 8. 5, 6, 7.

Falſe Church.

Where lying and falſhood hath gotten the upper hand and reigneth, there is not the church. And this is proved to be in the papacy, although they there boaſt of a perpetual ſucceſſion of biſhops. 4. 2. 1, 2, 3, 4.

They are not heretics or ſchiſmatics that depart from the papacy. 4. 2. 5, 6.

How much ſoever a man make the beſt of the faults of the popiſh church, yet the ſtate thereof is no better than was in the kingdom of Iſrael under Jeroboam. 4. 2. 7, 8, 9, 10.

Yet by the goodneſs of God there remain in the papacy certain footſteps of the church; and ſo is that fulfilled which hath been written, that Antichriſt ſhould ſit in the temple of God. 4. 2. 11, 12.

A compariſon of the power which the true church hath in teaching, with the tyranny of the pope and his miniſters in forging new articles of faith. 4. 8. 10. Of the Papiſts principle, that the church cannot err. 4. 8. 13.

It is falſe to ſay that it behoved that the church ſhould add to the writings of the apoſtles. 4. 1. 14. 15, 19.

A confutation of the arguments which the papiſts uſe to reprove that there is power given to the church to make new articles of faith. 4. 8, 11, 12.

Chriſt.

The Godhead of the Son is proved. 1. 13. 7.

A difference between Chriſt's working of miracles, and the prophets or apoſtles doing of the like. 1. 13. 13.

It is proved by many and moſt ſtrong teſtimonies of ſcripture, that Chriſt took upon him a true ſubſtance of man's fleſh, and not a ghoſt or counterfeit ſhape of man, as the Marcionites feigned, nor yet a heavenly body as the Manichees lyingly affirmed. 2, 13. 1.

An expoſition of the places of ſcripture, which Maricon wrote to the confirmation of his error, and alſo of thoſe which Manicheus wreſted, and many of their diſciples do wreſt at this day. 2. 13. 2, 3. where alſo are confuted the new Marcionites, who to prove that Chriſt took his body of nothing do hold women have no ſeed; there are alſo certain other things confuted, which are objected as abſurdities. 2. 13. 4.

That all the concupiſcences of men are evil and guilty of ſin, not inſomuch as they are natural, but becauſe they are all inordinate by reaſon of the corruption of nature. And ſo did Auguſtine think, if he be diligently ly weighed. 3. 3. 12. and this is proved by many places of his writings. sect. 13.

Confession auricular.

Concerning confession, the school divines do fight against the canonists, affirming that it is not by the commandment of God. A confutation of the arguments whereupon the first sort do stand, first because the Lord in the gospel did send the leperous whom he had cleansed to the priests; and there is shewed the true meaning of the action. 3. 4. 4.

A confutation of their second argument, for that the Lord commanded his disciples to loose and unbind Lazarus when he was raised from death. 3. 4. 5.

A true exposition of two places by which they labour to uphold their confession; that is to say, that they who came to the baptism of John did confess their sins, and James willeth us to confess our sins one to another. 4 4.6.

The use of confessing to a priest was very ancient, but yet free as a politic order, not as a law set by Christ or his apostles; and afterward the same was abrogate by Nectarius bishop of the church of Constantinople because of a deacon who had under that pretence abused a woman. This tyrannous law was not laid upon churches before the time of Innocent the third, about three hundred years past, and the foolishness and barbarousness of that ordinance is declared. 3. 4. 7.

Witnesses of the said abrogation, out of Chrysostom bishop of Constantinople. 3. 4. 8.

An exposition of Innocent's law concerning the confession of all sins, where are rehearsed the divers opinions of the Romish divines concerning the number and use of keys, and the power of binding and loosing. 3.4.15.

The lewdness of all the particular articles of the law of confessing, and especially of that concerning the rehearsing of all sins. 3. 4. 16. and a plain description of the cruelty wherewith poor consciences were by diverse circumstances tormented therein. 3. 4. 17.

By a similitude is described how a great part of the world hath hitherto obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible law, and maketh men hypocrites. And then it is shewed a most certain rule of confession according to the example of the publican. 3.4. 18.

The confutation of this article, that sins are not forgiven and that the gate of paradise is shut, &c. unless be first firmly conceived a vow of confessing, and their objection is confuted that judgment cannot be pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, that absolution cannot be given till all the sins are rehearsed. 3. 4. 18.

It is no wonder that we condemn and abolish auricular confession, and our adversaries do falsly assign so great profit unto it, for so much as on the other side it armeth men to boldness of sinning. 3. 4. 19.

They do falsly pretend that they have the power of the keys, since they are not successors of the apostles, nor have the Holy Ghost, forasmuch as they do daily without consideration loose those things which the Lord hath commanded to be bound and bind what he hath commanded to be loosed. 3. 4. 20.

It is proved false that they say that the power of the keys may sometimes be used without knowlege, forasmuch as by that means the absolution should be uncertain. Where also is spoken of the absolution or condemnation which the ministers of the gospel or the church do pronounce according to the word, and of the certainty thereof. 3. 4. 22.

The absolution of the priests in the papacy is uncertain, as well on the behalf of him that assoileth as of him that confesseth; but contrarywise it is in the absolution of the gospel which dependeth only upon this condition, if the sinner seek his purging only in the sacrifice of Christ, and do yield to the grace offered unto him. 3.4.22.

The popish doctors, when they allege for themselves the power of loosing given to the apostles, do wrongfully wrest to auricular confession those sayings which Christ spake partly of preaching of the gospel, and partly of excommunication. The error of Lombard and such others in this matter; and concerning the manner of remission with enjoying of penance and satisfaction. 3.4.23.

A sum of all before spoken; and what the faithful ought to think of auricular confession. 3. 4. 24.

True confession.

What kind of confession is taught us by the word of God, namely to confess to God the knower of our hearts and of all our thoughts. 3. 4. 9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, followeth a voluntary confession before men, so oft as it is needful for the glory of God or the humbling of our selves And of this second kind there was an ordinary use in the old church, and is also in the church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a special manner to be used, whensoever it shall happen that the people are guilty in any general offence, or to be plagued with any calamity. Of the profit of such confession. 3. 4.10, 11.

Of two other sorts of private confession; of which the first is used for our own cause, when we require comfort of our brethren, because the feeling of sins doth vex and trouble us; in which case we must chiefly resort to our pastors; and this remedy is warily and moderately to be used, that no bondage be brought in. The other sort is to appease and reconcile our neighbour, if he be in any thing offended by our fault, under which kind is contained their confession who have sinned so far as to offend the whole church. 3. 4. 12, 13.

The power of the keys hath place in the three kinds of confession. Of the fruit which they that confess do receive thereby, because they know that forgiveness of sins is declared to them by the messenger of Christ. 3. 4.14.

Of confession of sins one sort is general another special. 3. 20. 9.

It is to be wiſhed, that the manner of the old church were brought in uſe again, to call children to give account of their faith. 4. 19. 13.

Conſcience.

Conſciences, when they ſeek affiance of their juſtification before God ought to forget all the righteouſneſs of the law. 3. 19. 2, 3.
The conſciences of the faithful do not follow the law as conſtrained by neceſſity of the law, but being free from the yoke of the law, do voluntarily obey the will of God. 3. 19. 4, 5. 6.

It is falſe which the papiſts affirm, that truth remaineth not in the church unleſs it be among the paſtors, and that the church itſelf is not unleſs, it remain to be ſeen in general councils. 4. 9. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

Although God ought to be known by the creation of things, yet leſt the faithful ſhould fall away to the feigned inventions of the heathen, his will was that the hiſtory of the creation ſhould remain written, and the time thereof expreſſed in ſcripture. 1. 14. 1. where their ungodly ſcoffing is confuted, who aſk why it came no ſooner in God's mind to create heaven and earth. 1. 14. 1.
For the ſame purpoſe it is rehearſed that God ended his work, not in a moment, but in ſix days: and likewiſe the order is ſet forth, namely that Adam was not created till God had firſt furniſhed the world with all plenty of good things. 1. 14. 2, 22.

Although the beholding of heaven and earth, and the conſideration of the ordering of things pertaining to men, do move us to worſhip God yet all theſe things paſſed away without profit, even from the wiſeſt philoſophers. 1. 5. 10.
Hereupon came the infinite number of gods, and, the contrarities of opinion among the ſects of philoſophers concerning God. 1. 5. 11.
The ſubſtance of God is incomprehenſible; but in his works, by engraving certain points of his glory therein he hath after a certain manner preſented himſelf to be ſeen. 1. 5. 1.
The wiſdom of God is teſtified, not only by thoſe things which philoſophers and learned men do find by ſpeculation in heaven and earth, but alſo which common men do perceive by the help of their eyes only. 1. 5. 2.
That we may with true faith conceive ſo much as behoveth us to know concerning God, it is good to learn the hiſtory of the creation of the world, in ſuch ſort as Moſes hath ſet it forth, the chief points whereof are briefly rehearſed. 1. 14. 20.
The conſideration of the works of God, that is to ſay, of the creation of all things, ought to be applied to two principal ends, firſt that we do not with unthankful neglecting or forgetfulneſs paſs over his perfections which he preſenteth apparently to be ſeen in his creatures: 1. 14. 21. Secondly, that we may learn to apply them to ourſelves whereby we may ſtir up ourſelves to the truſt, invocation, praiſe, and love of him. 2. 14. 22.

The papiſts have no true deaconry left, foraſmuch as all the diſpoſition of church goods among them is openly turned to ſacrilege and robbery. 4.5.16,18,19.

A confutation of the ſhameleſneſs of certain papiſts, who ſay that the riotous exceſs of prieſts and of all the popiſh church, is the glorioufneſs of the kingdom of Chriſt which the holy prophets ſpake of before. 4.5.17.

Death of Chriſt.

Although Chriſt hath by the whole courſe of his obedience, that is to ſay, by his whole life and all the parts thereof, redeemed us, yet the ſcripture, to ſet forth more plainly the manner of our ſalvation, doth aſcribe the ſame as peculiar and proper to the death of Chriſt. In which the voluntary yielding of Chriſt hath the firſt place which yet was ſo voluntary as he gave over his own affection not without ſtrife, Alſo his condemnation is to be conſidered: wherein two things are to be noted, namely that Chriſt was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocency was oftentimes teſtified even by the judges own mouth. 2. 1. 5.

The manner of his death is to be marked, that is to ſay, the accurſed croſs. And it is declared by many teſtimonies of Iſaiah and the apoſtles, that this behoved ſo to be, that the curſe which was due to us being caſt upon him and ſo overcome and taken away, we ſhould be delivered. And this was figuratively repreſented in the ſacrifices of Moſes law, which at the laſt was performed in Chriſt the original truth of all figures. 2. 1. 6.

Both in the death and burial of Chriſt a double benefit is ſet before us, that is to ſay, deliverance from death whereunto we were in bondage and the mortifying of our fleſh. 2. 1. 6.

Deſcending of Chriſt to hell.

The deſcending of Chriſt to hell containeth the myſtery of a great thing, and is of no ſmall importance to the effect of our redemption. 2. 16. 8, 9.

A true, godly, holy, and comfortable expoſition thereof out of the word of God, which is alſo confirmed by the teſtimony of the old doctors, that Chriſt did not only ſuffer a bodily death, but alſo did feel the rigour ſo God's vengeance, whereby he might both appeaſe his wrath and ſatisfy his juſt judgment: and therefore it behoved that he ſhould, as it were hand to hand wreſtle with the power of hell, and with the horror of everlaſting death, yet was God not at any time either his enemy, or angry with him. But he did ſuffer the grievouſneſs of God's ſeverity, in reſpect that he being ſtriken and beaten with the hand of God, did feel all the tokens of God's wrath and puniſhment. 2.16.10,11.

A confutation of certain wicked and unlearned men, who at this day do find fault with this expoſition crying out that the Son of God hath wrong done to him, and that he is charged with deſperation, which is contrary to faith. Therefore it is proved againſt them with manifeſt teſtimonies, that theſe two things do very well ſtand together, that Chriſt feared, was troubled in ſpirit, was afraid, was tempted in every point as we are, and yet that he is without ſin. 2. 16. 12.

Devils.

Thoſe things that the ſcripture teacheth concerning devils, tend commonly to this end, that we ſhould be careful to beware of their deceits, and furniſh our ſelves with thoſe weapons which may be able to beat back the moſt mighty enemies. 1. 14. 13.

That we ſhould be the more ſtirred up to do ſo, it ſheweth us that there is not one or two devils, but great armies of evil ſpirits that make war againſt us: and in what ſenſe it ſometimes ſpeaketh of the devil in the ſingular number. 1. 14. 14.

This ought to inflame us to a continual war with the the devil, for that he is every where called enemy to God and us. 1. 14. 15.

The devil is naturally wicked, a murderer, a liar, and forger of all maliciouſneſs. 1. 14. 15. But this evilneſs of nature is not by creation, but by corruption. 1. 14. 16.

It is curioſity to enquire of the cauſe, manner, time and faſhion of the fall of the evil angels, foraſmuch as the ſcripture leaveth it unſpoken. 1. 14. 16.

This the devil hath of himſelf and of his own naughtineſs, wilfully and purpoſely to ſtrive againſt God, but he can do and perform nothing unleſs God be willing and grant it. 1. 14. 17.

God ſo tempereth this government, that he giveth Satan to reign over the ſouls of the faithful, foraſmuch as in the end they ever obtain the victory, although in ſome particular doings they are wounded and beaten down: but he only giveth the wicked to him to govern, and to uſe his power upon their ſouls and bodies. 1. 14. 18.

A confutation of them who ſay that devils are nothing elſe but evil affections or perturbations: and it is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture, that they are minds or ſpirits endued with ſenſe and underſtanding. 1. 14. 19.

Of the power of binding and loosing so much as pertaineth to discipline, wherein there is spoken of excommunication. 4. 11. 2.

This power of the church is distinct from the civil power, and the one is a help to the other. Therefore the opinion of some men is false who think that it ought to have no place where are christian magistrates. 4. 11. 1, 3, 8.

There is a stayed and continual order in the church, and not enduring only for a time. 4. 11. 4.

The ends which the church hath regard unto in corrections and excommunication. 4. 12. 5.

Of exercising the discipline of the church according to the proportion of sins, forasmuch as some are private and some are public, some are negligent defaults, some are hanious offences. 4. 12. 3, 4, 6.

In excommunication severity ought to be tempered. And in this behalf is noted in the extreme rigorousness of them in old time. 4. 12. 8.

Every private man ought to esteem them that are excommunicate as strangers from the church, but not to account them past hope, but to endeavour to the uttermost of their power to bring them into the way again. 4. 12. 9, 10.

If the bench of elders do not so diligently correct faults as they ought, or if the pastors cannot amend all things as they would, yet private men ought not to depart from the church neither ought the pastors to shake off their ministery. 4. 12. 11.

F

Faith.

THe name of faith otherwise taken among holy writers than it is among the prophane. 4. 12. 13.

How it is to be understood that God is the object of faith. 2. 6. 4.

Of faith. And here the sophisters are reproved, who understanding nothing else by this word faith, but a common assent to the history of the gospel, and do simply call God the object of faith, in the mean time leaving out Christ, without whom there is no faith, nor any access to God. 3. 2. 1.

A confutation of the school mens doctrine concerning unexpresed faith, whereas faith requireth an expres acknowleging of the goodness of God, in which standeth our righteousness. 3. 2. 2.

Our faith so long as we are wavering in the world is inwrapped with many remnants of ignorance, and in all things infidelity is ever mingled with faith, whereof many examples are seen in the disciples of Christ before that they came to perfect light, yet this is still most true, that understanding is ever joined with faith. 3. 2. 3. 4.

There is a certain obedience to Christ, and aptness to learn, with a desire to profit, which is called by the name of faith, whereas it is but preparations to faith, and that same may be called an unexpressed faith: yet it far differeth from the papists invention. 3. 2. 5.

The true faith or knowlege of Christ, is when we conceive him in such sort as he is offered of the Father, that is to say, clothed with his gospel. And faith hath a mutual relation to the word, and the word to faith, because the word is the fountain of faith, the ground of faith, and the mirror in which faith beholdeth God. 3. 2. 6.

Faith, although it assent to all the parts of the word of God, yet most properly it hath regard therein to the good will and mercy of God, that is to say, the promises of grace grounded upon Christ, for the understanding and certainty whereof, the Holy Ghost lightneth our minds and strengthneth our hearts; hereupon is gathered the definition of faith. 3. 2. 7.

A confutation of the sophisters distinction of faith, formed and formless; whereby it appeareth that they never thought of the singular gift of the Holy Ghost, forasmuch as faith can in no wise be separated from a godly affection. 3. 2. 8.

This word (faith) hath diverse significations and is sometimes taken for the power to do miracles, with which gift of God, sometimes the wicked are endued; sometimes it is figuratively taken for that knowlege of God which is in some wicked men, which is rather a shadow and image of faith, of which faith there are divers sorts in them. 3. 2. 9, 10.

The reprobate have also sometimes such a like feeling as the elect have, yet they do not fully conceive the efficacy of spiritual grace, but only confusedly. Nevertheless the same is a certain inferior working of the holy Ghost. But this feeling differeth far from the peculiar testimony which he giveth to the elect. 3. 2. 11.

Yet is not the Spirit deceitful, which lightly sprinkleth the reprobate sometimes with such a knowlege of the gospel, and feeling of the love of God as afterward doth vanish away. Sometimes also there is stirred up in their hearts a certain desire of mutual love toward God, but such a love as is mercinary and not a hearty love. At length it is concluded, that there are some who do not feign a faith, and yet do lack the true faith. Which is also proved by testimonies. 3. 2. 12.

and such a feeling is in the scripture called faith, although it be improperly so called. 3. 2. 13.

Faith is sometimes taken for the sound doctrine of religion, and the whole sum thereof; contrarywise sometime it is restrained to some particular object, and some times it signifieth the ministry of the church. 3. 2. 13.

Faith is most rightfully called knowlege and science, and yet is such a knowlege as rather consisteth of certain persuasion than of understanding, forasmuch as that which our mind conceiveth by faith is most infinite. 3. 2. 14.

Faith is not content with a doubtful opinion or a dark conceiving, but requireth a full and settled assuredness; and hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherewith the Holy Ghost setteth forth the authority of the word of God. 3. 2. 15.

Many do so conceive the mercy of God, that they receive very little comfort thereof, because they doubt whether he will be merciful to themselves or no; but there is far other feeling of the abundant store of faith, the chief ground whereof is that we do not think the promises to be true without ourselves only, but rather that by inwardly imbracing them we may make them our own. Hereupon is gathered, who may truly be called faithful. 3. 2. 15. 16.

Though the faithful in acknowleging the goodness of God toward them are not only oftentimes tempted with unquietness, but also are sometimes shaken with grievous terrors; yet this withstandeth not but that faith bringeth assuredness with it because howsoever they are troubled, yet they never fail and depart from that sure affiance which they have conceived of the mercy of God, but striving with their own weakness they always get the upper hand at last which is proved by many examples in David. 3. 2. 17.

A description of the battle of the flesh and the spirit within a faithful soul. 3. 2. 18.

The assuredness of God's goodwill. 3. 2. 18.

A confutation of the most pestilent subtil reasoning of certain half papists, who although they confess that so oft as we look upon Christ, we find plentiful matter to hope well, yet will needs have us to waver and doubt in consideration of our own unworthiness. And it is proved that we ought nevertheless to look for assured salvation, forasmuch as Christ by a certain wondrous communion doth daily grow together more and more into one body with us. 3. 2. 24.

So soon as we have any one drop of faith we begin to behold God merciful unto us, altho' afar off indeed, yet with so assured sight, as we know we are not deceived; both these points are proved by testimonies of Paul. 3. 2. 19, 20.

It is shewed by examples, how faith armeth and fortifieth itself with the word of God to bear the violent assaults of temptations, and how the ungodly mind never suffereth the affiance of God's mercy to be plucked away from it, although it be assailed with many remnants of unbelief and distrust. 3. 2. 21.

In the good will of God; which faith is said to have respect unto, although faith do chiefly look unto the assured expectation of eternal life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect surety of all good things, but the same such as may be gathered of the word; both of these points are confirmed by testimonies of scripture. 3. 2. 28.

Faith although it embrace the word of God in every point, that is to say, in the commandments also and in the prohibition and threatnings, yet hath her foundation and proper mark whereunto it is directed, in the free promise of mercy, and for this reason the gospel is called the work of faith, and is set as contrary to the law. 3. 2. 29.

Yet do we not by this distinction tear faith in sunder as Pighius shamefully cavileth. 3. 2. 30.

Faith doth no less need the word of God, than the fruit doth need the lively root of the tree, and with the word must be joined a consideration of the power of God, without the which mens ears will either not willingly hear the word, or not esteem it worthily. His power is to be considered; in that it is effectual, that is to say, by the works of God, and by his benefits either particular or ancient, and such as he hath bestowed upon the whole church. 3. 2. 31.

The faithful oftentimes so behave themselves, that some errors are mingled with their faith, and they seem to pass the bounds of the word, but yet so that faith hath always the upper hand; this is proved by the examples of Sarah and Rebekah, whom in the crooked turnings of their mind, God did by a secret bridle hold fast in the obedience of his word. 3. 2. 31.

By reason of our blindness and stiffneckedness, the word sufficeth not to make us have faith, unless the spirit of God do inlighten our mind, and strengthen our hearts with his power; and the same spirit is not only the beginner of our faith, but also doth increase it by degrees. 3. 2. 33.

Although it seem to the most part of men a most strange doctrine, that no man can believe in Christ, but he to whom it is given, yet it is proved to be most true by reasons, testimonies of scripture, and examples. 3. 2. 34.

Therefore faith is called the Spirit of faith the work and good pleasure of God; and it is a singular gift, which he giveth by singular privilege to whom he will, as it is proved by notable sentences taken out of Augustine. 3. 2. 35.

It is not enough that the mind be inlightened with understanding of the word, unless also the assuredness of the word be poured into the very heart, both which things the Spirit worketh, which is therefore fore called the ſeal, the pledge, and the Spirit of promiſe 3. 2. 36.

Although faith be toſſed with divers doubtings, yet it always at the leaſt, eſcapeth out of the gulf of temptations, and receiveth moſt ſweet quietneſs. 3. 2. 37.

A confutation of the damnable doctrine of the ſchoolmen, who ſay that we can no otherwiſe determine of the grace of God toward us than by moral conjecture. 3. 2. 38.

They are proved to be miſerably blind, in ſaying that it is raſhneſs for us to conceive an undoubted knowlege of the will of God: A good compariſon of them and Paul in this point of doctrine. 3. 1. 39.

A confutation of their trifling ſhift that although we may take upon us to judge of the grace of God according to the preſent ſtate of righteouſneſs, yet the knowlege of perſevering to the end abideth inſuſpence. 3. 2. 40.

It is proved that the definition of faith taught in this chapter, Sect. 7. agreeth with the apoſtle's definition: Heb. cap. 11. and the error of the ſchoolmen, that charity is before faith and hope is confuted by the teſtimony of Bernard. 3. 2. 41.

Hope is always engendered of faith, and is the undivided companion of faith, ſo that whoſoever lacketh hope, is proved alſo to have no faith. Alſo faith is nouriſhed and ſtrengthened by hope and how neceſſary are the helps of hope to eſtabliſh faith which is aſſailed with ſo many ſorts of temptations 3. 2. 42

By reaſon of this conjoining and alliance of faith and hope, the ſcripture doth may times uſe thoſe two words without difference, and ſometimes joineth them together A confutation of the error of Peter Lombard, who maketh two foundations of faith, that is to ſay, the grace of God, and the merit of works. 3. 2. 43.

Of the ſuperſtition of Lent, and the diverſity of obſerving the ſame faſting. 4. 12. 20, 21.

Fear.

The faithful are oftentimes troubled with fear and diſtruſt by reaſon of the feeling of their own weakneſs. 3. 2. 17.

Another kind of fear conceived in a godly heart, either by examples of God's vengeance againſt the wicked, or by conſideration of his own miſery: ſuch fear is ſo much not contrary to faith, that the faithful are much exhorted to have it. Neither is it any marvel, if there be in a faithful ſoul both fear and faith ſince on the other ſide in the wicked there are both dull negligence and carefulneſs. 3. 2. 22, 23.

The fear of God proceedeth out of a double feeling, namely when we honour God as our father, and fear him as our Lord: Neither is it any wonder if one mind have both theſe affections.

This fear differeth from the fear of the unfaithful, which they commonly call a ſervile fear. 3. 2. 27.

Of forſaking of ourſelves.

The firſt beginning of framing our life after the rule ſet forth in the law, is to conſider that we are not at our own liberty, but hallowed and dedicate to God. And therefore we ought to forſake our ſelves, and our own reaſon (which as the Philoſophers think, ought alone to be obeyed) to the end that we may be governed by the word and ſpirit of the Lord. 3. 7. 1.

Alſo that we ought not to ſeek thoſe things that are our own, but thoſe things that are according to the will of the Lord, and do ſerve to advance his glory. And that this is the forſaking of our ſelves, without the which there is a world of vices encloſed in the ſoul of man, and if there be any ſeeming of virtue at all, the ſame is corrupted with wicked deſire of glory. 3. 7. 2.

The forſaking or mortifying of ourſelves, is partly in reſpect of men, and partly, yea, and chiefly in reſpect of God. Toward other men, the ſcripture commandeth us to do two things: namely to prefer them in honour before ourſelves, and with unfeigned truth to employ ourſelves wholly to procure their intereſt. How the firſt of theſe points is to be performed is taught in the, 3. 4. 7. and alſo how the ſcripture leadeth us by the hand to the ſecond point is ſhewed in the. 3. 7. 5.

See certain things pertaining to this purpoſe. 3. 20.

Free-will.

Man was endued with free will in the firſt eſtate of his creation. 1. 15. 8. which he loſt by his fall. Of this the philoſophers were ignorant. and ſo all ſuch, as follow them, giving freewill to man, are utterly deceived. 1. 15. 8.

The pliableneſs or weak power of freewill which was in the firſt man, doth not excuſe his fall. 1. 15. 8.

It is as well for our profit, as for th' glory of God, to acknowlege all our ſtrength to be but ſtaff made of a reed, yea, but a ſmoak. In the maen time we muſt beware, that while we take all uprightneſs from man, we do not thereof take occaſion of ſlothfulneſs. But rather we ought thereby to be ſtirred up to ſeek in God all the goodneſs whereof we ourſelves are void. The defend ers of freewill do rather throw it down headlong than eſtabliſh it. 2. 2. 1.

The philoſophers determine three powers of the ſoul. Underſtanding, ſenſe, and will or appetite: and they think that the reaſon of man's underſtanding ſufficeth for his good government; that will is by ſenſe moved to evil, ſo that it doth hardly yield it ſelf to reaſon, and ſometimes is diverſly drawn from the one to the other, but yet that it hath a free election and cannot be ſtopped, that it may follow reaſon her guide in all things: finally that virtues and vices are in our powers. 2. 2. 23.

The eccleſiaſtical writers, although they acknowleged the ſoundneſs of underſtanding and the freedom of will to have been ſore wounded by ſin, yet have ſpoken too much philoſophically of this matter. The old writers did it for this purpoſe, firſt becauſe they were loth to teach a thing that ſhould be an abſurdity in the common judgement of men, and alſo ſpecially leſt they ſhould give a new occaſion of ſlothfulneſs to the fleſh being already too much dull to godlineſs, as appeareth by many ſayings of Chryſoſtom and Jerom. The Greek doctors above all others, and eſpecially Chryſoſtom, do exceed meaſure in advancing free-will. But all the old writers generally, except Auguſtine, do ſo vary and waver in this point of doctrine, that there can almoſt no certainty be gathered of their writings. They who came after them, fell one after another to worſe and worſe. The definitions of free-will out of Origen, Auguſtine, Bernard, Anſelm, Peter Lombard and Thomas. 2. 2. 4.

In what things they do commonly give free-will to man, and of the three ſorts of man's will. 2. 2. 5.

Alſo of the common diſtinction of the three ſorts of liberty. 2. 2. 5.

Whether man be wholly deprived of power to do good, or whether he have yet ſome power though it be weak: where it is ſpoken of the common diſtinction of grace working and grace working together, and what is amiſs in the ſame diſtinction. 2. 2. 6.

Foraſmuch as it cannot otherwiſe be ſaid that man hath freewill, but becauſe he doth evil of his own will, and not by compulſion, it had been very good for the church that this word freewill had never been uſed, which had raiſed up men to a damnable truſt of themſelves. The old writers alſo do oft declare what they mean by that word, eſpecially Auguſtine, out of whom there are many places alleged, where he weakneth and mocketh the ſtrength thereof, both when he calleth it bond-will, and when he expoundeth the thing itſelf as it is at large. 2. 2. 7, 8.

Although the old eccleſiaſtical writers do ſometime too much advance freewill, and have ſpoken doubtfully and diverſly in that matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their ſayings, that they little or nothing eſteeming man's power, gave the whole praiſe of all goodneſs to the holy Ghoſt. Many ſuch ſentences are rehearſed out of Cyprian, Auguſtine, Eucherius, Chryſoſtom. 2. 2. 9.

The power of man's will is not to be weighed by the ſucceſs of things, but by the choiſe of judgment and the affection of will. 2. 4. 8.

It is proved againſt the defenders of freewill that ſin is of neceſſity, and yet nevertheleſs ought to be imputed: alſo that it is voluntary, and yet cannot be avoided. 2. 5 1.

A ſolution of another objection of theirs, where they ſay that unleſs both virtues and vices proceed of free election of will, it were no reaſon that man ſhould either be puniſhed or rewarded. 2. 5. 2.

Alſo another objection, where they ſay that if this were not the power of our will, to chooſe good or evil, then of neceſſity either all men ſhould be good, or all men evil. 2. 5. 3.

Againſt the ſame men alſo it is proved that exhortations, admonitions, and rebukings are not in vain, although it be not in the power of the ſinner to obey: and there is ſhewed what effect the ſame do work both in the wicked and in the faithful. 2. 5. 4. 5.

It is not to be gathered by the commandments and law of God, that man hath freewill and ſtrength to perform them, for God doth not only command what ought to be done, but alſo promiſeth grace to obey. 2. 5. 6, 7. 9.

This is proved as well in the commandments which require the firſt converſion to God, as alſo in thoſe which ſpeak ſimply of the obſerving of the law, and thoſe which command men to continue in the received grace of God. For the ſame God who requireth thoſe things, doth teſtify that the converſion of a ſinner, holineſs of life, ſtedfaſtneſs of continuance, are his free gifts, and the praiſe thereof is not to be parted between God and man. 2. 5. 8, 9, 11.

The conditional promiſes, as, if ye will, if ye hear, and ſuch like, do not prove that there is in man a free power of willing or hearing: yet it is proved that God doth not mock men in ſo bargaining with them, alſo what is the uſe of ſuch proteſtations, both toward the godly and toward the ungodly. 2. 5. 10.

The reproachings, wherein God ſaith to his people that they were the cauſe that they received not all kind of good things at his hand, do not prove that it was in man's power to eſcape the evils wherewith they were afflicted. And there is ſpoken of the uſe of ſuch reproachings as well toward them that obſtinately go forward in their faults, as toward the conformable that are converted to repentance. Alſo whereas the ſcripture doth ſometime give to us the office of doing, it doth ſo for no other reaſon but to awaken the ſlothfulneſs of the fleſh. 2. 5. 11.

The ſaying of Moſes, the commandment is near to thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of free-will, foraſmuch as he there there ſpeaketh not of the bare commandments, but of the evangelical promiſes of the law. 1. 5. 12.

No more do thoſe places make for them, where it is ſaid that the Lord looketh and watcheth to ſee what men will do. 2 5. 13.

All thoſe places where good works are called ours: and we are ſaid to do that which is holy and pleaſing to the Lord. And here is ſhewed that the ſpirit of God only worketh all good motions in us, but yet not as in ſtocks. 2. 5. 14, 15.

An expoſition of certain other places of ſcripture, which the enemies of the grace of God do abuſe, to eſtabliſh free-will. 2. 5. 16, 17, 18, 19.

Goſpel.

Chriſt, although he was known to the Jews in the time of the law, was yet ſhewed in deed only by the goſpel: and the holy fathers taſted of that grace, which is now offered to us with full abundance: they ſaw the day of Chriſt albeit with a dim ſight, the glory whereof now ſhineth in the goſpel, without any vail between us and it. 2. 9. 1, 2.

In the ſame place alſo is ſhewed, that the goſpel is properly and ſpecially called the publiſhing of the grace given in Chriſt, and not the promiſes that are written by the prophets concerning the remiſſion of ſins. Againſt the doctrine of Servetus, who taketh away the promiſes under this pretence, that by the faith of the goſpel we have the fulfilling of all the promiſes it is proved that though Chriſt offer to us in the goſpel a preſent fulneſs of ſpiritual good things yet the enjoying thereof lyeth hidden under the cuſtody of hope ſo long as we live in this world, and thereof we muſt yet reſt upon the promiſes. 2. 9. 3.

A confutation of their error, who compare the law with the goſpel, no otherwiſe than the deſervings of works with the imputation of free righteouſneſs. 2. 9. 4.

John the baptiſt had an office in a medium between the prophets expoſitors of the law, and the apoſtles publiſhers of the goſpel. 2. 9. 5.

Holy Ghoſt.

Teſtimonies whereby the Godhead of the Holy Ghoſt is proved 1. 13. 14, 15.

The Holy Ghoſt is the bond wherewith Chriſt doth effectually bind us to him, and without it, all that Chriſt hath ſuffered and done for the ſalvation of mankind, doth nothing profit us. 3. 1. 1, 3.

Chriſt came after a ſingular manner furniſhed with the Holy Ghoſt, to ſeperate us from the world, and therefore he is called the Spirit of ſanctification. Why he is ſometimes called the Spirit of the Father and ſometimes the Spirit of the Son. He is called the Spirit of Chriſt, not only in reſpect that Chriſt is the eternal word, but alſo according to his perſon of mediator. 3. 1. 2.

An expoſition of the titles wherewith the ſcripture ſetteth forth the Holy Ghoſt: and there is treated of the beginning and whole reſtoring of our ſalvation: the titles are theſe, the Spirit of adoption, the earneſt and ſeal of our inheritance, life, water, oil, ointment, fire, a fountain, the hand of God, &c. 3. 1. 3.

Faith is the chief work of the Holy Ghoſt, and therefore to it for the moſt part are all thoſe things referred which are commonly found in the ſcripture to expreſs the force and effectual power of the Holy Ghoſt. 3. 1. 4.

Humility.

It is not the true humilty which God requireth of us unleſs we acknowlege ourſelves utterly void of all goodneſs and righteouſneſs. 3. 12. 6.

Of this humility there is an example ſhewed in the publican. 3. 12. 7.

That we may give place to the calling of Chriſt, both preſumption and careleſneſs muſt be far away from us. 3. 12. 8.

There is no danger leaſt man ſhould take too much from himſelf, ſo that he learn that which wanteth in himſelf is to be recovered in God. It is a deviliſh word, although it be ſweet to us, that liſteth up man in himſelf: for repulſing whereof, there are recited out of the ſcripture many weighty ſentences, which do rigorouſly throw down man: and alſo there are recited certain promiſes, which do promiſe grace to none but to them that do pine away with a ſenſe of their own poverty. 2. 2. 10.

Certain notable ſayings of Chryſoſtom and Auguſtine concerning true humility, 2. 2. 11.

I

Idols.

THE ſcripture ſetteth out God by certain titles of addition and marks, not to the intent to bind him to one place or to one people, but to put difference between his holy majeſty and idols. 2. 8. 15.

An expoſition of the firſt commandment: where is ſhewed that worſhipping, truſt, invocation, and thankſgiving, belongs wholly to God, and no whit thereof may be conveyed any otherwhere without great injury to him to whoſe eyes all things are open. 2. 8. 16.

An expoſition of the ſecond commandment: where is ſpoken of idols and images. 2. 8. 17.

The ſcripture to the intent to bring us to the true God, doth expreſly exclude all the gods of the Gentiles, 1. 10 3. and eſpecially all idols and images. 1. 11. 1.

God is ſeparate from idols, not only that he alone ſhould have the name of God, but that he ſhould be wholly worſhipped, and nothing that belongeth to the Godhead ſhould be conveyed to any other. 1. 12. 1.

The glory of God is corrupted with falſe lying, when any form is appointed to it. 1. 11. 1.

It is proved by texts and reaſons, that God generallymiſliketh all portraitures and images that are made to expreſs a figure of him and this prohibition pertained not to the Jews only. 1. 11. 2.

God did in old time ſo ſhew his preſence by viſible ſigns either to the whole people or to certain choſen men, that the ſame ſigns admoniſhed them of the incomprehenſible ſubſtance of God. 1. 11. 3.

It is proved even of Juvenal's teſtimony that the papiſts are mad, who defend the images of God and of ſaints with the example of the cherubs covering the propitiatory. 1. 11. 3.

The ſtuff itſelf and alſo the workmanſhip which is done with the hands of men, do ſhew that images are not gods. 1. 11. 4.

Againſt the Grecians, who make no graven image of God, but do give themſelves leave to paint him. 1. 11. 4.

The ſaying of Gregory, upon which the papiſts ſay that they ſtand, that images are unlearned mens books, is confuted by the teſtimony of Jerom, Habakuk, Lanctantius, Euſebius, Auguſtine, Varro, and the decree of the Elebertine council. 1. 11. 5, 6, 7.

The papiſts protraitures or images whereby they repreſent the holy martyrs and virgins, are paterns of moſt wicked riotous exceſs and unchaſtneſs. 1. 11. 7, 12.

The people ſhall learn much more by the preaching of the word and miniſtration of ſacraments, than by a thouſand wooden croſſes. 1. 11. 7.

The antiquity and beginning of idolatry, for that men thinking God not to be near them, unleſs he did ſhew himſelf carnally preſent, raiſed up ſigns in which they believed that he was carnally converſant before their eyes. 1. 11. 8.

After ſuch an invention by and by followeth the worſhipping of the image, like as of God or of any other creature in the image: both which the law of God forbiddeth. 1. 11. 8, 9.

Againſt them, who for defence of abominable idolatry, do pretend that they do not take the images for gods, it is proved that neither the Jews did think their calf to be God, nor the heathen when they made to themſelves images did ever think the ſame to be God, whom yet no man excuſe. 1. 11. 9.

The papiſts are ſo perſuaded as the heathen and the idolatrous Jews were, that they worſhip God himſelf under images. 1. 11. 10. Neither can they eſcape away with their diſtinction of ſervice and worſhip. 1. 11. 11, 16. and 1. 12. 2.

When idolatry is condemned graving and painting are not utterly reproved, but there is required a true and right uſe of them both, that God may not be counterfeited with bodily ſhape but only thoſe things which our eyes may behold. 1. 11. 12.

Of images in the temples of Chriſtians. 4. 9. 9.

Even the idolaters themſelves in all ages, naturally underſtood that there is one only God: but this underſtanding availed no further than to make them to be unexcuſable. 1. 10. 3.

Idolatry is an evident proof that the knowlege of God is naturally planted in the minds of all men. 1. 3. 1.

Image of God in man.

How it is, that man was created after the image of God: and here are confuted the fooliſh expoſitions of Oſiander and of others: and here is declared that tho' the image of God do appear alſo in the outward man, and do extend to the whole excellency wherewith the nature of man paſſeth all kind of living creatures, yet the principal ſeat thereof is in the mind and in the heart, or in the ſoul and in the powers thereof. 1. 15. 3. and 2. 2. 1.

The image of God at the beginning appeared in Adam, in light of mind, uprightneſs of heart, and the ſoundneſs of all his parts which is proved by the repairing of corrupted nature, wherein Chriſt newly faſhoneth us after the image of God, and by other arguments. 1. 15. 4.

Judicial proceedings in law.

Of the uſe of judicial proceedings, magiſtrates, and laws, among Chriſtians. It is lawful for Chriſtians to ſue for their right before a magiſtrate, ſo that the ſame be done without hurting of piety and of the love of our neighbour. 4. 20. 17, 18.

Deſire of revenge, is always to be avoided, whether it be a common or criminal action wherein men ſtrive before a judge. 4. 20. 19.

The commandment of Chriſt, to give thy cloak to him that taketh away thy coat, and ſuch like prove not but that a Chriſtian may ſue before a magiſtrate, and uſe his help for the preſerving of his goods. 4. 20. 20.

Paul doth not utterly condemn ſutes, but reproveth the unmeaſurable rage of ſueing at law among the Corinthians. 4. 20. 21.

Juſtification of faith.

Of the juſtification of faith, and firſt of the definition of the name, and of the thing itſelf. 3. 11.

The article of doctrine concerning the juſtification of faith is of great importance. 3 11. 1.

It is ſhewed by the ſcripture what is it to be juſtified by works, and what it is to be juſtified by faith. 3. 11. 2, 3, 4.

A confutation of the error of Oſiander, concerning eſſential righteouſneſs, which taketh from men, the earneſt feeling of the true grace of Chriſt. 3. 11. 5, 6, 7, &c. to the 13.

A confutation of Oſiander's invention, that whereas Chriſt is both God and man, he was made righteouſneſs to us in reſpect of his nature of godhead and not of his manhood. 3. 11. 8, 9.

Againſt them who imagine a righteouſneſs compounded of faith and works, it is proved that when the one is eſtabliſhed, the other muſt needs be overthrown. 3. 11. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

It is proved by the ſcripture againſt the ſophiſters, that this is a ſure principle, that we are juſtified by faith only. 3. 11. 19, 20.

It is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture, that the righteouſneſs of faith is reconciliation with God, which conſiſteth only upon the remiſſion of ſins. 3. 11. 21, 22.

By the only interceſſion or mean of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, we obtain to be juſtified before God. 3. 11. 23.

That we may be throughly perſuaded of the free juſtification, we muſt liſt up our minds to the judgment ſeat of God: before which, nothing is acceptable but that which is whole and perfect in every behalf, the dreadful majeſty whereof is deſcribed by many places of ſcripture. 3. 1. 2, 12.

All godly writers do ſhew that when men have to do with God, the only place of refuge for conſciences is in the free mercy of God, excluding all truſt of works and this proved by teſtimonies of Auguſtine and Bernard. 3. 12. 3.

Two things are to be obſerved in free juſtification. The firſt, that the Lord keep faſt his glory undiminiſhed: which is done when he alone is acknowleg d to be righteous, for they glory againſt God, who glory in themſelves. 3. 13. 1, 2. The ſecond that our conſciences may have quietneſs in the ſight of his judgment. 3. 13. 3, 4, 5.

What manner of beginning is of juſtification, and what continual proceedings. 3. 1. 4.

A briefſum of the foundation of Chriſtian doctrine, taken out of Paul. 3. 15. 5.

This foundation being laid, wiſe builders do well and orderly build upon, whether it be to ſet forth doctrine and exhortation, or to give comfort. 3. 15. 8.

Good works are not deſtroyed by the doctrine of juſtification of faith. 3. 16. 1.

It is moſt falſe that men's minds are drawn away from affection of well doing, when we take from them the opinion of merit. 3. 16. 2, 3.

It is a moſt vain ſlander, that men are provoked to ſin, when we affirm a free forgiveneſs of ſins, in which we ſay that righteouſneſs conſiſteth. 3. 16. 4.

In what ſenſe the ſcripture oftentimes ſaith that the faithful are juſtified by works. 3. 17. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

The doers of the law are juſtified. 3. 17. 13.

He that walketh in uprightneſs is righteous. 3. 17. 15.

An expoſition of certain places, wherein the faithful do boldly offer their righteouſneſs to the judgment of God to be examined, and pray to be judged according to the ſame, and it is proved that this diſagreeth not with the free juſtification of faith. 3. 7. 14.

The ſaying of Chriſt, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments, diſagreeth not with the free juſtification of faith. 3. 18. 5.

Knowlege of God.

To know God, is not only to conceive that there is ſome God, but to underſtand ſo much as behoveth us to know of him, and ſo much as availeth for his glory and is expedient. 1. 2. 1.

The knowlege of God ought to tend to this end firſt to frame us to fear and reverence: and then that by it guiding and teaching us we may learn to aſk all good things of him, and to account the ſame received at his hand. 1. 2. 2. and 1. 5. 8.

The philoſophers had no other knowlege of God than that which made them inexcuſable, but did not bring them to the truth. 2. 2. 18.

This perſuaſion is naturally planted in all men, that there is ſome God. 1. 2. 3. and that to this end, that they who do not worſhip him, may be condemned by their own judgment. 1. 3. 1.

Though all men know by nature that there is a God, yet ſome become vain in their ſuperſtitions, and other other ſome of ſet purpoſe do maliciouſly depart from God. 1. 4. 1.

Law.

The law, that is to ſay, the form of religion ſet forth by Moſes, was not given to hold the old people ſtill in it, but to nouriſh in their hearts the hope of ſalvation in Chriſt until his coming: which is proved by this, that Moſes repeateth the mention of the covenant: and by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in ſacrifices as in waſhings, alſo by the office of prieſthood of the tribe of Levi and the honour of the kingdom in David and his poſterity. The law alſo of the ten commandments was given to prepare men to ſeek Chriſt. 2. 7. 1, 2. and that is done, when it maketh us inexcuſable being on every ſide convicted of our ſins, to move us to ſeek for pardon of our guiltineſs. 2. 7. 3, 4.

It is proved by the ſcripture and declared that the obſerving of the law is impoſſible. 2. 7. 5.

There are three uſes and offices of the moral law: the firſt is, that ſhewing unto us the righteouſneſs which only is acceptable unto God, it may be as a glaſs for us, wherein we may behold our weakneſs, and by it our wickedneſs and finally by them both our accurſedneſs: neither turneth this to any diſhonour of the law, but maketh for the glory of the bountifulneſs of God, who both with help of grace aideth us to do that which we are commanded, and by mercy putteth away our offences. Neither yet doth this office altogether ceaſe in the reprobate. 2. 7. 6, 7, 8, 9.

The ſecond office, is to reſtrain the reprobate with fear of puniſhment, leaſt they unbridledly commit the wickedneſs which inwardly they always nouriſh and love: and alſo to draw back the children of God before the regeneration from outwardlicentiouſneſs. 2. 7. 10. 11.

The third office, concerneth the faithful: for the law although it be already written with the finger of God in their hearts, yet profiteth them two ways: For by ſtudying upon it they are more confirmed in the underſtanding of the will of the Lord, and are ſtirred up and ſtrengthned to obedience, that they go not out of kind by the ſluggiſhneſs of the fleſh. 2. 7. 12, 13. For as touching the curſe of the law, it is taken away from the faithful, that it, can no more extend itſelf againſt them in damning and deſtroying them. 2. 7. 14.

By the ten commandments of the law we learn the ſame things which we but ſlenderly taſte by inſtruction of the law of nature; firſt that we owe to God reverence, love, and fear, that righteouſneſs pleaſeth him, and wickedneſs diſpleaſeth him; finally that examining our life by the rule of the law, we are unworthy to be accounted among the creatures of God, and that our power is inſufficient, yea, no power at at all to perform the law. Both theſe points engender in us humility and abaſing of ourſelves, which teacheth us to flee to the mercy of God, and to crave the help of his grace. 2. 8. 1, 2, 3.

Forasmuch as God the law-maker is ſpiritual, that is to ſay, ſpeaketh as well to the ſoul as to the body, therefore the law likewiſe requireth not only an outward honeſty, but alſo an inward and ſpiritual righteouſneſs and a very angelic pureneſs. 2. 8. 6. which is proved by Chriſt's own expoſition, when he confuted the Phariſees wrong interpretation, which required only a certain outward obſervation of the law. 2. 8. 7.

There is always more in the commandments and prohibitions of the law, than is expreſſed. Therefore for the right and true expounding of them it behoveth us to weigh what is the intent or end of every one of them; then from that which is commanded or forbidden, we muſt draw an argument to the contrary, that we may underſtand, that not only an evil is forbidden, but alſo the good is commanded which is contrary to that evil. 2. 8. 8, 9.

Why God ſpake by way of implied comprehending, in ſetting forth the form of his commandments. 2. 8. 10.

Of the dividing of the law into two tables; and how therein we are taught that the firſt foundation and the very ſoul of righteouſneſs is the worſhipping of God. 2. 8. 11.

Of the diviſion of the ten commandments, and how many commandments are to be appointed to the firſt table, and how many to the ſecond. 2. 8. 12. 50.

An expoſition of the commandments of God; where is declared that the Lord is the beginning of the law, to eſtabliſh his own majeſty, uſeth three arguments; firſt by challenging to himſelf the ſovereign power and right of dominion over us, he doth as it were by neceſſity draw us to obey him; ſecondly, he allureth us with the ſweetneſs of the promiſe of grace; thirdly, he moveth us to obedience with rehearſal of the benefit that we have received. 2. 8. 13, 14, 15.

The law teacheth not only certain introductions and principles of righteouſneſs, but the very accompliſhment thereof, the expreſſing of the image of God, and the perfection of holineſs; which law is all contained in two points, that is to ſay, the love of God and of our neighbour, 2. 8. 51.

The law of nature. 2. 2. 22.

Laws politic.

Neither can laws be without the magiſtrates, nor the magiſtrate without laws. A confutation of them who ſay that a commonweal is not well ordered, unleſs it be governed by the politic laws of Moſes. For this purpoſe is rehearſed a diviſion of the laws of Moſes into mortal laws, ceremonies, judicial laws, and the the end of every one of them being discussed, it is proved that it is lawful for every seperate nation to make politic laws. 4. 20. 14, 15. so that they agree with that natural equity, the reason whereof is set forth in the moral law of Moses. Therefore it is shewed by examples that they may alter the ordinances of penalties according to the diversity of the country, time, and other circumstances. 4. 20. 16.

Liberty.

See Christian liberty.

Lying.

An exposition of the ninth commandment, wherein the Lord forbideth falsehood, wherewith we by lying or backbiting, do hurt any man's good name, or hinder his interest. 2. 8. 47.

We many times sin against this commandment, although we do not lie. But in this point there must be a difference wisely made between the slandering which is here condemned, and judicial accusation or rebuking, which is used upon desire to bring to amendment. 2. 8. 48.

Life of a Christian man.

The Law containeth a rule how to frame a man's life, and divers places also of the scripture doth here and there declare it, and not without an orderly manner of teaching, although not so exquisite and curious as the philosophers do. 3. 6. 1.

Herein the scriptures doth two things; it stirreth us up to the love of righteousness and teacheth a rule how to follow the same. The first point it worketh by divers arguments and reasons. 3 6. 2 and herein the scripture layeth much better foundations, than can be found in all the books of the philosophers. 3. 6. 3.

Against them that pretend a knowlege of Christ, when their life and manners retemble not the doctrine of Christ. 3 6. 4.

Though perfection were to be wished in all men, yet we must also acknowlege for Christians the most part of men who have not yet proceeded so far. We must always endeavour forward, and not despair for the smalness of our profiting. 3. 6. 5.

Out of a place of Paul these are gathered to be the parts of a well framed life; consideration of the grace of God, forsaking of wickedness and of worldly lusts, soberness, righteousness, godliness (which signifieth true holiness) and the blessed hope of immortality. 3. 7. 3.

Life present and the helps thereof.

The scripture teacheth the best way how to use the goods of this life. 3. 10. 4, 5.

Two faults must be avoided; that we do neither bind our consciences with too much rigorousness nor give loose reins to the intemperance of men. 3. 10. 1,3.

God both in clothing and in food provided not only for our necessity, but also for our delight. 3. 10. 2.

It is most necessary, that every one of us in all doings of his life do look upon his vocation, that we attempt nothing rashly with doubtful conscience. 3. 10. 6.

God disdaineth not to provide also for the necessities of our earthly body, and in what sense we ask of him our daily bread. 2. 20. 44.

Life to come.

God doth by divers mysteries teach us the contempt of this present life, that we may earnestly desire life to come. 3. 9. 1, 2, 4.

Such a contempt of this life is required of us, that we neither hate it nor be unthankful to God, of whose clemency it is a testimony to the faithful 3. 9. 3.

An admonition to them who are holden with too much fear of death, that Christians ought rather to desire that day which shall make an end of their continual miseries, and fill them with true joy. 3. 9, 5, 6.

Of the incomprehensible excellency of the eternal felicity (which is the end of the resurrection) the taste of the sweetness whereof we ought here continually to take, but yet to avoid curiosity whereupon do arise trifling and noisom questions, yea and hurtfull speculations. And there shal be an equal measure of glory to all the children of God in heaven, 3. 25 10, 11. In which place also is an answer to the questions which some men do move concerning the state of the children of God, after the resurrection.

In what sense eternal life is sometimes called the reward of works. 3. 18. 2, 4.

M

Magistrates

THe office of magistrates is not only holy and lawful before God, but also the most holy and honourable degree in all the life of men, and this is proved by diverse titles wherewith the scripture setteth it forth, and by the examples of holy men who have born civil power. 4. 20. 4.

This consideration is a prick to godly magistrates to move them to the doing of their duty and also it is a comfort to ease the hard labour of their office. 4. 20. 6.

A confutation of them, who say that though in old time under the law kings and judges ruled over God's people, yet this servile kind of government doth not agree with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his gospel. 4. 20. 5. 7.

They err who exclude the magistrates from the charge of religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the law. It is proved by scripture, that they are ordained protectors and defenders as well of the worshipping of God as of common peace and honesty, which they cannot throughly perform without the power of the sword. 4. 20. 9.

A declaration of this question by scripture, how the magistrates may be godly and also draw their sword, and shed the blood of men, and it is proved, that they are ſo far from ſinning in puniſhing offenders, that this is one of the virtues of a king, and a proof of their godlineſs. Herein the magiſtrates muſt beware of two faults namely extreme rigorouſneſs, and ſuperſtitious deſire of pity. 4. 20. 10.

It is the duty of ſubjects towards magiſtrates to think honourably of them as of the miniſters and deputies of God, foraſmuch as concerneth their degree, but not that they ſhould eſteem the vices of men for virtues. 4 20. 22.

It is alſo their duty with minds heartily bent to the honouring of them to declare their obedience toward them, whether it be in following their decrees or in paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their ſafety and proſperity, to raiſe no tumults and not to thruſt themſelves into the office of the magiſtrate. 4. 20. 23.

Even wicked princes of evil life, and who rule tyrannouſly, (forſomuch as pertaineth to public obedience) ought to be had in as great reverence and honour as we would give to the beſt king that might be, 4. 20. 24, 25. becauſe even they alſo have the public power not without the providence and ſingular power of God. Which is proved by diverſe teſtimonies and examples of ſcripture: and there is ſhewed with what conſiderations thoſe ſubjects ought to bridle their own impatience who live under ſuch ungodly and wicked tyrants. 4. 20. 26, 27, 28, 29, 31.

It is not lawful for private men to riſe up againſt tyrants, but only for them which by the laws of the kingdom or of the country, are the defenders of the liberty of the people. 4. 20. 31.

The Lord by his marvellous goodneſs and provipence, doth ſometimes raiſe up ſome of his ſervants to puniih tyrants, and ſometimes alſo he directeth thereunto the rage of wicked men while they intend another thing. 4. 20. 30.

In the obedience which is due to the commandments of kings and rulers this is always to be excepted, that it draw us not away from the obedience of God. Neither is any wrong done to them when we refuſe to obey them in ſuch things as they command againſt God: and this is our duty, how great and preſent peril ſoever do depend upon ſuch conſtancy. 4. 20. 32.

Man.

Man is by knowlege of himſelf not only moved to ſeek God, but alſo led as it were by the hand to find him. 1. 1. 1.

The creation of man is a notable ſhew of the power, wiſdom, and goodneſs of God: wherefore man is by ſome of the philoſophers called a little world. 1. 5. 3.

The unthankfulneſs of men who feeling tokens of the providence of God both in their ſoul and body, yet do not give God praiſe. 1. 5. 4.

Two ſorts of knowlege of ourſelves, the one in our firſt original eſtate, the other after Adam's fall, and the latter is not to be received without conſidering the firſt, leſt we ſhould ſeem to impute corruption to God the author of nature. 1. 15.

The knowlege of himſelf is moſt neceſſary for it which conſiſteth in this (as the truth of God preſcribeth) that firſt conſidering to what end he is created and endued with excellent gifts, he ſhould depend altogether upon God, of whom he hath all things by gift: then, that weighing his own miſerable eſtate after the fall of Adam, he ſhould truly lothe himſelf and conceive a new deſire to ſeek God, that in him he may recover theſe good things, of which he himſelf is found utterly void and empty. Wherefore we muſt beware that in this point we hearken not to the judgment of the fleſh and to the books of philoſophers, who while they withhold us in conſideration only of our good things, would carry us away into a moſt wicked ignorance of ourſelves. 2. 1. 1, 2, 3.

Man can never come to the true knowlege of himſelf, unleſs he have firſt beholden the face of God, that is to ſay, till he have began to know and weigh by the word of God what and how exact is the perfection of his righteouſneſs, wiſdom, and power. to the which we ought to be made of like form. 1. 1. 2.

Even the moſt holy men were ſtricken with fear and aſtoniſhment, when God did extraordinarily ſhew his preſence and glory unto them. 1. 1. 3.

That whole man is corrupted in both parts of him (that is to ſay both in underſtanding, mind, and in heart or will) is proved by divers titles wherewith the ſcripture deſcribeth him, eſpecially when it ſaith, that he is fleſh; and there is declared that this word (fleſh) is not referred only to the ſenſual part but alſo to the ſuperior part of the ſoul. 2. 3.

That men do in vain, ſeek for any good thing in their own nature, is proved by Paul, who treating of the univerſal kindred of the children of Adam, and not rebuking the corrupted manners of ſome one age alone but accuſing the perpetual corruption of nature, taketh from mens righteouſneſs, that is to ſay, uprightneſs and pureneſs, and then underſtanding, and laſt of all the fear of God. 2. 3. 2.

A confutation of the objection concerning certain heathen men, who foraſmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of nature bent to the endeavour of virtue and honeſty, do ſeem to warn us, that we ſhould not eſteem the nature of man, altogether corrupt. Therefore it is declared that in the unbelievers God doth not inwardly cleanſe the corruption of nature wherewith man is in each part defiled, (as he doth in the elect) but by this providence ſometimes he bridleth it in them, that it break not forth into deeds, and reſtraineth it by divers ways, ſo much as he knoweth to be expedient for preſerving of the univerſal ſtate of things. 2. 3. 3.

Thoſe virtues which we read to have been in heathen men, are not ſufficient proofs of the pureneſs of nature, foraſmuch as their mind was inwardly not upright, being corrupted with ambition or ſome other poiſon, poiſon, and not directed with deſire to ſet forth the glory of God: and alſo foraſmuch as thoſe virtues are not the common gifts of nature, but the ſpecial graces of God, which he diverſly and by a certain meaſure giveth to prophane men, as oftentimes to kings, and ſometimes to private men. 2. 3. 4.

See image of God in man.

Marriage.

An expoſition of the ſeventh commandment, wherein the Lord forbiddeth fornication and requireth chaſtity and cleanneſs, which we ought to keep and preſerve both in our mind, and in our eyes, and in the apparel of our body, and in our tongue, and in the moderate uſe of meat and drink. 2. 8. 41, 44.

Continence is a ſingular gift of God, which he giveth not to all men, but to ſome, yea and that ſometime for a ſeaſon: as for them to whom it is not granted, let them always flee to marriage, which is ordained of the Lord for the remedy of man's neceſſity. 2. 8. 41, 42, 42.

Married perſons muſt beware that they commit nothing unbeſeeming the honeſty and temperance of marriage: otherwiſe they ſeem to be adulterers of their own wives, and not huſbands. 2. 8. 44.

The Papiſts do wrongfully call marriage a ſacrament: and their reaſons are confuted. 4. 19. 34. It is proved that the place of Paul, wherewith they ſeek to cloak themſelves, maketh nothing for them. 4. 19. 35.

In the mean time they diſagree with themſelves when they exclude prieſts from this ſacrament, and do ſay that it is uncleanneſs and defiling of the fleſh. 4. 19. 36.

By this falſe colour of ſacrament, the Pope with his clergy have drawn to themſelves the hearing of cauſes of matrimony, and have made laws of marriage, which partly are manifeſtly wicked againſt God, and partly moſt unjuſt toward men, which laws are rehearſed. 4. 19. 37.

Mediator Chriſt.

It behoved that Chriſt, to the end that he might perform the office of mediator, ſhould be made man, foraſmuch as God had ſo ordained, becauſe it was beſt for us, ſince no other could be the mean for reſtoring of peace between God and us, no other could make us the children of God, no other could aſſure unto us the inheritance of the heavenly kingdom, no other could for remedy ſet man's obedience againſt man's diſobedience. 2. 12. 1, 2, 3.

A confutation of their phantaſtical conceit, who affirm that Chriſt ſhould have become man, although there had needed no remedy for the redeeming of mankind. And it is proved by many reaſons and texts, that foraſmuch as the whole ſcripture crieth out that he was clothed with fleſh, to the end that he might be the Redeemer, therefore it is too great raſhneſs to imagine any other cauſe or purpoſe. 2. 12. 4.

Neither is it lawful to ſearch further concerning Chriſt: and thoſe that do ſearch further, do with wicked boldneſs run forward to the feigning of a new Chriſt: and herein Oſiander is reproved, who hath at this time renewed this queſtion, and affirmeth that this error is confuted by no teſtimony of ſcripture. 2. 12. 5.

And the principle is overthrown which he buildeth on, that man was created after the image of God, becauſe he was formed after the likeneſs of Chriſt to come, that he might reſemble him whom the Father had already decreed to cloath with fleſh: and there is ſhewed that the image of God in Adam, was the marks of excellency wherewith God had garniſhed him, which doth alſo ſhine in the angels. 2. 12. 6, 7.

A ſolution of other objections or abſurdities which the ſame Oſiander feareth: namely, that then Chriſt was born and created after the image of Adam but as it were by chance: and that the angels ſhould have lacked their head, and men ſhould have lacked Chriſt their king. 2. 12. 6, 7.

How the two natures do make one perſon of the mediator in Chriſt: which is ſhewed by a ſimilitude taken from the joining of the ſoul and body in one man: and then it is proved by divers places that the ſcripture doth many times give unto Chriſt thoſe things which properly belongeth to the Godhead, and ſometimes thoſe things which muſt be referred only to the manhood, and ſometimes giveth to the one nature that which is proper to the other: which figurative manner of ſpeech is called communicating of properties. 2. 14. 1, 2. and ſometimes alſo aſcribeth to Chriſt thoſe things which do comprehend both natures together, but do ſeverally well agree with neither of them. Which laſt point the moſt part of the old writers have not ſufficiently marked: yet it is good to be noted, for the diſſolving of many doubts, and for avoiding of the errors of Neſtorius and Eutyches. 2. 14. 3. 4.

A confutation of the error of Servetus, who had put in the ſtead of the ſon of God, an imagined thing made of the ſubſtance of God's ſpirit, fleſh, and three uncreated elements: his ſubtilty is diſcloſed, and there is proved (which thing he denieth) that Chriſt was the Son of God, even before that he was born in the fleſh, becauſe he is that Word begotten of the Father before all worlds. 2. 14. 5.

Alſo it is proved that he is truly and properly the Son of God in the fleſh, that is to ſay in the nature of man, but yet in reſpect of his Godhead, and not of his fleſh, as Servetus bableth. 2. 14. 6.

An expoſition of certain places which Servetus and his diſciples do enforce for defence of their error: there is alſo another cavil of his diſcloſed, that Chriſt before that he appeared in the fleſh, is in no place called the ſon of God but under a figure. 2. 14. 7.

Alſo there is opened the error of all them who do not acknowlege Chriſt the ſon of God but in the fleſh: and there are briefly rehearſed the groſs ſubtilties of Servetus, wherewith he hath bewitched himſelf and others, overthrowing that which pure faith believeth concerning the perſon of the ſon of God: and thereupon is gathered that with the crafty ſubtilties of that filthy dog, the hope of ſalvation is utterly extinguiſhed. 2. 14. 8.

Merit of Christ.

It is truly and properly said that Christ merited for us the grace of God and salvation. Where it is proved that Christ was not only the instrument or minister of salvation, but also the author and principal doer thereof: and in so saying, the grace of God is not defaced, because the merit of Christ is not set against mercy, but dependeth upon it. And those things which are subalterna, fight not as contraries. 2 17. 1.

The distinction of the merit of Christ and of the grace of God is proved by many places of scripture. 2. 17. 2.

There are alledged many testimonies of scripture, out of which it is certainly and soundly gathered, that Christ by his obedience hath truly purchased and deserved favour for us with his father. 2. 17. 3, 4, 5.

It is a foolish curiosity to enquire whether Christ hath deserved any thing for himself: and it is rashness to affirm it. 2. 17. 6.

Merits of works.

The boastings that are made of the Merits of works do overthrow as well the praise of God in giving righteousness, as also the certainty of salvation. 3. 15. 1.

Whosoever first applied the name of merit to good works in the sight of God's judgment, he did against the pureness of faith. And though the old fathers used that name, yet they so used it that they have in many places shewed that they attribute nothing to works. 3. 15. 2.

An exposition of certain places, wherewith the sophisters go about to prove that the name of merit toward God is found in the scripture. 3. 15. 4.

It is proved by authority of the apostles and Augustine, that the rewards of righteousness do depend upon the meer liberality of God. 2. 5. 2.

It is proved that this is a false saying, that Christ merited for us only the first grace, and that afterward we do merit by our own works. 3. 15. 6, 7.

There are certain things touching merits in the article of justification by faith.

Ministry of the church

Of the ministry of the church, and of them who despise this manner of learning. 4. 1. 5.

Of the efficacy of the ministry. 4. 5. 6.

God, who might teach the church either himself alone or by angels, yet doth it by the ministry of men for three causes. 4. 3. 1.

The ministry of the church is garnished with many notables titles of commendation in the scripture 4. 3. 2, 3.

Of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers; and what is the several office of every of them. 4. 3. 45.

The chief parts of the office of apostles and pastors are to preach the gospel, and minister the sacraments. 4. 3. 6.

Pastors are so bound to their churches that they may not remove to any other place without public authority. 4. 3. 7.

They are called in scripture, bishops, priests, pastors and ministers who govern churches. 4. 3. 8.

No man ought to thrust in himself in the church to teach or govern; but there is a calling required. 4. 3. 10.

The preaching of the word of God is compared to seed which is scattered in the ground: whereby we understand that the whole encrease proceedeth of the blessing of God and the effectual working of the holy Ghost. 4. 14. 11.

What manner of men ought to be chosen bishops, and in what sort and of whom they are to be chosen, and with what form or ceremony they are to be ordered. 4. 3. 11. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

The old church before the papacy, divided all their ministers into three degrees, pastors, elders, and deacons. 4. 4. 1.

Of the commission to remit and retain sins, or to bind and loose, which is a part of the power of the keys, and pertaineth to the ministry of the word. 4. 11. 1.

Monkery.

Monastries in old time were the seed-plots of ecclesiastical orders: and there is described out of Augustine the form of the old monkery, and how they were wont at that time to get their living with the labour of their hands. Whereby appeareth that at this day the manner of Popish monkery is far otherwise. 4. 13. 8, 9, 10.

Of the proud title of perfection wherewith the monks do set out their kind of life. 4. 13. 11. because they bind themselves to keep the counsels of the gospel (as they call them) whereunto other christian men are not bound. sect. 12. and because they have forsaken all their possessions. sect. 14.

As many as go into monastries, do depart from the church, since they openly affirm that their monkery is a form of second baptism. 4. 13, 14.

The Popish monks do in manners much differ from the old monks. 4. 13. 15.

Some things are to be misliked even in the profession of the old monkery, and they that were the authors thereof brought a perillous example into the church. 4. 13. 16.

Monks with their vows do consecrate themselves not to God but to the devil. 4. 13. 17.

As all vows unlawful and not rightly made, are of no value before God, so they ought to be void to us 4. 13. 20.

Therefore they who depart from monkery to some honest trade of life, are wrongfully accused of faith breaking and perjury. 4. 13. 2.

Of mortification.

O.

Obedience of children to parents.

AN exposition of the fifth commandment: the end and sum thereof. 2. 8. 35.

How

how far this word honouring extendeth, and there are three parts thereof, reverence, obedience, and thanksgiving. 2. 8. 36.

Of the promise adjoined to the fifth commandment, concerning long continuance of life, and how far the same pertaineth to us at this day. 2. 8. 37.

How and by what diverse means, God sheweth his vengeance upon the disobedient: yet obedience is not due to parents and others, but saving the law of God. 2. 8. 38.

Offences.

What offences are to be avoided, and what to be neglected: what is an offence given, and what an offence taken. 3. 19. 11.

It is declared by the doctrine and example of Paul who are weak, to whom we must beware that we give no offence. 3. 19. 12.

Whereas we are commanded to beware that we offend not the weak, the same is meant only in things indifferent: therefore they do wrongfully abuse this doctrine who say that they hear mass for the weak's sake. 3. 19. 13.

Officials.

Of Popish bishops officials, as they call them. 4. 11. 7. 8.

Orders Papistical.

The sacrament of order breadeth to the papists seven other petty sacraments, of whose names and differences they themselves are not yet agreed. 4. 19. 22.

Their fond and ungodly foolishness, forasmuch as they make Christ fellow officer with them in every one of them. 4. 19. 23.

Of acoluthes, door-keepers and readers, whom the Papists do make orders of the church and sacraments, 3. 19. 24. and with what ceremonies they consecrate them. sect. 27.

Of exorcists or conjurers an order of the popish church. 4. 19. 24.

The orders of psalmists, door-keepers and acoluthes, are vain names among the Papists, forasmuch as they themselves do not execute the offices, but some boy, or any lay-man. 4. 19. 24.

Of the shaving of the clergy, and the signification thereof by the doctrine of the Papists. 4. 19. 25.

They do wrongfully apply it to Paul's example, who shaved his head when he took a vow, or to the old Nazarites. 4. 19. 26.

It is shewed out of Augustine whence it first began. 4. 19. 27.

Of the three higher orders: and first of priesthood or sacrificership: where is shewed that the papists have most wickedly perverted the order appointed by God, and do wrong to Christ the only and eternal sacrificing priest. 4. 19. 28.

Of their blowing at the making of the popish priests, and how in that ceremony they do wrongfully counterfeit Christ; where is declared that the Lord did many things which he would not have to be examples for us to follow. 4. 19. 29.

Of the indelible character or indefaceable mark of the oil wherewith popish priests are anointed at their creation. And how the same is wrongfully applied to the children of Aaron. But these priests in coveting to be like the Levites, are apostates from Christ. 4 19. 30, 31.

Original sin.

A definition and expounding of original sin. 4. 15. 10, 11, 12.

A true definition of original and a declaration of the same definition: wherein is shewed, that not only punishment came from Adam upon us, but also that the infection derived from him remaineth in us, and how it is the sin of another and also our own sin: finally, that such infection pierced not only into the inferior desire, but also into the very understanding mind and bottom of the heart, so that there is no part of the soul free from corruption. 2. 1. 8. 9.

A confutation of them that dare charge God with their faults, because we say that men are naturally faulty: and there is proved, that man is corrupt by natural viciousness: (to the end that no man should think it to be gotten by evil custom) but yet such as proceeded not from nature, but it is an accidental quality, and not a substantial property from the beginning 2. 1, 10, 11.

Patience.

A Part of the forsaking of ourselves, in respect of God, is contentment of mind and sufference: which we shall perform, if in seeking the advantage or quietness of this present life we yield ourselves wholly to the Lord, and do not desire, hope for, or think upon any other mean of prospering than by his blessing. 3. 7. 8.

So it shall come to pass that we shall never seek our own interest by unlawful means or with wronging of our neighbours; also that we shall not burn with unmeasurable desire of riches or of honours; finally if things prosper well with us, we shall not be holden from pride, and if they happen ill, we shall yet be restrained from impatience. 3. 7. 9. Which extendeth to all chances whereunto our present life is subject, whereof the faithful do always acknowlege the hand of God their Father, and not fortune, to be the governor. 3. 7. 10.

The patience of the faithful is not such as is without all feeling of sorrow, but such as being upholden by godly comfort, fighteth against the natural feeling of sorrow. Therefore the patience of the stoics is to be rejected; neither is it in itself any fault to weep or fear. 3. 8. 8, 9.

A description of that striving which is ingendred in the hearts of the faithful by the feeling of nature, which feeling cannot be clean done away, and by the affecti-affection of godlineſs wherewith that ſame feeling muſt be ſubdued and tamed. 3. 8. 10.

There is a great difference between philoſophical and chriſtian patience. Foraſmuch as the philoſophers do teach us to obey becauſe we muſt ſo of neceſſity; but Chriſt teacheth it, becauſe it is righteous, and alſo becauſe it is profitable for us. 3. 8. 11.

Pardons.

The ſo long continuing of pardons declareth in how deep darkneſs of errors men have been drowned theſe certain ages paſt. 3. 5. 1.

What pardons are by the papiſts doctrine; whereby it is proved that they are a diſhonouring of the blood of Chriſt; a compariſon of Chriſt and popiſh pardons. 3. 5. 1.

A confutation of the wicked doctrine of pardons, by the notable ſaying of Leo biſhop of Rome, and of Auguſtine. And there is ſhewed that the blood of martyrs is not unlawful, although it have no place in forgiveneſs of ſins. 3. 5. 3, 4.

Either the goſpel of God muſt lye, or pardons muſt be lying deceits. And there is ſhewed what ſeemeth to have been the beginning of them. 3. 5. 5.

Penance, the popiſh ſacrament.

Of the uſage of the old church in public penance; and of the laying on of hands at reconciliation. Alſo how in proceſs of time the laying on of hands was uſed in private abſolutions. 4. 19. 14.

The divers opinions of the ſchoolmen how penance is a ſacrament; and there is ſhewed that the definition of a ſacrament doth not agree with it. 4. 19. 15, 16.

It is a lie, and a deceitful error which they have invented concerning the ſacrament of penance: and it is a wicked and blaſphemous title wherewith they have garniſhed it, a ſecond board after a ſhip-wreck from baptiſm. 4. 19. 17.

Perſeverance.

See book 2. chap. 5. ſect. 3.

A confutation of the moſt wicked error that perſeverance is given of God according to the merit of men, ſo as every man hath ſhewed himſelf not unthankful for the firſt grace: and this opinion is ſhewed a double error. Of the common diſtinction of grace working, and working together: and how Auguſtine uſed it, qualifying it with an apt definition. 2. 3. 11.

Politic government.

There is a difference to be made between policy, and the inward government of the ſoul. Their doctrine is to be rejected who go about to overthrow policy as a thing not neceſſary for Chriſtians, or as a thing that overthroweth the ſpiritual liberty of the ſoul. Alſo thoſe flatterers are to be rejected, who do give too much unto it, and do ſet it in compariſon againſt the authority of God. 4 20. 1; 2, 3.

Policy is the gift of God, which bringeth great advantages to mankind and no ſmall help to the defence of the ſtate of religion. Polite government hath three parts, the magiſtrate, the laws and the people. 4. 20. 3.

Of the three forms of civil government, ariſtocracy the government of the beſt choiſeſt men. Democracy the government of the people, monarchy the government of one: it cannot ſimply be determined which of theſe is the beſt: yet it cometh to paſs by the fault of men, that it is ſafer and more tolerable to have many to govern than one to reign. But all theſe forms are of God, and diverſly diſpoſed by him, therefore it is the duty of private men to obey, and not to make innovation of ſtates after their own will. 4. 20. 8.

Of the immunity that the Romiſh clergy take to themſelves, which was altogether unknown to the biſhops of the old church. 4. 11. 15.

In matters of faith, the judgment in the old time pertained to the church and not to the princes, altho' ſometimes princes intermeddled their authority in eccleſiaſtical matters, but the ſame was done to preſerve and not to trouble the order of the church. 4. 11. 15, 16.

Of the authority of the ſword uſurped by the biſhops in the papacy: and how they have by little and little from ſo ſmall beginnings grown to ſo great increaſe. 4. 11. 9, 10.

Pope.

It is proved that the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome is not by the inſtitution of Chriſt. 4. 6. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Neither had Peter any principality in the church or among the apoſtles. 4. 6. 5, 6, 7.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man ſhould bear rule over the whole church. 4. 6. 8, 9, 10.

Although Peter had had a ſupremacy in the church, yet it followeth not that the ſeat of that ſupremacy ought to be at Rome. 4. 6. 11, 12, 13.

It is proved by many arguments that Peter was not biſhop of Rome. 4. 6. 14, 15.

The ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome is according to the uſe of the old church. 4. 6. 16, 17.

Of the beginning and increaſing of the Roman papacy, until it advanced itſelf to that height, whereby both the liberty of the church is oppreſſed and all moderate government hath been overthrown. 4. 7.

In the moſt part of the councils, the biſhop of Rome nor his legates had not the chief place, but ſome other of the biſhop had it at the council of Chalcedon: but yet without order. 4. 7. 1, 2.

Of the title of ſupremacy and other titles of pride wherewith the pope boaſteth himſelf, and when and how they crept in. 4. 7. 3.

Gregory pronounceth that the title of univerſal biſhop was deviſed by the devil, and publiſhed by the crier of Antichriſt. 4. 7. 4.

It is proved by the uſe of the old church, that it is falſe which the biſhop of Rome, boaſteth that he hath hath jurisdiction over all churches. 4. 7. 5. Whether ye consider the ordering of bishops, sect. 6. or ecclesiastical admonitions and censures, sect. 7. or summoning of councils, sect. 8. or authority of higher appeals. sect. 9, 10.

The old bishops of Rome in the most part of their epistles did ambitiously set forth the glory of their see, but those epistles at that time had no credit. Also they did thrust in certain forged things as though they had been written in the old time by holy men. 4. 7. 11, 20.

Although in the time of Gregory, the authority of the bishop of Rome was greatly increased, yet it is proved by his writings that it was then far from unbridled dominion and tyranny. 4. 7. 12, 13, 22.

There was strife for the supremacy between the bishop of Constantinople and the bishop of Rom . 4. 7 . 14, 15, 16. until Phocas granted to Boniface the third, that Rome should be the head of all churches; which afterward Pipine confirmed, when he gave to the see of Rome jurisdiction over the churches of France. 4. 7. 17.

From thenceforth the tyranny of the see of Rome increased more and more, partly by ignorance and partly by negligence of bishops; which destruction of the whole order of the church Bernard lamenteth and layeth to the pope's charge. 4. 7. 18. 22.

The insolence and shamelessness of the bishops of Rome in setting forth their own supreme authority. 4. 7. 19, 20. which is reproved by sayings of Cyprian and Gregory. sect. 21.

Rome cannot be the mother of all churches, forasmuch as it is in no church Neither can the bishop of Rome be head of bishops, since he is no bishop. 4. 7. 23, 24,

It is proved by Paul, that the pope is antichrist. 4. 7. 25.

Although the church of Rome in old time had had the honour of supremacy, yet the same is not to be bound to a place. 4. 7. 26, 29.

Of the manners of the city of Rome, of the pope, and of the cardinals and their divinity. 4. 7. 27, 28.

The bishop of Rome first laid hands upon kingdoms, and then upon the empire: which is proved by most sharp reprehensions of Bernard to be unmeet for him that boasteth himself the successor of the apostles. 4. 11. 11.

Of the gift of Constantine, wherewith he laboureth to hide his robbery. 4. 11. 12. and how there are not yet five hundred years past, since the popes were in subjection to princes, and by what occasion they have shaken it off. sect. 13. and how they brought the city of Rome into their power, but about a hundred and thirty years ago. sect. 14.

Prayer.

True faith cannot be idle from calling upon God. 3. 20.

How necessary and how many ways profitable is the exercise of praying. 3. 20. 2. although the Lord will not cease while we crave not, nor needeth any to put him in mind. sect. 3.

The first rule of well framing our prayer, is that we be no otherwise disposed in heart and mind than becometh them that enter into talk with God. 3. 20. 4. 5.

The second rule is, that in praying we always feel our own neediness, and that earnestly considering that we want all these things that we ask, we join with our prayer an earnest and fervent desire to obtain. 3. 20. 6.

We ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietness of our estates, the only remembrance of our sin only ought to be no small provocation to move us to that exercise. 3. 20. 7.

The third rule of praying well, is that we forsake all confidence of our own glory, lest if we presumtuously take any thing, be it never so little, unto ourselves, we with our vain pride, fall down from his face. 3. 20. 8.

The beginning of praying well, is the obtaining of pardon, with an humble and plain confession of offence. 3. 20. 9.

In what sense the prayers of certain holy men are to be taken, in which to intreat God, they seem to allege their own righteousness. 3. 20. 10.

The fourth rule of praying well, is that being so overthrown and beaten down with true humility: we are nevertheless encouraged to pray with an assured hope to obtain: so in our prayers, faith and repentance doth meet together. 3. 20. 11.

Of the certainty of faith, whereby the faithful do determine that God is favourable unto them. And how necessary the same is in prayer: neither is that certainty weakened, when it is joined with acknowleging of our own misery. 3. 20. 12.

God commandeth us to call upon him: he promiseth that we shall be heard both these things are necessary, that we pray in faith. 3. 20. 13.

There are rehearsed divers promises of God with the sweetness whereof they that are not stirred up to prayer, are altogether unexcusable. 3. 20. 14.

An exposition of certain places wherein God seemeth to have assented to some mens prayers which yet were grounded upon no promise. 3. 20. 15.

These four rules praying well, are not examined with so extreme rigour, but that God herein doth bear with many infirmities, yea many irregularities in them that are his, which is proved by many examples. 3. 20. 16.

We must always pray in the name of Christ only, 3. 20. 17. neither were the faithful never heard any otherwise. sect. 18.

They who pray otherwise, have nothing left for them at the throne of God, but wrath and terror. 3. 20. 19.

It is not against Christ's office of mediator: that we are are commanded to pray one for another. 3. 20 19.

A confutation of the ſophiſters device, who ſay that Chriſt is the mediator of redemption, and the faithful are mediators of interceſſion. 3. 20. 20.

Againſt them, who make dead ſaints interceſſors to God for them, or do mingle the interceſſion of Chriſt with the prayers and merits of dead men. 3. 20. 21.

This fooliſhneſs hath proceeded in the papacy to groſs monſtrouſneſs of ungodlineſs, and to horrible ſacrileges. 3. 20. 22.

A confutation of the arguments wherewith the papiſts labour to confirm the interceſſion of dead ſaints. 3. 20. 23, 24, 25, 26.

It is unlawful to direct our prayers to dead ſaints, foraſmuch as this kind of worſhipping doth moſt properly belong to God alone. 3. 20. 27.

Predeſtination.

It is proved that the doctrine of predeſtination is a doctrine of moſt ſweet fruit. There are rehearſed three principal profits thereof: and they are admoniſhed who being moved with a certain curioſity do beyond the bounds of ſcripture break into the ſecrets of the wiſdom of God. 3. 1. 1, 2. and alſo they who would have all mention of predeſtination to be buried. ſect. 3, 4.

What is predeſtination, and what is the foreknowlege of God and how the one of them is wrongfully ſet after the other. The example of predeſtination in all the offſpring of Abraham in reſpect of other nations, is confirmed by many teſtimonies of ſcripture. 3, 21. 5.

Alſo there is ſhewed a ſpecial predeſtination, whereby even among the children themſelves he hath made a difference betw en ſome and other ſome. ſect. 6, 7.

This is proved by Auguſtine, ſect. 8. and the trifling ſubtle device of Thomas to the contrary is confuted. ſect. 9.

The promiſe of ſalvation are not directed to all, but peculiarly to the elect. 3. 22. 10.

Againſt them who ſay, that this doctrine overthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proved by Auguſtine that preaching hath its courſe, and yet the knowlege of predeſtination is not hindred thereby. 3. 23. 13.

In this point of doctrine we muſt ſo temper our manner of teaching the truth, that ſo far as we may, we wiſely beware of offence. 3. 23, 14.

Where-

Whereas ſome obey the preaching of the word of God, and other ſome deſpiſe it, or are more blinded and hardened thereby, although this come to paſs by their own malice and unthankfulneſs, yet we muſt therewith alſo know, that this diverſity dependeth upon the ſecret counſel of God, than which it is unlawful for to ſearch for any further cauſe. 3. 24. 12, 13, 14.

An expoſition of certain places, wherein God ſeemeth to deny that it cometh to paſs by his ordinance that the wicked periſh, but in aſmuch as againſt his will they wilfully bring deſtruction upon themſelves. And there is ſhewed that thoſe places make nothing againſt the doctrine of predeſtination. 3. 24. 15, 16.

The univerſalneſs of the promiſes of ſalvation, maketh nothing againſt the doctrine of the predeſtination of the reprobate: and yet not without cauſe are they framed univerſally. 3. 24. 16.

Here alſo are confuted certain objections of them who deny this point of doctrine.

That we may know to what end Chriſt was ſent of his Father, and what he brought unto us, three things are chiefly to be conſidered in him, his prophetical office, his kingdom, and his prieſthood: and therefore is given to him the title of Chriſt (or Meſſias which ſignifieth Anointed) although he be eſpecially ſo called in reſpect of his kingdom. Although that God always gave prophets and teachers to his church, yet it is proved that all the godly looked for full light of underſtanding, only at the coming of Meſſias: and that he when he appeared was anointed a prophet, not only for himſelf, but alſo for all his body. 2. 15. 1, 2.

As touching his kingdom, firſt we muſt note the ſpiritual nature thereof, whereupon alſo is gathered the eternal continuance of it, which is of two ſorts; the one pertaineth to the whole body of the church, the other is proper to every member; both ſorts are declared and plainly ſet forth by teſtimonies of ſcripture. 3 15. 3.

It is declared that the profit of the kingdom of Chriſt cannot otherwiſe be perceived of us, but when we acknowlege it to be ſpiritual; and the ſame profit conſiſteth in two things, namely that it inricheth us with all good things neceſſary to eternal ſalvation, ſecondly, that it fortifieth us with ſtrength and virtue againſt the devil and all his aſſaults. And ſo Chriſt reigneth for us rather than for himſelf, whereupon we are rightfully called Chriſtians; where it is ſaid that at the laſt day he ſhall yield up his kingdom to God and his Father, and ſuch like ſayings, the ſame maketh nothing againſt the eternity of his kingdom. 4. 15. 4, 5.

As touching his prieſthood, that the efficacy and profit thereof may come to us, it is ſhewed that we muſt begin at the death of Chriſt. Hereupon it followeth that he is an everlaſting interceſſor, by whoſe mediationwe obtain favour, whereby ariſeth to godly conſciences both boldneſs to pray, and quietneſs: finally that he is ſo a prieſt, that he joineth us in the fellowſhip of ſo great an honour, to the end that the ſacrifices of prayers and praiſe which come from us, may be acceptable to God. 2. 15 6.

Promiſes.

Not without cauſe all the promiſes are concluded in Chriſt; foraſmuch as every promiſe is a teſtifying of the love of God toward us, and none of us is beloved of God without Chriſt. Neither was Naaman the Syrian, Cornelius the captain, nor the eunuch to whom Philip was carried, without knowlege of Chriſt, although they had but a very ſmall taſte of him, and a faith in ſome part unexpreſſed. 3. 2 32.

The Lord, to the end to fill our hearts with love of righteouſneſs and hatred of wickedneſs, was not content to ſet forth bare commandments only, but addeth promiſes of bleſſings both of this preſent life and of eternal bleſſedneſs, and alſo threatnings both of preſent miſeries, and of eternal death; the threatnings declare the great pureneſs of God, The promiſes do ſhew his great love to righteouſneſs, and his wonderful goodneſs toward men. 2. 8. 4

Of the promiſe of God's mercy to be extended to a thouſand generations. 2. 8 21

Although the promiſes of the law are conditional, yet they are not given in vain. 2. 7. 4.

Providence of God.

Prophane men, by fleſhly underſtanding do confeſs God the creator, otherwiſe than we do by faith; foraſmuch as faith doth teach that he is alſo the governor of all thing not by a certain univerſal motion but by a ſingular providence which extendeth even to the leaſt ſparrow. 1. 16. 1.

They who give any thing to fortune, do bury the providence of God, by whoſe ſecret council all ſucceſſes are governed. 1. 16. 2.

Things without life, although each of them have their property naturally planted in them, yet do not put forth their force, but ſo far as they are directed by the preſent hand of God; which is proved by the ſun, before which he would both light to be, and the earth to abound with all kind of good things; which alſo we read to have ſtood ſtill by the ſpace of two days, and gone back two degrees at the commandment of God. 1. 16. 2. alſo by the ſtars and ſigns of the heaven, which the unbelievers do fear. ſect. 3.

The almightineſs of God is buſied in continual doing, ſo that it extendeth to every particular act, and nothing happeneth but by his counſel; which whoſo do not acknowlege they defraud God of his glory and do extenuate his goodneſs; but we on the other ſide do receive double fruit thereof. 1. 16. 3.

It is proved that the providence of God doth not behold things that are done, but governeth all ſucceſſes; whereby is overthrown the feigned invention of bare foreknowlege and of universal providence only: also the error of the Epicures is confuted, and of them who give to God a government only above the middle region of the air. Yet there may a certain universal providence be granted, but so, that the special providence be not darkened, which doth govern not only certain but all particular actions. 1. 16. 4, 5.

That not only the beginning of motion is in the disposing of God, is proved by the plentifulness of one year and the barrenness of another, for whereas God calleth the one his blessing, and the other his curse and vengeance. 1. 16. 5.

The providence of God in governing the world, is chiefly to be considered in mankind, and in the diverse estate of all men, and diverse disposing of successes. 1. 16, 6. 7.

Against them who cavil, that this doctrine of the providence of God, is the stoics doctrine of fate or destiny. 1. 16. 8.

Whether any thing happen by fortune or chance: where is rehearsed the saying of Basilius Magnus, that chance and fortune are words of heathen men: also the saying of Augustine, that he repented that he had used the name of fortune. Yet those things may be said to happen by fortune in respect of us, which being considered in their nature, or weighed according to our knowlege do seem so, although in the secret counsel of God they are necessary: also all things that are to come, may be said to be happening, inasmuch as they are uncertain to us. 1. 16. 8, 9.

What things are to be considered, that the doctrine of the providence of God, may be referred to a right hand, that we have the profit thereof: and where the causes of those things that happen, appear not unto us, we must beware that we do not think, that things are rolled by the sway of fortune: but we must so reverence his secret judgements, that we esteem his will the most just cause of all things. 1. 17. 1.

Against certain dogs who at this day do bark against the providence of God, it is proved by the scripture that whereas God hath so revealed his will in the law, and the gospel that he illuminateth the minds of them that are his with the spirit of understanding, to perceive the mysteries therein contained, which otherwise are incomprehensible, yet the order of governing the world is called a bottomless depth, because when we know not the causes thereof, yet we ought reverently to honour it. 1. 17. 2.

Such prophane men do foolishly cumber themselves, when they alledge that if the doctrine of the providence of God be true, then the prayers of the faithful in which they ask any thing for time to come are vain, no counsel is to be taken for things to come, and then men who do any thing against the law of God, do not sin: these dangerous errors they shall avoid, who in considering the providence of God, shall frame themselves to true modesty. 1. 17. 3.

As concerning things to come, it is proved that the scripture doth well join the advisements of men with the providence of God: because we are not hindred by his eternal decrees, but that under his will, we may both foresee for our selves, and order our own things: for the knowlege of consulting and taking heed, are inspired into men by the Lord, whereby we may serve his providence, in the preserving of our own life. 1. 17 4.

In all successes of time past the will of God doth govern; and yet the doers of wicked deeds are not excused, because they are accused by their own conscience, and do not obey the will of God, but their own lust. They are indeed the instruments of God's providence, but so, that they find the whole evil in themselves, and in God is found nothing but a lawful use of their evilness. 1. 17. 5. and 1. 18. 4. Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of king Jeroboam, the ten tribes forsaking the house of David, the slaughter of the sons of Achab, and in the betraying of the Son of God.

A godly and holy meditation of the providence of God, which is taught by the rule of godliness first that being certainly persuaded that nothing happeneth by fortune, we always cast our eyes to God the chief cause of all things: then that we doubt not his singular providence watcheth for us, whether we have to do with men as well evil as good, or with his other creatures; to which use we must apply the promises of God in the scripture which testify the same, the examples whereof are rehearsed. 1. 17. 6.

We must also adjoin those testimonies of scripture which teach that all men are under the power of God, whether we need to get their good wills to restrain the malice of our enemies: which last point God worketh divers ways, sometimes by taking away their wit, and sometimes by granting it, he aweth them that they dare not go about that which they have conceived: and sometimes also when he suffereth them to go about it, he breaketh their enterprises: upon which knowlege necessarily followeth a thankfulness of mind in so prosperous successes of things. 1. 17. 7.

In adversity when we are hurt by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of mind: which is shewed in the examples of Joseph being afflicted of his brethren, Job persecuted of the Chaldees, and David railed upon by Shemei. If we happen to be distressed with any misery without the work of men, this self same doctrine is the best remedy against impatience because the scripture testifieth, that even adversities also do come from God. 1. 17 8.

A godly man principally regarding the providence of God, yet will not live inferior causes unmarked. Therefore if he have received a benefit of any man, he will heartily know and confess himself to be bound unto him. If he have taken harm or done harm to any other by his negligence or want of heed, he will impute it unto himself, much less will he excuse his own offences In things to come chiefly he will have consideration of inferior causes, but yet so that in determining ing he will not be carried away with his own judgmnet but commit himself to the wisdom of God; neither shall his trust so stay upon outwards helps, that he will carelesly rest upon them if he have them, nor be dismayed for fear if he want them. 1. 17. 9.

A large description of the inestimable felicity of a godly mind which resteth upon the providence of God: and on the otherside the miserable carefulness wherewith we must needs be distressed when the weakness of this earthly cottage maketh us subject to so many diseases, since our life and safety is besieged with infinite dangers at home, abroad, upon the land, in the water, by men, and by devils. 1. 17. 10, 11.

Those places of scripture, where it is said that God repented him: maketh nothing against the doctrine of providence, forasmuch as therein (like as also when he is said to be angry) the scripture applying it self to our capacity describeth him, not such as he is, but such as we feel him to be. Likewise, where he spared the Ninivites. to whom he had threatned destruction within forty days: whereas he prolonged the life of Hezekiah for many years, to whom he had declared present death: because such threatnings contain an unexpressed condition. Which is well proved by a like example in king Abimelech, who was rebuked for Abraham's wife. 1. 17. 12, 13, 14.

A confutation of them who coveting to get a praise of modesty, go about to maintain the righteousness of God with a lying defence, when they say: that those things which Satan and all the the reprobates do naughtily, are done by the sufferance of God, and not by his providence and will. And it is proved by the affliction of Job, the deceiving of Achab, the killing of Christ, the incestous adultery of Absalom, and many other examples, that men do work nothing but that which he hath already decreed with himself, and doth appoint so to be by his secret direction. 1. 18. 1.

And this hath place, not only in outward doings, but also in secret motions. For it is proved by the hardning of Pharaoh, and other testimonies, that God worketh even in the minds also and hearts of the wicked. Neither maketh it any thing to the contrary, that oftentimes the work of Satan is used therein: for God worketh nevertheless, but after his own manner, using a just revenge 1. 18. 2. therefore God is not the author of sins. sect. 4.

They are proved guilty of intollerable pride, who refuse this doctrine under pretence of modesty. A confutation of their objection when they say that if nothing happen but with the will of God, then hath he in himself two contrary wills, forasmuch as he doth appoint those things to be done by his secret counsel, which he hath openly forbidden by his laws. And there is shewed, that God doth not disagree with himself, that the will of God is not changed, that he doth not feign himself to disallow that which he willeth: but whereas there is in God, but one simple will, the same to us appeareth diverse, because for the weakness of our understanding, we conceive not how he diversly both willethn ot and willeth the self same thing to be done. Finally it is, proved by Augustine, that man sometimes with good will willeth something which God willeth not: and sometimes willeth that thing with evil will, which God willeth with good will. 1. 18. 3.

The consideration of God's power in governing this frame of heaven and earth, and all parts that are in them 1. 5. 5.

The fellowship of men is so governed by the providence of God, that he sheweth himself liberal, merciful, righteous, and severe. 1. 5. 6.

Those things which in the life of men are counted chances, as well of prosperity as adversity are so many tokens of the heavenly providence, 1. 5. 7. and ought to awaken us to the hope of the life to come. sect. 9.

How God worketh in the hearts of them that are his, and Satan in them that are his, but yet so, that they are not excused. 2. 4. 1.

God worketh also in the wicked, and even in the same work wherein worketh, and yet is not God so said to be the author of sin, neither is Satan or the wicked excused, but there is difference between the one and the other, both in the end and manner of doing. 2. 4. 2, 5.

The old writers oftentimes referred these things, not to the working of God, but to his foreknowlege or sufferance, lest the wicked should thereby take occasion to speak irreverently of the works of God. But the scripture when it saith that God blindeth, hardeneth, and such like, declareth somewhat more than a sufferance: although God do work two ways in the reprobate, namely of forsaking them, and taking his spirit from them, and also by delivering them to Satan the minister of his wrath. 2. 4. 3, 4.

The ministry of Satan is used to stir forward the reprobate, whensoever the Lord by his providence directeth them hither or thither. 2. 4. 5.

Purgatory.

We ought not to wink at the doctrine of purgatory, forasmuch as it is a damnable invention of Satan which maketh void the cross of Christ, &c. 3. 5. 6.

An exposition of certain places of scripture which the Papist do wrongfully wrest to the confirmation of their purgatory. 3. 5. 7, 8, 9.

An answer to the objection of the Papists that it hath been an ancient usage of the church that prayers should be made for the dead. Where is shewed that this was done by them in the old time, without the word of God, by a certain wrongful imitation, lest Christians if they were slow in having care of funerals and the dead, should seem worse than heathen men. Yet herein was a great difference between this slipping of these old men, and the obstinate error of the Papists. 3. 5. 10.

Redeemer Christ.

THE knowlege of God the creator is unprofitable unto us, unless faith do also follow, setting him forth in Chriſt a father and redeemer to us, and this doctrine from the beginning of the world in all ages hath been holden among the children of God. 2. 6. 1.

It is proved by divers arguments, and teſtimonies of ſcripture, that the happy ſtate of the church hath always been grounded upon the perſon of Chriſt. For both the firſt adoption of the choſen people, and the preſerving of the church, the deliverance of them in perils, and the reſtoring after their diſſipation did always depend upon the grace of the mediator. And the hope of all the godly was never repoſed any other where than in Chriſt. 2. 6. 2, 3, 4.

It is to be diligently conſidered how Chriſt hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, that we may find in him all things neceſſary for us, ſince (as Bernard ſaith) he is to us light, meat, oil, ſalt, &c. 2, 16. 1.

An expoſition how we ſhould ſay that God was our enemy until he was reconciled to us by Chriſt, whereas to give Chriſt to us, and to prevent us with mercy, were ſigns of the love wherewith he before embraced us. And there is ſhewed that the ſcripture uſeth this ſpeech and ſuch other, to apply it ſelf to our capacity; and yet it doth not the ſame falſely. And all this is proved by the authority of ſcripture, and the teſtimony of Auguſtine. 2. 16. 2, 3.

Regeneration.

Againſt certain Anabaptiſts, who invent a phrantic intemperance inſtead of ſpiritual regeneration, namely that the children of God being now reſtored into the ſtate of innocency, ought no more to be careful to bridle the luſt of the fleſh, but only to follow the Spirit for their guide. 3. 3. 13.

The reſt pertaining to this matter, ſee in the title of repentance.

Religion.

Neceſſity enforceth the reprobate to confeſs that there is ſome God. 1. 4. 4.

They are deceived who ſay that religion was deviſed by the ſubtilty of certain men to hold the ſimple people in order. 1. 3. 2.

The very wicked and godleſs men are compelled whether they will or no to feel that there is a God. 1. 3. 2. and in what ſenſe David ſaith, that they think that there is no God. 1, 4. 2.

Remiſſion of ſins.

Againſt them who dream of perfection in this life, which taketh away need of aſking pardon. 3. 20. 45.

Of remiſſion of ſins: and in what ſenſe ſins are called debts, and how we are ſaid to forgive others that have offended againſt us. 3. 20. 45.

Of the diſtinction of fault and pain, where with moſt ſtrong teſtimonies of ſcripture the doting error of the papiſts is confuted, namely, that when the fault is forgiven, yet God retaineth the pain, which remaineth to be redeemed with ſatisfactions. 3. 4. 29, 30. and there alſo is ſhewed that they cannot eſcape away with their diſtinction between everlaſting pain and temporal pains.

Of certain place of ſcripture wherewith they go about to confirm their error where is declared that there are two kinds of the judgment of God: the one of vengeance, the other of chaſtiſement, which are wiſely to be diſtinguiſhed aſunder. 4. 4. 31.

The firſt of theſe, that is to ſay, vengeance, the faithful have alway earneſtly prayed to eſcape: the other, that is to ſay, chaſtiſment, they have received with quiet mind, becauſe it hath a teſtimony of love. And where it is ſaid that God is angry with his ſaints, the ſame is not meant of his purpoſe or affection to puniſh them, but is ſpoken of the vehement feeling of ſorrow wherewith they are ſtricken ſo ſoon as they bear any part of his ſeverity; and this is profitable for them. On the other ſide, the reprobate, when they are ſtricken with the ſcourges of God do already after a certain manner begin to feel the pains of his judgment. All which things are proved by teſtimonies of the ſcripture, and alſo by the expoſitions of Chryſoſtom and Auguſtine. 3. 4. 32, 33.

God when he had forgiven the adultery of David, chaſtiſed him both for common example, and alſo to humble him; and for this reaſon he daily maketh the faithful (to whom he is merciful) ſubject to the common miſeries of this life. 3. 4. 35.

An expoſition of the article of the creed concerning remiſſion of ſins. 4. 1. 20, 21.

The keys were given to the church, to forgive ſins, not only to men at their firſt converſion to Chriſt, but to the faithful all their life long. 4. 1. 22.

This doctrine is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture againſt the Novatians, and certain of the Anabaptiſts who feign that the people of God are by baptiſm regenerate into an angelic life, and afterward there remaineth no pardon for them that fall. 4. 1. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27.

A confutation of them who make a voluntary tranſgreſſion of the law a ſin unpardonable. 4. 1. 28.

Repentance.

Repentance cometh of faith, and goeth not before it. 3. 3. 1.

A confutation of their reaſons, who think otherwiſe, but hereby is not ſignified any ſpace of time wherein faith breedeth repentance: but only is ſhewed that no man can earneſtly endeavour himſelf to repentance unleſs he know himſelf to be God's. Of the error of certain Anabaptiſts, Jeſuits, and ſuch other, who appoint to their novices certain days for repentance. 3. 3. 2.

Certain learned men long before this time, made two parts of repentance, namely mortification, which they commonly call contrition, vivification which they wrongfully expound to be comfort by the feeling of the mercy of God: whereas it rather ſignifieth a deſire to live well. 3. 3. 3.

They do alſo make two other ſorts of repentance, the one of the law, the other of the goſpel: where alſo are ſhewed examples of either ſort out of the ſcripture ture. 3. 3. 4.

A true definition of repentance taken out of the ſcripture, and here repentance though it cannot be ſevered, yet ought to be diſtinguiſhed from faith. 3. 3. 5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of repentance: where firſt is ſhewed, that there is required a turning to God, that is to ſay, an alteration, not only in outward works, but alſo in the ſoul it ſelf. 3. 3. 6. then that it proceedeth of an earneſt fear of God: where alſo is treated of the ſorrowfulneſs that is according to God. 3. 3. 7.

Thirdly, that ſaying is declared that repentance conſiſteth of two parts, the mortification of the fleſh, and the quickening of the ſpirit. 3. 3. 8.

Both theſe things do we obtain by partaking of Chriſt, the firſt by communicating of his death, the ſecond of his reſurrection. Therefore repentance is a new forming of the image of God in us, and a reſtoring into the righteouſneſs of God by the benefit of Chriſt: and this reſtoring is not fulfilled in us in one moment. 3. 3. 9.

But there remaineth in all the ſaints, while they live in mortal body, matter of ſtrife with their fleſh, and ſo thought all the eccleſiaſtical writers that have been of ſound judgment: and eſpecially Auguſtine, who calleth this nouriſhment of evil, and diſeaſe of luſting in the elect, weakneſs, and ſometimes ſin: and indeed it is ſin. 3. 3. 10.

This is confirmed by the teſtimony of Paul, and by the ſum of the commandments. Whereas it is ſaid that God cleanſeth his church from all ſin, the ſame is ſpoken rather of the guiltineſs of ſin, then of the matter of ſin it ſelf, which ceaſeth not to dwell in the regenerate (but ceaſeth to reign in them) though it be not imputed. 3. 3. 11.

A declaration of the ſeven cauſes or effects, or parts or affections of repentance, which Paul rehearſeth. Thoſe be ſtudy or carefulneſs, excuſing, diſpleaſure, fear, deſire, zeal, revenge. Whereunto alſo is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in ſuch renewing we muſt keep a meaſure. 3. 3. 15.

The fruits of repentance are devotion toward God, charity toward men, holineſs and pureneſs in all our life; but all theſe ought to begin at the inward affection of the heart, from whence outward teſtimonies may afterward ſpring forth; where alſo is ſpoken of certain outward exerciſes of repentance, which the old writers ſeem to enforce ſomewhat too much. 3. 3. 16.

Turning of the heart to God is the chief point of repentance: ſackcloth and aſhes, weeping and faſting, were uſed of them in the old time before Chriſt, as token of public repentance; of which the two laſt may yet be uſed to appeaſe the wrath of God in the miſerable times of the church. 3. 3. 17.

The name of repentance or penance is unproperly drawn from its natural ſenſe to this outward profeſſion. Public confeſſion is not always neceſſary in ſins: but private confeſſion to God may never be omitted, wherein we ought to confeſs not only theſe things that we have lately committed, but the diſpleaſure of our grievous fall ought alſo to call us back to remembrance of our paſſed offences. Of ſpecial penance which is required of hainous offenders and certain others: and of the ordinances, which the children of God, even the moſt perfect, ought to uſe all their life long. 3. 3. 18.

God doth therefore freely juſtify them that be his, that he may alſo with the ſanctification of his ſpirit reſtore them into true righteouſneſs; therefore John, Chriſt, and the apoſtles preached repentance and remiſſion of ſins. The effect of which ſaying is declared. 3. 3. 19.

Chriſtians ought to exerciſe themſelves in a continual repentance, and he hath moſt profited, that hath learned moſt to miſlike himſelf. 3. 3. 20.

Repentance is a ſingular gift of God, unto which he calleth all men, which he giveth to all them whom he purpoſeth to ſave, and which the apoſtle pronounceth, that it ſhall never be given to wilful apoſtates whoſe wickedneſs is unpardonable, that is to ſay, ſuch as have ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt. 3. 3. 8.

Although feigned repentance doth not pleaſe God, yet he ſometimes for a ſeaſon ſpareth hypocrites who make a ſhew of ſome converſion, which he doth not for their ſakes, but for common example, that we may learn more chearfully to give our minds to unfeigned repentance; and this is proved by the examples of Achab, Eſau, and the Iſraelites. 3. 3. 25.

The ſchool ſophiſters do foully err in thoſe definitions which they make of repentance, and no better do they divide it, when they part it into contrition of heart, confeſſion of mouth, and ſatisfaction of works; where is treated of certain queſtions which they move; whereupon is eaſily gathered, that they babble of things which they know not, when they ſpeak of repentance. 3. 4. 1.

When they require thoſe three things in repentance they muſt needs bind thereunto forgiveneſs of ſins: and if it be ſo, then are we moſt miſerable, foraſmuch as we can never have quietneſs of conſcience; which is proved firſt in that contrition of heart ſuch as they require. 3. 4. 2.

There is a great difference between the doctrine of ſuch contrition, and that contrition which the ſcripture requireth of ſinners, that they truly hunger and thirſt for the mercy of God. 3. 4. 3.

In what ſenſe the old writers thought that ſolemn penance, which was then required for hainous offences, might no more be often done then baptiſm. 4. 1. 29.

Reaſon of man.

Man's underſtanding is not ſo to be condemned of perpetual blindneſs, that we leave it no whit of underſtanding in any kind of thing: but it hath ſome knowlege inaſmuch as he is naturally carried with deſire to ſearch our truth: and yet this deſire by and by falleth into vanity, becauſe the mind of man cannot for dulneſs keep the right way to ſearch our truth, and for the moſt part he diſcerneth not of what things it is behoveful for him to ſeek the true knowlege. 2. 2. 12.

As touching earthly things it is proved by examples that the mind of man hath a ſharp underſtanding, as firſt of houſholds, ſince every man underſtandeth that the fellowſhip of men muſt be holden together by laws, and comprehendeth in mind the principles of thoſe laws. 2. 2. 13.

Alſo in liberal arts and handy crafts for learning whereof, yea for amplifying and garniſhing of the ſame, there is in man a certain aptneſs, although ſome be more apt than others. But the light of reaſon and underſtanding of men, i s ſo a general good quality in all men, that yet it is a free gift of Gods liberality toward every man: which thing God ſheweth when he createth ſome idiots and dull witted; alſo when he maketh one man to excel in ſharp invention, another in judgment, another in quickneſs of mind, again when he poureth into men ſingular motions according to every man's calling, and according to the time and matter that is to be done. 2. 2, 14, 17.

The invention of arts, the orderly teaching of deep and excellent knowlege thereof, which appear to have been in the old lawyers, philoſophers, phyſicians, being prophane men, do declare unto us, that the mind of men how much ſoever it be fallen from his firſt uprightneſs, is yet ſtill garniſhed with excellent gifts of God. 2. 2. 15.

They are the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt which the Lord giveth to whom he will, even to the ungodly for the public benefit of mankind; therefore we ought to uſe them although they be communicate unto us by the miniſtry of the wicked, to whom they are but tranſitory and fleeting, becauſe they are without the ſound foundation of truth 2. 2. 16.

It is ſhewed in the firſt two points that man's reaſon ſeeth nothing that concerneth the kingdom of God and heavenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to ſay, to know God, his fatherly favour toward us, and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. 2. 2. 18. and to that purpoſe are alleged divers teſtimonies of ſcripture. Sect. 19. 20. 21. In the third it ſeemeth that he hath ſome more underſtanding than in the other, foraſmuch as man is inſtructed by the law of nature to a right rule of life. But ſuch knowlege is unperfect in the unbelievers, and availeth to no other end, but to make them unexcuſable: neither do they by that natural light, ſee the truth in every thing. And here is expounded the ſaying of Themiſtius, that underſtanding in the univerſal definition is ſeldom deceived, but the error is when it deſcendeth to particular cauſes, and there is ſhewed that man's univerſal judgment in the difference of good and evil, is not always ſound and upright. For it attaineth not thoſe which are the chief things in the firſt table of the law, namely of confidence in God, &c. In theſecond table, altho' it have ſome more underſtanding, yet it appeareth that it ſometimes erreth; as when it judgeth that it is an abſurdity to ſuffer too imperious government, and not revenge wrongs; alſo it knoweth not the diſeaſe of deſire in the whole obſervation of the law. 2. 2. 22, 23, 24.

It is proved by the ſcripture, that the ſharpneſs of our reaſon in all the parts of our life, is nothing before the Lord, and our minds do reap the grace of enlightning, not only at the beginning, or for one day, bt at every moment. 2. 2. 25.

See under the title of free-will, certain things pertaining to this matter.

Reſurrection of Chriſt.

Without the reſurrection of Chriſt all is unperfect that we believe concerning his croſs, death and burial, thereof we receive three profits; foraſmuch as it hath both purchaſed us righteouſneſs before God, and is to us a pledge of the reſurrection to come, and by his life we are now regenerate into newneſs of life. 2. 16. 13.

A declaration of the hiſtory of the reſurrection of Chriſt. 3. 25. 3.

Laſt reſurrection.

Foraſmuch as the faithful, do chiefly need hope and patience, leſt they ſhould faint in the courſe of their calling; he hath ſoundly profited in the goſpel who is accuſtomed to a continual meditation of the bleſſed reſurrection. 3. 25. 1, 2.

The article concerning the laſt reſurrection, containeth a doctrine of great weight; grave and hard to believe; for the overcoming of which hardneſs by faith, the ſcripture giveth two helps, the example of Chriſt, and the almightineſs of God. 3. 25. 3, 4.

A confutation of the Sadducees, which deny the reſurrection; and of the Millenaries who appoint the kingdom of Chriſt to endure but a thouſand years. 3. 25. 5.

A confutation of their error, who imagine that ſouls at the laſt day ſhall not receive again the bodies wherewith they are now clothed, but ſhall have new and other bodies. 3. 25. 7, 8.

Of the manner of the laſt reſurrection. 3. 25. 8.

By what reaſon, the laſt reſurection, which is a ſingular benefit of Chriſt, is common alſo to the wicked and the accurſed of God. 3. 25. 2.

Sabbath.

AN expoſition of the fourth commandment, the end thereof, and the three cauſes whereupon we muſt note that it conſiſteth. 2. 8. 28.

The firſt cauſe is a ſhadowing of ſpiritual reſt, that is to ſay, of our ſanctification: this is is proved by divers places to have been the chief thing in the ſabbath, 2. 8. 29.

Why the Lord appointeth the ſeventh day. 2. 8. 30, 31.

This

This part, forasmuch as it was ceremonial, is taken away by the death of Christ. 2. 8. 31.

The two latter causes, that is to say, that there there should be certain days appointed for assemblies in the church, and that there should be given to servants, a rest from their labour, do serve for all ages. 2. 8. 32.

Of days of meeting in the church to hear the word of God and common prayers: where is spoken of observing of the sabbath. 2. 8. 32, 33. and of superstition to be avoided in this behalf. 2. 8. 34.

Sacraments.

What is a sacrament. 4. 14. 1.

For what reason the old writers used this word in that sense. 4. 14. 2, 13.

A sacrament is never without a promise going before, which the Lord sealeth by that mean, wherein he provideth help for our ignorance and dulness, and also for our weakness. 4. 14. 3, 5, 6. 12.

A sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward sign: but the sacramental word is to be taken otherwise than the papists think. 4. 14. 4.

Sacraments cease not to be testimonies of the grace of God, although they be given also to the wicked, which do gather to themselves more grievous damnation thereby. 4. 14. 7.

Our faith is so confirmed by sacraments, that yet it dependeth upon the inward effectual working of the spirit. 4. 14. 10, 11. and no virtue is to be put in the creatures. sect. 12.

A confutation of the devilish doctrine of the sophistical schools, that the sacraments of the new law do justify and do give grace, so that we do not stop it with deadly sin. 4. 14. 14.

Augustine's good distinction between a sacrament and thing of the sacrament, whereby it is proved that though God in sacraments do truly offer Christ yet the wicked receive nothing but the sacrament, that is to say, the outward sign. 4. 14. 15, 16.

We must not think that there is joined or fastened to the sacraments any secret virtue, whereby they by themselves do give us the graces of the Holy Ghost. 4. 14. 17.

In the old time God gave unto his people some sacraments in miracles and some in natural things. And there is spoken of the tree of life and of the rainbow. 4. 14. 18.

Sacraments are on the Lord's behalf testimonies of grace and salvation, and on our behalf tokens of our profession. 4. 14. 19.

The sacraments of the old church under the law, tended to the same end that our sacrament do, that is to say, Christ: whom yet our sacraments do more plainly represent wherefore the schoolmens doctrine is to be rejected, who say, that the old sacraments did shew a shadow of the grace of God, and ours do give it presently. 4. 14. 20, 21, 22, 23, &c.

The five falsly named sacraments.

When we deny those five to be sacraments, which are invented by men, we strive not about the name but the thing: because the papists will have them to be visible forms of invisible grace. 4. 19. 1.

Many reasons are brought, why it is not lawful for men to make sacraments. Also there is a difference to be put between sacraments, and other seremonies. 4. 19. 2.

The number of seven sacraments cannot be proved by the authority of the old church. 4. 19. 3.

Although the old church under the law, had more sacraments, yet at this day, the Christian church ought to be content with those two, which Christ hath ordained: and it is not lawful for men to make others, nor to add unto those any thing of their own. 4. 18. 20.

Sacrifices.

A difference between the sacrifices of Moses's law, and the supper of the Lord in the Christian church. 4. 18. 12.

What the name of a sacrifice properly signifieth: and of the divers kinds of sacrifices under the law: which may be devided into two sorts, whereof some may be called of thanksgiving and other some propitiatory or of cleansing. 4. 18. 13.

Our only propitiatory sacrifice, is the death of Christ. Sacrifices of thanksgiving we have many, as all the duties of charity, prayers, praises, giving of thanks, and all that we do to the worshipping of God. 4. 18. 13. 16, 17.

This manner of sacrificing is daily used in the church, and in the Supper of the Lord: and thereupon all christians are sacrificing priests.

Satisfactions papistical.

Of satisfaction, which they make the third thing in penance, of retaining the pain, the fault being forgiven and such like lies, which are all overthrown, by setting against the free forgiveness of sins, by the name of Christ. 3. 4. 25.

A confutation of the blasphemous error of the schoolmen that forgiveness of sins, and reconciliation is once done in baptism we must rise again by satisfactions. 3. 4. 26.

By such error Christ is spoiled of his honour, and the peace of conscience is troubled, forasmuch as they can never certainly determine, that their sins are forgiven them. 3. 4. 27.

In Daniel when Nebuchadnezzar is commanded to redeem his sins with righteousness: that same redeeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cause of pardon is not there set forth, but rather the manner of true conversion. The same is to be said of certain other places of scripture. 3. 4. 36.

An exposition of that place in the gospel, 'Many 'sins are forgiven her, because she hath loved much:' meaning that love is not the cause, but the proof of forgiveness. 3. 4. 37.

The old writers of the church did not speak of satisfactions in such sense as the papists do: for they understand that the penitent do make satisfaction to the the church, and not to God. 3. 4. 38, 39.

Scripture the word of God, and the authority thereof.

Men do not ſufficiently know God the Creator, and diſcern him from feigned gods, by conſideration of his creatures, unleſs they be alſo aſſiſted by the light of the word. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that are his not only ſince that he chooſe the Jews for his peculiar people, but alſo from the beginning, even toward Adam, Noah, and the other fathers. 1. 6. 1.

Either by oracles, or by viſions, or by the miniſtry of others, the fathers had the word which they were certainly perſuaded to be the word of God, whereby they knew the true GOD, the Creator and governor of all things: which word afterward, that he might provide for men in all ages, he cauſed to be written in the law and the prophets, as it were in public regiſters. 1. 6. 2, 3. in which place alſo is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture, that the doctrine of the word muſt be joined to the conſideration of creatures, leſt we conceive a fickle knowlege of God.

Of them who ſay that the authority of ſcripture dependeth upon the judgment of the church, and in how ill caſe we ſhould be, if it were ſo. 1. 7. 1.

This error is well confuted by the place of Paul in the ſecond chapter to the Epheſians, where he ſaith that the faithful are builded upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets. 1. 7. 2.

In what ſenſe Auguſtine ſaith, that he would not have believed the goſpel, unleſs the authority of the church did move him: which place they do cavilloufly wreſt to the confirmation of their error. 1. 7. 3.

Although there be many other arguments, which do prove, yea, do inforce the wicked to confeſs that the ſcripture came from God, yet by no other mean than by the ſecret teſtimony of the Holy Ghoſt, our hearts are truly perſuaded that it is God who ſpeaketh in the law, in the prophets, and in the goſpel. And this is proved by many places of Iſaiah. 1. 7. 4, 5.

The orderly diſpoſition of the wiſdom of God, the doctrine ſavouring nothing of earthlineſs, the goodly agreement of all the parts among themſelves, and eſpecially that baſeneſs of contemptible words, uttering the high myſteries of the heavenly kingdom, are ſecond helps to eſtabliſh the credit of ſcripture. 1. 8. 1, 2. 11.

Alſo the antiquity of the ſcripture, whereas the books of other religions, are latter than the books of Moſes, which yet doth not himſelf invent a new God, but ſetteth forth to the Iſraelites, the God of their fathers. 1. 8. 3, 4.

Whereas Moſes doth not hide the ſhame of Levi his father, nor the murmuring of Aaron his brother, and of Miriam his ſiſter, nor doth advance his own children: the ſame are argument, that in his book is nothing feigned by man. 1. 8. 4.

Alſo the miracles which happened, as well at the publiſhing of the law, as in all the reſt of time. 1. 8. 5.

Which miracles, when the prophane writers could not deny, they cavilled, that Moſes did them by magical arts. Which ſlander is confuted by moſt ſtrong reaſons. 1. 8. 6.

Alſo whereas Moſes ſpeaking in the perſon of Jacob, aſſigneth the government to the tribe of Juda, and where he telleth before of the calling of the Gentiles, whereof the one came to paſs four hundred years after, and the other almoſt two thouſand years; theſe are arguments, that it is God himſelf who ſpeaketh in the books of Moſes. 1. 8. 7.

Whereas Iſaiah telleth before of the captivity of the Jews, and their reſtoring by Cyrus (who was born a hundred years after the death of Iſaiah) and where Jeremiah before that the people was led away appointeth their exile to continue three-ſcore and ten years, whereas Jeremiah and Ezekiel, being far diſtant in places the one from the other, do agree in all their ſayings, where Daniel telleth before of things to come, for ſix hundred years after; theſe are moſt certain proofs, to eſtabliſh the authority of the books of the prophets. 2. 8. 8.

Againſt certain ungodly ſcoffers who aſk how we know that thoſe are the writings of Moſes and the prophets, which are read in their names; and how we know that there was ever any ſuch Moſes. 1. 8. 9.

Alſo of them that aſk, from whence the copies of the books of the ſcripture came to us, foraſmuch as Antiochus commanded them all to be burned. And there is ſpoken of the wonderful providence of God in preſerving them ſo many ages, among ſo many enemies, and ſo cruel perſecutions. 1. 8. 10.

The ſimplicity of ſpeech of the firſt three evangeliſts, containing heavenly myſteries, the phraſe of John thundering from on high with weighty ſentences, the heavenly majeſty ſhinning in the writings of Peter and Paul, the ſudding calling of Matthew from the board, the calling of Peter and John from their fiſher-boats the preaching of the goſpel, the converſion and calling of Paul, being an enemy, to apoſtleſhip, are ſigns of the Holy Ghoſt ſpeaking in them. 1. 8. 11.

The conſent of ſo many ages, of ſo ſundry nations, and of ſo diverſe minds in embracing the ſcripture, and the rare godlineſs of ſome, ought to eſtabliſh the authority thereof among us. 1. 8. 12.

Alſo the blood of ſo many martyrs who for the confeſſion thereof, have ſuffered death with a conſtant and ſober zeal of God. 1. 8. 13.

Againſt certain phrentic men, who forſaking the reading of ſcripture and learning, do boaſt of the ſpirit and do fly to revelations. 1. 9. 1, 2.

A confutation of their objections that it is not meet that the Spirit of God, to whom all things ought to be ſubject, ſhould be ſubject to the ſcriptures. 1. 9. 2.

Alſo where they ſay that we reſt upon the letter which ſlayeth. 1. 9. 3.

The Lord hath joined with a mutual knot the certainty of his doctrine and of his ſpirit. 1. 9. 3.

Such as the beholding of the heaven and earth and and other creatures doth point out God unto us, ſuch doth doth the ſcripture ſet him forth, that is to ſay, eternal, full of goodneſs, clemency, mercy, righteouſneſs, judgment and truth: and alſo to the ſame end. 1. 10. 1, 2.

What is to be thought of the power of the church in expoſition of ſcripture. 4. 9. 13.

The Romiſh doctors do wrongfully abuſe this colour to the confirmation of their errors and blaſphemies. 4. 9. 14.

Of ſinging in the church.

Voice and ſinging avail nothing in prayer, without affection of the heart. 3. 20. 31, 33.

Of the uſage of ſinging in churches. 3. 20. 32.

ſingle life.

Their ſhameleſneſs who do ſet forth the comelineſs of ſingle life for a thing neceſſary, to the great reproach of the old church. By what degrees this tyranny crept into the church: and how it cannot be defended by the pretence of certain old canons. 4. 12. 26, 27, 28.

Prieſts were forbidden to marry by wicked tyranny, and againſt the word of God, and againſt all equity. 4. 12. 23.

An anſwer to the adverſaries objection, that the prieſt muſt by ſome mark differ from the lay-people. 4. 12. 24.

The blaſphemy of the pope, ſaying that marriage is defiling and uncleanneſs of the fleſh. 4. 12. 24.

It is fond to defend the forbidding of marriage with the examples of the Levitical prieſts, which men they ſhould go into the ſanctuary, ly aſunder from their wives. 4. 12. 25.

Sin.

A confutation of Plato's ſaying, that men ſin not by ignorance: alſo of their opinion who ſay, that in all ſins there is an adviſed malice and frowardneſs. 2. 2. 22, 23, 25.

Againſt the falſe imagination of the ſophiſters concerning venial ſins, which they call deſires without a determined aſſent, which do not long reſt in the heart: it is proved that every ſin, even the lighteſt deſire deſerveth death, and is deadly, except in the ſaints who obtain pardon by the mercy of God. 2. 8. 58, 59.

A confutation of their fond diſtinction between deadly and venial ſins, and of their ſlander when they ſay that we make all ſins equal. 3. 4. 28.

How it is to be expounded, that God viſiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation: and whether ſuch avenging be unſeemly for the righteouſneſs of God. 2. 19. 20.

Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt.

The true definition of ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, and examples thereof out of the ſcripture. 3. 3. 22.

It is not one or another particular falling, but a general forſaking, the deſcription whereof is declared by the Apoſtle. Neither is it any wonder if God will be always unappeaſable to them that have ſo fallen 3. 3. 23. foraſmuch as he promiſeth pardon only to them that repent, which they ſhall never do. And though the ſcripture do ſay that ſome ſuch have groaned and cryed, yet that was not repentance or converſion, but rather a blind torment by deſperation. 3. 3. 24.

Of the ſoul.

That the ſoul or ſpirit of man is not only a breath, but an immortal ſubſtance, although it were created, is proved by conſcience, by the knowlege of God, and by ſo many excellent gifts wherewith the mind of man is endued, yea, and by thoſe things which it conceiveth in ſleep, and alſo by many arguments taken out of the ſcripture. 1. 15. 2. Finally by this that is ſaid, that man was created after the image of God. ſect. 3.

Againſt them that under the colour of nature do deny the providence and government of God uttering itſelf in the marvellous (and in a manner) innumerable powers of the ſoul. 1. 5. 4, 5.

A confutation of the error of the Manichees and of Servetus, that the ſoul is a derivation of the ſubſtance of God: alſo of the error of Oſiander, who acknowlegeth no image of God in man without an eſſential righteouſneſs. 1. 15. 5.

Concerning the immortality of the ſoul, in a manner none of the philoſophers hath certainly ſpoken: but they do bind the powers thereof to this preſent life, whereas the ſcripture doth ſo give to it the chief rule in government of life, that it alſo ſtirreth up man to the worſhipping of God. Alſo of the diverſity of ſouls, and of the diviſion of the powers of the ſoul according to the philoſophers. 4. 15. 6.

Another diviſion more agreeable with Chriſtian doctrine, that is to ſay, that the powers of the ſoul are underſtanding and will: the office and force of either of them in man's firſt eſtate. 1. 15. 7, 8.

That there yet remaineth ſomewhat of the ſeed of religion yet imprinted even in the corruption of the ſoul. 1. 15. 16.

Of their error who thought that the whole man periſheth by death, and that the ſoul at the laſt ſhall riſe again with the bodies. 3. 25. 6.

Of the ſtate of ſouls from death to the laſt day. 3. 25. 6.

A deſcription taken out of Bernard, of the miſeries of a faithful ſoul, being conſidered as it is in itſelf, and of itſelf: and on the other ſide, of the aſſured glorifying of a faithful ſoul in Chriſt, who blotteth out all her unworthineſs. 3. 2. 25.

Superſtition.

The ſimplicity of the ſuperſtitious doth not excuſe them, becauſe their blindneſs is found to be mingled with vanity, pride, and obſtinacy. 1. 4. 1, 3.

When ſuperſtition goeth about to pleaſe God, it mocketh him with lying colours. 1. 4. 3.

The ſuperſtitious do not approach unto God but againſt their will and with ſervile fear. 1. 4. 4

Whoſoever do corrupt the true religion, although they follow the conſent of antiquity or the cuſtom of any city, yet they depart from the one and true God. 1. 5. 12.

It is proved by the etymology of the words, ſuper-tition, religion, Eusebia or godliness, what difference is between religion and superstition. 1. 12. 1.

The craft of superstition, when granting the chief place to the one God it besetteth him with a rout of smaller gods. 1. 12, 1, 3.

Supper of the Lord.

Of the bread and wine the signs in the holy supper: and it is declared by his own words at his supper, why the Lord willed that we should use them. 4. 17. 1.

We gather a great fruit of confidence and sweetness out of this sacrament, which testifieth that we are so grown together into one body with Christ, that whatsoever is his, we may lawfully call it ours. 4. 17. 2.

This is declared by the words of the supper. 4. 17. 3.

The chief office of the sacrament is not to give unto us the body of Christ without any higher consideration, but rather to seal that promise wherein he testifieth that eis flesh is verily meat. 4. 17. 4.

The supper maketh not Christ then first to begin to be the bread of life, but that we should feel the force of that bread. He once gave his flesh for the life of the world, and daily giveth it to them that are his. We must beware that we do not too much abase or advance the signs. The eating of the flesh of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith. 4. 17. 5.

So thought Chrysostom and Augustine and in what sense Augustine saith, that in believing we eat the flesh of Christ. 4. 17. 6.

They do not say enough, who passing over the mention of flesh and blood, do think that we are made partakers only of the spirit of Christ. The mystery of the supper is so great, that neither the tongue can express with speaking, nor the heart comprehend with thinking the greatness thereof. 4. 17. 7.

How far the perfect communicating of Christ extendeth. Where is delared that Christ, who from the beginning was the life giving word of the Father, made the flesh which he took upon him to be also life giving to us. 4. 17. 8, 9.

The faithful do truly eat of the same flesh how great distance of place soever there are between them and it. 4. 17. 10.

The mystery of the supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signs, and the spiritual truth: which spiritual truth containeth three things, signification, matter, and effect. 4. 17. 11.

Of the the transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, which the craftsmen of the court of Rome have forged. 4. 17. 12, 13, &c. and 20.

They are without testimony of antiquity. And in what sense the old writers said, that in the consecration is made a secret turning. Also the signification of the supper agreeth not unless the substance of the outward signs remain. 4. 17. 14.

The bread is a sacrament to none but to men to whom the word is directed. And here are confuted certain arguments of the teachers of transubstantiation. 4. 17. 15.

Of some men, who though they do at one word grant that the substance of the signs remaineth, yet placing the body of Christ in bread and under bread, they fall back into the local presence, and feign a being every where. 4. 17. 16, 17, 18, 20.

A confutation of their objections. 4. 17. 21, 22. 23, &c.

It is proved that this doctrine is not maintained, neither by the testimony of Augustine, nor by authority of scripture. 4. 17. 28, 29, 30, 31.

A confutation of certain other of their objections, and chiefly of this that they say, that whatsoever we teach of spiritual eating, is against the true and real eating: where also is declared that the body of Christ is in the supper offered to the infidels, but they receive it not. 4. 17. 33.

Neither can the saying of Augustine be drawn to this purpose, that the sacraments are nothing appaired by the infidelity of men. Which is proved by diverse other testimonies of the same man. 4. 17. 34.

How the body and blood of Christ is given to us in the supper, and what manner of presence of Christ we ought to hold therein. 4. 17. 18, 19, 32.

Of the exposition of the words of Christ in the supper. 4. 17, 20, 21.

The body of Christ is contained in quantity, and comprehended in heaven until the last day, as it is proved by the scriptures. 4. 17, 26, 27.

Of the papists carnal adoration, and concomitance, and consecration of the host (as they call it) and carrying it about in pomp. 4. 17. 35, 36, 37.

The mystery of the supper ought to stir us up to giving of thanks, to exercise us in remembring the death of Christ, to kindle us to holiness of life, and chiefly to charity. 4. 17, 37, 38.

In the papacy the supper (the true ministration whereof is not without the word) is turned into a dumb action. And here is spoken of the laying up of the sacrament to be extraordinarily distributed to sick men. 4. 17. 39.

The doctrine of the papists, when they go about to prepare men to the worthiness of eating the body of Christ, doth in cruel wise torment consciences: and the devil could not by any readier way destroy men. Of the best remedy to avoid this destruction. They err who in the supper do require of the faithful perfection of faith. 4. 17. 41, 42.

As touching the outward usage of the ministration of the supper, there are many things indifferent: and how it ought to be ministred most comely. 4. 17. 43.

Of the small assembly at this day at the partaking of the supper, which is a token of contempt, wherewith the holy fathers in old time were much displeased: and how the custom which commandeth men to communicate once every year, was a most certain invention of the devil 4. 17. 44, 45, 46.

It is proved by authority of the scripture and by the usage of the old church, four hundred years before the death death of Gregory, and by many other arguments, that the conſtitution which took away from lay-men the cup of the Lord, came out of the devils work-ſhop. 4. 17. 47, 48, 49, 50.

Of the concomitance of the blood in the fleſh of Chriſt, which is a popiſh invention. 4. 17. 47.

The ſupper of the Lord is prophanely abuſed, if it be given to all men without choice. Of the duty of miniſters in rejecting the unworthy. 4, 12. 5.

A brief ſum of thoſe things which we ought to know concerning the two ſacraments. And why the ſupper is oftentimes miniſtred, and baptiſm but once. 4. 18. 19.

Swearing.

An expoſition of the third commandment, in which theſe three things are contained, that we neither think nor ſpeak any thing of God, nor of his word and honourable myſteries, nor yet of any of his works, otherwiſe than reverently. 2. 8. 22.

A definition of ſwearing; where is declared that it is a kind of worſhipping of God. And therefore we muſt beware that our oaths contain not any diſhonour to the name God, which is done in foreſwearing: or any contempt of it, which is done in ſuperfluous oaths, or in which the name of any other than God is uſed. 2. 8. 23, 24, 25.

It is proved by ſcripture againſt the Anabaptiſts: that all oaths are not forbidden us, that Chriſt in the goſpel changed nothing as touching the rule of ſwearing, ſet forth in the law. 2. 8. 26. Which is proved by his own example: and not only public, but alſo private oaths are permitted, keeping the moderation which the law commandeth, 2. 8. 27.

Temples.

OF temples of chriſtian men for aſſemblies of the congregation. 3. 20. 30.

It is proved by the authority of the old church, and the reaſons of Auguſtine, that it is not expedient, that there ſhould be any images in chriſtian temples. 1. 11. 13.

The preaching of the word and the ſacraments, are lively images which only are fit to be in chriſtian temples. 1. 11. 7, 13.

The wickedneſs of the Nicene ſynod which was holden by the commandment of Irene the empreſs, and the filthy follies thereof in allowing images in temples, and the worſhipping of them. 1. 11. 14, 15, 16.

Of the garniſhing of temples and holy things in the old church. 4. 4. 8. and 4. 5. 18.

Temptations.

Of diverſe kinds of temptations: and in what ſenſe it is ſaid that God tempteth us. 3. 20. 46.

Teſtament, Old, and New.

Of the likeneſs of the Old, and New Teſtaments: where is declared, that they are all one in ſubſtance and matter, but only do differ in miniſtration. The likeneſs ſtandeth chiefly in three points. 2. 10. 1, 2. The firſt point is that the Old Teſtament did not hold the fathers in earthly felicity, but had chief regard to the life to come. Which is proved by Paul, who ſaith that the promiſes of the goſpel are contained under it. 2. 10. 3.

The ſame alſo is proved by the law and the prophets: firſt, by conſidering the words of the covenant; I am your God. 2. 10. 7, 8.

Again, I will be the God of your ſeed after you. ſect. 9. Alſo by the life of the fathers, as Adam, Abel, Noah, ſect. 10. Abraham, ſect. 11. Iſaac, Jacob, ſect. 12, 13, 14. And by many teſtimonies of David. ſect. 15, 17, 17, 18. Of Job, ſect. 19. Generally of all the latter prophets, ſect. 20. But namely of Ezekiel. ſect. 21. Of Iſaiah and Daniel, ſect. 22. A concluſion of this point with rehearſing certain teſtimonies out of the New Teſtament. ſect. 23.

The ſecond point is that the Old Teſtament did not ſtand upon the merits of men, but upon the free mercy of God. The third point is that the covenant of the fathers with God, did then ſtand upon like knowlege of Chriſt the mediator. 2. 10. 4.

Alſo in ſignification of ſacraments the Iſraelites under the law were equal with the chriſtian people. 2. 10. 5. 6.

There are four differences of the old Teſtament from the new, whereunto we may add a fifth. The firſt is, that although in the old time alſo the Lord's will was to direct the ſouls of his people to the heavenly inheritance: yet to the end that they might be the better nouriſhed in the hope thereof, he gave it them to be holden, and after a certain manner taſted under earthly benefits. But now the grace of the life to come, being more clearly revealed by the goſpel, he directeth our minds the ſtraight way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exerciſing which he uſed among the Iſraelites. 2. 11. 1.

Therefore the old church is compared to an heir under age, which is governed by guardians. 2. 11. 2.

For this reaſon, the Fathers ſo much eſteemed this life, and the bleſſings thereof. 2. 11. 3.

The ſecond difference is in figures wherewith the Old Teſtament did ſhew forth the image and ſhadow of ſpiritual good things. The New Teſtament giveth the preſent truth and perfect body. There is alſo a reaſon ſhewed why the Lord kept this order: and a definition of the Old Teſtament. 2. 11. 4.

In this ſenſe it is ſaid, that the Jews were by the introduction or ſchooling of the law led unto Chriſt: before that he was delivered in the fleſh. 2. 11. 5. which appeared in the moſt excellent prophets that were endued with ſingular grace of the ſpirit. ſect. 6.

The third difference is taken out of the one and thirty chapter of Jeremiah, and the third chapter of the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians, that the Old Teſtament is literal, and the New Teſtament is ſpiritual: the Old bringeth death, the New is the inſtrument of

The fourth difference is, that the ſcripture calleth the Old Teſtament, the Teſtament of bondage becauſe it engendereth fear in mens minds: but the New is called the Teſtament of liberty, becauſe it raiſeth them up to confidence and ſurety. The three latter differences are compariſons of the law and the goſpel. The firſt containeth alſo the promiſes made before the law. The fathers lived ſo under the law and the Old Teſtament, that they ſtayed not there, but always aſpired to the New, yea and embraced a certain communicating thereof. 2. 11. 9, 10.

The fifth difference is, that before the coming of Chriſt, the Lord had ſevered one nation, in which he would keep the covenant of his grace, in the mean time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles is a certain ſign, wherewith the excellency of the New Teſtament is ſet forth above the old: a thing ſo incredible, that it ſeemed yet new to the apoſtles themſelves, being exerciſed in reading of the prophets, and endued with the Holy Ghoſt. 2. 11. 11, 12.

A concluſion of this matter, and an anſwer to diverſe objections of ſome men, who ſay that this variety in the church, this diverſe manner of teaching, ſo great change of uſages and ceremonies, is a great abſurdity. Where is declared that the conſtancy of God appeareth in this changing, and he hath done nothing but wiſely, righteouſly, and in mercy, when he governeth his church, after one ſort in childhood and after another ſort in riper age, and alſo when he did keep cloſe in one people the ſhewing forth of his grace before the coming of Chriſt, which afterward he poured forth upon all nations. 2. 11. 13, 14.

Theft.

An expoſition of the eight commandment: where is treated of divers kinds of theft, and ſome which although men judge otherwiſe yet are accounted thefts before God. And ſo he that doth not perform that which by the office of his calling he oweth to others, is a thief. 2. 8. 43.

What we ought to do, that we may obey this commandment, is ſhewed by divers examples according to the diverſity of perſons and offices. 2. 8. 46, Traditions.

Foraſmuch as the Lord, willing to teach a rule of true righteouſneſs, hath drawn all the parts thereof to his own will, thereby it appeareth, that all the good works which men deviſe of their own wits, are nothing worth before him: but the true worſhipping ſtandeth upon obedience only, which is the beginning, mother and preſerver of all virtues. 2. 8. 5.

Of traditions of men, that is to ſay, ordinances proceeding from men, concerning the worſhipping of God; and of the ungodlineſs and uſeleſneſs of them. 4. 10. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8.

A diviſion of popiſh conſtitutions, which they call traditions of the church, into ſuch as contain ceremonies and other who are ſaid to pertain to diſcipline. The wickedneſs of both ſorts, becauſe they place the worſhip of God in them, and conſciences are bound with preciſe neceſſity of them. 4. 10. 9.

For them the commandment of God is made void. 4. 10, 10.

A true mark of mens tradition, which ought to be rejected of the church, and of all godly men. 4. 10. 16.

A confutation of the pretence which ſome men uſe that defend popiſh traditions to be of God, becauſe the church cannot err, and is governed by the Holy Ghoſt. 4. 10. 17.

It is a mere mockery to ſay, that the apoſtles were authors of the traditions, wherewith the church hath heretofore been oppreſſed. 4. 10. 18, 19, 20.

The example of the apoſtles, when they commanded the Gentiles to abſtain from things offered unto idols, from ſtrangled, and from blood, is falſely alleged to excuſe the tyranny of the Pope's laws. 4. 10. 21, 22.

The Lord's kingdom is taken from him, when he is worſhipped with the laws of mens traditions: which is proved by examples and teſtimonies of ſcripture to have always been a moſt hainous offence in the ſight of God. 4. 10. 23, 24.

The inventions of men connot be defended by the example of Manoah, who being a private man offered ſacrifice, nor of Samuel who ſacrificed in Ramath. 4. 10. 25. nor of Chriſt who willed men to bear the burdens that the ſcribes and Phariſees did bind together. 4. 10. 26.

Of holy and profitable ordinances of the church, and the end that they tend unto. 4. 10. 1.

Of ſuch ordinances of the church as ought to be accounted holy, namely thoſe which ſerve for comelineſs, or do preſerve order and peace in the church. 4. 10. 27, 28, 29. We muſt wiſely conſider, which be of that ſort. 4. 10. 30.

It is the duty of chriſtian people, to obſerve ſuch ordinances: and what errors herein are to be taken heed of; and how in the mean time, the liberty of conſciences may ſtill be preſerved ſafe, 4. 10. 31, 32.

Tributes.

Of tributes, taxes, impoſitions, and finances, which are paid to princes; and how princes may uſe them with a good conſcience. 4. 20. 13.

Trinity.

In one ſimple eſſence of God, we muſt diſtinctly conſider three perſons, or (as the Greeks call them) Hypoſtaſes. 1. 13. 2.

A confutation of them who in this matter do condemn the name of perſon, and reject it for newneſs. 1. 13. 3, 4, 5.

The holy doctors have been compelled to invent certain new words, to defend the truth of God againſt certain ſubtle men, who mocked it out with ſhifting; as againſt Arius they invented this word Homouſion conſubſtantial, and againſt Sabellicus the name of three properties ſies or perſons. 1. 13. 4, 16.

The divers ſentences of Jerom, Hillary, and Auguſtine, in the uſe of theſe words. 1. 13. 5.
What we call a perſon, when we treat of the Trinity. 1. 13. 6.
Of the error of Servetus, in the taking of this word Perſon. 1. 13. 22.
As God hath more clearly opened himſelf by the coming of Chriſt, ſo he is ſince that time more familiarly made known in the three Perſons. 1. 13. 16.
Teſtimonies of ſcripture, whereby is ſhewed the diſtinction of the Father from the word, and of the word from the Spirit. 1. 13. 17.
Alſo in the ſcripture there is a diſtinction made of the Father, from the Word, and the Spirit, and of the Spirit from them both, as well by obſervation of order, as by prophecies aſcribed to them. 1. 13. 18.
This diſtinction of perſons maketh not againſt the moſt ſimple unity of God. 1. 13. 19.
In what ſenſe the fathers ſay, that the Father is the beginning of the Son, and yet that the Son hath his eſſence of himſelf. 1. 13. 19.
A brief ſum of thoſe things which we ought to believe concerning the one eſſence of God and the three perſons. 1. 13. 2.
And herein we muſt diſpute ſoberly, and with great moderation, that neither our thought nor our tongue, do paſs beyond the bounds of the word of God. 1. 13. 21.
A confutation of the doting errors of Servetus in this point of doctrine. 1. 13. 22.
A confutation of the error of certain lewd men, who ſay, that the Father is truly and properly the one only God, who in making the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, did pour his Godhead into them. 1. 13. 23.
It is falſe which they ſay, that when mention is made of God in the ſcripture, only the Father is meant thereby. 1. 13. 24.
Alſo it is falſe which they dream of undivided ſubſtances, of which every one hath a part of the eſſence 1. 13. 25.
An anſwer to their objection, that Chriſt, if he be properly God, is wrongfully, called the Son of God. 1. 13. 26.
An anſwer to many places which they bring out of Irenæus for proof of their opinion, where he affirmeth the Father of Chriſt to be the one only and eternal God of Iſrael. 1, 13. 27.
Alſo to the places of Tertullian. ſect. 28.
It is proved that Juſtine, Hilary, and Auguſtine, do make of our ſide. 1. 13. 19.
The Son is of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. 4. 8. 16.

U.

Laſt unction as they call it.

WHat manner of adminiſtration is of the popiſh laſt unction, and in what form of words: and how it cannot be defended by the authority of James, or by the example of the apoſtles. 4. 19. 18.
Foraſmuch as the grace of healing which was in the old time given to the apoſtles, hath long ago ceaſed in the church ſect. 19. 20. And though it ſtill remained, yet this their wicked obſervation is far from that holy ceremony of the apoſtles. A declaration of the blaſphemies thereof when they conjure the oil, and aſcribe unto it that which is proper to the Holy Ghoſt. 4. 19. 21.

Vocation.

SEE calling.

Vows.

Of vows which are made againſt the expreſs word of God: whether they may well be vowed of chriſtian men, and how they are to be eſteemed. 4. 13. 1, 6.
Three things are to be conſidered in vows: who it is to whom we vow, namely God who delighteth in obedience 4. 13. 2. Who we be that do vow, that we meaſure our own ſtrength and look upon our calling, that we neglect not the benefit of liberty which God hath given to us. ſect. 3. And with what mind we vow. ſect. 4.
Of the prieſts, monks and nuns vows of ſingle life, 4. 13. 3, 17, 18, 19.
There be four ends of vows, two have reſpect to the time paſt, and two to the time to come. 4. 13. 4, 5.
There is one common vow of all the faithful which they make in baptiſm. 4. 13. 6.
Of the raſhneſs and ſuperſtition of the world in making of vows, 4. 13. 17.

W.

Of wars.

WArs are lawful, when magiſtrates are driven of neceſſity to take weapon in hand, to execute public revenge upon thoſe that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they be civil or foreign enemies. 4. 20. 11.
It maketh not to the contrary hereof, which many allege, that there is not in the New Teſtament any teſtimony or example which proveth that war is a thing lawful for chriſtians. But magiſtrates ought to take great heed, that in taking of weapon in hand, they nothing at all follow their own luſts. As war, ſo garriſons alſo, leagues and civil fortifications are things lawful for chriſtians to uſe. 4. 20. 12.

Will of God.

Of the ſecret will of God. Alſo of another will, whereunto anſwereth willing obedience. 3. 20. 43. and 3. 24. 1, 7.

Will of man.

Whether the will of man be in every part throughly defiled and corrupted, ſo that it bringeth forth nothing but evil: or whether it yet retain ſome liberty of choice. Where is declared the common ſaying taken out of the philoſophers, that all things by natural diſpoſition covet that which is good. And there is ſhewed that the liberty of will cannot be proved thereby 2. 2. 26.

The ſoul hath not only a weak power but no power at all of it ſelf to aſpire to goodneſs. And ſince the whole man is ſubject to the dominion of ſin, it is proved by teſtimonies of ſcripture and of Auguſtine, that the will of man is bound, with moſt ſtraight bonds. 2. 2. 27.

Man by his fall loſt not his will, but the ſoundneſs of his will, ſo that he cannot move, much leſs apply himſelf to goodneſs, but is neceſſarily drawn or led unto evil, howbeit not by compulſion but voluntarily. Which is proved by Auguſtine and Bernard, a large declaration of the difference between compulſion and neceſſity. 2. 3. 5.

Since the Lord both beginneth and perfiteth good in our hearts, ſince he worketh in us to will that is to ſay the good will, ſince he createth a new heart, taketh away the ſtony heart and giveth a fleſhy heart, it followeth, that the will of man is utterly corrupted and hath no goodneſs at all. 2.3.6.

It is clearly proved by reaſons and divers teſtimonies of ſcripture, that God worketh good will in them that are his, not only in preparing or turning them from the beginning ſo as it may afterward do ſome good of it ſelf. But becauſe it is his only work that will conceiveth a love of goodneſs, that it is enclined to the ſtudy thereof, that it is ſtirred and moved to an endeavour to follow it, and again that the choice ſtudy, and endeavour do not faint, but proceed to effect, finally that man goeth conſtantly forward in them and continueth to the end. 2. 3. 7, 8, 9.

Therefore it is proved by the authority of ſcripture and of Auguſtine that this which hath been taught theſe many ages, that God ſo moveth our will, that it is afterward in our own choice to obey or diſobey his motion and other like ſayings are utterly falſe. 2. 3. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14.

Alſo in doings, which of themſelves are neither righteous nor unrighteous, and belong rather to the bodily than the ſpiritual life, the will of man is not free, but by the ſpecial motion of God is enclined to clemency, mercy, wrath, fear, and other diverſe affections, when it pleaſeth him to make way for his providence. Which is proved by ſcripture, by daily experience, and by the authority of Auguſtine. 2. 4. 6, 7.

Works.

A compariſon of the pureneſs of God with all the righteouſneſs of men. 3. 12. 4, 5.

All the offspring of Adam being divided into four kinds of men, it is proved that they have no holineſs, or righteouſneſs: firſt in them who are endued with no knowlege of God, in whom although there do ſometimes appear excellent qualities (which are the gifts of God) yet there is in them nothing pure. 3. 14. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

The ſame is ſhewed in them who being profeſſed by ſacraments, are chriſtians only in name, denying God in their deeds; alſo in hypocrites who with vain falſe colours do hide the wickedneſs of their heart. 3. 14. 7, 8.

Finally, it is proved that even the children of God truly regenerated by his Spirit, cannot ſtand by any righteouſneſs of their own works before the judgement of God becauſe they can bring forth no good work that is not ſprinkled with ſome uncleanneſs of the fleſh, and therefore damnable. Moreover although they could bring forth any ſuch work, yet one ſin is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteouſneſs. 3. 14. 9, 10, 11.

A confutation of the papiſts ſhifts concerning the righteouſneſs of works: and eſpecially of the ſame horrible monſter of works of ſupererogation. 3. 14. 12, 13. 14, 15.

When we treat of works we muſt thruſt two peſtilences out of our minds: that we put no truſt in the righteouſneſs of our own works, and that we aſcribe no glory unto them. 3. 14. 16.

The ſcripture ſetteth out and declareth four kinds of cauſes in eſtabliſhing our ſalvation; and it is proved that in them all there is no regard of works. 3. 14. 17.

Where ſometimes the ſaints do bolden themſelves with remembrance of their own innocency and uprightneſs: how the ſame is to be taken: and how it doth in no wiſe abate any thing from the free righteouſneſs in Chriſt. 3. 14. 18, 19, 20.

Where the ſcripture ſaith that the good works of the works of the faithful do move God to do them good, the order is therein rather expreſſed than the cauſe. 3. 14. 21.

Why the Lord in the ſcripture calleth good works ours, and promiſeth reward to them. 3. 15. 3,

A confutation of the ſophiſters invention, concerning moral works, whereby men are made acceptable to GOD, before that they be grafted in Chriſt. 3. 15. 6. and 17. 4.

Thoſe rewards are given to the works of the faithful, which the Lord in his law hath promiſed to the followers of righteouſneſs: but thereof there are three cauſes to be conſidered. 3. 17. 3.

We may note in the ſcripture two acceptances of man with God, of which the latter although it have reſpect to the good works of the faithful, yet is alſo the free mercy of God. 3. 17. 4, 5.

When it is ſaid that God doth good to them that love him, here is not rehearſed a cauſe why he ſhould do them good, but rather the manner of what ſort they be by his grace. 3. 17. 6.

An expoſition of certain place wherein the ſcripture giveth to good works the name of righteouſneſs. And there is ſhewed that thoſe places are not againſt the doctrine of juſtification of faith. 3. 17. 7.

One good work or many do not ſuffice for righteouſneſs before God, although one ſin ſuffice to condemn. And here the principle hath no place, the contraries contraries have all one rule. 3. 18. 10.

Why the Lord said that he rendereth to works that which he had freely given before works. 3. 18. 3. And therein he helpeth our weakness lest we should be discouraged. 3. 18. 4, 6, 7.
Hereupon dependeth the righteousness of the good works which the faithful do, that by pardon they are allowed of God. 3. 18.
